In Blackburn v. Webb, 65 P. 952, 133 Cal. 420, the court said:

"It is also true that under section 867 of the Civil Code, as it now reads, the beneficiary of a trust for the receipt of the rents and profits of real property may transfer his right thereto (Fatjo v. Swasey [44 P. 225] 111 Cal. 628), notwithstanding the provisions of section 863 of the Civil Code."

It is apparent that there is no provision in the trust deed under consideration here which inhibits Emily Lawton from transferring her beneficial interest thereunder. She could sell, assign, convey, or incumber such interest for any purpose she saw fit, and, under the circumstances here and the authorities heretofore cited, it passed to her trustee in bankruptcy, and through him to the plaintiffs.

"The beneficial interest of a bankrupt in property held in trust for him passes to his trustee in bankruptcy." 1 Remington on Bankruptcy, § 973, p. 545.

A case similar to the instant one is found in Loomer v. Loomer, 57 A. 167, 76 Conn. 522. The facts appear from the following extract from the decision:

"It appears, therefore, that the testator's two sons, Lyman H. and Andrew F., at the time of their adjudication as bankrupts, were each, as cestuis que trustent, entitled, under the paragraph of the will in question, to receive one-eighth of the net income of the trust estate during the continuance of the trust to pay income as aforesaid, and were each the owner of an equitable remainder in fee in an undivided one-eighth of the trust estate, with the right to have the full legal title thereto upon the termination of the trust.

"It needs no argument to show that, upon the adjudication in bankruptcy of Lyman and Andrew, all their remainder title and interest passed to the trustee in bankruptcy. National Bankrupt Act (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 70a, 30 Stat. 565 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3451]). It is, however, contended that their rights to the income under the trust did not so pass. Whatever may be said upon the much-mooted question as to the legality of so-called spendthrift trusts, it is clear that the trust in question possesses none of the attributes of the trusts so described. The beneficial interests are absolute, and left wholly unrestrained and under the control of the beneficiaries. Such equitable estates, we have repeatedly held, are alienable, and may be subjected to the rights of creditors upon attachment and execution. Ives v. Beecher, 54 A. 207, 75 Conn. 564, and cases there cited. The equitable interests in question, therefore, passed to the trustee in bankruptcy, who thus, by virtue of the bankruptcy proceedings, came to stand in the shoes of the two bankrupts, as respects their rights under the paragraph of the will in question.

"As between the trustee in bankruptcy and the claimant Hubbell, to whom, on February 19, 1903, he conveyed the right, title, and interest of the two bankrupts in and to the lands in question, we understand that there is no dispute as to their respective rights. The trustee claims that share of the income to which the two bankrupts would have been entitled on February 19, 1903, had they not been adjudicated bankrupts; and Hubbell claims such share of subsequently accruing income, and their undivided shares in remainder in the real estate itself. These claims are well founded."

It follows from the foregoing discussion that the plaintiff in the instant case succeeded to all the rights of Emily Lawton as cestui que trust under the deed of trust, as well as all interest in remainder granted to her and to her children, Alfred and David.

[6] One other question remains to be determined, and that relates to the termination of the trust. Appellant contends that the trust is terminated because its purpose has ceased—that its object was to pay the income from the property to Emily Lawton—and since her beneficial interest has passed to plaintiffs, there is no useful purpose to be served by continuing the trust in force and effect. This argument loses sight of the fact that the trustee was to manage the property, rent or lease the same, pay taxes, assessments and charges, and thus preserve it for the contingent remaindermen. While the contingent interests of Emily Lawton and Alfred and David Lawton have passed to plaintiffs, there remain outstanding contingent interests of children who may yet be born to Emily Lawton and survive her at the time of the death of the trustee. Such interests have not passed to plaintiffs, and the trust continues for their protection. The case of Fletcher v. Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, 187 P. 425, 182 Cal. 177, presents a similar question. We do not agree with appellant's differentiation of the two cases. In principle the cases are the same, although there is some variation in the facts. In the Fletcher Case the court refused to terminate a trust under which Mrs. Fletcher was to receive the net income of property during her lifetime, with remainders over to her children. The refusal of the court was based upon the legal possibility of Mrs. Fletcher thereafter having children, and hence all the beneficiaries or possible beneficiaries were not sui juris and before the court consenting to the termination. We conclude, therefore, that the trust created by the deed from Gerhard H. Kallmeyer to Sarah Jane Kallmeyer is not terminated.

[7] But it is also argued that the trustee by the execution of the instrument transferring all her right, title, and interest in the property to Emily Lawton, resigned as trustee, and terminated the trust. The foregoing discussion disposes of the last contention. The trust was not terminated by the consent of the trustee and the beneficiaries, because some of the possible beneficiaries may later come into existence.

As to the discharge of the trustee, we quote the following from 1 Perry on Trusts (6th Ed.) § 274, p. 470:

"If a trustee once accepts the office, he cannot by his sole action be discharged from its duties. Having once entered upon the management of the trust, he must continue to perform its duties until he is discharged in one of three ways: First, he may be removed and discharged, and a new trustee substituted in his place, by proceedings before a court having jurisdiction over the trust; second, he may be discharged, and a new trustee appointed, by the agreement and concurrence of all the parties interested in the trust; and, third, he may be discharged, and a new trustee appointed, in the manner pointed out in the instrument creating the trust, if it makes any provisions upon that subject. Mere abandonment of the trust will not vest the trust property in the hands of his co-trustee, nor relieve a trustee from liability."

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a decree that the defendant Sarah Jane Kall-meyer is the owner and holder of the legal title to the property in controversy for the period of her natural life, as a trustee, however, to pay the net income therefrom to plaintiffs, who are the owners and holders of the beneficial interest in said property during the lifetime of the said trustee, and that the plaintiffs are the owners and holders of the contingent interests in remainder after the termination of said legal life estate, which were granted to Emily Lawton and Alfred and David Lawton by the deed from Gerhard H. Kallmeyer to Sarah Jane Kallmeyer.

HOWARD v. BURROW. (Civ. 5402.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 10, 1926. Rehearing Denied April 8, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 3, 1926.)

1. Brokers ⇐50—Broker not entitled to commission under contract to lease property, where landlord's agreement with tenant was made after its expiration.

Broker was not entitled to commission under contract to lease certain property, where tenant and landlord did not reach agreement until two days after expiration of such contract, notwithstanding he was instrumental in obtaining tenant.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇐22(1)—Agreement to lease, which provided that landlord should approve plans and specifications for alterations, held unenforceable, where such plans and specifications had not been prepared.

Agreement to lease, which provided that landlord should approve plans and specifications for alterations, held unenforceable, where such plans and specifications had not been prepared at time of its execution, since minds had not met on this material element.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by E. A. Howard against G. W. Burrow. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Earl D. White, of Oakland (Gus L. Baraty, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Clarence E. Todd, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant for compensation claimed to have been earned by him as a broker. The defendant appeared and filed an answer and a cross-complaint. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, and a trial was had on the issues presented by those pleadings. As the trial court was sitting without a jury, it made findings. Those findings were in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed and has brought up a bill of exceptions.

After a short conversation between them the defendant wrote out, signed, and delivered to the plaintiff a writing as follows:

"Campbell Cal.

Mar 28, 1924

"On consideration of securing the services of E. A. Howard. And efforts on his part. And at his expense to obtain a tenant on a five year lease. Subject to my approval. On property located at 3020 Broadway, and Orchard & Brook St Oakland Cal I agree to pay the regular commission as per the Realty Board of Oakland for services rendered. This contract to remain in force for ten days from date

"[Signed] G. W. Burrow.

"R. 1 Box 278 Campbell Cal."

A few days later the plaintiff took Mr. Campe, as president and general manager of the Campe Automobile Company, to the defendant's farm near Campbell and introduced him. A long conversation was held between the defendant and Mr. Campe regarding a lease from the defendant to the Campe Automobile Company. However, no agreement was reached between the parties at that time nor on or prior to April 7, 1924, the end of the term of the plaintiff's contract.

In the conversation last mentioned it developed that the Campe Automobile Company wanted a lease on the property of the defendant, but on the condition that extensive alterations and improvements should be made. The defendant did not object to alterations being made, but insisted that if they were made the work should be done so that future tenants would not find them useless or objectionable, and that they should be installed in such manner as not to mar the appearance of the building. It was known that the improvements would cost a considerable sum, and neither party was willing to bear the whole cost. The owner asked $700 rental per month, and Mr. Campe was not willing to pay that sum and pay for the improvements.

A short time later, April 9, 1924, the parties met at the office of Mr. Campe in Oakland. Mr. Howard, Mr. Burrow, Mr. Campe, and Mr. Campe's local manager, Mr. Flint, were present. Down to this date there is not a word in the record to the effect that the failure to reach an agreement was caused by "any negligence, fault, or fraud" of Mr. Burrow. It was not until several days later that any plans and specifications of the alterations and improvements were drawn up or presented. However, at this meeting a long conversation was held, and later a writing was executed in words and figures as follows:

"We agree to lease through the agency of E. A. Howard, the following described property, to wit: Lots 79, 80, and 82 and improvements of Academy Homestead, situate in Oakland, county of Alameda, state of California, on the following terms and conditions: That the rental of said premises shall be $600.00 per month for a period of five years from August 1st, 1924, and that the lessor agrees to give the lessee an option of a further five years, namely from August 1st, 1929, till August 1st, 1934, at a monthly rental of $700.00 per month. This option to be executed in the event of it being desired by the lessee ninety (90) days previous to the expiration of the lease and the option to be executed on the same terms and conditions, with the exception of the rental, as enumerated above, as the original lease.

"The lessor agrees to spend in the improvements and alterations of the interior of the premises, in accordance with the plans and specifications submitted to and approved by him the sum of $2,500.00. This is to be exclusive of the repairing of the roof and the painting of the exterior of the building. The lessee agrees to spend a sum of $2,500.00 or more in the improvement and alteration of said premises.

"The form of lease to be executed is to contain all of the ordinary provisions and is to be fully approved by both parties hereto.

"George Campe, Incorporated, Lessee,
"George Campe, President.

"Witness: E. A. Howard.

"G. M. Flint.

"Accepted: Lessor, G. W. Burrow.

"Dated at Oakland, California, this 9th day of April, 1924."

[1] The foregoing paper is the only instance in which the parties are claimed to have reached an agreement. Mr. Campe, a witness called by the respondent, so testified, and he was not contradicted by any other witness. If we assume, for the purpose of this case, that such is the fact and that said paper was an agreement, it will be noted that that paper was executed two days after the respondent's contract had expired. Such being the fact the respondent could not recover under his contract. Very soon after Fultz v. Wimer, 9 P. 316, 34 Kan. 576, was decided, it was cited by the Supreme Court of this state. Wilson v. Sturgis, 16 P. 772, 71 Cal. 226, 229. Later it was cited and followed in Zeimer v. Antisell, 17 P. 642, 75 Cal. 509, 512. It has been frequently cited and followed since that time. Brown v. Mason, 99 P. 867, 155 Cal. 155, 159, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 328. Still, assuming that the writing of April 9, 1924, constituted a valid enforceable contract, of what benefit to respondent is the fact? In the case of Fultz v. Wimer, 9 P. 316, 34 Kan. 576, at page 580, the Supreme Court of Kansas answered just that question. Its language is quoted with approval in Brown v. Mason, 99 P. 867, 869, 155 Cal. 155, at page 159, as follows:

"It is doubtless true that Fultz was instrumental in enabling the defendant to sell his land; but as Fultz and Wimer had entered into written stipulations as to the terms upon which Fultz was entitled to commission, these stipulations must control. Fultz failed to find or produce a purchaser ready and willing to take the farm and pay the money within the time prescribed in the written contract or within the time that Wimer extended such contract, and Wimer was under no obligation to wait any longer that he might make further efforts. 22 Cent. Law J., 466; Wylie v. Marine, etc., Bank, 61 N. Y. 415. After the extension of the contract had expired, Wimer had the right to sell to Galli or to any one else; and under the written contract, he was not liable to pay to Fultz his commission, or any other sum, because, after the expiration of the extension of the contract, the contract had spent its force. Coleman v. Meade, 13 Bush, 358; Charlton v. Wood, 11 Heisk. 19. If the delay in closing the sale between Galli and Wimer had been caused by any negligence, fault or fraud of Wimer, Fultz would be entitled to his commission; but the evidence shows nothing of this kind. Wimer acted in the best of faith, and was very desirous, being over-anxious, for Fultz to produce a cash purchaser upon the terms prescribed in the written contract."

It follows that the judgment in this case should be reversed.

[2] In what we have said above, we assumed that the writing dated April 9, 1924, was a valid enforceable contract. Under the settled law of this state and of many other states we went too far in making that assumption. The Campe Company was to make the alterations and improvements. The plans and specifications had not been prepared. When they were prepared it is manifest that they should be prepared by, and to the satisfaction of, the Campe Company. By the clear language of the written instrument dated April 9, 1924, they were also to be approved by Mr. Burrow. There was, therefore, a material element in the writing on which the minds of the parties had not met. However, it was of the very essence of the respondent's contract that he should bring the parties to an agreement. Ayres v. Thomas, 47 P. 1013, 116 Cal. 140, 144. There is a long line of cases in this state holding that writings in such form are incomplete and not enforceable as executory contracts to enter into a lease. Morrison v. Rossignol, 5 Cal. 64, 65; Stanton v. Singleton, 59 P. 146, 126 Cal. 657, 664, 47 L. R. A. 334; Wineburgh v. Gay, 150 P. 1003, 27 Cal. App. 603, 605; Durst v. Jolly, 169 P. 449, 35 Cal. App. 184, 189. And the same rule has been applied to executory contracts of sale. Klein v. Markarian, 165 P. 3, 175 Cal. 37, 40-41. Speaking of the rule in general, in 1 Williston on Contracts, § 45, the author says:

"Although a promise may be sufficiently definite when it contains an option given to the promisor or promisee, yet if something is reserved for the future agreement of both parties, the promise can give rise to no legal obligation until such future agreement. Since either party by the very terms of the promise may refuse to agree to anything to which the other party will agree, it is impossible for the law to affix any obligation to such a promise. It should be observed, however, that though such a promise is invalid, it will not necessarily invalidate an entire agreement of which it forms a part."

A leading case in New York is a parallel case. Mayer v. McCreery, 23 N. E. 1045, 119 N. Y. 434. In that case Mr. Justice Peckham, speaking for the court, said:

"It is, in substance, an agreement that if the parties shall thereafter agree upon plans for the alteration of the building, that thereupon a lease of the building upon the terms specified in the letters will be given by the defendant to the plaintiff." (Italics ours.)

On the uncontradicted evidence it follows that the respondent never performed his contract, and he was not entitled to recover.

The judgment is reversed.

GOLDMAN v. CALIFORNIA CAR CO.
(Civ. 5164.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 6, 1926.)

1. Corporations ⇨413—Recovery from corporation may be had of money loaned to president which was used to increase corporation's assets, and not wasted or misapplied, irrespective of his authority to borrow.

Recovery from corporation may be had on showing that loans to president were used to increase assets of corporation, irrespective of his authority to borrow, particularly where there was no showing that any moneys were wasted or misapplied.

2. Appeal and error ⇨994(3).

Determination of trial court on truth or falsity of testimony is conclusive on appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Caba-niss, Judge.

Action by Joseph H. Goldman against the California Car Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff against the defendant named, and it appeals. Affirmed.

John E. Bennett, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Charles N. Douglas, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant corporation and one of its stockholders to obtain a judgment for money. In a common count he alleged that there was $500 due him which had not been repaid. The corporation and the stockholder answered the complaint. Later the action was dismissed as to the stockholder, and a trial was had in the trial court of the issues presented by the plaintiff's complaint and the answer thereto by the defendant corporation. The trial court made findings of fact in favor of the plaintiff and ordered a judgment entered in accordance therewith. The defendant has appealed from the judgment and has brought up a bill of exceptions.

[1, 2] The first point made by the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings. During a part of the time Mr. A. D. Bowen was president of the defendant corporation. On August 20, 1921, the plaintiff drew his check in favor of A. D. Bowen in the sum of $200; on August 21, 1921, he drew a similar check in the sum of $50; and on October 6, 1921, he drew a similar check in the sum of $300. All of those checks were produced at the trial by the plaintiff and there was no question but what the same had been cashed. Mr. Bowen testified that every cent of the money went into the California Car Company. Furthermore, it appeared that all of the checks were deposited in a special account maintained by Mr. Bowen as trustee, and before this action was commenced, so the record runs, that entire account was covered into the accounts of the defendant corporation. Moreover, there is not a trace of evidence to the effect that any of the moneys were wasted or misapplied in any respect. As we understand the appellant, its position is that no corporate authority was presented showing that Mr. Bowen had the power to borrow moneys either in the name of, or for the benefit of, the corporation; and, if we understand the appellant correctly, it takes the position that, therefore, the obligations were the obligations of Mr. Bowen and not the obligations of the appellant. In making this contention it entirely overlooks the testimony to the effect that all of the moneys went to increase the assets of the appellant, and that there was no testimony whatever to the effect that the proceeds of the checks were used or intended to be used for the personal affairs of Mr. Bowen. In Pauly v. Pauly, 40 P. 29, 30, 107 Cal. 8, 18, 48 Am. St. Rep. 98, the Supreme Court said:

"If the bank, in fact, furnished to the cable company moneys, whether as loans upon unauthorized promissory notes, or upon account, or paid money for construction of its road, or in discharge of its legal liabilities, so far as the same were in fact applied to the proper use and benefit of the cable company, such moneys may be recovered by the plaintiff to the extent to which they have not been repaid. Plaintiff in the last count of his complaint pleaded facts which, if proved, would entitle him to such a recovery."

If it be claimed that the moneys did not in fact go to swell the assets of the defendant corporation, the reply is that the truth or falsity of the testimony on the subject was for the determination of the trial court, and its determination of the question of fact is conclusive on this court.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MULLALY. (Cr. 883.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 11, 1926.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 1159(3).

In prosecution for unlawfully possessing intoxicating liquor, implied findings of jury against defendant on conflicting evidence held conclusive.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 369(6)—Admitting evidence of sales of intoxicating liquor, made prior to time of alleged offense of unlawful possession, held not error (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1025).

In view of Pen. Code, $\S$ 1025, in prosecution for unlawfully possessing intoxicating liquor, evidence of defendant's sales, made prior to time of alleged offense, held admissible to show that liquor found on premises belonged to him.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 369(2).

In view of Pen. Code, $\S$ 1025, fact that evidence material to crime charged may disclose commission of another crime by defendant is no objection to its admission.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 1172(2)—Defendant's rights held not to have been prejudiced by instruction on law applicable to sale of liquors.

In prosecution for unlawfully possessing intoxicating liquor, since any sale of liquor made by defendant at his place of business was unlawful, his rights were not prejudiced by instruction on law applicable to such sales.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 1172(2) — Instruction that defendant had burden of proving license or permit to have liquors in his possession held not to have affected result of trial.

Where sole defense to prosecution for unlawfully possessing liquors was that defendant did not possess liquor at all, and circumstances proved showed that, if he did have it in his possession, it was unlawful, charge that burden of proving license or permit authorizing him to have it in his possession was on him held not to have affected result of trial.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 783(1)—Refusal of instruction to consider defendant's previous sales of liquor only on question of intent, and not as evidence of commission of offense charged, held not error.

In prosecution for unlawfully possessing intoxicating liquor, where evidence as to previous sales was admissible to show liquor found was in defendant's possession, it was not error to refuse his instruction that proof of previous sales was admissible only on question of intent, and not as evidence of commission of offense charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkert, Judge.

Pat Mullaly was convicted of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

FINCH, P. J. The information herein charges the defendant with the offense of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor and alleges that prior to the commission thereof he was "duly convicted of the offense of unlawfully having intoxicating liquor in his possession." He admitted the prior conviction and was convicted of the offense charged. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

[1] At the time of the alleged offense the defendant was conducting a hotel. On the 23d day of February, 1925, between 8 and 10 o'clock p. m., a deputy sheriff, a constable, and two city marshals duly searched the defendant's hotel and the premises adjacent thereto. From their testimony it appears that there was a bar in the hotel at which soft drinks were served. There was a tankhouse about 15 or 20 feet from the rear of the hotel, and a barn, in which defendant had been keeping his horses, estimated to be from 75 to 150 feet diagonally from the rear of the hotel. In the kitchen they found a flask containing a small quantity of jackass brandy, and there was a strong odor of the same kind of liquor in a bucket of water behind the bar and also in some glasses at the same place. In the tankhouse they found two bottles containing a "very, very little" of the same kind of liquor. Three bottles of wine were found in the barn. There were many empty bottles and jugs in the tankhouse and in the back yard. One of the city marshals testified as follows relative to the actions of defendant during the search:

"I went in the hotel after I had been in the back yard, and he was wandering around from one room to the other, and didn't seem to be anybody keeping track of him, so I kind of kept track of him. * * * He went from one room to another, trying to chase a dog out of the house. * * * He finally left the dog in the bar room and * * * he went out through the hallway, into the dining room and from the dining room to the kitchen and out the back screen door. * * * When he went out the back door, he started on a run, * * * and I kept as near to him as I could, and he reached down in the yard and grabbed a bottle and ran a little further, * * * and then he threw the bottle, and I heard the crash, and in an instant I smelled the liquor. I asked him, * * * 'Pat, what did you throw at?' He says, 'The * * * dog.' I says, 'There ain't no dog there.' He says, 'Yes, there was.' I says, 'You broke the bottle.' 'I didn't break no bottle,' he says.

"Q. Where was the dog at that time? A. In the hotel. * * * The side of the building and brick was wet and broken glass there was wet. * * *

"Q. And did you smell anything on the bottle? A. Yes, sir. * * * What is known as jack-ass brandy."

Others of the officers testified that they heard the crash of the bottle when it was thrown and that the liquid therefrom was jackass brandy. Three previous sales of intoxicating liquor by defendant were proved. At the first sale he went out the rear door to get the liquor and was gone "just a few minutes." He took the liquor from the barn for the second sale and from behind the bar for the third. The defendant took the witness stand, and denied practically everything stated by the witnesses for the prosecution, except that his premises were searched. The implied findings of the jury are conclusive against him upon such conflicting evidence.

[2, 3] Appellant contends that it was error to admit evidence of sales made by him prior to the time of the alleged offense. Such evidence was admissible as tending to show that the liquor found in the barn and in the tankhouse belonged to defendant. People v. Buttalia (Cal. App.) 233 P. 401. It also tended to show that defendant's possession thereof was for an unlawful purpose. Appellant's specific contention is that these sales "were included in offense * * * for which he had suffered a previous conviction" as charged in the information and for that reason "should not have been alluded to on the trial." Section 1025 of the Penal Code provides that, where a previous conviction is charged, if the defendant "answers that he has suffered the previous conviction, the charge of the previous conviction must not be read to the jury, nor alluded to on the trial." Clearly it is the previous conviction, not the evidence upon which such conviction was had, which must not be "alluded to on the trial." The mere fact that evidence which is material to the crime charged may disclose the commission of another crime by defendant is no objection to its admission.

[4] Appellant contends that the court erroneously instructed the jury upon the law applicable to the sale of intoxicating liquor. Under no provision of the law could the defendant have made a lawful sale of such liquor at his place of business. It follows that any sale made by him must have been unlawful, and therefore his rights could not have been prejudiced by the instruction. People v. Silva, 227 P. 976, 67 Cal App. 351, 357.

[5] The court instructed the jury as follows:

"The court instructs you that upon proof by the prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had possession of said intoxicating liquor, and for an unlawful purpose such as the unlawful sale thereof, but burden of proving any license or permit authorizing the defendant to have said intoxicating liquor in his possession is upon the defendant, as any such permit, if in existence, is a matter peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant. And if under such circumstances, and after such proof by the prosecution, the defendant fails to prove or produce any such permit or authority to have such intoxicating liquor in his possession, you are to presume that the defendant has no such permit or authority."

The instruction, in part at least, is not in harmony with the law as stated in People v. Pagni, 230 P. 1001, 69 Cal. App. 94; People v. Arnarez, 230 P. 193, 68 Cal. App. 645; People v. Silva, supra, and People v. Matos, 227 P. 974, 67 Cal. App. 346. In the Arnarez Case it is said:

"That the jury may properly infer from proof of possession of intoxicating liquor and the circumstances concerning the possession that the defendant has it for unlawful purposes, as defined in the Volstead Act, and might find the defendant guilty upon such proof without further testimony, is an entirely different matter from stating to the jury that, under mere proof of possession, the jury is bound as a matter of law to bring in a verdict of possession for unlawful purposes."

There was no pretense at the trial, however, that the defendant had the liquor lawfully or for a lawful purpose. His sole defense was that he did not have possession of the liquor at all, and the circumstances proved were such as to show conclusively that, if he did have the liquor, his possession thereof was unlawful. The instruction, therefore, could not have affected the result of the trial.

[6] The court refused to give an instruction requested by defendant to the effect:

That proof of previous sales of liquor by defendant "will be considered by you only for the purpose of showing a willful intent * * * on the part of the defendant to commit the offense charged in the information, * * * and not as evidence of the commission of the offense charged in the information; * * * and, if the prosecution has not proved beyond a reasonable doubt that such other offenses show a willful intent on the part of the defendant to continue to violate the law, then it is your duty not to take into consideration at all any other offenses."

Such evidence was admissible for the purpose, not stated in the proposed instruction, of showing that the liquor found in the barn and in the tankhouse was in defendant's possession. The instruction, therefore, was properly refused. In other instructions the court told the jury that the defendant was not on trial for and could not be convicted of such prior sales.

There is no prejudicial error shown by the record. The evidence against defendant is strong and convincing and his guilt is abundantly proved.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

WORKS, J. This proceeding, along with two others which were companions with it, was treated in the opinion in Hall v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 233 P. 80. In this matter there were certain conditions of fact which in some material respects differentiated it from the other two. These differences were not made the basis of specific argument in the briefs, but the three proceedings having been briefed together, they were all treated by us as if they were identical in every respect. A petition for rehearing was filed in this matter, in which the differences above mentioned were specified, and the petition was granted. In this opinion upon the rehearing we refer to the facts stated in our former opinion, as far as they are pertinent, making below such additional statement as is necessary.

The present proceeding was different from its companions in these respects: In the cause pending in respondent court, proceedings in which are here sought to be halted, no findings and judgment have yet been signed and filed, and one of respondent judges, but for the pendency of this matter, threatens to make therein findings and render therein judgment adverse to petitioner. It therefore becomes necessary for us now to pay more extended attention to a question which was merely mentioned in our former opinion, the question whether respondent judges are disqualified to act in the cause mentioned.

[1, 2] The alleged disqualification of respondent judges arises from their ownership of lands in respondent irrigation district, which public corporation, as will be noted from the statement of facts contained in our former opinion, is not a party to the action. It is also to be observed that, as stated in the same place, an application for leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint making it a party has been denied by one of respondent judges. This situation meets us at the threshold of any investigation of the question whether respondents are disqualified. Is there any theory upon which the point as to their alleged disqualification may be considered, there being no party to the action in whose welfare or in whose property they have an interest? It appears to us that there is not. To reach a contrary conclusion involves two things: First, it must be determined that respondent court erred in refusing to permit the irrigation district to be made a party; second, we must hold that the error can be reviewed and corrected in this proceeding. As to the second question, laying the first aside, it is the general rule that the writ of prohibition may not be employed for the purpose of reviewing errors of an inferior tribunal, as the purpose of the writ is to prohibit threatened action and not to correct action which is already complete. Traffic Truck Sales Co. v. Justice's Court, 220 P. 306, 192 Cal. 377. It has often been determined, it is true, that where the right to prohibition exists the court will sometimes annul or set aside past orders which stand in the way of complete relief. For instance, it was said in Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 24 P. 121, 138, 84 Cal. 327, 394 (10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192):

"It [the writ] is primarily and principally preventive,—its office is to arrest proceedings; but when a case arises in which there are proceedings to be stayed or prevented, it will also annul such prior proceedings as may be necessary to make the remedy complete. The principle is that which prevails in equity. When there is jurisdiction, the court will afford complete relief."

Many and later cases might be cited to the same effect, but we know of none which will support the contention of petitioners here. Let us contrast the situation in this proceeding with that supposed in the quotation from the opinion in Havemeyer v. Superior Court. If we were to hold that the order of respondent court refusing leave to bring in the irrigation district as a party was erroneously made, we are asked to correct that error by deciding, in effect, that the new party shall be brought in, are sought to demean ourselves as if in fact it had been brought in, and are upon that foundation requested to declare that respondent judges are disqualified. While it is said in the quotation that the writ "is primarily and principally preventive," we are expected first, or primarily, upon petition for the writ, to administer a corrective, and thereafter, or secondarily, to administer the preventive purely as a resultant from the corrective. It is said, again, that—

"When a case arises in which there are proceedings to be stayed or prevented, it [the writ] will also annul such prior proceedings as may be necessary to make the remedy complete."

Here we are asked to annul a prior proceeding to the end that there may thereupon arise or be made apparent a proceeding to be stayed or prevented. We are not in the position of a court of equity, which, after having acquired jurisdiction, will afford complete relief; but it is insisted that we may award a preliminary corrective relief as a foundation for the acquisition of jurisdiction or power to afford the preventive relief which is the usual and ordinary purpose of the writ. We are satisfied that petitioner is not entitled to the ultimate relief which is sought.

The alternative writ of prohibition is vacated, and a peremptory writ is denied.

HALL v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR IMPERIAL COUNTY et al. (L. A. 8699.)

1. Judges ~~§~~42—Interest disqualifying judge must be certain, definable, pecuniary, or proprietary interest which will be directly affected by judgment rendered (Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 1).

Interest which disqualifies a judge from acting judicially in an action under Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 1, must be certain, definable, pecuniary, or proprietary interest which will be directly affected by judgment rendered.

2. Judges ~~§~~42—Disqualification of judge may be disclosed by facts alleged in complaint in conjunction with extrinsic facts shown in support of petition for prohibition.

It is not essential that disqualification of judge be manifest on face of complaint, it being sufficient if disqualifying interest is disclosed by facts alleged in complaint in conjunction with extrinsic facts shown in support of petition for prohibition.

3. Judges $\S$ 42—Judge may be disqualified for interest where, because of form of action or kind of relief asked, he would be unable to become a party to such action.

Judge may be disqualified by reason of his interest in the subject-matter where, because of form of particular action or kind of relief asked, he would be unable to become a party to such action, if he so desired.

4. Judges $\S$ 43—Judge is disqualified if holding stock in corporation which is interested in property involved in controversy.

Judge is disqualified if he is a stockholder in a corporation, where corporation is interested in property involved in controversy, although not a formal party to action.

Judges of superior court owning property in irrigation district had such a proprietary interest in district's property, so as to be disqualified by interest from presiding in an action against district's predecessor to enjoin operation of canal so as to permit seepage, in view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 170, subds. 1, 5; it being immaterial that district was not a party to the action, as decree therein would directly affect it.

6. Judges $\S$ 51(2)—Objection on ground of disqualification of presiding judges might be raised at any time.

If irrigation district was interested in a cause by virtue of its ownership of property which would be affected by a judgment therein, objection made on ground of disqualification of presiding judges might be raised at any time.

7. Waters and water courses $\S$ 224—Members of irrigation district have proprietary interest in district's property.

While not occupying precise status of stockholders in a corporation, landowners as members of an irrigation district sustain such relation to the district as to give them a proprietary interest in district's property.

Jesse George, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Leon R. Yankwich and Luther Brown, both of Los Angeles, and J. Stewart Ross, Robt. B. Whitelaw, and Chas. L. Brown, all of El Centro, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This proceeding in prohibition was instituted to restrain the judges of the superior court in and for the county of Imperial from further participating in an action pending in said court. The writ is sought upon the ground that the said judges are disqualified under the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure to sit or act in said action by virtue of their alleged interest in the subject-matter of said actions, and are further disqualified by virtue of the provisions of subdivision 5 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it existed at the time the action was instituted and the proceedings in controversy here heard and determined.

The facts set forth in the petition for the writ of prohibition are these: The petitioner herein commenced an action on May 17, 1917, in the superior court of Imperial county against "Imperial Water Company No. 7," a corporation, for the purpose of recovering the sum of $12,610 for damages, which it is alleged was done to petitioner's land by the seepage of water from one of the canals of said water company upon the land of the petitioner and for injunctive relief abating the use and operation of said canal in such a manner as to cause the water therein to seep upon the petitioner's land. A trial of the cause was had before Judge Cole, one of the respondent judges, who, subsequent to a trial of said case, rendered a decision directing a judgment in favor of the defendants. Only a minute entry of this judgment was made. Subsequent thereto in August, 1923, upon motion by the attorney for the petitioner, plaintiff in said action, the court set aside said minute entry and decision, but refused the request to permit additional testimony to be introduced. On August 19, 1923, said judge, sitting in said court, granted the petitioner, plaintiff therein, damages in the sum of $300, but denied all injunctive relief. No findings and judgment have ever been made and entered in said action. In November, 1922, the Imperial irrigation district, a public corporation, purchased all of the property of the said water company, including the said canal from which water seeped upon and damaged the petitioner's land. Since the purchase of the said canal, the irrigation district has operated and still continues to operate it in such a manner as to cause water to continue to seep therefrom and upon petitioner's land, so that the said canal continues to be a nuisance. Unknown to the petitioner, whose lands were not within the Imperial irrigation district at the time she commenced said action and at the time of the trial thereof, the said irrigation district was the party who diverted the water from its natural course in the Colorado river, and caused it to be carried through the canals of the said water company. Petitioner was also ignorant at this time of the fact that the respondent judges of the superior court in Imperial county were landowners in said irrigation district. It was not until July, 1924, that the petitioner became aware of these facts concerning the interest of the said irrigation district in the said canal and the interest of the respondent judges in the irrigation district. Upon the discovery of these facts and prior to findings made or entry of judgment in the action commenced against the "Imperial Water Company No. 7," the petitioner, plaintiff in said action, filed an objection to respondent judges sitting or acting further in said action, upon the ground that they were and are interested therein and moved to be permitted to file an amended and supplemental complaint making the said Imperial irrigation district a party defendant in said action. The objection to said judges was supported by proper affidavits showing their ownership of land within the irrigation district. One of the alleged disqualified judges, Judge Cole, overruled the objections of petitioner to himself and the other judge of the superior court of Imperial county, and denied the motion to file the amended and supplemental complaint making the said irrigation district a party to the action. Thereupon and prior to any findings made or judgment entered in said action, the petitioner presented her petition for the writ of prohibition to the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 2, to prevent said judges from making findings and entering judgment therein, as it is alleged they threatened to do. 233 P. 80.

The present proceeding was instituted in conjunction with two similar proceedings directed against two other water companies—Water Companies No. 3 and No. 5. As the time within which the motion for a new trial might have been made in these cases had expired by operation of law and as there were no proceedings pending in those two cases to which a writ of prohibition could be directed, no hearing by this court was asked in those cases and the judgment therein is now final. We are confined, therefore, to the case against Water Company No. 7, in which action a decision has been made, but no findings made or judgment entered, and, consequently, there are proceedings in that case to which a writ of prohibition—if it be deemed that a writ should issue—could be directed.

Petitioner charges that the respondent judges of the superior court in Imperial county are disqualified to sit or act in the action pending therein by virtue of the provisions of section 170, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, for interest in said action growing out of their ownership of land within the confines of said Imperial irrigation district. Respondents insist, on the other hand, that the irrigation district not being a party to the action and the action not relating to its property, the ownership of land in the irrigation district by the respondent judges does not create grounds for their disqualification. In other words, the respondents declare that a superior court judge, who is a landowner in an irrigation district, may sit and act in a case directly affecting the property owned by such district unless or until such district is made a party to the action. In this behalf it is argued that there is not before the court a party in whose welfare or in whose property the respondent judges have an interest, and, in the absence thereof, their disqualification cannot be raised. The case of San Diego v. Andrews (Cal. Sup.) 231 P. 726, relied upon by respondents in support of this proposition, is not in point. That case involved the disqualification of the trial judge under subdivision 5 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The question of whether or not a judge was disqualified under subdivision 1 of said section was not raised. The rule therein announced must be restricted to cases involving subdivision 5 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The fallacy of respondents' argument in this behalf lies in its assumption that the action does not relate to the property in which the irrigation district is an interested party. Predicated primarily upon the facts existent at the commencement of the action, the argument ig-noses the change wrought in the interest of the irrigation district in the property involved in the litigation, i. e., the complained of canal, by its purchase of the same prior to the making of any findings and entry of judgment in the action. Thus we are confronted with the question of whether or not a judge may be disqualified because of interest in the result of the litigation even though that interest may not appear upon the face of the proceedings and although the subject-matter of the judges' interest may not be formally involved in the controversy.

[1-4] The interest which disqualifies a judge from acting judicially in an action under section 170, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, must be a certain, definable, pecuniary, or proprietary interest which will be directly affected by the judgment rendered. Adams v. Minor, 53 P. 815, 121 Cal. 372; Meyer v. San Diego, 53 P. 434, 121 Cal. 102, 41 L. R. A. 762, 66 Am. St. Rep. 22; North Bloomfield, etc., Co. v. Keyser, 53 Cal. 315; Heilbron v. Campbell, 23 P. 122, 3 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 204; Quatman v. Superior Court, 221 P. 666, 64 Cal. App. 203; Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, 187 P. 1056, 182 Cal. 315. It is not essential that the disqualification be manifest upon the face of the complaint. It is sufficient if the disqualifying interest is disclosed by the facts alleged in the complaint in conjunction with extrinsic facts shown in support of the petition for prohibition. Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, supra. "The judge may be disqualified by reason of his interest in the subject-matter where, because of the form of the particular action or the kind of relief asked, he would be unable to become a party to such action if he so desired." Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, supra. And a judge is disqualified if he is a stockholder in a corporation where the corporation is interested in the property involved in the controversy, although not a formal party to the action. Adams v. Minor, supra.

In Adams v. Minor, supra, the action involved the validity of certain bonds issued by an irrigation district. The Bank of Modesto held a portion of these bonds. The judge before whom the case was tried owned some shares of capital stock in said bank. The parties to the action were Adams, Stoddard, and certain others, as plaintiffs, and the collector of the Modesto irrigation district as defendant. The First National Bank of Los Angeles was an intervener in the action. It did not appear that the Bank of Modesto, in which the respondent judge was a stockholder, and which held certain of the disputed bonds of the irrigation district, was a party to the action. The question involved was that of whether or not the judge was disqualified by reason of his interest by virtue of being a stockholder in the Modesto Bank from trying the action. The court held that the said judge was disqualified from sitting or acting in the case and the mere fact that subsequent to the submission of the cause and pending decision the judge disposed of his stock in the said bank did not remove the disqualification. The following language constitutes the basis of the court's decision:

"It was held by Chancellor Sanford in Washington Ins. Co. v. Price, 1 Hopk. Ch. (N. Y.) 1, that a chancellor being a stockholder in a corporation cannot do any judicial act in a cause in which that corporation is a party, although he is not personally a party to the record.

"We can see no substantial difference in the case of a judge who is a stockholder in a corporation sitting in a case brought by or against such corporation, and a case where the matter in controversy involves the property of such corporation although it is not a party to the action."

The rule enunciated in that case governs and controls us in the determination of the question presented in the case at bar. It seems obvious that the disqualification of the respondent judges does not depend, as respondents contend, upon the irrigation district being a party to the action, but rather upon the interest of the irrigation district in the property involved in the action, and the interest of the respondent judges in the irrigation district as landowners therein. Although the irrigation district was not a party to the action, yet that was not essential under the rule of Adams v. Minor, supra, for the action involves property in which the irrigation district was interested and as owners of such property of the irrigation district the respondent judges had an interest therein. It was unnecessary, therefore, for the irrigation district to be made a party to the suit, but merely to make it appear that the property in which it had a proprietary interest be involved therein. For if the irrigation district is interested in the property in controversy and the respondent judges are interested in the irrigation district and will be pecuniarily affected by the determination of the case, they must be held to come within the purview of the rule enunciated in the case of Adams v. Minor, and are disqualified from taking judicial part in the action.

The Imperial irrigation district is a public corporation. It is the owner of numerous canals, rights of way, and other easements within Imperial county. Having purchased the properties of the Imperial Water Company, including the canal complained of, said irrigation district became interested in the outcome of the action, seeking, among other things, the abatement of said canal. It is patent that the granting or the denial of a decree, subsequent to said purchase by said irrigation district, would necessarily affect said irrigation district. If the relief prayed for in the action against the water company is awarded, the canal, which is the property of said irrigation district, cannot be used until it is put into such shape that water will not seep therefrom upon the petitioner's land. This will necessarily entail an expenditure of money—the amount not being material—by the said district. If the relief is denied, the irrigation district will not be compelled to expend any money in the conditioning of said canal. If the relief prayed for is granted and the irrigation district discontinues the use of the canal, the said district will be peculiarly affected by the same, for the said canal is now used to divert some ten thousand acre feet of water per annum and the closing of the canal would materially diminish the supply of water available for use within said district. Thus it is palpable that a judgment and decree in said action, now pending in the superior court in Imperial county before one of the respondent judges, would directly affect the said irrigation district. At all events, it would limit and control the use of the canal.

[5-7] Respondents contend, however, that petitioner elected to proceed against the water company, who it is conceded is a cotortfeasor, without joining the irrigation district, and having done so she cannot now complain because she neglected to make the district a party and ask that a writ of prohibition be issued. This contention overlooks the fact alleged under oath in the petition for the writ of prohibition, and which is not controverted, that the petitioner had no knowledge of the facts concerning the responsibility of the irrigation district for the diversion of the water nor of the ownership by said district of the canal, of which complaint is made. Moreover, if the irrigation district is interested in the cause by virtue of its ownership of property which will be affected by a judgment therein, the objection made on the ground of the disqualification of the respondent judges may be raised at any time. Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, supra. Respondents insist, however, that the denial of injunctive relief depended upon facts as they existed at the time of trial, upon facts which occurred prior to the assumption of ownership of the canal by the irrigation district and that the said district did not assume by the purchase of the water company's property the liabilities of said water company which arose prior to the purchase. It is therefore immaterial, it is argued, whether relief for the injury caused by the said canal be in the nature of damages or for equitable relief or both. While it may be conceded that the district did not assume liability for the damage caused by the canal prior to the purchase thereof, and conceding also that the water company was independently liable for the damages occasioned by the seepage from the said canal, yet it ignores the very salient fact that not only are damages sought in the action, but, in addition thereto, equitable relief in the nature of an injunction abating the said canal. The uncontroverted allegations in the petition for the writ are to the effect that the canal still continues to be a nuisance and continues to injure the petitioner's land by seepage of water therefrom; this being so, if injunctive relief necessarily be affected thereby. The irrigation district being an interested party in the property involved in the controversy, the question now arises as to the nature of the interest of the respondent judges in the irrigation district. The interest of said judges as landowners within said district was such a direct, proprietary interest as to disqualify them from acting in an action involving the property of said district. While not occupying the precise status of stockholders in a corporation, yet the landowners, as members of an irrigation district, sustain such a relation to the district as to give them a proprietary interest in the district's property. This relation is aptly pointed out in the case of Merchants' National Bank v. Escondido Irr. Dist., 77 P. 937, 939, 144 Cal. 329, 334, where the court distinguishes irrigation districts from ordinary municipal corporations in the following language:

"But here, the corporation in question is distinguished from ordinary municipal corporations by the fact that 'the legal title,' only of the property of the corporation is vested in the district, 'in trust for the uses and purposes set forth in [the] act'; and that the beneficiaries of the trust—who, upon familiar equitable principles, are to be regarded as the owners of the property—are the landowners in the district with whose funds the property has been acquired (Civ. Code, § 853); and in whom, indeed, is vested by the express provisions of the statute, in each, the right to the several use of a definite proportion of the water of the district, and in all, in common, the equitable ownership of its water-rights, reservoirs, ditches, and property generally, as the means of supplying water. (Stats. 1887, pp. 34, 35, §§ 11, 13.) Such rights as these cannot be distinguished in any way from other private rights. * * *

Thus it is patent that the respondent judges as the equitable owners of the property of the irrigation district had a direct, proprietary interest in the property involved in the action and by virtue of this ownership were disqualified from acting judicially therein. It follows then that the action of the respondent judge in overruling the objection to their sitting or acting further in the cause was void and without effect in law. People v. De La Guerra, 24 Cal. 73; Johnson v. German Am. Ins. Co., 88 P. 985, 150 Cal. 336; Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, supra.

Respondents advance the additional argument that the subject of the action is the past operation of the canal, the canal being merely the object through which the alleged injury was accomplished. This argument fails, however, to consider the fact that the, relief requested is, among other things, for the abatement of the canal as a nuisance and the granting or the denial of the relief is a matter in which the respondent judges are directly interested.

[8] The trial judges were also disqualified to sit or act in said action by virtue of the provisions of subdivision 5 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it existed at the time the action was instituted. Respondents insist that, the irrigation district not being a party to the action, this Code section is inapplicable to the instant case. The facts set out in the petition for the writ bring this case clearly within the purview of said Code section, which provided:

"In an action or proceeding brought in the superior court * * * by or against the reclamation board of the state of California, or any reclamation, levee, swamp land or drainage district, or any public agency, * * * affecting or relating to any real property or an easement or right of way, levee, embankment, canal, * * * the judge of the superior court of the county, * * * in which such real property, or any part thereof, or such easement or right of way, * * * canal or work, or any part thereof is situated shall be disqualified to sit or act, and such action, if brought in the superior court, shall be heard and tried by some other judge of the superior court requested to sit therein by the Governor. * * *

There is an additional provision permitting parties, by stipulation in writing, to waive the disqualification. No such waiver appears in the instant case. An irrigation district, although not specifically designated in said Code section, is a public agency of a kindred character to those particularly mentioned therein and is one of the "public agencies" contemplated by said Code section. Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, 187 P. 1056, 182 Cal. 315.

[9, 10] It is not disputed that the complained of canal is situate in Imperial county. The offer of an amended and supplemental complaint by the plaintiff, petitioner herein, in the action pending in said superior court of Imperial county, seeking in good faith to make the Imperial irrigation district a formal party to the action was, it seems to us, sufficient in and of itself to disqualify said judges. The mere filing of the original complaint making the irrigation district a party would have disqualified them from further judicial participation in the cause. People v. De La Guerra, 24 Cal. 73. This being so, we think a like effect should be given to the presentation of an amended or supplemental complaint making an irrigation district a party to the action. A judge's disqualification is not dissipated by his refusal to permit pleadings to be filed making him a party in good faith or by striking out such pleadings after they are filed. People v. De La Guerra, 24 Cal. 73; Younger v. Superior Court, 69 P. 485, 136 Cal. 682.

In People v. De La Guerra, supra, a change of venue was requested on the ground that the judge was disqualified. Instead of granting the request, the judge dismissed the action because he believed that under the pleadings there was nothing to try and that a change of venue was unnecessary. This court held the dismissal of the proceedings was void on the ground of the incompetency of the judge to act and that the refusal to change the place of trial was erroneous.

In Younger v. Superior Court, supra, the trial judge struck out the complaint and dismissed the action, although the complaint alleged his interest in the action and he was made a party thereto. In dismissing the action the judge stated, in effect, that the court was satisfied that the allegation was made "for the sole purpose of making said Lucas F. Smith a party defendant in said action in order to disqualify him as judge of said court in the trial of said action, and to prevent him from acting therein as such judge, and for no other reason." On certiorari, this court held the action of the trial judge to be void and stated, among other things, that "where the judge is made a party, upon proper allegation, he cannot arbitrarily determine that he is not a party, nor that he is not interested."

Although in the instant case the Imperial irrigation district was not a formal party to the action, yet the motion to file an amended complaint making said irrigation district a party, if granted, would have disqualified the respondent judges from sitting or acting in the case. The denial of this motion was tantamount to a dismissal of the action in so far as it affected the said district. It will be especially noted that at the time said motion was made the irrigation district was the owner of the complained of canal and was operating it, as alleged, in such a manner that it continued to damage the petitioner's land. Thus in order to grant full injunctive relief—if it were determined that such relief should be granted—the irrigation district was a necessary party to the action.

The case of San Diego v. Andrews (Cal. Sup.) 231 P. 726, cited by respondents to the effect that no disqualification arises until an irrigation district is made a party to the action, presents no barrier to our conclusion. In that case the original parties to the action entered into a stipulation waiving the disqualification of a judge. Thereafter an irrigation district and other parties intervened. The question of the effect of the stipulation upon the parties subsequently intervening arose. This court held that since, at the time the stipulation was entered into and filed, none of the public agencies mentioned in or contemplated by subdivision 5 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure was a party to the action, the stipulation was a nullity and that the disqualification did not arise until the entrance into the case of the irrigation district as a party. The soundness of this conclusion is indubitable. In the instant case, however, the respondent judge refused to permit the irrigation district to be made a party and thus in effect, in a manner of speaking, circumvented his own disqualification which would necessarily have arisen as soon as the irrigation district became a party to the action.

It should be here noted, however, that subdivision 5 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure was by the amendment of 1925 eliminated. Stats. 1925, p. 18. Having been eliminated, it follows that although the judges were disqualified under this subdivision to said section to participate in said action, they are not now disqualified. Were it not for the fact, therefore, that the judges, as previously indicated, are disqualified from sitting by virtue of the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we would be constrained to deny the writ sought.

[11] Respondents contend that the granting of the writ would involve a review of the ruling of the trial court on the motion to file the amended and supplemental complaint making the irrigation district a party to the action, and that such error—if it be error—cannot be reviewed and corrected in this proceeding. In this behalf, it is argued that the writ of prohibition may not be employed for the purpose of reviewing errors of an inferior tribunal, as the purpose of the writ is to prevent threatened action and not to correct completed action. Conceding this to be the purpose of the writ of prohibition, yet the facts of the instant case come squarely within the scope of its purpose. The writ is not being sought primarily to correct errors of the trial court, but to prevent a threatened judicial action—the making of findings and the entry of judgment by a disqualified judge. Where further action is threatened to be taken by a disqualified judge, this court, on application for prohibition, will not only stay further action, but “* * * it will also annul such prior proceedings as may be necessary to make the remedy complete. The principle is that which prevails in equity. When there is jurisdiction, the court will afford complete relief.” Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 24 P. 121, 84 Cal. 327, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192.

It is insisted, however, that the petitioner has other remedies, i. e., by appeal, and that therefore the writ should not issue. This argument is not well taken. In the case of Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, supra, the writ was granted, although the same result could have been achieved by taking an appeal. In Quatman v. Superior Court, 221 P. 666, 64 Cal. App. 203, the same objection was raised as in the instant case, and in answer thereto the court said:

“Where a judge is disqualified to act in any proceeding or cause the disability necessarily enters into all orders and decisions made by him other than those specially excepted and provided for in the Codes, and to refuse the writ on the ground that a remedy might be had in another manner would be to permit the trial to proceed to a final conclusion by the disqualified judge and then set aside the proceedings as void ab initio.”

No good purpose could be served in permitting a disqualified judge to perform certain acts and thereafter declare them void on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to perform the same.

The order of the respondent court denying the motion of the petitioner for leave to file an amended and supplemental complaint making the said irrigation district a party to said action should be annulled, on the ground that the respondent judge who denied said motion was disqualified to act thereon, and the judges of the respondent court should be prohibited from acting on said motion on the ground of their disqualification under subdivision 1 of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Let the writ issue accordingly.

PEOPLE v. ADAMS et al. (Cr. 2832.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 14, 1926.
Rehearing Denied May 13, 1926.)

1. Homicide ☞253(1).

Evidence held to sustain conviction of first degree murder.

2. Homicide ☞305—Instruction on law of conspiracy held not prejudicial to defendants in murder trial.

In murder prosecution, where evidence supported theory that defendants were conspirators in commission of the crime, instruction on law of conspiracy held not prejudicial to affect defendants.

3. Homicide ☞305—Jury in murder trial were properly instructed that they must consider evidence in its application to each particular defendant.

In murder prosecution, jury were properly instructed that they should consider evidence in its application to each particular defendant, and that, if one stood by at time of the crime, but did not act prior to death of the victim to aid and assist, he was entitled to acquittal, and that mere presence at time of homicide was insufficient to make such person an aider or abettor.

4. Criminal law ☞796—Right of jury to impose life imprisonment held not to have been limited by instructions (Pen. Code, § 190).

Since jury were told that right to relieve defendants of death penalty in exercise of their discretion was absolute, and that they were free to return verdict for life imprisonment, right of jury, under Pen. Code, § 190, to relieve defendants of death penalty was not limited by instructions.

5. Homicide ☞338(2)—Evidence as to compelling one of defendants to revisit place of homicide held without prejudice to him.

Evidence as to compelling one of defendants to revisit place of the homicide, and of his appearance and conduct, showing his reluctance to enter, held without prejudice.

6. Criminal law ☞516—Statements of defendant, under arrest, held not to amount to confession, and admissible without preliminary proof that they were voluntarily made.

Where defendant at no time admitted his guilt, statements made by him when compelled to revisit scene of the homicide held not to amount to confession, and were admissible without requiring preliminary proof that they were freely and voluntarily made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Willie Adams and another were convicted of first degree murder, and they appeal. Affirmed.

H. M. Dalton, of Los Angeles, for appellant Rincon.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin J. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SEAWELL, J. The defendants, Willie Adams and Alfonse Rincon, were accused by the district attorney of the county of Los Angeles, by an information filed in the superior court of said county of Los Angeles against them, with the crime of having, on or about the 17th day of May, 1925, in said county of Los Angeles, murdered one T. K. Ullman. The trial resulted in the jury finding each defendant guilty, by separate verdict, of murder in the first degree, which verdicts, under the law, carried with them the imposition of the death penalty. A death judgment was accordingly pronounced by the court against the said defendants. At the trial they were represented by separate counsel, and each appealed from the judgment imposing the death penalty and from the order denying the motion made by each for a new trial. Both defendants are from Mexican ancestry. Rincon is a native of this state, and was past 26 years of age at the time of the commission of the crime with which he stands convicted. As a youth he attended the grammar and high schools of the city of Los Angeles. Adams was past 22 years of age, a native of Mexico, but had been a resident of this state since he was of the age of about 12 years.

[1] The proof of the guilt of the defendants was conclusively shown at the trial, and there is no reasonable ground to sustain the claim that either should have escaped the consequences of an exceptionally cruel murder. Briefly told, the circumstances are that the deceased, T. K. Ullman, aged about 58 years, lived alone in a sparsely settled community near Elizabeth Lake, situate in the northern portion of the county of Los Angeles, and approximately 65 or 70 miles from the city of Los Angeles. The entrance to Ullman's lands was by way of a byroad leading from the Elizabeth Lake and Palmdale public road. He was the owner of a number of acres of land, upon which he resided, and in connection with his ranch interests he conducted a blacksmith shop, and performed such occasional service as came his way. He was crippled in both limbs, and walked with considerable difficulty. The few persons living in the general locality were widely separated by great distances. The view from one neighbor's home to another was obstructed by intervening hills. Defendant Willie Adams, who seems to have had no fixed place of abode, had for a period of about 2 years worked in turn for the several ranchers in the neighborhood, including the deceased. At the time of the murder he was cultivating, or had been cultivating, a small vegetable garden on Ullman's property upon shares, but his most recent employment was by Mr. R. L. McDaniels, whose connection with the defendants will hereafter appear. Defendant Rincon resided in the city of Los Angeles with his sister and her husband, Mr. and Mrs. McDaniels. He had part-week employment at a Los Angeles daily newspaper. In January, 1925, Mr. McDaniels seems to have made an entry upon lands lying contiguous to the lands of Ullman, claiming the same to be public lands, and subject to entry by virtue of the homestead laws of the various acts of Congress. There was no convenient way of ingress or egress into or from said lands except over the lands of Ullman, and said homestead lands were without a water supply. McDaniels claimed that an old, unoccupied house supposedly upon the Ullman lands was in fact upon his homestead, and he proceeded to occupy the same. McDaniels erected no buildings upon his homestead. He carried with him to said entry a tent, in which he expected to live, and two spring bed mattresses, two or three chairs, a cooking stove, and a few other articles of lesser importance, none of which was of any considerable value. In addition to taking possession of the unoccupied house upon Ullman's lands, McDaniels also disputed the property lines as previously fixed by Ullman, and claimed the right to travel across and upon lands supposedly owned by Ullman. Bitter feelings of hostility were engendered between McDaniels and Ullman. Adams was in pronounced sympathy with his employer, and shared with him his feelings of ill will for Ullman. The disputes between Ullman and McDaniels were halted upon Ullman causing McDaniels' arrest upon a complaint charging him with trespass. McDaniels returned to his home at Los Angeles almost immediately following his arrest, and upon the second day after reaching home he suffered a heart attack, which resulted in his sudden death. During the controversies between McDaniels and Ullman as to property lines and the right of McDaniels to travel upon Ullman's lands, Adams was quite self-assertive, and upon one occasion, at least, when registering a complaint against Ullman for refusing to allow McDaniels to cross his lands for the purpose of bringing water to the homestead, remarked that he would kill "that Dutchman." Adams admitted that he made the remark attributed to him, but claimed that it was made in a light vein and in a joking mood. Other witnesses testified to threats made by him against the life of Ullman upon other occasions. The defendant Rincon had been upon the McDaniels' claim but once prior to the latter's death, and, while there, made the acquaintance of Adams. It was on or about May 12th that Rincon, after a number of visits from Adams, concluded to visit the McDaniels' claim for the asserted purpose of caring for a hay crop, and gathering up the personal effects belonging to McDaniels. Accordingly, he went from

Los Angeles to the McDaniels' homestead with Adams, and was constantly in his company to the day following the commission of the crime. Both occupied, without the consent of the owner, the house of a neighbor who was temporarily absent. Both were seen on the day before, and on the morning of the day the crime was committed, at or near Ullman's house. It was made certain by the evidence that both were reduced in circumstances. Rincon had attempted to sell a rifle belonging to McDaniels to a neighbor, but failed. They were without provisions and tobacco, and were unable to purchase either in any substantial quantities. Ullman, it seems, kept on hand a small supply of cigarettes, and a tin or two containing small cigars. He also had in his house a small money safe, the outer door of which was fastened by a combination lock, and the inner door was locked by key. On the day of the murder he had something like $7 in coin and currency in his purse, and he also had in his pocket the key which unlocked the inner safe door and the key which fitted the Ford automobile lock. The automobile was equipped with a delivery bed and top. Upon reconnoitering the locality and selecting an opportune time, which chanced to be the hour of about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, the defendants entered the home of Ullman, who was seated in a rocking chair, evidently enjoying the entertainment furnished by his radio. Either Adams or Rincon informed Ullman that he wished to buy cigarettes, and, as Ullman arose from his chair to receive the 25 cents handed to him by the purchaser, and was in the act of putting it into his purse, the other struck him upon the back of the head from behind with an iron bar, which the defendants had carefully selected from a scrap pile of old iron which was near to or in Ullman's blacksmith shop. The first blow felled him to the floor, and as he lay there, he was struck two successive blows, one on each side of the head in the region of the temples. No sound save a groan of pain escaped the old man's lips, and death probably ensued very soon after he received the mortal blows. The body was searched by the defendants and the keys, and what money that his purse contained, amounting to about $6, were taken, while a silver dollar and some small coins, which doubtless fell from his purse to the floor, were overlooked by the defendants. The house was thoroughly searched by the defendants for plunder, and it was left in a condition of disorder by them. Both defendants admitted at the trial, and upon other occasions, that they carried the body from the room in which the deceased was killed to the open well, containing water, a distance greater than 50 feet, and deposited it in the well, and filled the space between the water and the level of the earth with broken boxes and debris. They repaired to the shed or barn, where the Ford machine was kept, took possession of it, and made their way to Los Angeles, stopping at a friend's house before arriving at the home of Mrs. McDaniels, where they remained that night and until late on the following afternoon, which was Monday, May 18th. The plate containing the number of the stolen machine was removed, and the plate under which the McDaniels machine was operated substituted in its stead. The top of the Ford car was also removed and other changes calculated to disguise the identity of the machine were made. In the afternoon of that day—Monday—defendant Adams and two Mexican women started to the locality in which Ullman had been murdered. Adams claimed that he had interested the two women in the purchase of the McDaniels furniture, and he was taking them to the place where he and Rincon had left the furniture that they might inspect the same. In the meantime the discovery of Ullman's body had been made by neighbors, and the blood-bespattered room in which he had been murdered and other evidences of the gruesome deed pointed to murder. Adams and Rincon were strongly suspected of the crime, and it was the understanding among the neighbors that, should either be found in the neighborhood, the person so finding them should detain them for investigation as to their knowledge of the crime. At dusk on the afternoon of Monday, May 18th, Adams arrived at the residence of one of Ullman's neighbors in company with the two women above referred to. The neighbor informed Adams of the discovery of Ullman's body, and told him that the neighborhood suspected him and Rincon as the persons who had murdered Ullman. He told him that he had instructions to arrest him and take him to a neighbor's residence for examination. Adams expressed a willingness to go, and told the neighbor to go into the house and put on his coat and prepare himself to accompany him, and he would drive him to said neighbor's residence. As the neighbor entered his house to prepare for the journey, Adams hurried to where the automobile was standing, leaped into it and started away at a high rate of speed. The neighbor, upon discovering that he had fled, mounted a horse, and followed as rapidly as he could. Upon reaching the main highway, Adams, in his attempt to turn into it, overturned the machine he was driving, and the two women riding with him were thrown clear of the machine, but he was pinioned beneath it. He was held there until the arrival of several neighbors, who released him from his position and took him into custody. That night he was taken to a neighbor's, and, in the presence of several persons, made a statement as to his and Rincon's participation in the murder. He stated that they had committed it for the purpose of robbery. A blood-stained $1 bill and other coins which had been taken from Ullman's body were upon his person. He related with much detail the plan of execution of the crime, and directed the officers to another well, into which he and Rincon had deposited the clothing which they wore at the time they committed the crime. The clothing, blood-stained, was, according to description, recovered. He gave other information, which, upon investigation, was verified by indisputable physical facts. The discovery and rescue of Ullman's body from the well was followed by disclosures which cast suspicion upon Adams and Rincon. The reports of the discoveries quickly spread to the city of Los Angeles, and on the same afternoon one of the local papers carried a story of the murder. A friend of Rincon's, upon reading the article, hastened to the McDaniels home to inform him of the report that was upon the streets. Rincon became very much alarmed, and, after a consultation with his sister and one or two friends, proceeded to a Los Angeles newspaper office, and made a statement denying any participation in the murder of Ullman. This was the first information given out by Rincon to any person concerning the tragedy, with the possible exception of informing his sister that Ullman had been killed. He made no report of Ullman's death to any officer of the law. He was taken into custody the following morning.

A short time after Adams made his first statement of his and Rincon's connection with the crime he made a second statement, in which he implicated Mrs. McDaniels and another person, whom he claimed were at the scene of the murder and were active participants therein. He excused himself of any participation whatsoever in the murder, and stated that he had no knowledge that Ullman was to be killed. His claim was that, after Ullman had been slain by Rincon, he was forced by the latter's threats to take his life if he should refuse to assist in carrying the body to the well, and he was acting under the influence of fear when he assisted in making a search of the house for money and valuable property, and thereafter, while driving the automobile into Los Angeles. In fact, he insisted that everything he did from the moment of Ullman's death to the time when he left the McDaniels home on Monday, May 18th, was done under pressure of fear and threats. He afterwards abandoned the portion of his story which incriminated the two persons whom he had falsely accused, but clung to that portion of his story in which he claimed that he acted under a sense of fear alone when he did the things which appeared to connect him with the crime. According to a subsequently revised story, Rincon was declared to be the sole person who coerced and intimidated him by threats of violence to do everything done by him which had an inculpatory aspect. Rincon, on the other hand, excused himself and accused Adams. Both of the defendants made a number of statements in which they described in detail the manner in which the crime was executed. In this respect there is no material difference between their statements. The manner of the execution of the crime as told by each is fully corroborated by physical facts. The only difference between the stories of the defendants is that each claimed that the other committed the crime in precisely the same manner as described by each and under the pressure of threats made by the other. Each incriminatory statement charged by one as having been made by the other was turned by the one accused as the statement of the accuser. We have carefully examined the record in this case, which consists of more than 1,000 typewritten pages, and are convinced by our examination of the record, as the jury must have been convinced by the statements made by the defendants themselves and by the testimony of numerous witnesses and corroborating circumstances, that there is no possible theory upon which either of the defendants can be innocent of the crime charged against them. It is not our purpose to enter into a discussion of the weight, effect, or conclusiveness of the evidence. It is so overwhelming in its convincing force to the effect that the two acted in concert as to sweep away the feeble efforts made by each of the defendants to relieve himself of the consequences of a brutal, deliberately planned murder. The motive on the part of each was twofold. There can be no doubt but that Mrs. McDaniels, the sister of Rincon, and Rincon himself, absorbed much of the bitterness of feeling that McDaniels held for Ullman as a result of the disputes which arose out of the asserted right of McDaniels to travel the Ullman lands. Neither can there be any doubt but that Rincon felt that the heart attack which resulted in the sudden death of his sister's husband was attributable directly to the excitement produced by Ullman in procuring McDaniels' arrest. There is no doubt but that Adams, who had worked for McDaniels, and who had become a partisan in the disputes which arose between McDaniels and Ullman, was hostile to the latter, as his declarations and conduct plainly indicated. So much for malice on the part of the defendants. That they were also moved to the commission of the murder by a desire to possess Ullman's property is proved by the fact that they actually looted and plundered his home. The $6 taken from the person of the deceased and the larceny of the automobile and some other articles is cumulative upon the issue. So far as overt acts would indicate, Adams was the bolder and more abandoned of the two. But that they acted in concert and jointly executed the crime there seems to be no room for reasonable doubt. Both had been in the immediate vicinity of Ullman's house for some 5 or 6 days prior to the commission of the crime, and no legitimate business seems to have required the presence of either in that locality. They were constantly together, acting in all matters in apparent unity and accord, and both entertained a hostile feeling against Ullman. The claim made by each that the other struck the fatal blow, and the further claim as to the robbery of the house and the theft of the automobile, and the concealment of the body, and the prior and subsequent conduct of the defendants, were questions for the jury's consideration in determining the part taken by each of the defendants in the commission of the crime and their relation thereto. The jury by its general verdict impliedly found against the defendants on every material issue advanced by them. The verdict is unquestionably sustained by the evidence.

[2, 3] The questions of law presented for our consideration are few and simple. The court instructed the jury as to what acts are necessary to be established in order to constitute a person an accomplice with another in the commission of a crime. It is admitted that the instructions given on the subject are academically correct, and not subject to just criticism, but it is urged that such instructions were not applicable to the facts of the case, and the recitation of the law of conspiracy prejudicially affected the jury in its consideration of the defendants' cause. This contention is wholly without merit. The facts as herein related are a complete answer to the contention that the evidence was insufficient to support the theory, or to justify a conviction of the defendants, upon the basis that they were coconspirators in the commission of the crime. The court would have fallen short of performing its full duty had it refused to instruct the jury as to the law of conspiracy. The instructions given by the court upon this issue, as well as upon all the issues presented are exceptionally full, fair, and free from error. Every phase of the law was fully covered, and the defendants suffered no prejudice in any single particular by the court's instructions. They certainly were as favorable to them as they could reasonably request. The jury was told that they must consider the evidence in its application to each particular defendant, and was charged by separate instructions that, even if one defendant stood by at the time the offense was committed, but did no acts prior to the death of the deceased to aid and assist the same, such one was entitled to an acquittal; that the mere presence of either of the defendants at the place where and at the time the homicide was committed was not sufficient to make such a person an aider or abettor of the crime. The rights of the defendants were carefully guarded by the charge of the court.

[4-6] The defendants make the further complaint that the right of the jury, in the exercise of its discretion, to relieve the defendants of the death penalty, and impose imprisonment for life, was limited by the court's instructions. This contention is not supported by the record. The jury in effect was told that the exercise of their discretion in this respect was substantially absolute, and it was free to return a verdict carrying with it imprisonment for life rather than the infliction of the death penalty, and that the infliction of either penalty was a question submitted solely to its sound judgment and discretion. The language of the instruction will not support a contrary construction. It therefore becomes unnecessary to cite authorities construing section 190, Penal Code, because there is not sufficient substance in the objection made to require a review of said authorities. Defendant Rincon specially assigns as error the conduct of the prosecution in compelling him to revisit the Ullman home on the day the inquest was held at Lancaster, near the place where the crime was committed. After the preliminary examination had concluded, Adams and Rincon were handcuffed together and taken to the Ullman home. Rincon entered the house with considerable reluctance, while Adams seemed wholly unabashed. The latter freely recited the circumstances of the crime in a realistic manner, the greater portion of which we have herein related. Rincon, who was not represented by counsel, was informed by the prosecution that he was not required to make any statement whatsoever. A number of the statements made by Adams incriminating Rincon were denied by the latter. At no time did Rincon admit his guilt, but at all times challenged the truth of the statements made by Adams that he, Rincon, struck the mortal blows or took any part in the homicide. He admitted that he assisted in carrying Ullman's body to the well, assisted in searching the home and riding into Los Angeles in Ullman's automobile with Adams after the commission of the homicide. He undoubtedly assisted in changing the appearance of the automobile on the following day, and received his share of the small sum of money which Ullman had in his possession at the time he was assaulted. Upon the trial of the case several witnesses testified to the fact that Rincon, when taken to the Ullman house, was reluctant to enter, and appeared to be very nervous and pale. His appearance and conduct at the Ullman home was shown in evidence, and it was claimed that both were evidence of a consciousness of guilt. The claim is made by appellant Rincon that his enforced visit to the Ullman house compelled him to give evidence against himself. While we do not commend the procedure adopted by the prosecution, we do not see how Rincon could have been prejudiced thereby. Had he made a confession of guilt under the circumstances related, a very serious question would be presented for our consideration. But this he did not do. His appearance under the stress of the situation had no special significance. The probabilities are very great that any person, whether he be guilty or innocent, if placed in his position, would have shown apprehension which is usually exhibited by nervousness and pallor. We feel satisfied that the jury, composed of reasonable persons, was not affected prejudicially by anything that took place at the Ullman home. Any statement there made not amounting to a confession was admissible against him without requiring preliminary proof of the fact that it was freely and voluntarily made. The distinction between a statement or admission of fact and a confession of guilt is well settled. People v. Ammerman, 50 P. 15, 118 Cal. 23; People v. Connelly (Cal. Sup.) 234 P. 374.

B. A. Shope was convicted of violating Pen. Code, § 288, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Pierce & Gould, of Ventura, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

YORK, J. The defendant was accused by information, filed by the district attorney of Ventura county, of the crime of violation of section 288, Penal Code, entitled "Crimes Against Children," a felony, and from the judgment of conviction defendant appeals.

The sole point raised worthy of consideration by this court is whether or not the trial court erred in permitting the district attorney to amend the information prior to the trial. The amendment was one made to make the information conform to the decision in the case of People v. Grinnell, 9 Cal. App. 238, 98 P. 681, and was amended before trial to charge a public offense in compliance with that decision, and at the time of trial the information did charge a single, definite public offense. The amendment placed upon the charged offense a definite limitation by adding the words, "the said act not then and there being an act constituting any crime provided for in part I of the Penal Code." According to the decision in People v. Grinnell, supra, the information without this amendment would have failed to describe a public offense under said section 288. See, also, People v. Camp, 183 P. 845, 42 Cal. App. 411.

Prior to the amendment the information as filed, although defective as above stated, was nevertheless an information attempting to charge the commission of a crime. The amendment completed the charge. As there is nothing to the contrary in the record, it will be assumed, in support of the order allowing the amendment, that the information as amended correctly states an offense shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination, and for which the defendant was committed. This being so, it was within the power of the court to allow such amendment to be made. Section 1008 of the Penal Code authorizes such order "where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant." The only limitation placed thereon by the statute is that an information cannot be amended "so as to charge an offense not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination." Discussing said section 1008, the Supreme Court in People v. Foster, 243 P. 667, 671, said:

"We think the amendment as made to section 1008, Penal Code, in 1911, is quite persuasive, if not entirely convincing, as to the intention of the Legislature to permit, in the discretion of the trial court, the amendment of informations where it can be done without substantial prejudice to the rights of the defendant, so as to correctly state the offense shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination."

There is nothing in the nature of the amendment, or in any circumstance of the case, that would suggest any abuse of discretion by the court in its exercise of the power thus conferred. On allowance of the amendment the defendant made no request for a continuance of time of trial, or any showing that he was entitled to a continuance. After an examination of the entire cause we are satisfied that the case was fully and fairly tried, and that there was ample evidence to authorize the conviction.

The judgment is affirmed.

Archibald B. Tinning, of Martinez, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of the county of Contra Costa, in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendants, in an action brought by the former to quiet their title to a certain easement claimed by them to exist in certain waters which take their rise upon the land now owned by the defendants herein, and which are thence conducted by said plaintiffs to the premises owned by them and known as the Harrison place, lying near the town of Danville, in said county of Contra Costa. Plaintiffs derived their ownership of their said property from their mother, Isabella Harrison, who had obtained title thereto in about the year 1887, and who not long thereafter acquired by deed from one William Hemme a conveyance to all of the waters issuing from a certain spring located upon the land now owned by the defendants herein, but of which land said William Hemme had originally been the owner, and the title to which land had descended by mesne conveyances to the defendants herein, who had acquired the same by purchase from the then owners thereof in August, 1922. Shortly thereafter a controversy arose between said defendants and the plaintiffs herein as to the extent and definition of the easement which is the subject of the present litigation. By the terms of the aforesaid conveyance from William Hemme to Isabella Harrison of the easement in question, the said Hemme undertook to convey:

"All of that certain spring and water flowing therefrom, situate, lying, and being in the county of Contra Costa, state of California, and particularly described as follows, to wit: 'All the water issuing from our spring, which spring is located on the west end of a certain tract of land'"—describing the land now owned by the defendants herein.

At the time of, and apparently for some considerable time prior to, the date of said conveyance there had been constructed and maintained at the place where the waters referred to therein took their rise a wooden box 4 feet square at the foot of an alder tree, which was apparently within the area of a boggy or marshy place where an amount of water which underlay and percolated through the larger tract upon which the same was situated came to the surface thereof, occupying an area upon the point of their exudation about 40 feet square. The box referred to had been sunk within this damp or marshy area with a view apparently to collect the waters which arose therein, and in order to aid in such collection wooden troughs or drains had been constructed leading into this central receptacle and out of which, by piping, the waters thus assembled were conveyed to the Harrison place.

About 26 years before the inception of the present litigation, the Harrisons, in order to augment the flow of water into this earlier receptacle, which is described in the record as "box A" or "spring A," had installed another wooden box about 2 feet square at a point lying about 40 feet southeasterly from said box A, and had led the waters collected therein by means of an iron pipe into box A. This later installed receptacle is described as "box B," or "spring B," and it is in reference to the right of the plaintiffs thereto and to the waters collected therein that the present litigation arose. It was the contention of the respondents herein that the waters collected in box A and box B were waters from one and the same source, and as such were embraced within the terms of the early grant to Isabella Harrison. It was the contention of the defendants and appellants herein that the waters thus collected from box B were from an entirely different and separate source and were not included in said original grant. It was the further contention of the respondents herein that, even if the waters thus collected in box B were not derived from the same general source as those collected in box A, the plaintiffs were nevertheless entitled to the same by prescription. The issues as thus presented by the pleadings were submitted to the trial court, and, upon the issue as to whether the waters collected in box B were included within the terms of the original grant of the easement to Isabella Harrison, the said court made the following findings of fact, viz.:

"I. That the plaintiffs Wilfred Harrison and Ralph Harrison are the owners of all the waters issuing from that certain spring located on the west end of that certain tract of land situate in the county of Contra Costa, state of California, described as follows, to wit: Lots numbered two (2) and four (4) and the south half of the northeast quarter of section 31, township 1 south, range 1 west, Mt. Diablo Meridian, containing 172.48 acres of land, together with the right of way to lay pipes to conduct water from said spring across said last-described tract to the said Harrison place, in plaintiffs' complaint described, belonging to the said plaintiffs.

"II. Said spring is the same spring described in a deed dated the 26th day of April, 1887, made by William Hemme, to Isabella Harrison, and recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county of Contra Costa, state of California, on the 29th day of April, 1887, in volume 50 of Deeds, at page 231, and consists of the waters issuing from the earth near a clump of laurel trees located about 820 feet southeasterly from the northwest corner of the last above described tract of land, and flowing into a wooden box or catch-basin about 4 feet square, sunk into the ground, and located near the foot of said laurel trees (the same being the point A as designated on the diagram referred to in plaintiffs' testimony), and the waters issuing from the earth and flowing into a wooden box about 2 feet square sunk into the ground and located about 40 feet southeasterly from said first-mentioned box or catch-basin (the same being the point B as designated on plaintiffs' said diagram) the water from said smaller box flows through a pipe into said larger box, from which it is conducted away to said Harrison place."

It is the contention of the appellants herein that the foregoing findings of the trial court, in so far as they relate to the waters issuing from the earth and flowing into the receptacle known as box B, are entirely unsupported by the evidence in the case. The appellants' first insistence in making this contention is that the term "spring," as used in the conveyance of the original easement to Isabella Harrison, must be interpreted as having reference only to the 4x4 box described in the record as "box A" or "spring A," and that said term cannot be so extended as to embrace the entire damp, boggy, or marshy area within which said receptacle was located. We are of the opinion that this contention is without merit, for the twofold reason that the term "spring" in its common acceptance, at least in California, is a term which in general usage has been applied to a damp, marshy or boggy area, usually of small but definite extent, wherein underground waters from a larger tract of land find their way to the surface thereof and make their presence known either by a definite outflow or by the surface presenting such a quantity thereof as will render practicable their assembling in such receptacles as those described in the record herein as box A and box B; and for the further reason that the interpretation which the trial court placed upon said term was the one apparently accepted and acted upon by the parties to the transfer of this easement, since it appears that either before or at the time of such transfer, when said box A was installed, there was also installed a radiating system of perforated troughs for the assembling of the waters of said marshy area. One of the troughs then installed, as shown by the evidence, extended in the direction of the spot where later box B was located, and, according to the evidence given by Ralph Harrison, ran through a rocky ridge of earth to the spot where box B was subsequently placed. The main insistence of the appellants in this regard is that the dry or rocky ridge above referred to constituted a distinct separation between the marshy spot where box A had been placed and the point where subsequently box B was located. We incline to the opinion, however, that the foregoing testimony of Ralph Harrison, if believed by the court, would constitute a sufficient basis for its finding that the waters issuing from the earth at both of the indicated points were waters which had a single source, and hence were embraced within the terms of the original grant of the easement to Isabella Harrison. If, therefore, the foregoing finding of the trial court was sufficiently supported by the evidence in the case, it was in itself sufficient to justify the judgment of the trial court based thereon, and, this being so, it becomes unnecessary for this court to consider or determine whether the asserted title of the plaintiffs to the waters collected in box B by prescription is or is not sufficiently supported by the evidence in the case.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment herein is affirmed.

Ex parte COLLINS. (Cr. 2902.)(Supreme Court of California, in Chambers.
April 24, 1926.)

Constitutional law $\hookrightarrow$ 270—Courts $\hookrightarrow$ 394(10)
—Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 1206(1)—Statute as to determining term of imprisonment held not unconstitutional as contrary to Fourteenth Amendment; application for writ of habeas corpus by petitioner whose prison term was set by prison board held to involve no federal question (Const. U. S. Amend. 14; Pen. Code, §§ 473, 1168).

Pen. Code, § 1168, authorizing prison board to determine duration of imprisonment after expiration of minimum term, does not violate Const. U. S. Amend. 14, and hence no federal question justifying writ of error to United States Supreme Court is involved in refusal of application for writ of habeas corpus by petitioner convicted of forgery, whose imprisonment was set at 12 years by prison board, after expiration of minimum term, under section 473.

Application by John L. Collins for a writ of habeas corpus. Application was denied, and petitioner applies to the Chief Justice for writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States. Application denied.

John L. Collins, in pro. per.

WASTE, C. J. The petitioner was convicted of the crime of forgery and sentenced to be confined in the state prison, but the court in imposing such sentence did not fix the term or duration of the period of imprisonment, leaving the prison board to determine what length of time the petitioner should be confined. Pen. Code, § 1168. After the expiration of the minimum term of imprisonment provided by law for forgery (Pen. Code, § 473), had expired, the prison board fixed the term of imprisonment of petitioner at 12 years. Contending that his detention was illegal, petitioner sought his release from imprisonment through an application to this court for a writ of habeas corpus, which was denied without opinion. Application of Collins, Crim. 2902, April 5, 1926. He has now made application to the Chief Justice for a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States.

In denying the application for a writ of habeas corpus the court considered petitioner's contention, based on his construction of the decision in People v. Sama, 207 P. 893, 189 Cal. 153, that section 1168 of the Penal Code is unconstitutional, in that it violates the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, is discriminatory, reposes an arbitrary discretion in an administrative body, and vests judicial powers in the prison board. This court held, in People v. Sama, supra, that it was not necessary that the provisions of the section, to be uniform in their application, should apply universally. It is sufficient, as was there pointed out, that the law bear equally, in its burdens and benefits, upon persons in the same category, and this depends upon the facts that characterize the offense. Had a written opinion been handed down in the matter of the application for a writ of habeas corpus, it would have been to the effect that the section is neither discriminatory nor unconstitutional in the manner contended for by the petitioner. People v. Sama, supra; in re Lee, 171 P. 958, 177 Cal. 690.

For the reason that I am not convinced that a federal question is involved in this matter, the application for a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Proceeding by Aurilla Mabel Waller against Emily W. Ewald and another to contest probate of the will of Aurilla Johnson, deceased. Judgment was rendered for the contestant denying probate, and the motion for a new trial was denied. From an order entered vacating a portion of the judgment awarding costs in favor of contestant against Emily W. Ewald, the contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; CURTIS, J., dissenting.

H. A. Blanchard, of San Jose (Daniel Rygel, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant.

Maurice J. Rankin and L. H. Walker, both of San Jose, for respondent.

LENNON, J. The order appealed from vacates that portion of a judgment, in a will contest, which awarded costs in favor of the plaintiff, Aurilla Mabel Waller, and against defendant Emily W. Ewald. The contest arose over a document which purports to be the last will and testament of Aurilla Johnson, deceased, and names said Emily W. Ewald as sole legatee and devisee. This instrument was offered for probate by Amos O. Williams as public administrator of Santa Clara county, who asked for letters of administration with the will annexed. Probate was contested by Aurilla Mabel Waller, an adopted daughter of the decedent, upon the grounds that decedent was not of sound mind at the date of the execution of the instrument and that the instrument was not entirely written, dated, and signed by the decedent. In this action Amos O. Williams and Emily W. Ewald appeared as defendants. The jury returned a verdict in favor of contestant upon both grounds, judgment was entered in accordance therewith, and defendants' motion for a new trial was denied. In passing, it may be noted that the merits of the will contest are involved in an appeal which defendants have taken from the judgment itself and are not under consideration in the present proceedings.

Subsequent to the motion for a new trial, defendant Amos O. Williams moved that the judgment be set aside and vacated upon the ground that it contained an award of costs which was made and based upon an erroneous conclusion of law and which was not within the authority or jurisdiction of the trial court. The motion was granted, and an order made vacating the judgment and directing the entry of a judgment in favor of plaintiff as previously rendered, but eliminating therefrom all provisions concerning costs. From the order last mentioned plaintiff, Aurilla Mabel Waller, instituted the present appeal.

In support of her appeal, plaintiff contends that the trial court had jurisdiction to award costs against defendant Emily W. Ewald, since section 1720 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes the court to exercise its discretion in allowing costs in a will contest, and therefore that any error committed was merely an error in the exercise of discretion concerning a matter within the court's jurisdiction and could only be reached on a motion for new trial, and not, as in the present case, by a motion to vacate the judgment made subsequent to and independently of the proceedings for a new trial.

[1,2] The right to recover costs exists solely by virtue of statute. Consequently an award of costs can be justified only if permitted by some statutory provision, and the measure of the statute is the measure of the right. Begbie v. Begbie, 60 P. 667, 128 Cal. 154, 49 L. R. A. 141; Turner v. East Side Canal & Irr. Co., 171 P. 299, 177 Cal. 570; Sime v. Hunter, 202 P. 967, 55 Cal. App. 157. It is true that the statute covering and controlling the allowance of costs in a will contest instituted before probate is section 1720 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides:

"When it is not otherwise prescribed in this title, the superior court, or the Supreme Court, on appeal, may, in its discretion, order costs to be paid by any party to the proceedings, or out of the assets of the estate, as justice may require. Execution for the costs may issue out of the superior court."

On several occasions this section of the Code has been before this court for interpretation, and in each instance the court has held that it does not authorize an order allowing costs until the judgment in the will contest has become final. The reason assigned for so holding is that it is not possible for the court to exercise its "discretion" in accordance with the requirements of "justice," as prescribed by the statute, until the court is apprised of the entire history of the litigation, including the ultimate fate of the disputed document.

In Estate of Yoell, 117 P. 1047, 160 Cal. 741, in reversing an order directing payment of costs of contestants out of the funds of the estate, the court said:

"The final determination of the litigation * * * must have a weight in influencing the court in the exercise of the discretion to award costs with which the law has vested it."

Counsel for appellant point out that the order awarding costs in the case last cited was made after a disagreement by the jury, and not as an incident to a judgment in favor of a contestant, as in the present instance. This attempt to distinguish the cases is answered by Estate of Berthol, 125 P. 750, 163 Cal. 343, where the order allowing costs was made subsequent to a verdict and judgment in favor of the contestant. The order was reversed upon the ground that:

"The court is simply without discretion to make any order until the final determination of the controversy."

It is immaterial whether the order awards costs from the assets of the estate or against an individual party, for in neither case can the requisite discretion be exercised until the final determination of the litigation. The case of Estate of Jones, 135 P. 293, 166 Cal. 147, follows the Estate of Berthol, supra, and is a striking illustration of the reason underlying the interpretation accorded the statute.

By reason of these authorities we are compelled to conclude that the statute applicable to costs in will contests before probate does not authorize an allowance of costs until the final determination of the litigation, and consequently that the trial court was without jurisdiction to allow costs in rendering the judgment in plaintiff's favor in the present case.

[3] However, it is pointed out by plaintiff that the motion to set aside the order allowing costs was not made by Emily W. Ewald, the defendant against whom costs were awarded, but by defendant Amos O. Williams, who was not the "party aggrieved." Plaintiff claims that, according to the provisions of section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the motion can only be made by the party injured by the erroneous judgment. It was unnecessary to comply with the terms of the section last mentioned, for, to the extent that the judgment purported to allow costs, it was outside of the jurisdiction of the court and absolutely void. Any person at any time could call the attention of the court to that fact. When a judgment or a part thereof is absolutely void and the invalidity is apparent upon the face of the record, it "may be attacked anywhere, directly or collaterally whenever it presents itself, either by parties or strangers. It is simply a nullity, and can be neither a basis nor evidence of any right whatever." Estate of Pusey, 181 P. 648, 650, 180 Cal. 368, 374; Lang v. Lang, 190 P. 181, 182 Cal. 765.

The order eliminating that portion of the judgment which allowed costs was therefore proper, and the present appeal must fail.

The order is affirmed.

QUINN v. REILLY et al. (S. F. 11073).

(Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1926.)

1. Trusts §86—Doctrine of resulting trust, where title is taken in person not paying consideration, is subject to exception that such transactions between parent and child are presumed to be gifts or advancements (Civ. Code, § 853).

Exception to doctrine embodied in Civ. Code, § 853, that resulting trust arises in favor of purchaser who pays consideration money and takes conveyance in name of a third person, exists in transactions between parent and child, in which cases gifts or advancements are presumed.

2. Trusts §86.

Presumption that parent, paying consideration money and taking conveyance in name of child, intends an advancement, is rebuttable.

3. Pleading §225(1)—Sustaining demurrer without leave to amend complaint in action to establish resulting trust, on theory that advancement to defendant was presumed, held error.

In action to establish resulting trust in property purchased by plaintiff's father, who took title in defendant, plaintiff's sister sustaining demurrer to complaint without leave to amend, on ground that parent was presumed to have intended an advancement to defendant, held erroneous, since it denied to plaintiff any right to rebut the presumption.

4. Trusts §371(2)—Plaintiff, alleging that transaction between his father and sister was not intended as an advancement, held not required to further plead acts or agreements supporting such claim.

Plaintiff suing to establish a resulting trust in property purchased by his deceased father and conveyed to defendant, his sister, alleging that transaction was not intended as a gift, advancement, or bounty, held not required to further allege specific acts or agreements supporting allegation that gift was not intended.

5. Pleading §11.

Ultimate facts only need be pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by William Joseph Quinn against Nellie E. Reilly and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Sawyer & Sawyer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Gillogley, Crofton & Payne, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This action was commenced by William Joseph Quinn against his sister, Nellie E. Reilly (her husband being joined), to have Nellie E. Reilly declared a trustee, holding certain realty and improvements for the benefit of the estate of their father, Patrick P. Quinn. It appears that in 1921 Patrick P. Quinn purchased certain property, the deed running to himself and his daughter, Nellie E. Reilly.

The lower court sustained a demurrer, without leave to amend, to appellant's second amended complaint, and the appeal is from the resulting judgment in respondents' favor.

The allegation, to which the demurrer was sustained, reads as follows:

"Plaintiff is informed and believes and therefore alleges that at the special instance and request of said Patrick P. Quinn said deed was made and executed to said Patrick P. Quinn, and said Nellie E. Reilly as grantees therein, and having said deed so made and executed said Patrick P. Quinn intended to convey, and did have conveyed to said Nellie E. Reilly, the said interest and title in and to said property, thereby conveyed to said Nellie E. Reilly, in trust for and to the use and benefit of said Patrick P. Quinn and his said estate and not otherwise, and that said deed was so made and executed, not with any intent or purpose of conveying, nor did it convey, to said Nellie E. Reilly such interest in or title to said property or any part thereof, as a gift, advancement, or bounty from said Patrick P. Quinn, or otherwise than in trust as herein alleged, and at all times since the making of said deed Nellie E. Reilly has held such interest and title in said property in trust as alleged and as trustee for said Patrick P. Quinn and his said estate, and not otherwise."

The contention in support of the appeal is twofold: It is urged that under section 853 of the Civil Code, a resulting trust arose in favor of Patrick P. Quinn, or his estate, out of the 1921 transaction, and that the provisions of section 853 are without exception in their scope. It is also urged that, if there is an exception to the provisions of section 853—as in the case where the transaction is between husband and wife or parent and child—this exception operates to raise a presumption that is rebuttable and not conclusive.

Section 853 provides that:

"When a transfer of real property is made to one person, and the consideration therefor is paid by or for another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person by or for whom such payment is made."

[1] Section 853 of the Civil Code is but a formal declaration of the old and well-established doctrine of equity that a resulting trust arises in favor of a purchaser who pays the consideration money and takes the conveyance in the name of a third person. There are, however, exceptions to this doctrine. It is well settled that one exception to the rule is found in transactions between parent and child. Russ v. Mebius, 16 Cal. 350; Hamilton v. Hubbard, 65 P. 321, 66 P. 860, 134 Cal. 603; Elliott v. Merchants' Bank, etc., Co., 132 P. 280, 21 Cal. App. 536-541. These transactions are presumed to be in the nature of gifts, advancements, or bounties. In short, the existence of the relationship of parent and child is a circumstance which prima facie establishes the presumption of an advancement and thereby rebuts the presumption of a resulting trust.

[2] Considering it as a circumstance in evidence, it follows that there must be, of course, evidence admitted on the other side; that is to say, the presumption that an advancement was intended in transactions between parent and child is itself a presumption which is rebuttable. It was so held in Faylor v. Faylor, 68 P. 482, 136 Cal. 92, 96.

[3] The trial court, by sustaining the demurrer to the amended complaint without leave to amend, precluded the appellant from offering any proof which he might have at his command that the intention of his father was not that the conveyance should be a gift, advancement, or bounty, but a trust. In short, the order of the lower court sustaining the demurrer operated in effect to make conclusive a presumption which is merely rebuttable.

[4] Respondents, however, contend that, if the transaction was not in the nature of a gift, advancement, or bounty, it was not so by reason of some act or agreement of the parties to it, and that those acts or agreements should have been specifically pleaded by the appellant.

[5] With this contention we cannot agree. Ultimate facts only need be pleaded. In the instant case the ultimate fact is the intention of the deceased. Any act or agreement between the parties would be, perhaps, proof of this ultimate fact, but they would not be the ultimate fact itself. In pleading the intention of the deceased, the appellant pleaded an ultimate fact which, if it can be established by competent evidence, will rebut the presumption that the 1921 transaction was in the nature of a gift, advancement, or bounty. The appellant was not obliged to embody his proof, whatever it may amount to, in the allegations of his complaint.

Judgment reversed.

PALO VERDE IRR. DIST. v. SEELEY,
Secretary of Board of Trustees, etc.

(Supreme Court of California. April 22, 1926.)

I. Waters and water courses ⚡226—Authority for issuance of refunding bonds, payable by assessment of all lands in irrigation district, to take up bonds originally payable from taxes on property within former levee district only, held constitutional (St. 1911, p. 303, as amended by St. 1917, p. 809; Palo Verde Irrigation District Act [St. 1923, p. 1067], §§ 24, 28, 59, and section 15a, as added by St. 1925, p. 637).

Legislature, having expressly found in St. 1925, p. 637, adding section 15a to Palo Verde Irrigation District Act, that lands and improvements within such district will be uniformly benefited by works theretofore constructed by levee district, there is no constitutional inhibition against issuance of refunding bonds, for payment of which all lands and improvements thereon within irrigation district will be assessed under section 15a and sections 24, 28, 59, to take up levee district bonds, payable under St. 1911, p. 303, as amended by St. 1917, p. 809, from taxes on property within levee district only.

2. Waters and water courses ⇨224.

Under Const. art. 11, § 13, Legislature has plenary power over districts organized for reclamation purposes.

3. Constitutional law ⇨290(1)—Legislature's declaration of benefit to all lands of irrigation district by works built by former levee district and imposition of assessment for payment thereof held not taking of property without "due process" (Palo Verde Irrigation District Act [St. 1923, p. 1067] §§ 24, 28, 59, and section 15a, as added by St. 1925, p. 637).

Legislature's declaration (St. 1925, p. 637, adding section 15a to Palo Verde Irrigation District Act), that all lands of such district were benefited by works built by former levee district, included in irrigation district and assessment of all lands in latter district for payment thereof, under such section, and sections 24, 28, and 59, is not taking of property without "due process."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Due Process of Law.]

4. Constitutional law ⇨290(3)—When Legislature finds property in irrigation district benefited by fixing boundaries thereof, property owners are not entitled to hearing before assessment.

Generally, hearing as to benefits must be provided before land is finally burdened by assessment, but when Legislature, by fixing boundaries of irrigation district, finds that all property therein is benefited, property owners are not entitled to hearing, being conclusively presumed to have been heard through their representatives in Legislature.

5. Constitutional law ⇨70(3) — Legislature's finding that all lands in district are benefited by levee protection works theretofore constructed is conclusive, and not reviewable unless palpably unjust and absurd.

Legislature's finding that all property in irrigation district taking over levee district is benefited by works theretofore constructed by latter district is conclusive, and not reviewable by courts unless shown to be palpably unjust and absurd.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨226 — That Legislature's finding that all lands of irrigation district will be benefited by works built by levee district included therein was made after fixing boundaries does not invalidate it.

That Legislature's finding of benefit to all lands of irrigation district by levee protection works theretofore constructed by levee district included in irrigation district was made after boundaries of latter district were fixed does not militate against validity of such finding.

7. Waters and water courses ⇨226—Board of supervisors' determination as to lands benefited by proposed works held not conclusive, so as to render Legislature's subsequent finding of benefit to other lands in subsequently organized irrigation district embracing territory of levee district unreasonable.

Board of supervisors' determination, in fixing boundaries of levee district, that only lands therein included were benefited by proposed works was not conclusive of such fact, so as to render Legislature's subsequent finding of benefit to lands outside district, within subsequently organized irrigation district, embracing territory of such levee district, unreasonable, unwarranted, and arbitrary.

8. Waters and water courses ⇨226—Refunding bonds, made charge on entire irrigation district, held not invalid because authorized to be sold to repay only part of outstanding bonds of former levee district (St. 1911, p. 303, as amended by St. 1917, p. 809; Palo Verde Irrigation District Act [St. 1923, p. 1067], §§ 24, 28, 59, and section 15a, as added by St. 1925, p. 637).

That refunding bonds, made charge on entire irrigation district by Palo Verde Irrigation District Act, §§ 24, 28, 59, and section 15a, as added by St. 1925, p. 637, are to be sold to pay only part of outstanding bonds of former levee district taken over by irrigation district, while principal and interest of remaining bonds continue to be charge only on property originally liable therefor under St. 1911, p. 303, as amended by St. 1917, p. 809, does not invalidate them.

9. Waters and water courses ⇨226—Authorizing issuance of refunding bonds by irrigation district to retire part of bonds of levee district does not necessitate imposition of obligation on all lands to pay off remaining levee district bonds (St. 1911, p. 303, as amended by St. 1917, p. 809; Palo Verde Irrigation District Act [St. 1923, p. 1067]).

As obligation imposed on levee district property, under St. 1911, p. 303, as amended by St. 1917, p. 809, was to pay off bonds by general tax, owners of property cannot complain that other lands benefited by improvements are not assessed, and authority granted to irrigation district, taking over levee district under Palo Verde Irrigation District Act, to issue refunding bonds, to retire part of levee district bonds, does not necessitate imposition of obligation on all lands in irrigation district to pay off remaining levee district bonds.

10. Waters and water courses ⇨226—Legislature could provide for continued payment of part of outstanding bonds of levee district, taken over by irrigation district by general tax (St. 1911, p. 303, as amended by St. 1917, p. 809; Palo Verde Irrigation District Act [St. 1923, p. 1067]).

It being optional with Legislature to provide for payment of levee district bonds through exercise of general taxing power, as was done by St. 1911, p. 303, as amended by St. 1917, p. 809, it could continue such method of raising funds to pay part of outstanding bonds of district when taken over by irrigation district organized under St. 1923, p. 1067.

11. Waters and water courses ⚡226—Owners of property outside levee district consented by electing to become part of irrigation district to assume obligations imposed by statute for issuance of refunding bonds, and were bound by majority vote of electors to issue bonds (Palo Verde Irrigation District Act [St. 1923, p. 1067] §§ 57-59).

Owners of property outside levee district, taken over by irrigation district organized under St. 1923, p. 1067, consented, by electing to become part of latter district, to become subject to obligations authorized by provisions of such act for issuance of refunding bonds to take up outstanding levee district bonds (sections 57-59), and were bound by majority vote of property owners of irrigation district to issue bonds, though they voted in negative.

12. Waters and water courses ⚡226—Legislature's finding that all lands of irrigation district will be benefited by water system already constructed held not palpably unreasonable and unwarranted as matter of law (Palo Verde Irrigation District Act [St. 1923, p. 1067], and section 15a, as added by St. 1925, p. 637).

Where petition for writ of mandate to compel signing of irrigation district refunding bonds, authorized by Palo Verde Irrigation District Act, to take up outstanding bonds of water company, averred that vast extensions and improvements were contemplated to supply thousands of acres of unirrigated land, it cannot be said, as matter of law, that Legislature's finding in section 15a, as added by St. 1925, p. 637, that all lands within irrigation district are benefited by water distribution system already constructed is palpably unreasonable and unwarranted.

13. Constitutional law ⚡143—Contract of taxpayers of levee district held not impaired by issuance of refunding bonds of irrigation district to take up outstanding levee district bonds, because personal property will be released from obligation to pay taxes (Palo Verde Irrigation District Act [St. 1923, p. 1067]).

Issuance of refunding bonds by irrigation district, organized under St. 1923, p. 1067, to take up outstanding bonds of levee district, held not to impair obligation of contract, so far as taxpayers of levee district are concerned, because of release of personal property within district from obligation to pay taxes for repayment of such bonds.

14. Constitutional law ⚡143—Rights of levee district bondholders held not impaired by issuance of refunding bonds of irrigation district organized to take up outstanding levee district bonds (Palo Verde Irrigation District Act [St. 1923, p. 1067]).

Rights of holders of levee district bonds held not impaired by issuance of refunding bonds by irrigation district, organized under St. 1923, p. 1067, to take up outstanding levee district bonds, obligation thereof being satisfied if old bonds are paid, while, if not, obligation therefor remained.

Application by the Palo Verde Irrigation District for writ of mandate to Tony Seeley, as Secretary of the Board of Trustees of such district. Writ granted.

Chapman & Chapman, by Ward Chapman, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macniel and Paul E. Schwab, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Mandate to compel the respondent, as secretary of the board of trustees of Palo Verde irrigation district, to sign $213,000 of refunding bonds, designated as "second issue" of said Palo Verde irrigation district, which were voted upon at an election held in said irrigation district on August 28, 1925.

The Palo Verde irrigation district was organized in 1923 under an act known as "Palo Verde Irrigation District Act" (Stats. 1923, p. 1067), for the purpose of taking over the properties and functions of three separate and independent agencies theretofore operating in the Palo Verde Valley, and thereby eliminating the inefficiencies and extra expenses occasioned by the independent functioning of said agencies. These independent agencies consisted of the Palo Verde joint levee district, which had charge and control of levee protection for the valley; the Palo Verde drainage district, which had charge of the drainage projects in the valley, and the Palo Verde Mutual Water System, a private corporation, which had control of the distribution of water.

The boundaries of the Palo Verde irrigation district comprise all of the territory within the old Palo Verde joint levee district of Riverside and Imperial counties, and all of the territory within the Palo Verde drainage district. Said levee district and drainage district, however, partially overlap each other, and there is an area containing some 684 acres within the old drainage district which is not within the boundaries of the old levee district and some 13,817 acres in the old levee district which are not within the drainage district.

The validity of the Irrigation District Act as a whole, and the organization of the Palo Verde irrigation district thereunder, was considered and upheld by this court in the case of Barber v. Galloway, 231 P. 34.

The statute under which the Palo Verde irrigation district was organized was amended in 1925 (Stats. 1925, p. 637), by adding section 15a, which deals specifically with the power of the irrigation district to issue refunding bonds to take care of the bonds already issued or to be issued of the Palo Verde levee district, the Palo Verde drainage district, and the Palo Verde Mutual Water System. In said section it was specifically declared that:

"All of the levee and other protection works or structures and all other drainage canals and other drainage works, and all of the irrigation system of the Palo Verde Mutual Water Company which have heretofore been constructed by either and all of said organizations [Palo Verde Levee District, Palo Verde Drainage District and Palo Verde Mutual Water Company], or which may hereafter be constructed, maintained and operated by the Palo Verde irrigation district, are uniformly advantageous and beneficial to all of the lands within said district [Palo Verde Irrigation District]."

In the case of Barber v. Galloway, supra, the question of whether or not the issuance of bonds by the irrigation district to redeem the bonds of the levee or drainage district would be illegal was expressly left open as being unnecessary to a decision of that case. Since the date of that decision the proceedings for the authorization, issuance, and sale of said $213,000 of refunding bonds have been taken, and, respondent being one of the officers required under the statute and under the resolution authorizing the issuance of these bonds to sign the same, has refused to do so upon the ground that such bonds would, if issued, be invalid. It is the respondent's contention that the provisions relating to the issuance of these refunding bonds, and the provisions regarding the levying of assessments for the payment thereof are unconstitutional, and that the issuance of these bonds with the subsequent levying of assessments for their payment in accordance with the statutory provisions will result in the taking of property without due process of law, and will result in the unconstitutional impairment of the obligations of a contract. It is conceded that the statutory requirements regulating the proceedings for the authorization, issuance, and sale of the bonds have been complied with, and therefore no question of the regularity of said proceedings is here involved.

[1] The said $213,000 of refunding bonds are to be issued "for the purpose of providing funds to be applied upon the payment or redemption of bonds now outstanding of the Palo Verde joint levee districts of Riverside and Imperial counties of California, the Palo Verde drainage district or the Palo Verde Mutual Water Company, the payment of which has been assumed by this district [Palo Verde Irrigation District] and which may become due and payable during the next three years." It appears that none of the Palo Verde drainage district bonds will mature within the next three years, but that $123,000 of bonds of the Palo Verde joint levee district will mature within three years from August, 1925, and that $90,000 of bonds of the Palo Verde Mutual Water Company will mature within three years from said date. Manifestly, therefore, the proceeds from the $213,000 of refunding bonds are to be used for the purpose of paying or redeeming the $123,000 of joint levee district bonds and $90,000 of the Palo Verde Mutual Water Company's bonds.

The bonds of the old levee district which are to be redeemed or paid off were payable from taxes upon all the taxable real and personal property in the levee district. Stats. 1911, p. 303, as amended by Stats. 1917, p. 809. Under the provisions of the Palo Verde Irrigation District Act, sections 15a, 24, 28, and 59, all of the lands and improvements thereon within the irrigation district will be assessed for the payment of the refunding bonds. The result will therefore necessarily be that a portion of the burden of the old joint levee district will be imposed upon the 684 acres of the new irrigation district, which were not any time a part of the old joint levee district which originally incurred the obligation.

Respondent insists that the board of trustees of the Palo Verde irrigation district has not the power to authorize and issue bonds of the district for the purpose of providing funds to pay or redeem bonds of the former levee district and drainage district, and thus impose an obligation by taxation upon property owners whose properties are located outside of the boundaries of the former districts for the purpose of payment of a bonded indebtedness which was not originally a lien or a charge upon their property. With this contention we cannot agree. In Johnson v. City of San Diego, 109 Cal. 468, 42 P. 249, 30 L. R. A. 178, and People v. Alameda County, 26 Cal. 641, the court upheld the power of the Legislature to make property actually benefited liable for the cost of public improvements and chargeable with the payment of a reasonable proportion thereof based upon benefits or other equitable considerations.

If the lands within the irrigation district which were not included in the original levee district are and will be actually benefited by the levee protection work already constructed by the levee district, no good reason exists why they should not be called upon to pay their proportional share of the cost of construction. That the lands and improvements within the irrigation district will be uniformly benefited by the levee protection works heretofore constructed has been expressly found by the Legislature. In the face of this express finding by the Legislature we find no constitutional inhibition against the issuance of refunding bonds whereby the whole irrigation district assumes the burden originally imposed upon the property within the levee district.

[2] It is well settled in this state that the Legislature has plenary power over districts organized for reclamation purposes. Barber v. Galloway, supra. By article 11, § 13, of the Constitution, the Legislature is granted unlimited power "to provide for the supervision, regulation and conduct, in such manner as it may determine, of the affairs of irrigation districts, reclamation districts or drainage districts, organized or existing under any law of this state."

[3-5] It cannot be said that the declaration by the Legislature of a benefit to all the lands of the irrigation district and the imposition of an assessment upon all the lands for the payment thereof is a taking of property without due process of law. The general rule on this subject is that a hearing as to benefits must be provided at some time before the land is finally burdened by the assessment. But this general rule is subject to the well-established exception that, when the Legislature itself, by fixing the boundaries of a district, finds that all of the property therein is benefited, the property owners are not entitled to a hearing, for they are conclusively presumed to have been heard through their representatives in the Legislature. Tarpey v. McClure, 190 Cal. 593, 604, 213 P. 983. Such a finding by the Legislature, in the absence of a showing that the action of the Legislature was palpably unjust and absurd, is conclusive and is not subject to review by the courts. People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 386, 103 P. 207.

[6] The mere fact that the finding of a benefit was made after the boundaries of the irrigation district were fixed does not, in our opinion, militate against the validity of such a finding by the Legislature. If the Legislature may make an implied finding that certain lands are or will be benefited by certain improvements within that district, it would seem to lie within its power to make express findings that certain lands already included in a district will be benefited by improvements within that district.

[7] No attempt is made by the respondent to establish the fact that the action of the Legislature in declaring the lands of the irrigation district benefited by the levee protection improvements was arbitrary and unjust by denying any of the facts set forth by petitioners to justify the findings of the Legislature. Respondent contents himself with declaring that, inasmuch as the board of supervisors, to whom was given the power of determining the boundaries of the old levee district, must have determined, in fixing the said boundaries, that the lands therein included and no others were benefited by the proposed levee protection works, such determination was conclusive of the fact that only the lands within the levee district would be benefited by such works, and any subsequent action of the Legislature finding that other lands not included within the old levee district were benefited must necessarily be unreasonable, unwarranted, and arbitrary. This does not necessarily follow. It may well happen that by the extension of the original plans lands which would not be benefited by the original construction work would derive a benefit, not only from the additional improvement, but from the original improvement as well. The determination of the board of supervisors is not, therefore, a conclusive determination, and is not uncontrovertible proof that the action of the Legislature in declaring other lands benefited was unwarranted.

[8] There is nothing anomalous in the fact that the refunding bonds which are to be a charge upon the entire irrigation district are to be sold to repay only a portion of the outstanding levee bonds, namely, those maturing in the next three years, while principal and interest of the remaining bonds continue to be a charge only upon the property originally liable therefor. The Legislature has seen fit, in the exercise of its plenary power, to allow that obligation to remain against the property originally liable therefor unless refunding bonds may hereafter be issued to take them up. No injustice is done the owners of the properties within the old levee district, because they are only required to do what they were originally bound to do. The fact that the Legislature has seen fit to partially lighten the burden of the original obligation of the property owners of the old levee district does not make it obligatory upon the Legislature to permanently lessen it.

[9] Respondent argues that the Legislature, having authorized the issuance of refunding bonds, which are a charge upon all the lands uniformly benefited to retire a part of the levee district bonds, it will be necessary for the Legislature to impose an obligation upon all of the lands benefited to pay off the remaining levee district bonds. However, the obligation imposed upon the old levee district properties was not an assessment based upon special benefits, but was a general tax, not referable to special benefits. The two methods of raising revenues are entirely distinct, and therefore the property owners obligated under the imposition of a general tax will not be in a position to complain that other lands benefited by the improvements are not assessed. S. P. Co. v. Levee District No. 1, 172 Cal. 345, 156 P. 502.

[10] It was optional with the Legislature to provide for the redemption of the bonds through assessments based upon benefits, or provide for their payment through the exercise of its general taxing power. Since it was optional with the Legislature to cause these bonds to be discharged through the imposition of a general tax without regard to benefits, it may at its option continue that method of raising the funds for the payment of the remaining bonds of the levee district.

[11] It may also be said, we think, that the property owners within the area not originally included in the levee district, by electing to become a part of the irrigation district, consented to become subjected to the obligations authorized to be imposed by the provisions of the Irrigation District Act for the issuance of the refunding bonds. Under the Irrigation District Act, the board of trustees had the power to issue refunding bonds to take up outstanding levee district bonds as well as the bonds of the drainage district and water company. Sections 57, 58, and 59, Stats. 1923, p. 1067. The question of whether the new district should be organized was submitted to a vote of the property owners of the district and carried. Moreover, it will be remembered that the proposal to issue the bonds was carried by an overwhelming vote at the special election called for that purpose. It may be that the owners of property in the added territory voted in the negative, but their properties formed a component part of the new district, and the voice of the majority under the provisions of the statute under which they had elected to become a part of the new district was binding upon them.

Respondent insists, however, that the facts and decision in the instant case are practically identical with the facts and decision in the case of Reclamation District No. 70 v. Birks, 159 Cal. 233, 113 P. 170, and that the instant case is therefore covered and controlled by the latter case. Respondent relies particularly upon certain language to be found in the Birks Case, which reads as follows:

"* * * Where a debt has been imposed upon the property of a quasi municipal corporation such as a reclamation district, which debt is to be paid by the owners of the property within the district in proportion to the benefits which their lands receive from the work done, it is not within the power of the Legislature to transfer and impose this debt upon property not within the district at the time the original obligation was created, and which was not benefited by the work done."

The Birks Case is not, however, closely analogous in its facts and circumstances to the instant case, and that decision does not, therefore, govern and control the instant case. The facts in that case show that there had been in existence a district known as "swamp land district No. 70." This district had issued warrants to the extent of many thousand dollars. In 1905 the Legislature created reclamation district No. 70, which reclamation district embraced all of the territory within the old swamp land district No. 70 and certain additional territory in another district. The trustees of reclamation district No. 70, upon the fallacious assumption that title to the improvements of old 70 remained in old 70 after its absorption by new 70, adopted a plan whereby the property of old 70 was to be purchased by new 70 and paid for by assessments levied upon lands in the new 70. There was no legislative finding that the lands of the new district were benefited by the improvements undertaken by the old 70, and no provision was made by the Legislature for the payment of the existing debt of the old district by the new district. The assessments levied for the payment of the properties of the old district were evidently levied upon the theory that the debts of the old district became automatically the debts of the new district, and the new district was liable for such debts by operation of law. The court in its decision pointed out that beneficial title to the property of the old district was in the state, and upon the creation of the new district the title became vested in the new district; the new district could not buy what it already owned, and an assessment for the payment of the purchase of the property was therefore invalid. It was further held that, in the absence of any provision by the Legislature for the payment of the existing debt, it remained the debt of the old district, and did not become the obligation of the new district by operation of law. It was said that the debt of the old district did not become an obligation of the new district by operation of law for the reason that it might happen that the lands of the new district would not be benefited by the reclamation works of the old district, and it would be manifestly unjust for the burden to be automatically imposed by operation of law regardless of whether there was or was not any benefit. The question of what the situation would be had there been, as in the instant case, a legislative finding that the lands of the new district were benefited by the improvements of the old district was not discussed, and obviously could not have been decided for the reason that that question was not then before the court.

Even the language relied upon by respondent as specifically denying the power of the Legislature to impose the burden upon the land in the new irrigation district not originally within the levee district is not inconsistent with the theory that such a burden may be imposed if the new lands are found to be benefited by the improvements of the old levee district. The language relied upon is merely to the effect that it is not within the power of the Legislature to impose the debt upon property not within the district at the time the original obligation was created which was "not benefited by the work done." In the instant case there is an express enactment by the Legislature to the effect that all the lands within the irrigation district will be benefited by the improvements of the old drainage district, the old levee district, and the Palo Verde Mutual Water System. In the Birks Case there was no such enactment. In the instant case express provision is made for the assumption of the debt of the old levee district by the new irrigation district by means of the issuance of refunding bonds. In the Birks Case no such provision had been made. Therein lies the distinction and differentiation between the Birks Case and the present case.

[12] We have heretofore discussed only the question of the validity of the refunding bonds to redeem the bonds of the old levee district. The same arguments, however, apply with equal force to the bonds proposed to be issued to redeem the bonds of the Palo Verde Mutual Water System. Section 15a of the Statute of 1925 (Stats. 1925, p. 637) contains an express finding that all the lands of the irrigation district will be benefited by the irrigation system of the Palo Verde Mutual Water Company. Inasmuch as the petition for the mandate avers that within the next three years vast extensions and improvements are contemplated to be made so that thousands of acres of land not now under the water system can be supplied with water and placed in cultivation, it cannot be said as a matter of law that the finding of the Legislature that all of the lands within the irrigation district, including both the lands now served by irrigation and those to be served, are benefited by the water distribution system already constructed, is palpably unreasonable and unwarranted.

[13] It is also seriously urged by the respondent that the obligation of the contract entered into by the taxpayers of the Palo Verde joint levee district at the time of the issuance of the levee district bonds will be impaired by the issuance of the refunding bonds by reason of the fact that the personal property within the levee district will be released from the obligation to pay taxes for the repayment of the levee district bonds. There is no impairment of the obligation so far as the taxpayers are concerned by the change in the method of taxation. In the case of La Mesa Lemon Grove, etc., Irrigation District v. Halley (Cal. Sup.) 239 P. 719, it was held that the Legislature had the power to authorize changes in the method of raising revenue by such district, and expressly repudiated the idea that property owners had any contractual right to have the same method continued in force without alteration.

[14] It is, of course, obvious that the rights of the bondholders are not in any way impaired by the issuance of the refunding bonds. If the bonds are issued and sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the old bonds as they mature, the obligation of the old bonds is satisfied, and there is no contract to impair. If the obligation of the old bonds is not extinguished by their payment from the proceeds of the refunding bonds, then the obligation of the old bonds remains, and all the property originally liable therefor continues to be liable therefor. Nowhere in the original act nor in the amendatory act of 1925 is there any attempt on the part of the Legislature to release any property from existing obligation to bondholders.

Let the writ issue, directed to Tony Seeley as secretary of the board of trustees of Palo Verde irrigation district, commanding him to sign the $213,000 of refunding bonds designated as "second issue" of the Palo Verde Irrigation district, voted upon at the election held in said district on August 28, 1925.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Fred V. Treat, Judge.

Action for goods sold and delivered by E. Campion against Margaret C. Downey, doing business as the Gage Millinery. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Laurenz J. Krueger, of San Francisco, and J. A. Bardin, of Salinas, for appellant.
C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an action for goods sold and delivered. The defendant answered, and the case was tried before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, and from the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The plaintiff declared on a common count indebitatus assumpsit. The defendant interposed an answer, in which she (1) denied specifically the allegations contained in the complaint; and then she alleged (2) affirmatively that the agreement between the parties was that this defendant should make reasonable efforts to dispose of the goods, and that they should be paid for by the defendant as the goods were sold and paid for by the purchasers; and then she further alleged (3) that the agreement was to the effect that the defendant should endeavor to sell the goods, and if she was unable to do so then, on application, the vendor would send a special salesman from his establishment in San Francisco to the defendant's place of business at Monterey to assist her in conducting a special sale of said goods, and upon his refusal to do so that the defendant had returned the goods to the vendor, costs prepaid.

The defendant was the proprietress of a millinery store at Monterey, Cal. On the 21st day of August, 1924, Mr. Rhodes, as a traveling salesman representing Benioff Bros., wholesalers, transported the goods in question to Monterey, and thereafter called on the defendant to come into his temporary salesroom for the purpose of selling to her a stock of furs. Thereafter certain articles were selected from the stock of the salesman, and order No. 09175 was written out by Mr. Rhodes on a printed form. The order was as follows:

Another paper, order No. 09176, was likewise written by Mr. Rhodes, and an immediate delivery of the goods was made. The two orders totaled $1,800.50. On August 22, 1924, the vendor, on his letter head, wrote a letter to the defendant as follows:

"San Francisco, 8/22/24.

The invoices referred to in the letter were numbered 7443 and 7444. Both papers are similar in form, and the only difference is the description of the goods and the prices. We therefore set forth one of the papers, 7443, which was in form as follows:

Sold and delivered to you by our Mr. B. A. Rhodes, August 21, 1924.

After the goods were placed on the shelf the defendant and the plaintiff's assignor had some correspondence regarding the terms of the contract and the obligations of the respective parties, and, a disagreement arising, the defendant packed the goods and returned them by express, charges prepaid, to the vendor. The vendor declined to accept the package, and the record discloses that it is now held by the express company.

On the trial of the action the plaintiff called Mr. Rhodes as a witness, and it also called Mr. Benioff, plaintiff's assignor. During the presentation of his case the plaintiff introduced in evidence the documents above mentioned. After the above witnesses had been examined and cross-examined plaintiff rested. Thereupon the defendant took the stand in her own behalf, and the following proceedings were had: After certain preliminary questions had been propounded to the witness, her attorney asked her to state to the court and jury the conversation and the transaction that she had with Mr. Rhodes. The plaintiff objected on the ground that the invoice and copy order constituted a contract, and that such written instruments could not be varied by parol. The objection was overruled, and the witness proceeded to state in detail the probative facts sustaining the affirmative allegations alleged in her answer. At this time the appellant repeats his contention that his objection should have been sustained.

"It has been held that the rule against the admission of parol evidence to vary or contradict a written contract does not apply where the writing as to which it is sought to introduce the evidence is collateral to the issue involved and the action is not based upon such writing. "This rule has usually been applied in cases where the action was not between the parties to the instrument, in which case another exception would also apply; but it has also been applied where the parties to the action were the same as the parties to the writing. * * *" 22 C. J. 1282, § 1713; Decennial Digest, Evidence, § 425; Key No. Digest, Evidence, § 425.

An examination of the cases cited in the foregoing authorities abundantly support the contention of the respondent that the evidence was properly admitted. First Nat. Bank of Chicago v. California Nat. Bank of San Diego, 35 P. 639, 4 Cal. Unrep. C. 403, is directly in point. In that case the plaintiff pleaded his cause of action in three different counts: (1) Upon a promissory note; (2) a cause of action upon an overdraft; and (3) a cause of action on a common count as for moneys loaned. The first and third counts related to the same indebtedness. On the trial of the action the plaintiff introduced testimony in reference to the negotiations on the part of the plaintiff and the defendant of and concerning the loan. The defendant objected on the ground that such evidence tended to vary a written instrument, to wit, the promissory note which had already been admitted. Mr. Commissioner Searls, speaking for the court, said:

"We do not see that it did anything of the kind. The third cause of action was for money loaned by plaintiff to defendant. This evidence tended to support that cause of action, and the fact that defendant contended that it was not a loan by plaintiff but a purchase of the promissory note in question did not militate against the admissibility of the evidence." Moore v. Copp, 51 P. 630, 119 Cal. 429; Wintermute v. Standard Furniture Co., 102 P. 443, 444, 53 Wash. 539; National Bank of Commerce v. Gougar, 98 P. 607, 608, 51 Wash. 204.

[2] There is another reason why the evidence was properly admitted. The letter written by Benioff Bros. inclosing the invoice constituted the written contract giving to appellant's contention the broadest interpretation the facts will warrant. However, that letter and invoice constituted merely what the books term a "bill of parcels," and were not of such dignity as necessarily to indicate that all previous negotiations were merged in them. Leavitt v. Fiberloid Co., 82 N. E. 682, 196 Mass. 440, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 855, 864, and cases there cited. All of the courts seem to have made a distinction which is patent between a formal bill of sale and a bill of parcels when considering the rule. R. M. Davis Photo Stock Co. v. Photo Jewelry Mfg. Co., 104 P. 389, 47 Colo. 68, 19 Ann. Cas. 540, and see note, page 544. See, also, the following leading cases: Sutton v. Weber, 101 N. W. 775, 127 Iowa, 361; Rosenberg v. Capital Cut Stone & Granite Co. (Ariz.) 238 P. 330; Routledge v. Worthington Co., 23 N. E. 1111, 119 N. Y. 592; H. Leonard Simmons Co. v. Goldfarb (Sup.) 150 N. Y. S. 547; Boulware v. Victor Automobile Mfg. Co., 134 S. W. 7, 152 Mo. App. 567. A case not so similar in its facts, but nevertheless presenting the same principles, is Luitweiler, etc., Co. v. Ukiah, etc., Co., 116 P. 707, 712, 16 Cal. App. 198.

[3] Finally, there is yet another rule that has been adopted by our Supreme Court and which sustains the position of the respondent. We refer to the rule stated in the case entitled Providence Jewelry Co. v. Nagel, 108 P. 312, 157 Cal. 497. The facts in that case were much stronger in favor of the vendor than the facts in the instant case. After stating the facts, Mr. Justice Allen, speaking for the court, said:

"The testimony of the defendant's witnesses which was accepted by the court as true clearly indicates that the minds of the parties did not meet; that there was in fact no contract between them as appears in the written order, and that the same was executed under such circumstances as would estop plaintiff from claiming any benefit thereunder. It seems clear that a fraud was practiced upon defendant by this representative of plaintiff, and that his signature to the order was procured by misrepresentation and fraud sufficient to vitiate the instrument. The defendant had a right to rely upon the representations of plaintiff's agent that the written instrument presented for signature was but an order to send the goods for sale on commission and plaintiff, in an action between the original parties, is not in a position to say that, having practiced this fraud, defendant must still be bound because he did not distrust plaintiff and signed without an independent examination."

The appellant earnestly contends that he is supported by International Filter Co. v. Crystal Ice & Cold Storage Co., 157 Ill. App. 96, Hess v. Liebmann (Sup.) 84 N. Y. S. 178, and Fairbanks Steam Shovel Co. v. Holt & Jeffery, 140 P. 394, 79 Wash. 361, L. R. A. 1915B, 477. We have carefully examined those cases, and we think that each one rests on the conclusion of the court that the facts showed the writings involved to be bills of sale and not merely bills of parcels.

[4] After the appellant had made the objection above referred to, and after counsel for the plaintiff and counsel for the defendant had argued the question of law involved, the trial court said: "I can't see there is any obligation created by these writings introduced in evidence. I don't think it is complete in itself." Taking the language in connection with the context, we think it is quite clear that the trial court was merely ruling that the writings were not of that class which made it improper to receive the parol evidence which the respondent was offering. The appellant apparently so understood the remark, because his attorney made no objection and took no exception to the remark made by the court.

The appellant also asked the trial court to give four instructions which presented the appellant's contentions regarding the admissibility of the evidence which we have discussed above. The trial court declined to give the instructions, and that ruling is assigned as error. For the reasons which we have stated above, the trial court did not commit any error in refusing to give the requested instructions.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MARTENSEN. (Cr. 910.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 6, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 3, 1926.)

Obstructing justice — Person refusing to give arresting officer name and attempting to push him from running board of automobile when arrested for speeding held guilty of resisting public officer (Pen. Code, § 148; Motor Vehicle Act, § 154, as amended by St. 1925, p. 415, § 19).

Under Pen. Code, § 148, one resisting officer by refusing to give name and pushing him off running board during attempt to obtain information necessary to give him notice to appear for speeding is guilty of resisting an officer, since, under Motor Vehicle Act, § 154, as amended by St. 1925, p. 415, § 19, arresting officer shall at such time take name and address of person and number of motor vehicle.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

J. H. Martensen was convicted of resisting a public officer, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Lilburn I. Gibson, of Ukiah, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was convicted in the superior court of Mendocino county of the crime of resisting a public officer, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $350 and also to be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of Mendocino for the period of 30 days. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and also from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The record shows that on or about the 18th day of September, 1925, in the county of Mendocino, the defendant was traveling in an automobile along a certain public highway in the county of Mendocino at a speed exceeding 45 miles per hour: that two officers of the motor vehicle department of the state of California, M.

Holden and E. V. Pettis, observing the excessive rate of speed at which the defendant was traveling, in the performance of their duty as such officers trailed the defendant for something like half a mile, and finally overtook the defendant and required him to stop his automobile. It further appears that the officers were also traveling in an automobile. As soon as the officers had succeeded in stopping the defendant, Mr. Holden got out of the automobile in which he and Pettis were traveling and walked over to the automobile driven by the defendant. It appears also that the officers were dressed in uniform and wearing their badges of office. Upon walking over to the automobile occupied by the defendant, Mr. Holden asked the defendant for his operator's license and told the defendant he was exceeding the speed limit. The defendant refused to exhibit to the officer his operator's card. Mr. Holden asked the defendant his name. The defendant refused to disclose his name, or in any manner to reveal his identity. The officer testified in this particular as follows: "I tried to get some information in every way I could, who he was, and when I could not I told him I would place him under arrest." It appears that defendant started his motor three several times in order to get away from the officers; that the third time the defendant started his motor Mr. Holden stepped on the running board and reached over into the automobile, turned the ignition switch, stopping the motor. The defendant thereupon pushed the officer off the running board. This occurred after the officer had told the defendant that he was going to place him under arrest. After these occurrences the officers did take actual custody of the defendant and took him to the town of Ukiah, where a formal charge of speeding was placed against the defendant and also a charge of resisting an officer.

It is contended upon this appeal that at the time the defendant pushed the officer from the running board he was not attempting to resist the officer for an offense set forth in the Motor Vehicle Act or for any offense mentioned in the Penal Code of this state. This contention is based upon certain testimony given by Mr. Holden upon the preliminary examination of the defendant held on the charge of resisting an officer. This testimony is set out in the cross-examination of the witness Holden after he had testified upon direct examination that he was proceeding to arrest the defendant on a charge of speeding. These questions and answers given by the witness Holden upon the preliminary examination of the defendant are as follows:

"Q. If he had told you (referring to the defendant) who he was you wouldn't have arrested him on the speeding charge? A. No, sir; I would have given him a written warning.

"Q. What caused you to place him under arrest? A. For the simple reason he refused to give me identification.

"Q. You didn't arrest him for resisting an officer out there? A. I placed him under arrest.

"Q. On what charge? A. I wanted to see who he was and what he was.

"Q. You arrested him on no charge out there? A. I said I arrested the man upon his refusing to furnish identification.

"Q. Is that what you arrested him for? A. At that time I placed him under arrest for that, and then he illegally started the motor and tried to get away, and I reached in and turned off his switch; I did that three times, and the last time he shoved me off the running board.

"Q. That was before you placed him under arrest? A. I placed him under arrest before that; he made two more attempts before that—before he shoved me off of the car—and it was before that I placed him under arrest when he didn't give me the identification I asked for.

"Q. Did you arrest him for any other charge that day, than the speeding charge? A. Yes.

"Q. Just one charge you arrested him for out there? A. Yes.

"Q. What did you arrest him for, speeding or resisting an officer? A. I arrested him for identification, when I told him he was under arrest.

"Q. You didn't arrest him on either charge, either of speeding or resisting an officer, you arrested him because he wouldn't give any identification? A. At the time; yes, sir."

Section 148 of the Penal Code reads:

"Every person who willfully resists, delays, or obstructs any public officer, in the discharge or attempt to discharge any duty of his office, when no other punishment is prescribed, is punishable by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding five years."

By reference to section 154 of the Motor Vehicle Act of the state of California, as amended in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 415, § 19), and which section was in full force and effect on the 18th day of September, 1925, it will appear that the contention of the defendant upon this appeal is founded upon a misapprehension of the law relating to arrests for violations of the Motor Vehicle Act. By that section of the Motor Vehicle Act it is provided that in all cases, except for offenses constituting a felony, the arresting officer shall proceed in the following manner, after having stopped the person whom he knows to be guilty of violating the speed laws: The arresting officer shall, upon the production of the operator's license of the person arrested or from other satisfactory evidence of his identity, take the name and address of such person, the number of his motor vehicle, and notify him in writing to appear at a time and place to be specified in such notice, or, upon demand of the person arrested, take him immediately before some magistrate. It is further provided that whenever any such person refuses to give his written promise to appear or demands appearance he shall be forthwith taken before a magistrate, etc. Referring to section 148 of the Penal Code, we find that it specifies that any person who willfully refuses, delays, or obstructs a public officer in the discharge or attempt to discharge any duty of his office, etc., is punishable, etc. Under any view of the evidence in this case, the officer was attempting to discharge the duties of his office. He had already actual knowledge of the violation of the Motor Vehicle Act by the defendant in traveling at a speed in excess of 45 miles per hour, which violation is not contested, and he was proceeding according to section 154 of the Motor Vehicle Act to ascertain the facts necessary to give the defendant the proper notice to appear and answer the charge of speeding, and while he was discharging and attempting to discharge this duty of his office the defendant pushed him from the running board and endeavored in this way to prevent the officer acquiring the information and performing his duty according to the section of the Motor Vehicle Act to which we have referred. Whether the defendant was thereafter arrested upon a proper charge is immaterial, for it appears beyond question that the officer was resisted at the time when he was attempting to discharge the duty imposed upon him by law.

The order and judgment of the trial court are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thos. O. Toland, Judge.

Action by Charles E. Scranton against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. M. Swartz, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Plaintiff delivered to defendant, a common carrier, certain personal property to be shipped over defendant's lines of railway from Portland, Or., to Monrovia, Cal. While in transit, the goods were destroyed by fire, and plaintiff commenced this action to recover their value. The trial court found that the value of the property was $850, and rendered judgment for that amount. Defendant appeals.

It is contended by appellant that the judgment was excessive, and, in order to lay a foundation for the discussion of the question presented, it is necessary to refer in part to the contents of the bill of lading, which was issued by appellant at the time the goods were lodged with it for shipment. The property shipped was listed in the document as follows:

"2 Bxs Canned Fruit. 1 Crt. Trunk. 1 Bx H H Gds. 1 Bdl Lumber dressed."

There was a memorandum in the bill of lading signed by an agent of respondent, but we lay aside for the present all question as to the nature or extent of the authority of the agent who appended the signature. The memorandum read:

"I hereby declare the value of H H Goods herein described as 10 cents per lb."

The trial court made various findings of fact concerning this memorandum, but it is not necessary to state their purport. They were all based upon the trial judge's view of the law, with which appellant does not agree. There is, therefore, no question presented on the appeal which involves the sufficiency of the evidence to support any finding, unless appellant's view of the law as applied to the findings is correct and the theory of the trial judge was incorrect.

We are first called upon to determine the extent to which respondent's agent, by the memorandum made upon the bill of lading, attempted to limit the value of the goods which made up the shipment. The limitation, if it was effective at all, a point later to be considered, applied only to the item, "1 Bx H. H. Gds." The memorandum purported to place a value on the H. H. Goods "described" in the bill of lading, and the item of the bill just quoted is exactly covered by the terms of the memorandum. If we either assume the abbreviated expression in the memorandum to refer to household goods, or take it as it is without attempt to assign a meaning to the initials "H H," we can by no means see that the remaining items of the bill of lading comport with it. We cannot perceive that either canned fruit, a trunk, or dressed lumber is included within the expression "H. H. Gds."

[1] The next question is as to whether the memorandum written on the bill of lading had any effect whatever. Respondent contends that his agent had no authority to write it. Appellant asserts that the authority to do so was ample. It was stipulated at the trial that respondent delivered his goods to a certain transfer company at Portland "to take charge of said goods as his agent, and to take the necessary steps, with full authority to ship said goods from" that place to Monrovia. Appellant contends that this language clothed the transfer company with power to place a limitation upon the value of the "H. H. Gds." It is our opinion that the terms of the agent's authority, as expressed in the stipulation, without anything else, were insufficient to uphold its act in attempting to limit value.

Appellant cites authority to the effect that power to ship goods, conferred upon an agent, includes the power to make a contract for special rates for carriage, but nothing is shown us which renders such a rule applicable here. We are pointed to nothing in the record which tends to prove that the limitation of value attempted to be placed upon the shipped goods was intended to operate to procure a reduction of freight charges, or even that any part of the goods was shipped at less than the maximum rates for such service.

[2] It is provided by section 20 of the Interstate Commerce Act (4 Fed. Stat. Ann. [2d Ed.] p. 506) that, if goods to be shipped by common carrier "are hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, or other means, and the carrier is not notified as to the character of the goods, the carrier may require the shipper to specifically state in writing the value of the goods, and the carrier shall not be liable beyond the amount so specifically stated, in which case the Interstate Commerce Commission may establish and maintain rates for transportation, dependent upon the value of the property shipped as specifically stated in writing by the shipper." Appellant sets forth this provision in its brief, but the enactment apparently has no bearing upon the present cause. If we concede that this statute would apply to respondent acting through his agent just as it would had respondent personally delivered his goods to appellant for shipment, we are shown nothing which indicates that it would have had an application if respondent had made such personal delivery. Specifically, nothing in the record is called to our attention which tends to prove that the "H. H. Gds." mentioned in the bill of lading were hidden from view by wrapping, boxing, or other means when they were delivered to appellant for shipment, or that appellant was not notified as to the character of the goods, or that appellant required respondent, through his agent, to specifically state in writing the value of the goods. Clearly, to our minds, the burden of proof was not upon respondent to prove these negatives. That respondent is not bound under the statute by the attempted limitation upon value, in the absence of evidence upon the points just mentioned, is shown by Union Pac. R. R. Co. v. Burke, 41 S. Ct. 283, 255 U. S. 317, 65 L. Ed. 656.

We have nothing before us, as a measure of the authority of respondent's agent, except the statement contained in the stipulation entered into at the trial. We think the authority there shown was not of sufficient strength to sustain the burden which appellant seeks to impose upon it.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Action by M. J. Brennan against G. Weissbaum. From an order denying defendant's motion to set aside a judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James M. Thomas, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Charles Quayle, of Oakland, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Appeal from an order denying defendant's motion to set aside a judgment on the ground of surprise and excusable neglect.

The action in which the judgment was obtained was one brought upon an assigned claim of a Dr. Hedley Scudder for medical services rendered, which services were alleged to be of the value of $898.

The action was commenced May 21, 1924, and appellant served and filed his answer thereto on August 14, 1924. The matter was set for hearing and came on regularly for trial on December 10th following. Defendant failed to appear, and judgment was rendered against him for the full amount prayed for, together with interest and costs of suit. Thereafter, on December 16th of the same year, a motion was made to vacate and set aside the judgment upon all the grounds provided for by section 473, Code of Civil Procedure.

In support of this motion the attorney for the defendant filed an affidavit stating, in substance, that prior to December 10, 1924, he had advised his client that the trial of said cause was set for said day, and had been informed by him that there was no necessity to prepare for trial, as he had arranged with Scudder, the assignor of the claim, to settle the same; that on the day prior to the trial, not having heard from his client as to whether or not a settlement had been made, he called on the clerk of the court where the action was pending to ascertain the condition of the calendar for the following day, and was told that the case would be reached; that he thereupon informed said clerk that he had been advised the day before by his client that the litigation would be settled, but that he had not yet heard about it; that he thereupon telephoned to the office of plaintiff's attorney, in the presence of the clerk, to ascertain as to whether or not he had heard whether a settlement had been effected, and was informed by a stenographer that plaintiff's attorney was not in; that he thereupon told the clerk of the court that he would take the matter up with respondent's attorney during the day, and advise him; that he thereafter called at the office of opposing counsel twice during the day, but failed to find him; that he left word with his stenographer that he understood that the case was going to be settled, but that he had been unable to ascertain whether the settlement had been effected, and he requested that she ascertain this fact and telephone to him that day; that he received no response to this request, but was informed later in the day by his client that the case had been settled; that, upon receiving this information, he immediately sent a communication to plaintiff's attorney informing him of the settlement, and thereafter dismissed the matter from his mind, concluding that, in view of the settlement, no action would be taken by the court; that on December 13th following he was surprised on being advised by defendant that an execution had been issued and levied upon defendant's bank account; that he immediately asked plaintiff's attorney to set aside the judgment, but that he refused to do so.

Defendant also filed an affidavit in support of the motion to vacate wherein it is recited that some day prior to the 10th day of December, 1924, he had called upon his attorney and had advised him that there was no occasion for him to prepare the case for trial, as he intended to settle the same; that thereafter he called upon Scudder, the assignor, and made a settlement with him, and was given a letter addressed to the assignee, Brennan Mercantile Agency, informing it that the case had been settled for the sum of $200; that on the 9th day of December, 1924, this letter was taken to the office of plaintiff, and was shown to the party in charge; that the letter was also taken to the office of the attorney for the plaintiff, and shown to his stenographer, he not being in. In reply to these affidavits, plaintiff's attorney filed his counter affidavit, which, in substance, recited that he was at all times the attorney of record for plaintiff in said action, and was conversant with all of the facts, and was the one instrumental in having the judgment entered as it was; that the action was one for medical services; that the answer filed did not deny the claim on its merits, but simply raised an issue as to the physician's qualifications; that said cause was regularly set for trial on plaintiff's motion on September 10, 1924, the day of trial fixed being December 10th following, of which fact defendant had due and proper notice; that, as the day of trial approached, defendant sought through his counsel to procure a compromise of the claim; and that on November 10, 1924, he offered affiant the sum of $250 in settlement thereof, which was promptly refused, and a demand made in writing for the full amount with interest; that nothing further was heard from defendant or his counsel in the matter until late in the afternoon of December 9, 1924, when a Mr. Meyers, representing himself to be a friend of defendant, called at affiant's office, and announced to an attendant that the claim had been settled with Scudder; that Meyers was at that time informed that the settlement would not be recognized, as plaintiff was the owner of the claim; that affiant at once sought Dr. Scudder, and learned what had been done; that affiant, on behalf of plaintiff, the assignee, repudiated any settlement, and refused to recognize the same as binding, and so informed Scudder, and insisted that he be present in court the following day with his books of account. This suggestion was followed, and the judgment was duly given and entered; that on his return to his office, affiant found the letter which the attorney for defendant had mailed him.

[1] Upon the showing made under these affidavits, the trial court refused to set aside the judgment. It is here claimed that the action of the court constituted an abuse of its discretion. We do not think so. Applications to set aside default judgments are addressed to the sound discretion of the court. While it has been said that the exercise of this discretion ought to tend in a reasonable degree to bring about a judgment on the merits, this observation by appellate courts has been in the nature of advice to the lower courts, and not for the purpose of compelling them to decide in that mode. Unless the record clearly shows that the court has abused its discretion, its order, whether it be to grant or deny the application, will be affirmed. Ingram v. Epperson, 70 P. 165, 137 Cal. 370.

[2, 3] It clearly appears from the affidavits that defendant's attorney knew that the case had been set for trial. It also appears from the affidavit of plaintiff's attorney that he repudiated the settlement, and so advised defendant's friend a day before the trial. The only reasonable inference that can be drawn from this fact is that defendant or his attorney was advised of his attitude in the matter. Then, again, they were bound to know that the assignment of a claim, though made for collection only, passes the legal title to the assignee, and, after notice thereof, the debtor deals with the assignor at his peril. In re Kling, 186 P. 152, 44 Cal. App. 267.

While the case may seem a harsh one from defendant's point of view, he is not entirely without a remedy, as recourse, no doubt, may be had against respondent's assignor. No abuse of discretion appearing, the ruling of the trial court is affirmed.

Under Pen. Code, § 686, evidence that witness, whose testimony at preliminary examination is offered, is out of state, is admissible only to show that he cannot be found within state.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 539(1)—Both direct and cross examination of absent witness at preliminary examination is admissible at trial (Pen. Code, § 686; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2022, 2032).

Under Pen. Code, § 686, both direct and cross examination of absent witness given at preliminary examination is admissible at trial, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2022, 2032; cross-examination being as much a part of testimony as direct examination.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Thomas Myers was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Otto Christensen, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary, and appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Over the objection of appellant the trial court permitted the prosecution to read to the jury the testimony of one Bush which was given at appellant's preliminary examination before the committing magistrate. Section 686 of the Penal Code provides that evidence may be received in that form only when the defendant has "cross-examined or had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness" at the preliminary examination. Appellant contends that the right contemplated by this section is the right fully and completely to cross-examine, and that in the present instance the right was abridged because the magistrate sustained objections to proper questions put to the witness by appellant's counsel. Appellant argues thoroughly the proposition that the right to cross-examine referred to in section 686 is of the breadth for which he contends, and cites authority in support of his argument, but he presents neither argument nor authority upon the question touching the rulings of the magistrate, which he says were erroneous. We have merely the assertion that the rulings were improper. Under such circumstances we deem it more than sufficient to say that we have examined the record and that it appears to us that the rulings were correct. Granting for the sake of argument that they were not correct, we do not decide whether or not the fact would operate altogether to exclude the testimony from admission in the superior court. The magistrate, of course, had the power to rule upon objections to evidence offered during the preliminary examination. See Pen. Code, § 869, subd. 3; People v. Riley, 16 P. 544, 75 Cal. 98.

The next question presented by appellant also concerns the reception in evidence of the testimony of Bush taken at the preliminary examination. The cause had been set down for trial on June 22, 1925. Bush was in attendance on that day in response to a subpoena which had been served upon him. The hearing was continued to June 30 and all witnesses were instructed by the court to return at that time. When the day came Bush was not present in court, but all witnesses were admonished by the court to return on July 9, to which date the hearing was then continued. On that day the trial was commenced and it proceeded without interruption to a conclusion. It is contended that under these conditions the trial court erred in receiving in evidence the testimony of Bush which was taken at the preliminary examination. The admission of testimony in that form is governed by the provisions of section 686 of the Penal Code, already mentioned. The enactment provides in part that testimony heard at a preliminary examination may be read on a trial in the superior court when it is shown that the witness "is dead or insane, or cannot with due diligence be found within the state." The prosecution endeavored to bring itself within this provision by proof that Bush left the state after June 22, and continued absent therefrom until the time when his testimony at the preliminary examination was read at the trial, and the evidence was such that the trial judge would have been justified in so finding. Appellant contends that this evidence was not sufficient as a foundation for the admission of the testimony in question. It is said that Bush, within the meaning of section 686, was found within the state when the subpoena was served upon him which required his presence in court on June 22, and that a search for him within the state was unavailing under the statute after that service, after he had appeared on the day named in response thereto, and after he had failed to appear at later sessions under instructions from the court so to do and was in contempt of court for his derelictions. It is remarked, to state appellant's contention in his own language, that "the force and effect of the statute has been spent" by the finding of a witness within the state as Bush was found at the time the subpoena was served upon him requiring him to appear as a witness on June 22.

[2] No authorities are cited upon this point by either appellant or respondent, and after a diligent search we have found none which exactly touches it. The question does not however, seem difficult of solution. The purpose of section 686 was to enable the prosecution to introduce in evidence in the superior court testimony which was taken at a preliminary examination when the witness cannot be found in the state at the time of the trial, or perhaps we had better say at a time so near the date of the trial and under such circumstances that the trial judge may determine that his attendance cannot be had at the actual trial. The beneficial end of the enactment would be largely frustrated if it were held that his presence in the state at some period before the trial, at which time a subpoena was served upon him, would render its provisions inapplicable. To make the applicability of the section depend upon the question whether or not a subpoena had been served would seem, when the purpose of the statute is kept in view, to drag a false quantity into the argument. What difference can it make whether a subpoena is served or not if due diligence, exercised within a proper period before the trial, shows that the actual attendance of the witness cannot be had during the trial? The evidence contained in the testimony taken at the preliminary examination, when such a showing is made, is as much needed in the due administration of justice—and that is what the section is designed to promote—where a subpoena has been previously served as where one has not been served. The adoption of the rule for which appellant contends would make the applicability of section 686 depend upon the elasticity of conscience or lack of fear which might permit a witness to disregard the mandate of process which had been served upon him, and not at all on the diligent exercise, upon the part of the agents of the people, of the duty to procure, if possible, the personal attendance of the witness. We think, indeed, that the service of the subpoena, instead of closing the door upon the right of the prosecution to use at the trial Bush's testimony taken on the preliminary examination, was an important step in the protection and preservation of that right. Having found Bush in the state at a date so near that upon which the case was expected to be tried, a failure of the prosecution to serve subpoena upon him would have furnished a ground for objection to his testimony taken at the preliminary; the facts as to his disappearance under those circumstances being the same as those now shown by the record. It is clear to us, then, that the service of the subpoena, rather than militating against the right to use the preliminary testimony, was an act constituting a part of that due diligence which the prosecution was bound to show as a foundation for the exercise of the right.

[3] It is insisted that the testimony of Bush at the preliminary examination was inadmissible, for the reason that the prosecution knew that he was about to absent himself from the state and failed to secure his attendance by the means provided in section 879 of the Penal Code. The section provides that, whenever a judge is satisfied by proof on oath that there is reason to believe that a witness in a criminal case will not appear and testify at the trial, he may order the witness to enter into a written undertaking securing his attendance. We doubt if the evidence here is sufficient to show that the district attorney had knowledge that Bush was about to leave the state, and could therefore have asked for the relief contemplated by section 879. Passing that question by, however, it has been directly decided that it is not necessary to invoke the provisions of the section as a prerequisite to the use at the trial of testimony taken at a preliminary examination. People v. Flannery, 84 P. 461,

3 Cal. App. 41. With the conclusion there reached we are satisfied.

[4] It is also contended that Bush's testimony at the preliminary could not properly have been used at the trial, unless it were shown that his absence from the state was to be permanent, and no such showing was made. A rule to that effect has been announced in some jurisdictions, but it has never prevailed in this state. In those jurisdictions in which the rule obtains, the question has usually been discussed in the light of the provisions of Constitutions securing to an accused the right to be confronted by the witnesses against him. There is no such provision in the Constitution of this state; the right here being preserved merely by statute. Pen. Code, § 686; People v. Hayes (Cal. App.) 237 P. 390.

It is also to be observed that in some of the states the statutes permit the use at the trial of testimony taken at a preliminary examination or upon a former trial upon a showing that the witness is absent from the state. Also appellant relies largely upon a case decided in a state in which there is no direct statute "with reference to the introduction of testimony of a witness given upon a former trial or preliminary hearing of a case"; the question being there determinable under the rules of the common law. Davis v. State (Okla. Cr. App.) 201 P. 1001. Here, under section 686, the defendant enjoys the right of being confronted by the witnesses against him, except that such confrontation need not occur when under certain conditions the witnesses have testified at the preliminary examination and "cannot with due diligence be found within the state." We cannot amend the statute by holding that it must be proven before his previous testimony may be offered, that a witness is not only absent from the state, but is permanently absent.

[5] Of course, in laying the foundation for the introduction of testimony taken at a preliminary examination, evidence is often received showing that the witness is actually outside the state, but, considering the form of our statute, such evidence is admissible only for the purpose of showing that he cannot be found within the state. The specific question now presented by appellant apparently has never been considered in this jurisdiction. However, the views above expressed find some support in cases which have held that a showing of due diligence was sufficient where there was evidence that the witness was out of the state at the time of the trial; there being no evidence as to how long the absence was likely to continue. These cases are: People v. Grill, 91 P. 515, 151 Cal. 592; People v. Edwards, 111 P. 263, 14 Cal. App. 128; People v. Lederer, 119 P. 949, 17 Cal. App. 372; People v. Poo On, 192 P. 1090, 49 Cal. App. 219. In one case the showing was held sufficient where it was testified that the absent witness had said that he "wanted to take a trip around on a boat and did not know how long he would be gone—perhaps five or six months." People v. Ramos, 199 P. 544, 52 Cal. App. 491.

[6] When the testimony of Bush given at the preliminary examination was offered, appellant attempted to withdraw the cross-examination which his counsel had conducted at the hearing, but he was not allowed to do so. The prosecution was then permitted, over appellant's objection, to read the cross-examination to the jury along with the direct examination. Appellant now contends that in its two rulings the trial court erred. We think the rulings were correct. Section 686 of the Penal Code provides for the admission in evidence of "the deposition" of a witness given at a preliminary examination, not merely of a part of it; that expression being used in the enactment instead of the words "the testimony." A further guide to the solution of the question here presented is found in a rule of evidence governing in civil cases. Sections 2022 and 2032 of the Code of Civil Procedure provide that a deposition taken pursuant to the requirements of that Code may be read by either party at the trial. It was said in an opinion construing this provision that—

"The only authority for the use of depositions is in the provisions of the Code which provide that 'the deposition' may be used; * * * but it is not said that portions of them can be used, nor can it be inferred that such was the intention." Bank v. Finnell, 65 P. 976, 133 Cal. 475.

A cross-examination is as much a part of testimony given by a witness, or of a deposition in which it is found, as is the direct examination. The point made by appellant is therefore without merit.

Judgment and order affirmed.

MITCHELL v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR FRESNO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5611.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 4, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 3, 1926.)

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 159(1)—Indictment at common law, depending on finding of grand jury on oath for validity, cannot be amended in any matter of substance without grand jury's concurrence.

2. Indictment and information $\S$ 159(2), 161(5)—Indictment cannot be amended to change offense charged or information so as to charge offense not shown by evidence at preliminary hearing although either may be amended within such limits by district attorney without leave of court before defendant pleads, and thereafter by leave of court, where not affecting substantial rights.

Indictment cannot be amended so as to change offense charged or information so as to charge offense not shown by evidence taken in preliminary examination, although either indictment or information may be amended within above limits by district attorney without leave of court at any time before defendant pleads, or thereafter by leave of court, where not affecting substantial rights of accused.

3. Indictment and Information $\S$ 159(1), 161(1)—Trial court, and not district attorney, has power to determine whether change in accusation is such as to affect substantial rights of defendant.

Mandamus by W. D. Mitchell against the Superior Court in and for the County of Fresno and Charles R. Barnard, Judge, to compel the dismissal of an indictment. Writ denied.

Geo. Cosgrave, of Fresno, for petitioner.

George R. Lovejoy, Dist. Atty., and Ernest Walling and O. M. Ozias, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of Fresno, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an application by the petitioner against the respondent as the superior court to obtain a writ of mandamus. Among other things, the petitioner alleged that on the 22d day of December, 1925, the grand jury of Fresno county returned an indictment against him; that on December 31, 1925, the petitioner was arraigned, and at said time he demurred to the indictment; that thereafter, on the 4th day of January, 1926, the court made an order "that the demurrer be, and it is hereby, sustained, and that the matter be submitted to the present grand jury"; that no amendment of said indictment was sought, and no amendment was allowed; that on January 9, 1926, the petitioner moved the trial court for an order dismissing the first indictment; and that on the 27th day of January, 1926, the trial court made an order denying said motion. As an exhibit attached to the petition the petitioner sets forth a copy of said indictment and from said copy it appears that said indictment was filed on December 22, 1925, and purported to charge that the petitioner did, on the 20th day of April, 1923, commit a felony, to-wit, violate the provisions of section 561 of the Penal Code. In the prayer to his petition the petitioner asks that this court direct the respondent court to enter a judgment of dismissal. A determination of the case involves an interpretation of section 1008 of the Penal Code.

[1-3] Before taking up the provisions of the statute, it is necessary to bear in mind certain historical matters none of which may be questioned and yet all of them throw much light on provisions of the statute which are particularly before us. At common law an indictment, being the finding of a grand jury upon oath and depending upon this fact, among others, for its validity, cannot be amended by the court or the prosecuting officer in any matter of substance without the concurrence of the grand jury which presented it. The use of an information as an accusation in a felony case did not exist at common law. In 1850, and continuously since, the law has provided that, when the trial court sustains a demurrer to an indictment, the court can order the case resubmitted. Whether the particular offense was prosecuted by indictment or by information the power of the trial court or of the prosecuting officer to amend it was not by express language conferred prior to the year 1911. However, commencing with the year 1880, legislation has been adopted for the purpose of preventing an entire miscarriage of justice because of defects in pleading. At the present time, giving full allowance to all of the new statutes, an indictment cannot be amended so as to change the offense charged or an information so as to charge an offense not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination. An indictment or information may be amended within above limits by the district attorney without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment within above limits may also be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court, where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. That the provisions of the statute shall not be so followed as to trespass upon any of the rights of the defendant, the power to determine when a change in the accusation is of such a nature as to affect the substantial rights of the defendant has been given to the trial court and not to the prosecuting officer. Copeland v. Superior Court, 217 P. 573, 62 Cal. App. 316, and cases there cited. When a demurrer is interposed to the indictment or information, one of several different defects may appear. It may appear from an examination of the face of the accusation: (1) That the offense pleaded is barred by the statute of limitations; (2) that there has been made a typographical or other minor mistake not going to the substantial rights of the defendant; (3) that there has been an omission to plead some material element in the alleged offense, and which does go to the substantial rights of the defendant; and (4) there may arise other situations and conditions not necessary to enumerate at this time. If in a given case the contingency first enumerated arises, and it is not claimed that the dates have been incorrectly pleaded, it may be assumed that the demurrer will be sustained, and, as no amendment or change is possible which will avoid the dilemma, it is clear that it will be an idle act for the trial court to direct an amendment, or to direct that a new information be filed, or to direct that the cause be resubmitted to a grand jury. If the second contingency arises, it is equally patent that, if the trial court is of the opinion that a defect can be cured by an amendment, and the amendment will not go to the substantial rights of the defendant, then and in that event the trial court will make its order allowing the amendment in accordance with the justice of the case as the facts may appear. People v. Olsen, 220 P. 444, 64 Cal. App. 126. In the third contingency above stated, as we have already shown, no amendment, in the proper use of that expression, can be made, as it will affect the substantial rights of the defendant, and the statute provides that the trial court may order the cause resubmitted to the grand jury, and in that event the statute authorizes the prosecuting officer so to proceed as to get another indictment returned, or cause another examination to be held and later file another information. People v. Cockrill, 62 Cal. App. 22, 216 Pac. 78, 81. But in no proper sense can it be said that, when the second pleading comes in, it is within the contemplation of the statute an amended indictment or an amended information, but it is a new indictment or a new information.

The record before us does not disclose what was claimed to be the defect in the first indictment filed against the petitioner. However, from the allegations of the petition, it appears that no amendment was asked or allowed. We may assume, therefore, that the defect, if any, was at least claimed to be one which went to the substantial rights of the defendant. This assumption is fortified by the terms of the order sustaining the demurrer, and which directed the case to be submitted to the grand jury. The court was therefore considering an instance where, in its judgment, a change was necessary, but which change, if made, was one of those changes which must be made with the authority first obtained from the grand jury. The court was considering a new indictment, not an amendment. To such a change the petitioner would apply that sentence contained in the section, which reads as follows:

"If a demurrer is sustained, and an amendment is not allowed, or if allowed, is not made, within such reasonable time as the court may fix, the court shall give a judgment of dismissal, which shall be a bar to another prosecution for the same offense."

That sentence, standing alone, is limited to amendments, and not to new indictments, and is not helpful under the facts of this case. However, we think that the remaining portion must also be applied. It is as follows:

"The defendant shall thereupon be discharged, unless the court directs the case to be submitted to the same or another grand jury, or directs a new information to be filed; provided, that after such order or resubmission, the defendant may be examined before a magistrate, and discharged or committed by him, as in other cases."

The whole section must be so interpreted as to give some force and effect, if possible, to each and every clause therein contained. The very purpose of the amendments to the section was to prevent miscarriage of justice—not to create them. The section clearly provides that in a proper case it will be the duty of the trial court to direct the case to be submitted to the same or another grand jury, or to direct a new information to be filed. The contention made by the petitioner will give no force or effect whatsoever to that part of the section just quoted.

[4] In short, the position of the petitioner rests on the assumption that the phrase "unless the court" limits the antecedent "discharged." In this behalf the petitioner confidently asserts the statute is so punctuated. The vice of his position rests on the conclusion that punctuation is a cardinal rule of interpretation. It may be of assistance, but punctuation does not necessarily control in interpreting a statute. In French v. Teschemaker et al., 24 Cal. 518, commencing on page 553, Mr. Chief Justice Sanderson, speaking for the court, said:

"To construe a statute, is to search after the legislative intent as expressed in the language of the statute. 'The end of construction is to find what was the intent and meaning, and to clear up that meaning, when obscure; to ascertain the sense of ambiguous words; to determine the design when imperfectly expressed.' Smith's Commentaries, 692. The search, if need be must not be confined to the doubtful passages or words, but may be extended to every provision of the act. In interpreting the letter of the statute, punctuation may be entirely disregarded, and the rules of grammar need not be strictly followed. * * * Statutes are to be read without breaks or stops, and we have therefore omitted the punctuation. The foregoing is but one clause, and has but one subject, viz. exemption from personal liability. In order to get its full meaning, we read all that is said upon that subject, aided by the legal presumption that no word is idle or useless, and that each has its office to perform in giving expression to the legislative intent; * * * And so in City of Covington v. McNickle's Heirs, 18 B. Mon., 286, say the Court of Appeals of Kentucky: 'A well known rule for the construction of statutes—which, though ancient, is always adhered to—is that the general words in one clause of a statute may be restrained by the particular words in a subsequent clause of the same statute.' See, also, Dwarris on Statutes, 765."

In People v. Sassovich, 29 Cal. 480, on page 484, the same able jurist speaking for the court said:

"A qualifying phrase does not always bear relation to a single word, noun or pronoun, as its antecedent; on the contrary, it may, and frequently does, have another phrase or sentence as its object of relation. Treating the question, then, as a question in grammar only, may it not be claimed with equal certainty that the entire phrase 'fourteen judicial districts' is the antecedent of the phrase 'subject to be altered'?"

In Randolph v. Bayue, 44 Cal. 366, at page 369, Mr. Justice Rhodes, speaking for the court, said:

"The first section of the act of 1868 is in the same words as the first section of the act of 1850, except that the word 'seven' is inserted in the act of 1868 in place of the word 'ten,' in the act of 1850; but in the act as printed in the statutes of 1867-8, semicolons are in two places inserted where commas are found in the act of 1850. These are obviously clerical or typographical errors; but if such were not the case, the punctuation would not be permitted to have the effect to render the statute absurd."

In Joseph B. Dunn & Sons v. Brager, 81 A. 516, at page 519, 116 Md. 242, the Supreme Court of Maryland stated its conclusion and the reasons therefor as follows:

"This purpose will be made clear by striking out the period after the word 'counties,' changing the capital 'E' in the word 'every' to a small 'e,' and inserting a comma after the word 'same.' The period and the capital 'E' following break into two sentences what was evidently designed to be one sentence, and destroy what would otherwise be the clear meaning of the language used. Almost the identical change now proposed was made in Manger v. Board of Examiners, 45 A. 891, 90 Md. 659, Judge McSherry saying: 'Neither bad grammar nor inaccurate punctuation can alter the obvious sense of a legislative enactment. This is necessarily so. The statutes in England are not punctuated in the original rolls; but more or less marks of punctuation appear in them as printed, by authority. With us, the punctuation is the work of the draftsman, the engrossers, or the printers. In the legislative body, the bills are read, so that the ear, not the eye, takes cognizance of it. Therefore the punctuation is not, in either country, of controlling effect in the interpretation.' The same view is held by other courts of high standing. In Martin v. Gleason, 29 N. E. 664, 139 Mass. 183, the court said, 'Punctuation may sometimes be properly disregarded.' In Gyger's Estate, 65 Pa. 311, Judge Sharswood said, 'No punctuation ought to control a statute;' and in Randolph v. Bayue, 44 Cal. 366, the court said, 'Punctuation cannot be permitted an effect which would lead to absurdity.'"

And see 10 Ann. Cas. page 1083.

[5] Being guided by the foregoing rules, the latter half of section 1008 of the Penal Code should be read as though it were worded as follows:

"If a demurrer is sustained and an amendment is not allowed, or, if allowed, is not made, within such reasonable time as the court may fix, the court shall give a judgment of dismissal, which shall be a bar to another prosecution for the same offense, and the defendant shall thereupon be discharged, unless the court directs the case to be submitted to the same or another grand jury, or directs a new information to be filed; provided that after such order of resubmission, the defendant may be examined before a magistrate, and discharged or committed by him as in other cases."

So construing the statute, it is clear that the petitioner was not entitled to have any dismissal entered as of the date he made his motion.

The writ is denied.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

198 Cal. 453

PEOPLE of the State of California, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Earl J. CLARK, Defendant and Appellant. (Cr. 2818.) (Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1926.) In Bank. Motion to dismiss appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Sidney N. Reeve, Judge, of conviction of murder of the first degree, with sentence of death. Motion granted. Buel R. Wood, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, A. A. Linney, and John L. Flynn, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, C. J. The defendant, Earl J. Clark, was convicted in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles of the crime of murder in the first degree, and judgment was pronounced and entered against him, sentencing him to be hanged. An appeal from that judgment to this court has been submitted, and is pending decision herein. It now appears from the affidavit of William I. Traeger, sheriff of the county of Los Angeles, that the defendant, Clark on or about the 16th day of March, 1926, escaped from the county jail in the county of Los Angeles, wherein he was confined. He has not since been apprehended, and is now a fugitive from justice. Supported by the affidavit of the sheriff, in whose custody the defendant was held, relating these facts, the Attorney General, by motion, asks this court to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the defendant, Clark, has escaped from custody and is now at large. Upon the authority of People v. Redinger, 55 Cal. 290, 36 Am. Rep. 32, and People v. Elkins, 122 Cal. 654, 55 P. 599, it is ordered that the appeal of said Earl J. Clark in this case be and the same stand dismissed unless the defendant, within 30 days from this date, return to the custody of the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles, state of California. It is further ordered that a copy of this order be served upon the attorney for the defendant within five days hereof.

recalled. Writ granted. Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, and J. W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, for petitioner. Leo R. Friedman, of San Francisco, John F. Davis, of South San Francisco, and A. J. Scampini, City Counsel, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Mandamus. A petition purporting to have been signed by the required number of qualified voters of the city of South San Francisco was filed and presented to respondents, as the members of the board of trustees of said city, demanding that a special election be called to determine whether the members of said board should be recalled. Said board of trustees refused to act upon said petition, and thereupon application was made to this court for a writ of mandate to compel said board to call said special election as demanded in said recall petition. An alternative writ was issued, in response to which respondents filed a demurrer and an answer. The demurrer was overruled, and the legal questions involved in the proceeding were disposed of at that time (Ratto v. Board of Trustees of the City of South San Francisco [Cal. App.] 243 P. 466); but the affirmative allegations of the answer raised issues of act upon which findings were necessary to be had before the proceeding could be finally determined. Those issues of fact were referred to the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of San Mateo for trial and determination. Written findings thereon have since been made and filed, and it appears therefrom, and from the matters decided on demurrer, that said recall petition is legally sufficient in form and in substance and is signed by qualified voters of said city exceeding in number 25 per cent. of the entire vote cast within said city at the last election for the office of trustee. We therefore conclude that a peremptory writ of mandate should issue as prayed for in the petition on file herein; and it is so ordered.

HOWE v. KEY SYSTEM TRANSIT CO. et al.
(and three other cases). (S. F. 11872, 11888-11890.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1926.)

1. Trial ⚡3—Separate parties in court's discretion may litigate controversy separately and proceed to final judgment without waiting for judgments as to other parties.

Separate parties, if court in its discretion so directs, may litigate their controversy separately, and proceed to final judgment without waiting for judgments as to other parties.

2. Appeal and error ⚡76(1)—Question as affecting right of appeal from judgment is not what form of order or judgment may be, but what is its legal effect (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 577, 963).

Question as affecting right of appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, authorizing appeals from final judgments, is not what form of order or judgment may be, but what its legal effect is, although section 577 defines a judgment as the final determination of rights of parties in action or proceeding.

3. Appeal and error ⚡81—Right of appeal from orders rests on theory that it is in effect final judgment in collateral proceeding growing out of action, and so independent as to be substantially final decree for purpose of appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

Right of appeal from orders not resting on express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 963, is sustained on theory that order, is in effect, a final judgment against party, in collateral proceeding growing out of action, and so far independent of suit itself as to be substantially final decree for purpose of appeal.

4. Appeal and error ⚡79(1)—Although particular judgment may not be binding on all parties, it may yet be final as to appeals (Code Civ. Proc. § 963).

That particular judgment may not be binding on all parties to action does not prevent it from being final judgment within Code Civ. Proc. § 963, relating to appeals.

5. Appeal and error ⚡79(1)—Order striking cross-complaints of railroad employees in action against railroad for injuries held appealable (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 442, 963).

Where, in action against two railroad companies and numerous employees for injuries in collision, employees of one road cross-complained against other railroad company for injuries in same collision, under alleged authority of Code Civ. Proc. § 442, order dismissing the cross-complaints was such final judgment as was appealable within section 963.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. The plaintiffs and respondents in the four actions above entitled have moved to dismiss appeals, taken by a different defendant in each case, from an order striking out the particular defendant's cross-complaint. All the motions were before the court, and were argued and submitted at the same time. The actions are for damages for personal injuries, and grew out of the same accident. The pleadings are the same, in so far as any question presented by the motions is concerned. The complaint in each case charged that the plaintiff, while a passenger on a train of the Key System Transit Company, was injured by reason of a collision between that train and a car of the defendant San Francisco-Sacramento Railroad. The collision happened on the tracks of the Key System Transit Company, and is alleged to have occurred by reason of the negligence of each of the two railroad companies defendant in the operation and maintenance of their railroads and railroad systems, and in the operation of the train and car involved in the accident. Each plaintiff joined with the railroad companies defendant some 40 fictitious defendants, designated as First Doe to Fortieth Doe. Eleventh Doe to Twentieth Doe, inclusive, it is alleged, were in charge of, and were negligent in the operation of, the train of the Key System Transit Company upon which plaintiff was a passenger. The two railroad companies appeared separately in the actions, and filed answers to the complaints. Four members of the train crew of the Key System train were injured in the collision. They also appeared in the actions, and answered, alleging themselves to be designated Doe defendants. They were Compton, who answered and cross-complained in the case in which Olga Howe is plaintiff; H. Hamma, who did the same in the case of Helen Lawry, plaintiff; T. V. Van Dalsem, in the case of Lester Miller, plaintiff; and A. M. Hobson, in the case in which Marvin Howe is plaintiff. These defendants not only answered the complaint in the action in which each appeared, denying its material allegations, but cross-complained against the defendant San Francisco-Sacramento Railroad. It is alleged in each of the cross-complaints that the cross-complainant was employed by the Key System Transit Company, and, as such employee, was engaged in operating the train upon which the plaintiff in the action was a passenger; that, due to the negligence of the San Francisco-Sacramento Railroad in the operation of its car, that car collided with the train of the Key System Transit Company, and, as a result, the cross-complainant was injured. Each cross-complainant, therefore, prayed for damages against the defendant San Francisco-Sacramento Railroad.

The plaintiffs in the four cases served on the cross-complaining defendants notices of motion to strike the cross-complaints from the files. The grounds of the motion were that the cross-complaints were not, and did not purport to be, cross-complaints against the plaintiffs; that the same were not in fact cross-complaints; and that a cross-complaint does not lie in such actions. Before the motion came on to be heard the cross-complainants were granted leave to and did amend their cross-complaints to make it more fully appear that the accident relied upon in the cross-complaints was the same accident which formed the basis of the plaintiffs' causes of action. The court granted the motions of the plaintiffs, and the cross-complaints, as amended, were stricken from the files. The orders were duly entered in the minutes of the court, and the cross-complainants filed notices of appeal. No other form of judgment was entered, and the actions are still undetermined. The plaintiffs in the various actions now move to dismiss the appeals on the ground that an appeal does not lie from an order striking a cross-complaint from the files.

[1] Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an appeal may be taken from a superior court (1) from a final judgment entered in an action, or special proceeding; (2) from certain specified orders; (3) from certain judgments or orders in probate proceedings. An order striking out a cross-complaint is nowhere designated in the section as an appealable order, and respondents insist, in support of their motion, that such an order is not a final judgment within the meaning of subdivision 1, but is, rather, an interlocutory order from which no appeal is provided. The "final judgment," from which an appeal may be taken under the section, they contend, is "the ultimate or last judgment which puts an end to the suit or proceeding"—citing In re Smith's Estate, 33 P. 744, 98 Cal. 636, 640, Gianelli v. Briscoe, 181 P. 105, 40 Cal. App. 532; Nolan v. Smith, 70 P. 166, 137 Cal. 360; Doudell v. Shoo, 114 P. 579, 159 Cal. 448. They have placed much stress upon the language of this court in Stockton, etc., Works v. Glen's Falls Insurance Co., 33 P. 633, 98 Cal. 557, where the court held the judgment or decree denying to the defendant the relief demanded, "in what is termed its cross-complaint," was not a final judgment, and the separate appeal therefrom was dismissed. The court said (page 577 [33 P. 637]):

"There can be but one final judgment in an action, and that is one which in effect ends the suit in the court in which it is entered, and finally determines the rights of the parties in relation to the matter in controversy."

But that case, and others cited by respondents to the same effect, can only have application to parties to an action whose interests are identical. Separate parties, if the court in its discretion so directs, may litigate their controversies separately, and may proceed to final judgment without waiting for judgments as to other parties. Baxter v. Boege, 160 P. 1072, 173 Cal. 589, 592; Rocca v. Steinmetz, 208 P. 964, 189 Cal. 426.

In the Baxter Case, supra, the plaintiff brought an action against a number of defendants. Three of them demurred to plaintiff's amended complaint. Their demurrers were sustained, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered against him in favor of the three demurring defendants that, as to them, the action be dismissed. Another defendant filed a demurrer, and answers were filed by a number of others. The plaintiff appealed from the judgment dismissing the three defendants from the action. The respondents moved to dismiss upon the ground that the appeal was not taken from an appealable judgment. They insisted that no judgment will be regarded as final, unless all necessary issues of law and fact have been determined and the case completely disposed of (citing Freeman on Judgments in support of their contention). In denying the motion to dismiss, this court distinguished Stockton, etc., Works v. Insurance Co., supra, relied on by respondents, saying (160 P. 1073, 173 Cal. 592):

"It will appear at a glance that the question there presented was not like the one before us here. In that case there were but two parties to the action, and it was, of course, necessary to determine all of the matters in litigation between them. In the case at bar the controversy between the plaintiff and the respondents was adjudicated and determined upon issues of law, and it does not necessarily follow that because the matters between plaintiff and defendants, other than these respondents, remain undetermined, respondents must therefore await trial of all issues involved between plaintiff and all other defendants before any final judgment may be entered and an appeal from it taken."

The case of Nolan v. Smith, supra, also relied on by the moving parties here, was distinguished as merely applying the rule "that any set of parties whose interests are identical must have the controversy as to them settled before any final judgment may be entered." The court cited section 579 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the effect that, in an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper, and held that the judgment dismissing the three demurring defendants from the action was a final judgment from which an appeal would lie, and the motion to dismiss was denied.

The case of Rocca v. Steinmetz, supra, more recently decided, has a close bearing on the case now before us, in that no formal judgment was entered, the order appealed from being, as our records show, merely an order of the trial court dismissing an action as to one of the defendants after demurrer to complaint sustained and refusal of the plaintiff to amend. The plaintiff appealed from the order, and the respondent moved to dismiss on the ground that an appeal does not lie from a judgment against one of two joint tort-feasors before the final trial of the action on its merits. It was held (208 P. 965, 189 Cal. 428) that the action was unquestionably of a character in which a joint or several judgment could be rendered, and where the trial court, upon finding that one of the parties was not liable in the action, could render a judgment in his favor, and then leave the action to proceed against the other parties; and that to hold the plaintiff bound to wait until the final judgment against the party remaining in the action before taking an appeal from the judgment against the first defendant already rendered is wholly unreasonable, and finds no warrant in any provision of the Code. "Such a judgment," said the court, "is final within the meaning of that term, as given in section 963." The motion to dismiss the appeal was accordingly denied.

[2] It was originally provided in this state that no appeal should lie to the Supreme Court from any but a final judgment. Practice Act, § 258 (Stats. 1850, pp. 428, 451). Section 144 of the Practice Act of 1851 adopts the provision of section 245 of the New York Code of Procedure, and defines a judgment to be "the final determination of the rights of the parties in the action or proceeding," which is the exact definition now found in section 577 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Yet as early as the first volume of the reports, and continuing down to the more recent decisions of this court, the rule has been held to be that the question as affecting the right of appeal is not what the form of the order or judgment may be, but what is its legal effect. Belt v. Davis, 1 Cal. 135; Zoller v. McDonald, 23 Cal. 136; Phillips v. Pease, 39 Cal. 582; Dollenmayer v. Pryor, 87 P. 616, 150 Cal. 1; Estate of West, 122 P. 953, 162 Cal. 352; Baxter v. Boege, supra; Rocca v. Steinmetz, supra. "The question is not to be determined by technical definition and verbal criticisms on the terms and phrases in which judgments have been or may be expressed, but is to be determined by the substance and effect of the adjudication in question." 2 Cal. Jur. 137; Los Angeles v. Los Angeles City Water Co., 66 P. 198, 134 Cal. 121; Anglo-Californian Bank v. Superior Court, 96 P. 803, 153 Cal. 753; Hildebrand v. Superior Court, 159 P. 147, 173 Cal. 86.

[3] The theory upon which the decisions sustain the right of appeal from orders, where that right does not rest upon the express provisions of section 963, is that the order is in effect a final judgment against a party in a collateral proceeding growing out of the action—is so far independent of the suit itself as to be substantially a final decree for the purpose of an appeal, although there has been no final decree in the suit. Anglo-Californian Bank v. Superior Court, 96 P. 803, 153 Cal. 753, 755; Los Angeles v. Los Angeles City Water Co., supra; Hildebrand v. Superior Court, supra. In Dempsey v. Underhill, 106 P. 73, 156 Cal. 718, it was held that an order dismissing an "action and the whole thereof" constituted a final judgment within the meaning of the provisions of the Code touching appeals, in that it finally and entirely disposed of the whole case. To the same effect is Marks v. Keenan, 73 P. 751, 140 Cal. 33, where it was held that, as an order dismissing an action on the ground that service of summons had not been made in time was "essentially a final judgment, it should be so treated for the purpose of appeal." An order dismissing an action in ejectment as to certain defendants was held to be, when entered, "a final judgment in the cause, which was itself appealable." Tripp v. Santa Rosa St. R. R., 11 P. 219, 69 Cal. 631. In Sharon v. Sharon, 7 P. 456, 463, 67 Cal. 185, at page 196, the court said, referring to an order for the payment of alimony and counsel fees, "a final judgment is not necessarily the last one in an action. A judgment that is conclusive of any question in a case is final as to that question. The Code provides for an appeal from a final judgment, not from the final judgment in an action."

In Dollenmayor v. Pryor, supra, the respondent objected to the consideration of an appeal from an order of the superior court denying an application for leave to intervene. The contention was that the appeal was premature, and that the party seeking to appeal from the order should await final judgment between the original parties and appeal from that judgment; or, at all events, should procure the entry of a more formal judgment denying the motion and appeal after such entry. The court said (87 P. 616, 150 Cal. 3):

"We can perceive no merit in this objection. The record shows that the order, or judgment, denying the application to intervene was entered before the appeal was taken. It clearly shows that the court had determined the right of the intervener, and declared that [he] should not intervene in the action, and that his proposed complaint should not be filed therein. The most verbose statement could not state the determination more accurately or effectually. So far as the intervener and his rights in that action were concerned, it was final. We see no good end to be secured by requiring him to await judgment between the other parties after a trial in which he could not participate. It ended the litigation as to him, and he should be allowed an immediate appeal"—citing cases.

See, also, Stich v. Goldener, 38 Cal. 608, 610.

The principles which govern cross-complaints are, to a great extent, those which apply to matters in intervention. East Riverside, etc., Dist. v. Holcomb, 58 P. 817, 126 Cal. 315, 319.

[4, 5] The circumstance that a particular judgment may not be binding upon all the parties to the action does not prevent it from being a final judgment within the Code provisions relating to appeals. 2 Cal. Jur. 141. In the present case, the issues tendered by the cross-complaints, which were stricken from the files, are entirely severable from the issues made by the complaints and answers. As a practical matter, however, a scrutiny of the pleadings in the cases will show that proof of the facts put in issue between the plaintiffs and defendants would, if the cross-complaints were in the cases, support all the allegations of the cross-complaints with the exception of those with reference to the injuries suffered by the particular cross-complainant. Appellants have filed their cross-complaints under the authority found in section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1923, which provides that—

"Whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party, relating to or depending upon the * * * happening or accident upon which the action is brought * * * he may, in addition to his answer, file at the same time, or by permission of the court subsequently, a cross-complaint."

They contend that the section gives them the right to cross-complain in order that they may take care of the situation in which they find themselves in the present cases; that, to avoid a multiplicity of litigation and duplication of trials and issues and facts, they have the right to follow the procedure which the lower court, by its order, has prevented; that, unless they have the right to an immediate appeal, their rights are lost, for, if they must wait until a final determination of the whole action in the lower court before taking the appeal, a reversal of the order striking their cross-complaints from the files would, in effect, amount to only a hollow victory. We are of opinion that the situation presented here is not one in which the interests of the parties to the action are identical, but is one falling reasonably within the application of the rule of construction adopted in Baxter v. Boege, supra. The filing of the cross-complaints were proceedings in the actions commenced by the filing of the complaints, and, it is contended, were authorized by statute, the design, of which is to enable all matters in dispute between the parties, relating to or depending upon the happening or accident upon which the actions were brought, to be determined in a single action, and by a single judgment which shall give the defendants seeking it such affirmative relief as they are entitled to. By its action the trial court has, in effect, dismissed the appealing defendants from the actions in so far as they have a right to have their claims for affirmative relief determined therein and adjudicated by single judgments. In that regard the cases are ended as to them, and they are no longer before the court. In effect, their dismissal is complete. To hold that they are bound to wait until the final judgment in the respective actions before taking appeals from the orders, which are substantially final judgments as to them, seems to be as wholly unreasonable as the same contention was declared to be in Rocca v. Steinmetz, supra.

The motions to dismiss the appeals are denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Harriet M. Gragg and another against Charles Culp. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for appellant.

Zabala & Sargent and Russell Scott, all of Salinas, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. [1, 2] An appeal from a decree rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, quieting title to 38.85 acres of land situate within township No. 17 south, range No. 2 east, M. D. M., county of Monterey.

By letters patent, June 10, 1875, the United States of America granted to Jonathan Roberts, plaintiffs' predecessor, full payment therefor having been made by said Jonathan Roberts to the United States, grantor, lot No. 2 (27.35 acres), section 19, lot No. 6 (42.81 acres), section 29, and lot No. 1 (30.57 acres), and lot No. 2 (32.27 acres), and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter (40 acres) of section 30, and, as enumerated in said patent, "containing 178 acres according to the official plat of the surveyor of the said lands returned to the general land office by the surveyor general."

In February, 1900, the United States, by patent, granted to Virginia E. Ball, defendant's predecessor, the following land: The southwest quarter of the southwest quarter (40 acres), section 29; southeast quarter of the southeast quarter (40 acres), section 29; southeast quarter of the southeast quarter (40 acres), section 30; northeast quarter of the northeast quarter (40 acres), section 31, and lot No. 5 (48.35 acres), section 29, containing in the aggregate 168.35 acres.

The township map from which the above areas and locations are taken purports to conform to the field notes of the surveys on file in the surveyor general's office. It was made in 1884 and bears the certificate of the department of the interior, general land office, to the effect that it is a true and correct copy of the plat or survey of the lands to which it relates on file in that office. The section of the township in which the lands in controversy are situate and those adjacent thereto are mountainous, rough, and precipitous. The rock formations are so abundant that the surveyors, as shown by their notes, found pit excavations, as a means of indicating section corners, to be impracticable in some places. The land, as such, is listed as being inferior in quality. The country is sharply broken with gulches, ravines, and canyons, and portions of the land are so heavy in brush as to be impenetrable. San Clemente creek, regarded as an important natural monument, has its source in this locality, and its several branches meander a wide area of country. A few of the ancient monuments were not discoverable, but sufficient in number and position were found to make reasonably certain the location of section and quarter section lines as originally established. It could not reasonably be expected under the circumstances of the situation that accuracy as to courses and distances, or as to the establishment of section or quarter section monuments would mark the results of the surveyor's efforts, or that pits dug more than 50 years prior to the recent surveys would continue, in all cases, to remain open.

The complaint, in describing said lot 6, does so by reference to certain monuments, courses, and distances, and alleges it to contain 81.66 acres. Defendant's claim of ownership of said 39.05 acres, as set forth in his answer, is placed upon the open, notorious, uninterrupted, exclusive, and adverse possession and claim of ownership of himself and his predecessors in interest for a period of more than 20 years immediately prior to the commencement of the action and "upon a written instrument purporting to convey said real property." As a further defense to the action the bar of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, §§ 318 to 325 (omitting section 320), both inclusive, and section 343, are separately pleaded. The trial court found that plaintiffs were the owners in fee simple of said lot 6 described in the complaint as containing 81.66 acres, and found that none of the allegations of defendant's answer and separate defense were true. Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of plaintiffs.

The principal matter for determination of the trial court was the ascertainment of the actual acreage contained in said lot No. 6, notwithstanding the fact that said township map, which purports to have been made conformable to the field notes of early surveys of sections 29, 30, 31, and 32, and upon which said lot 6 is marked as containing 42.81 acres. Said early surveys were made by deputy United States surveyors in chronological order as follows: F. L. Ripley in 1872; John Gilchrist, 1877; John D. Hall, 1882-83. Field notes of the survey of the Rancho San Francisquito, which partly lies in sections 19, 30, and 29, as made and recorded by James E. Terrill in 1859, and a re-survey of said rancho made by Lou D. Hare in 1903-04, are also carried into the record. The last survey made of portions of sections 29 and 30 and upon which survey respondents rely to establish the claim that the figures "42.81," representing acreage as indorsed upon said map, was erroneous and said lot at all times contained 81.66 acres, was made by William Davies in 1923. In addition to the introduction in evidence of the field notes of said surveys considerable oral evidence was taken.

It is not claimed that lot 6, when granted to Jonathan Roberts by patent in 1875, was, according to the original survey, in the irregular shape which it must assume if defendant's claim should be sustained. The southerly boundary line, as shown upon the plat made from the field notes of Surveyor Ripley, is a straight, unbroken line, while, if defendant prevails according to his contention, it would begin at the 4x4 inch post marked " $\frac{1}{4}$ S. 29 S. 30 S.," running thence east 890 feet; thence south 22 degrees 30 minutes east 425 feet; thence east 475 feet to a point; thence south, etc. It is the claim of defendant, however, that the line which originally marked the southerly boundary of lot 6 has been dropped so as to include the 40 acres lying contiguous to it on the south. From an inspection of the map made from the Ripley field notes it is very apparent that there has been no dropping of said line. By a comparison of the easterly line of said lot 6 with the other lines of said lot it is obvious that in the shape as platted it could not have contained more than about the acreage shown upon its face, to wit, 42 acres. In order to give it the added acreage contended for by respondents the fence line which marks the southerly limits of the Rancho San Francisquito rather than the grant line as indicated by the Ripley survey must be taken as the common boundary line of said rancho and lot 6. The acreage lying between the fence line of said rancho and the line shown by the Ripley survey as being the boundary line of said rancho practically accounts for the excess which forms the basis of the claim of the respective parties to the suit. Surveyor Davies surveyed the land upon the ground in order to determine the location and acreage of lot 6. Undoubtedly the original monument establishing the common corner of sections 29, 30, 31, and 32 was plainly distinguishable and it was accepted by him as such corner. It consisted of a post placed in a rock mound. Besides, there was parol evidence to the effect that it was accepted by Mr. Culp, his predecessors in interest, and, in fact, was commonly regarded by others as the ancient monument marking the section corner. With the aid of the government field notes, the verity of which was confirmed by the actual discovery of monuments, connections were made with other section corners of the township, thus enabling the surveyor to reproduce the exterior boundaries of said section. Thus the common corner of sections 25, 30, 36, and 31 was verified. On the line dividing sections 29 and 30, north 30 degrees west, 2,630 feet from the common corner of sections 29, 30, 31, and 32, another old rock mound bearing indications of a post having formerly been placed in it, and which agreed with the field notes, was discovered and accepted as the quarter section corner. The distance between this quarter and the section corner was divided and a 4x4 inch post set as marking the southwesterly corner of lot 6. The newly marked point was 50 or 60 feet east of an old fence built parallel with the section line, but which was not connected with any other fence. From the last-named point the witness proceeded to the quarter corner between sections 20 and 29 and there found a post and a government bearing tree, which corresponded with the calls of the government field notes. This point was connected with the common corner of sections 20, 21, 28, and 29, which was evidenced by four bearing trees. The old post was found lying on the ground and it was reset. The distance from the section corner of the quarter section measured 2,640 feet. From the section corner the surveyor ran south along the section line between sections 28 and 29 to an "old line tree." A projection of the section line from this point south 25 chains (according to the original field notes) would, or should, connect the northeast and southeast sections' corners of section 29. The position of the common corner of sections 28, 29, 32, and 33 and the length of the southerly line of section 29 was obtained by traversing. The distance of the southerly boundary line of section 29 was calculated to be 6,100 feet, and therefore contained an excess of 820 feet. This excess was apportioned between the quarter sections by allotting to each an additional width of 205 feet.

The length of the west line of section 19, according to the field notes of the Ripley survey, is given as 50.2 chains or 3,313.2 feet, while the Davies survey shows it to be 4,280 feet, leaving a discrepancy of 969 feet between the two surveys. The excess, as shown by the Davies survey, exists in that portion of the section line lying north between the quarter section line and the point at which said line cuts into the southerly line of the San Francisquito rancho. The quarter section line extending southerly from said quarter section point is definitely determinable and precludes the theory of apportionment south of said lots. The southerly boundary line of said rancho is also the northerly boundary line of lot 6 for a distance of about 2,000 feet and connects the westerly boundary line of said lot (which is also the westerly boundary line of section 19) with the easterly boundary line of said lot 6. From the point of intersection of the westerly line of section 19 with the southerly boundary line of said rancho, according to the Ripley map, the course is south $49\frac{1}{4}$ degrees east. There can exist but little doubt that the discrepancy in the acreage of lot 6 is to be accounted for by mistaking the position of the southerly boundary line of said rancho. It is very apparent that the map platted from the Ripley field notes fixed the southerly line of said rancho along the course indicated upon said map as south $49\frac{1}{4}$ degrees east and not along the fence line which Davies established as the southerly boundary line of said rancho and the northerly boundary of said lot 6. As above stated, by running north to said fence line the excess acreage is accounted for. If this be true, the southerly boundary line of said lot 6 remains practically where it was originally fixed and the excess acreage in the northerly portion of said lot would be of no interest to or concern of the defendant. The questions of Ripley mistaking gulches or canyons for the San Clemente creek or tributaries thereof and the identification of other points were questions to be determined by the trial court, and, while there may be room for disagreement as to the conclusion that may be drawn from a number of material matters in controversy, we can not say that the court's findings are without evidentiary support.

[3] It is the invariable rule, early adopted in this state—

"that when a piece of land is conveyed by metes and bounds, or any other certain description, all included within those bounds, or that description, will pass, whether it be more or less than the quantity stated in the deed. * * * The quantity, being the least certain part of the description, must yield to the boundaries or number, if they do not agree." Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 148.

The figures "42.81," entered on the face of the map, must give way to the more definite description, to wit, lot 6; and its boundaries, having been defined by the court, will control as to the quantity of land contained in said lot.

We have considered the claim of ownership by prescription and adverse possession made by defendant, and think that he has not sustained either issue. He received the full acreage of his purchase measured by whatever rule may be applied to the situation. Neither appellant nor his predecessors paid taxes upon any portion of the land in controversy, nor has his possession, which was but 3 years' duration, or the possession of his predecessors in interest, been of the kind and character which the law requires in order to transfer the title of real property. Plaintiffs and their predecessors have paid taxes upon said lot 6, whatever its acreage may be. We have examined the entire record, including all the evidence in the case, and feel satisfied that the trial court committed no prejudicial error.

The judgment is affirmed.

STONE v. SERIMIAN et al. (S. F. 11120.)

1. Mechanics' liens $\S$ 281(4).

Evidence held not to show "cost price" of materials "offered to contractor," within contract measuring his right to recover therefor.

2. Mechanics' liens $\S$ 271(6)—Complaint, in action foreclosing mechanic's lien, need not aver existence of essential requirements of statute in precise terms of statute itself.

It is not necessary, in complaint in action to foreclose mechanic's lien, to aver existence of essential requirements of the statute in its exact language, it being sufficient if, from a reading of complaint as a whole, it can fairly be deduced that plaintiff has conformed to requirements of statute in respect that materials under his agreement with defendants were to be furnished for designated structure, and that such materials were actually furnished in construction.

3. Mechanics' liens ⚡271(6)—Complaint, in action to foreclose mechanic's lien, though omitting direct averment of statute, held sufficient, in absence of special demurrer for uncertainty, where it enabled proof to be made that materials were furnished and used in designated building.

Complaint, in action to foreclose mechanic's lien, omitting direct averment that materials alleged to have been furnished were furnished to be used, and were actually used, in reconstruction of designated building, held sufficient, in absence of special demurrer for uncertainty, where it enabled proof to be made that materials were furnished for, and were actually used in, reconstruction of such building.

4. Mechanics' liens ⚡157(1)—Claim of lien for materials furnished in building held not invalidated by erroneous statement of payment, in absence of fraud and showing that innocent third party was misled (Code Civ. Proc. § 1203).

Claim of lien for materials furnished in reconstruction of theater building was not invalidated, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1203, because it did not contain an exact or correct statement of agreed terms of payment, where it was not made with intent to defraud, and no innocent third party was misled.

5. Mechanics' liens ⚡254(2)—Owners can set off, against contractor's lien claim for labor and materials furnished in reconstructing building, amount they have been compelled to pay to relieve their property from liens filed thereon to secure contractor's debts, including attorney's fees and costs in suits to enforce liens (Code Civ. Proc. § 1193).

In suit to foreclose lien for labor and materials furnished in reconstructing theater building, defendants held entitled to set off against claim of plaintiff his counter obligation to indemnify them for any amount that they have been compelled to pay to relieve their property from liens filed thereon to secure plaintiff's debts, including attorney's fees and costs in suit to enforce liens, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1193.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by F. J. Stone against Martin Serimian and another, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

C. K. Bonestell, of San Francisco (L. M. Hoefler, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Harris & Hayhurst and W. D. Crichton, all of Fresno, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $6,581.85, alleged to be the reasonable value of labor and materials furnished by him at defendants' request for the reconstruction of a certain theater building of which the defendants were the owners. There were three counts in the amended complaint. In the first two foreclosure of a mechanic's lien was sought. The third was in the form of a common count for labor performed and materials furnished in and about the construction, alteration, and repair of the building. The defendants, answering, denied the various allegations of the complaint, and, at the same time, interposed a counterclaim in the sum of $3,800 for labor and materials required to be furnished by the defendants by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to perform and furnish the same. They also interposed a cross-complaint for $6,000 damages, alleged to have been caused by reason of the delay occasioned by the plaintiff in the reconstruction of the building.

By the terms of the written contract, which the court found was made, the plaintiff agreed with the defendants to do certain designated work of, and to furnish the materials for, the reconstruction of the old building of the defendants for 10 per cent. of the cost of such reconstruction; the entire cost, including the builder's 10 per cent., not to exceed the sum of $12,500. The contract did not contain the whole agreement between the parties, but it was verbally agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants that the sum of $12,500, which was to be the outside figure for the construction of the building, should be paid in three installments; $4,000 when the walls of the building were up; $4,000 when the roof was on; and $4,500 when the work was completed. The plaintiff commenced the work, but did not fully complete the contract, for the reason that, prior to its completion, the defendants repudiated the transaction and refused to pay the second installment of $4,000 when the roof was on, and did not make any further payments. By reason of the failure of the defendants to make payment, the plaintiff was compelled to cease work on the building. The court found that the plaintiff fully complied with all the terms and provisions of his contract until prevented by the defendants, and that the reasonable value of the labor and materials rendered and furnished by the plaintiff under the contract was the sum of $6,581.85, after deducting the payment of $4,000 made when the walls of the structure were up. Certain items of cost and expenditure claimed by the plaintiff were eliminated from the account, and the court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $5,344.85 and foreclosing the contractor's lien for the amount.

[1] The first contention of the appellants is that there is no evidence to justify the finding of the trial court as to the reasonable value of the labor and materials rendered and furnished by plaintiff under the contract. It was alleged in the amended complaint that the labor and materials were of the reasonable value of $6,581.85. This allegation was denied by the answer. It was stipulated in the contract, with reference to price of materials, that the cost of the entire work should not exceed the sum of $12,500, and that the cost price of materials should be figured at the cost price offered to the contractor. There is no evidence on the question of the value of labor and materials other than that of the plaintiff, who testified that "the entire cost" up to the time he quit the work was $9,889.56, and that 10 per cent. of that amount was the reasonable value of the services performed by him as general contractor. He also testified that he incurred certain debts and paid for certain items contained in the claim of lien. Other items were not paid for. Assuming that here was an attempt to show the "cost price" of materials "offered to the contractor," which was the measure of plaintiff's right to recover, the evidence does not have that effect.

Certain items, viz. for plumbing, millwork, and lathing, claimed by the plaintiff, were not allowed by the trial court. Complaint is here made that other items should have been disallowed, but we find no error in their inclusion in the aggregate amount found due and secured by the plaintiff's lien.

[2,3] It is contended that the court should not have decreed foreclosure of the lien, for the reason that the complaint did not allege, nor was there any finding, that the materials were furnished to be used, and were actually used, in the reconstruction of the building. It is not necessary in a complaint in an action foreclosing a mechanic's lien to aver the existence of the essential requirements of the statute in the precise terms or language of the statute itself. It is sufficient if, from a reading of the complaint as a whole, it can fairly be deduced that the plaintiff has conformed to the requirements of the statute in the respect that the materials under his agreement with the defendants were to be furnished for the designated structure, and that such materials were actually used in the construction. Ensele v. Jolley, 204 P. 1085, 188 Cal. 297, 300. The complaint in this action omits the direct averment, but we are satisfied that it fairly appears therefrom that the materials alleged by the plaintiff to have been furnished were furnished to be used, and were actually used, in the reconstruction of the building by the plaintiff for the defendants under the contract. The claim of lien was attached to the amended complaint, and expressly made a part of it. In the absence of a special demurrer upon the ground of uncertainty, the complaint is sufficient to enable proof to be made that the materials in question were agreed to be furnished for, and were furnished for, and were actually used in, the construction of the designated structure upon the premises of the defendant sought to be charged with the lien. Ensele v. Jolley, supra. The finding is subject to the criticism urged against the complaint. It should have been more definite and certain, but sufficiently covers the point.

[4] While the claim of lien does not contain an exact or correct statement of the agreed terms of payment, it is not claimed, as we understand the appellants' position, that the incorrect statement was made with intent to defraud. It does not appear, either, that any innocent third party has been misled. The claim of lien was, therefore, not invalidated by the erroneous statement. Code Civ. Proc. § 1203.

[5] Appellants contend that plaintiff should not have been permitted to include in his claim of lien the item of $1,975.61 for lumber, for the reason that a judgment had been rendered against these defendants in an action brought by the Citizens' Lumber Company to recover the price of the lumber, and to foreclose a lien for the amount. The minutes of the court were introduced in evidence, but showed merely that judgment had been rendered in favor of the plaintiff in that case. It was the duty of respondent to protect the appellants' property against any lien preferred by the lumber company. The owners are entitled to set off against their obligation to pay plaintiff so much as the labor he performed, and the materials he furnished are reasonably worth the counter obligation of plaintiff to indemnify them for any amount they have been compelled to pay to relieve their property from liens filed thereon to secure plaintiff's debts, including the attorney's fees and costs in the suits to enforce the liens. Code Civ. Proc. § 1193; Clancy v. Plover, 40 P. 394, 107 Cal. 272, 275; Covell v. Washburn, 27 P. 859, 91 Cal. 560, 563. See, also, Holden v. Mensinger, 165 P. 950, 175 Cal. 300, 305. We have no way of arriving at these amounts. Consequently, the cause must be remanded to the lower court in order that that may be done and the owners be protected against the possibility of being forced to make double payment.

Appellants also contend that the trial court erred in denying them relief on their cross-complaint. They claim that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that plaintiff, up to the time he quit the work, had performed all the terms and conditions of his contract. The evidence was conflicting, and the trial court decided the issue presented by the cross-complaint in favor of the plaintiff.

Because of the errors we have noted, the judgment is reversed.

In re SHAW'S ESTATE. (Sac. 3524.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1926. As Amended April 29, 1926.)

1. Wills ⚡470.

In determining testatrix's intent, court must look to entire body of will and give effect if possible to every portion thereof.

2. Wills ⚡617—Rules that unequivocal gifts of life estates are not to be limited by later doubtful clauses relating to management thereof held inapplicable, where the extent of life interest devised is limited to the income of testatrix's estate, and control of corpus is reposed in other than devisees (Civ. Code, § 1322).

Where testatrix in immediate context in will wherein she devised life interest in her estates limited such interest to the income thereof, and in other parts of will reposed exclusive control of corpus in others, rule in Civ. Code, § 1322, that clear and unequivocal gifts of life estates will not be limited by later and doubtful clauses relating to management of properties thus devised is inapplicable.

3. Wills ⚡617—Will devising life interest in one-half of testatrix's estate to each of two devisees, followed by limitation that interest which is devised is a life interest only, and not an interest in fee, held to have invested devisees only with a life interest in income of testatrix's estate.

Under will devising life interest in one-half testatrix's estate to each of two devisees, immediately followed by statement that interest thus devised is a life interest only and not an interest in fee, followed by clear language reposing control of corpus in others than devisees, held that only life interest which testatrix intended to devise in devisee was a life interest in income of testatrix's estate.

4. Trusts ⚡25(1)—Whether or not trust has been created depends rather on powers or duties with which named persons have been invested than on titles bestowed on them or terms employed in defining nature and extent of their estate.

There is no magic in mere words "trust" or "trustee" in an instrument, and whether or not a trust has been created by such instrument depends rather on powers and duties persons named have been invested with than on titles bestowed on them or terms employed in defining nature and extent of their estate.

5. Wills ⚡676—Powers and duties invested in executors, giving them control and dominion over whole estate during period far exceeding time occupied in administering estate, held such as to constitute them trustees, when their powers as executors drew to a close.

Where persons named as executors in will were given such control and dominion over whole properties of estate, coupled with such exclusive possession as is usually exercised by trustees, for a period far exceeding time occupied in administration of an estate, and occupying entire lives of devisees of life interest in estate, held that powers and duties with which such executors were invested were such as to constitute them trustees of the property of decedent when their powers and functions as executors drew to a close.

6. Wills ⚡681(2)—Will declaring that estate should be "managed and handled" by named executors held to create an active trust and not "dry trust."

Will creating trust by express "wish, will and intent" of testatrix that her estate be "managed and handled" by named executors held to have created an active trust and not a "dry trust"; "dry trust" referring to trust wherein trustees have no actual responsibilities as such and no active duties to perform.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Dry Trust.]

7. Wills ⚡681(2)—That will creating trust contained provisions, not compulsory, for turning of properties into money and deposit thereof in banks held not to make trust a dry or naked trust.

That will creating a trust contained provisions for deposit of trust funds if turned into money did not create a dry trust, where it was not compulsory to turn properties into money, but only discretionary, but even if properties were turned into money and deposited, trust would not become a dry or naked trust, since equity would require an active supervision over such mon. by the trustees.

8. Trusts ⚡159—Contention that trust was void because president and secretary of bank were named as trustees, thus making bank trustee, held without merit, trustees' official relation to bank being merely descriptio personæ.

Contention that because will creating trust named president and secretary of bank, named as depository of estate funds, as trustees, trust was void because bank is in fact trustee, held without merit, since officers of bank were named as trustees, their official relation to bank being merely descriptio personæ.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Emily Pixley Shaw, deceased. From a judgment and decree of final distribution, Catherine Gray Peterson appeals. Affirmed.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, for appellant.

George F. McNoble, of Stockton, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment and decree of final distribution in the matter of the administration of the above estate and in the course of probate of the last will and testament of Emily Pixley Shaw, deceased. The decedent died testate in the county of San Joaquin, state of California, on or about June 5, 1921, leaving an estate mainly, if not wholly, situate in said county, amounting in value to approximately $115,000, and consisting almost entirely in money and personal property in the form of notes, stocks, and bonds. The terms of her last will and testament which have direct reference to her disposition of her said estate are those which read as follows:

"Thirdly: I give, devise and bequeath unto my adopted daughter, Catherine Gray Peterson, formerly Catherine Gray Shaw, and now the wife of Fred A. Peterson, of Santa Cruz, California, a life interest in and to one-half of the rest, residue and remainder of my estate after my debts are all paid, the income on said life estate to be paid quarterly to her by my executors, promptly on the first day of each and every quarter during the term of her natural life; and the remainder in fee interest in and to the same, upon the death of said Catherine Gray Peterson, is to go to and become the property of her daughter, Helen Peterson Lightfoot, and in case of the death of said person last mentioned, to Catherine Lightfoot, the daughter of said Helen Peterson Lightfoot.

"The interest of the said Catherine Gray Peterson herein devised is a life interest only, and not an interest in fee simple.

"Fourthly: I give, devise and bequeath unto Helen Peterson Lightfoot, daughter of said Catherine Gray Peterson, an undivided one-half interest in and to all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, to hold and enjoy the same for the term of her natural life, and no longer; and at her death, the remainder in fee interest in and to the same is to go to and become the property of her daughter, Catherine Lightfoot.

"The said Helen Peterson Lightfoot is to receive the income on said undivided one-half rest, residue and remainder of my said estate, quarterly, the same to be paid to her by my executors promptly on the first day of each and every quarter during the term of her natural life.

"The interest herein devised to said Helen Peterson Lightfoot is a life interest only, and not an interest in fee simple.

"I desire that all of the debts, charges and expenses of administration of my estate, and all the expenses of my last illness and funeral expenses, be paid in full before said estate be distributed, and before said shares go to the respective devisees mentioned herein.

"Lastly: I hereby nominate and appoint J. B. Cory and W. H. Lorenz the executors of this, my last will and testament, to serve without bonds being required of them, or either of them, and I hereby revoke all former wills by me made; and I request that no bonds shall be required of the successors in office of my said executors, or either or any of them.

"I hereby direct that my executors, if they deem it advisable and for the best interest of my estate and for all concerned, to cause all of the real and personal property of my estate to be sold and converted into cash, and that after all necessary legal disbursements have been made in the administration of said estate, that the funds of said estate be kept on deposit in the First National Bank of Lodi and in the Central Savings Bank of Lodi, and that during the lives respectively of said life tenants, mentioned herein, said funds, and all funds in my estate, remain in said banks.

"I further hereby appoint as the successor of either or both of my executors, in case of their deaths, their successors, respectively, in office as president and secretary, or either or both, of the said First National Bank of Lodi; it being my wish, will and intent that my estate shall be managed and handled by the president and secretary of the said First National Bank of Lodi, and in case of the death of either of them, that his successor in such case shall take the place of such present executor—that is to say, in case of the death of said J. B. Cory that his successor as president of said bank shall serve as one of my executors, and in case of the death of W. H. Lorenz, that his successor as secretary of said bank shall serve as one of my executors."

The questions which are presented upon this appeal involve the interpretation to be placed upon the foregoing provisions of the decedent's last will and testament. The trial court upon the petition for distribution of the decedent's estate pursuant to the said terms of her last will and testament, and upon the opposition thereto presented by Catherine Gray Peterson and Helen Peterson Lightfoot, the two devisees of life interests in said estate under said will, made certain findings of fact and conclusions of law upon which the said court predicated the judgment and decree appealed from. The above-named devisees of life interests under said will, and each of them, appealed from said judgment and decree, but subsequently thereto the appeal was, by the District Court of Appeal in which the matter was then pending, dismissed as to the appellant Helen Peterson Lightfoot without prejudice to the appeal of the other appellant. The remaining appellant assails upon this appeal certain of the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the trial court, wherein the latter in interpreting the provisions of the last will and testament of said decedent above set forth determined that said decedent had by the foregoing terms of her said will devised to each of said appellants a life interest in the income only of the properties of her said estate; and as to the corpus thereof had created a trust and had invested the executors named therein with the powers and functions of trustees and with the right to have distributed to themselves as such the said corpus of said estate and to hold the same as such during the lifetime of said appellants and each of them for the purposes declared in said will. We are asked to review and reverse the findings, conclusions, and decree of the trial court in the foregoing regard.

[1, 2] The primary question presented for our consideration is as to whether the testatrix intended by the foregoing terms of her last will to invest the two persons, who are named therein as being each entitled to a life interest in an undivided one-half of her said estate, with such right to the possession and control of her respective proportion of said properties as to entitle each of said persons to have the same distributed directly to her in lifetime under the decree of final distribution of said estate. In determining this question it is conceded by both the appellant and the respondents herein that we are to look to the entire body of the decedent's said last will and to give effect, if possible, to every portion thereof. The appellant, however, argues and cites authority for her insistence that when a will contains clear and unequivocal gifts of life estates the vesting of such estates will not be limited or controlled by later and doubtful clauses in the will relating to the management of the properties thus devised or of the income thereof. There can be no doubt as to the correctness of this rule, since it is embodied in section 1322 of the Civil Code, but, conceding that the rule would be as appellant states it in respect to an appropriate situation, we are satisfied that it cannot be given application to the instant case, for the reason that the testatrix by the very terms of her devise of the life interests in question has embodied her intended limitation upon the right of the devisees thereof to the possession and control thereof during the life of the term thereof. In the immediate context wherein the testatrix devised the so-called life interest in the undivided one-half of her estate to each of said devisees, she limited the extent of the domination, receipt, possession, and control of the interest thus devised to the income thereon in each instance; and in other parts of her said will by words equally clear and distinct reposed the exclusive domination and control over and possession of the corpus of each of said undivided and indivisible portions of her said properties and estate in persons other than the aforesaid devisees, during the entire life of each of them and of the term of their interest in said properties and estate. It is to be noted as of prime significance in this connection that the properties of said testatrix consisted almost wholly of personal property, together with her small holding of real estate, which the executors of her said will were given discretion to turn into money, retaining the corpus thereof, and delivering the income thereof only to said devisees during their lives. To properties of this character the terms "life estate" and "life tenants" could have only a limited significance; and, since the whole of the corpus was devised in remainder, the chief value to the devisees of a life interest therein consisted in their right to the income or usufruct thereof.

[3] Reading the will thus as a whole and finding no doubt or uncertainty as to the foregoing terms thereof, we therefore arrive at the conclusion that the only life interest with which the testatrix intended these particular devisees to be invested was thus declared to be a life interest in the income of her said properties and estate. The cases to which we are referred by the appellant as supporting her interpretation of the terms of this will do not go to the extent of requiring us to uphold that interpretation. In Estate of Pforr, 77 P. 825, 144 Cal. 121, no attempt was made by the testator to create a limited estate, nor were his executors invested with any powers inconsistent with their functions as executors or which were not to be exercised in that capacity and within the period of two years which would be a reasonable period within which to complete the administration of the estate. The case furnishes no parallel to the case at bar. In the Estate of Campbell, 87 P. 573, 149 Cal. 712, there was no limitation upon the estates devised by the will of the testator, nor, as this court held, was there any power with which the executrix was invested except such as pertained to her office. In the case of Benalack v. Richards, 48 P. 622, 116 Cal. 405, all that was decided was that the investment of the executors with the naked power of sale of the properties of the estate did not operate of itself to create a trust in said executors nor to invest them with any estate or with powers other than those conferred by law upon executors. In the case of Sheehan v. Sullivan, 58 P. 543, 126 Cal. 192, the sole question involved was as to whether the mere verbal and indefinite declarations of the grantor as to an intended trust affecting the property embraced in a deed absolute in form were sufficient to amount to the creation of a trust in the grantee. This court properly held that they were not. In each of the foregoing cases also it is to be noted that the devisees were in the main of real estate to which the law applicable to the creation of particular estates and of trusts in real estate would have a more especial application. We shall discuss certain other cases to which we have been referred in a later portion of this opinion, but upon the branch of the case under immediate consideration we are satisfied that it was not the testatrix's intent as expressed in her said will to invest the appellants herein with a greater estate than that of a life interest in the income to be derived from her said properties in their present form or when turned into money according to the direction of her will.

[4] The next question presented for our consideration is as to whether the trial court was justified by the terms of the decedent's will in distributing the entire corpus of her said estate to the executors named in her said will and to their successors to be selected in the manner designated therein as trustees of an express trust for the purposes and period designated in the last will of said decedent. It is urged by the appellant herein that the said will of said decedent does not create a trust in said persons or in the successors of them, for the reason that there is no mention or use of the words "trust" or "trustee" in said will, nor are there any appropriate words therein indicating an intent to create a trust. As to the use of the words "trust" or "trustee" in an instrument, it has been frequently held that there is no magic in mere words of this character, and that the question as to whether or not a trust has been created by such instrument depends rather upon the powers and duties with which the persons named therein have been invested than upon the titles bestowed upon them or the terms employed in defining the nature and extent of their estate. The rule in this regard is perhaps most clearly stated in the case of Colton v. Colton, 8 S. Ct. 1164, 127 U. S. 300, 32 L. Ed. 138, which was a case arising in California and which made its way through the federal courts to the court of last resort. The words of the will in that case were:

"I give and bequeath to my said wife, Ellen M. Colton, all of the estate, real and personal, of which I shall die seized, possessed, or entitled to. I recommend to her the care and protection of my mother and sister, and request her to make such provision for them as in her judgment will be best."

It was held that a trust was imposed upon the surviving wife to make suitable provision for the mother and sister. The court said:

"No technical language, however, is necessary to the creation of a trust, either by deed or by will. It is not necessary to use the words 'upon trust' or 'trustee,' if the creation of a trust is otherwise sufficiently evident. If it appear to be the intention of the parties from the whole instrument creating it that the property conveyed is to be held or dealt with for the benefit of another, a court of equity will affix to it the character of a trust, and impose corresponding duties upon the party receiving the title, if it be capable of lawful enforcement. No general rule can be stated that will determine when a conveyance will carry with it the whole beneficial interest, and when it will be construed to create a trust; but the intention is to be gathered in each case from the general purpose and scope of the instrument."

The foregoing language was quoted with approval by this court in the case of Estate of Reith, 77 P. 942, 144 Cal. 314, 318, in which, also, the language of the Supreme Court of New York in the case of Tobias v. Ketchum, 32 N. Y. 319, received the approval of this court. In the last named case—

"The testator did not use the word 'trustee' or 'trustees', but gave the executors power to rent, lease, repair, and insure his real estate, until sold or divided, and out of the rents and profits to pay the provision made for the widow, and to at a certain time divide the property among the children or other heirs. It was held that the will created a trust in the executors. The court said, quoting from Hill on Trustees: 'It is by no means necessary that the donee should be expressly directed to hold the property to certain uses or in trust, or as trustee. * * * It is one of the fixed rules of equitable construction that there is no magic in particular words; and any expressions that show unequivocally the intention of the parties to create a trust will have that effect. It was said by Lord Eldon, that the word "trust" not being made use of is a circumstance to be alluded to, but nothing more; and if the whole frame of the will creates a trust, the law is the same, though the word "trust" is not used."

Many other cases might be cited in support of the same doctrine, but we deem their further review unnecessary in view of the holding of this court in Estate of Reith, supra.

[5] Turning to the terms of the will of the testatrix in the instant case, we find the clearly expressed intention on the part of the decedent to invest her executors in their capacity as such with the power and duty in their discretion of converting her entire estate into money. This they might have done within the period usually occupied in administering estates of like amount to this one. Thus far the exercise of no trust function other than that which the statutory office of executor imposes would be required. But this will goes much further than that by the provisions thereof which postpone the final disposition of the corpus of this estate in whatever form until the termination of the lifetime of both of the two devisees who are to receive the income thereof during the lives of each of them and of the survivor. The record herein discloses that in the year 1919, at the time of the execution of said will, Catherine Gray Peterson, one of said devisees, was of the age of about 53 years, that her daughter, Helen Peterson Lightfoot, the other of said devisees, was at said time of the age of under 30 years, and that Catherine Lightfoot, the devisee of the remainder of said estate after the termination of both of the aforesaid life interests therein, was of the age of about 4 years. It will thus be evident without any close computation based upon mortality tables that the persons named in said will as the executors thereof have, by the terms thereof, been invested with the possession, management, and control of the entire corpus of said estate for a period of time far outreaching the ordinary period to be occupied in the administration of such an estate. During such period thus extending far beyond the scope and need of administration and occupying the entire lives of the two devisees of said life interests in said estate, the said persons designated as executors in the decedent's said will are to exercise a degree of dominion over the whole of the properties of said estate, coupled with such exclusive possession and power of management thereof as is usually exercised by trustees and as ought to be surrounded by such safeguards as the law imposes upon trustees under like conditions. The provisions of this will which thus define the powers, duties, and responsibilities of the persons named therein or their successors, and designated as executors therein, are not doubtful or uncertain in any other respect except in the fact that their prescribed powers and functions are not expressly denominated a "trust," nor are they called therein "trustees"; but this, as we have seen, is not vital (Estate of Reith, supra, and cases cited) to the determination that such persons are in fact trustees and their function and office that of a trust, if their control of the properties with which they are invested and the performance of their duties with respect thereto are such as in the nature of things require that the mantle of a trusteeship shall be cast upon their shoulders. The decisions are uniform to this effect. In the case of Mee v. Gordon, 80 N. E. 353, 354, 187 N. Y. 400-407 (116 Am. St. Rep. 613, 10 Ann. Cas. 172), the court aptly says:

"The duty of investing and administering the share in question it is true is imposed upon persons who are designated as executors rather than trustees, but it is a very familiar rule that the duties imposed upon a person rather than the name applied to him in the will should measure his office and position."

In the case of In re Bartholemew's Will, 143 N. Y. S. 695, 82 Misc. Rep. 1, involving the interpretation of a will in which, as in this case, the words "trust" and "trustee" did not appear, the court, after reciting the terms of the will, said:

"To carry out these intentions, while no trust was in terms created, one should be implied to enable the executrix or her successor to perform the duties imposed; that is, the executrix, or whoever might administer the estate, was a trustee of the corpus of the estate, the income of which was to be applied as hereinabove expressed. Matter of Young, 40 N. E. 226, 145 N. Y. 535, 537. No particular formula of words need to be used to create a trust. To create a trust it is not essential that the words 'trust' or 'trustee' should be used, or that there should be a direct devise in terms to the trustee, or that the authority to receive the rents and profits should be conferred in express language. It is sufficient if the intention to create a trust * * * can be fairly collected from the instrument, and what is implied from the language used is, as in other instruments, deemed to be expressed."

The same doctrine is laid down in many cases from other jurisdictions which but reinforce the rule set forth in the Reith Case above cited. We have no hesitancy, therefore, in holding that the powers and duties with which the persons named in the said will of the decedent with respect to their dominion over and management and control of the corpus of the testatrix's estate during the lifetime of the appellants herein were such as to constitute them trustees of the properties of the decedent when their powers and functions as the executors of her said will would draw to a close and the time would arrive in the usual order of procedure for the distribution in probate of her said estate.

[6] The appellant herein, however, insists that the trust thus sought to be created is void for the following several reasons: First, that said trust is a so-called "dry trust." The term "dry trust" refers to a trust wherein the trustees would have no actual responsibilities as such and no active duties to perform. But this trust is not of that character, but is rather of the character referred to in the case of Gray v. Union Trust Co., 154 P. 306, 171 Cal. 637, 640, wherein the duties of the trustee were to so manage, invest, and handle the trust property as to give to the beneficiary the usufructuary benefit thereof during her lifetime, and upon her death to see that the property goes to the nominees under her will. The court in that case held that such a trust was not a dry, naked trust, since active duties were imposed upon the trustee during the lifetime of the beneficiary entitled to the income thereof. In like manner in the instant case an active trust was created by the expressed "wish, will and intent" of the testatrix, as she declares, "that my estate shall be managed and handled" by her named executors, who are respectively the president and secretary of the First National Bank of Lodi, or, in case of their death, by their successors in that official relation to said bank.

[7] The appellant herein makes the further insistence that said trust, if created at all, is a dry trust because of the provisions in said will with respect to the deposit of the funds of said estate, if turned into money, in the two banks named in her said will. But the answer to this contention is that it is not made compulsory upon those who are thus to have charge of the properties of her said estate to turn the same into money, but is only discretionary upon them to do so. The executors of her said estate and who are to be the trustees thereof have thus far maintained the entire property in the original form in which they received it, and they may in their discretion continue to manage and handle said properties in such form, which is mainly that of stocks, notes, and bonds; in which event it could hardly be contended that a trust involving the management and handling of such properties would be a dry or naked trust. But even if said properties should be turned into money and deposited in the banking institutions named in the will of said testatrix, the trust would not thereupon or for that reason become a dry or naked trust, since equity, which is the guardian and ultimate administrator of all trusts, would require of said trustees such an active supervision over the properties or moneys thereof, whether in the hands of these or of other depositaries, as would result in carrying out the expressed purpose of its creator with relation to the provision and payment of a suitable income regularly to those having a life interest in such income.

[8] The final contention of the appellant that said trust is void for the reason that the trustees of said trust are, in point of fact, the banks who are named as the depositories of the funds of said estate, and which said banks are not authorized by law to do a trust business, is devoid of any real merit. The persons named in said will as the executors thereof were, it is true, the president and secretary of the First National Bank of Lodi, but it was said persons and not said bank who were to be the executors of the decedent's will. Their official relation to said bank was merely descriptio personæ, and it is reasonable to assume that it was her intention that this would continue to be so when their relation changed to that of the trustee of her properties. The trial court so interpreted her will, and we are satisfied with interpretation. It is therefore our conclusion that the trial court was not in error in the interpretation which as a whole it placed upon the will of said decedent, and hence did not err in making and entering its judgment and decree of distribution in accord therewith.

The judgment and decree are therefore affirmed, the respondents to recover their costs herein, to be paid out of the assets of said estate.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Herman Frost against Alpheus L. Hanscome and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

I. I. Brown and Samuel T. Bush, both of San Francisco (L. Seidenberg, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

J. R. Cunyningham, of San Francisco, for respondent Hanscome.

J. E. White, of San Francisco, and N. J. Barry, of Susanville, for respondents Turner and Wood.

SHENK, J. The plaintiff brought this action to annul two judgments obtained against him by the defendants Wood and Turner, respectively; also to compel the surrender of certain securities pledged by him to the said defendants; also for $30,000 actual damages and additional damages in the sum of $20,000 by way of punishment. The complaint charges the defendants with fraud in obtaining said judgments, and with a conspiracy to abstract from him his money and property by fraud and deceit. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case defendants moved the court for a nonsuit on the ground that there was no evidence to show a conspiracy or fraud on the part of any of the defendants, and that there was no evidence to show that the plaintiff in any way lost any money or suffered any damage. The motion was granted, and from a judgment in favor of defendants the plaintiff appeals. The only question presented on the appeal is whether the trial court was justified under the evidence in granting the motion for a nonsuit.

For some 20 years the plaintiff, Herman Frost, had been engaged in the sheep raising and ranching business in Eastern Oregon. In 1915 he removed with his accumulated savings to San Francisco, where he engaged in the saloon and café business at No. 920 Market street. In 1916 he became acquainted with Milton S. Hamilton, who was made a party defendant in this action, but was never served with process. Hamilton was an attorney at law and represented Frost in numerous actions and other matters during the course of several years. Hamilton early acquired the habit of borrowing money from Frost and of recommending that he loan money to others, among whom was Patrick L. Flanigan, a real estate operator residing in Reno. Acting on the advice of Hamilton, Frost loaned Flanigan various sums aggregating, in March, 1917, the sum of $6,000, which was repaid in the manner presently to be related.

The defendant Sallie C. Turner was the owner of a grain and live stock ranch in the Surprise Valley in Modoc county, consisting of 2,580 acres of land, which she and her husband had acquired during the course of 20 years' residence in that locality. Her son, Raymond Turner, since 1913 had been leasing 740 acres of the ranch on a lease from year to year. On December 1, 1916, the defendant Charles E. Wood, a real estate dealer and promoter, entered into a written lease with the Turners, husband and wife, covering 2,044 acres of the ranch for a term of five years from the 4th day of January, 1917, on a rental of one-half of the crops and one-half of the increase of the live stock. Wood also owned a contract to purchase the Hedgpeth ranch, located three miles south of the Turner ranch. Flanigan was an acquaintance of Hamilton, and through the influence and advice of the latter aroused the interest of Frost in the purchase of the Turner ranch. Frost made a trip to the ranch in September, 1917. On that trip he met Flanigan, Wood, and Mrs. Turner. After spending several hours on the ranch and examining it in a superficial way, so he claims, and after conversations between Frost, Flanigan, and Wood it was agreed that they would purchase the Turner ranch, take the title thereto, and operate the same in the name of a corporation thereafter to be formed under the laws of the state of Nevada, and to be called the Surprise Valley Land & Livestock Company. The documents preparatory to the incorporation and organization of the company were shortly thereafter prepared by the defendant Hanscome, who had practiced law in an eastern state, but had not been admitted to practice in this state. Hanscome was an acquaintance of Hamilton, and on a prior trip to Modoc county had met Mrs. Turner and the defendant Wood. After negotiations for the purchase of the ranch had been concluded it was agreed between Flanigan, Wood, and Frost that a contract of purchase should be entered into with Mrs. Turner, that Flanigan should be the nominal purchaser, and that he should thereafter assign the contract of purchase to the proposed corporation. Wood was to surrender his lease on the Turner ranch and transfer his contract of purchase covering the Hedgpeth ranch to the corporation. Frost was to advance $10,000 in cash as the first payment on the purchase price of the Turner ranch and receive the corporation's note for $10,000 in consideration of such advancement. The three were to share equally in the capital stock of the corporation, which was to consist of 100 shares of the par value of $100 each.

The Surprise Valley Land & Livestock Company was incorporated in October, 1917, and upon organization Flanigan was elected president, Wood secretary, and Frost treasurer of the company. The capital stock was issued as agreed. Wood surrendered his lease on the Turner ranch and transferred to the corporation his interest in the Hedgpeth ranch. By the agreement of purchase and sale, which bears date January 4, 1918, Mrs. Turner agreed to convey to Flanigan the 2,580 acres of land in the Turner ranch free and clear of all incumbrances and a miscellaneous lot of farm machinery, tools, and equipment used in the operation of this extensive ranch. The agreement also covered the purchase of live stock consisting of 70 head of mules, 31 head of horses and brood mares, 250 head of cattle, 175 hogs, 58 sheep, one jack, and a half interest in a French Percheron stallion. The purchase price was $219,385, $10,000 payable on the execution of the contract, $10,000 on the first days of November, 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921, respectively, and $58,692.50 on the 1st day of November, 1922, after which payments Mrs. Turner agreed to convey title to the real property, execute a bill of sale of the personal property, and take a note or notes for the balance of the purchase price secured by a mortgage on the premises. On the day of its date the contract of purchase was assigned by Flanigan to the corporation. Frost did not advance the first payment of $10,000 on the contract as he agreed to do under the arrangement between the three men, but insisted that Flanigan pay thereon the said $6,000, owed by Flanigan to Frost, plus interest on the same. After considerable negotiation the sum of $6,500 was paid by Flanigan to Mrs. Turner in discharge of his indebtedness to Frost, and the latter paid to Mrs. Turner the balance of the first payment on the contract, to wit, the sum of $3,500. Under date of December 5, 1917, Frost received the corporation's note for $10,000 on account of his agreed advancement of the initial payment. The corporation entered into possession and commenced farming operations. In order to finance the enterprise the corporation made application for a loan to the Fort Bidwell Bank. To carry on his operations under his lease Wood had theretofore obtained a credit at that bank of $5,000, of which he had drawn $1,000. The bank agreed to loan the company $5,000 provided the $1,000 was paid. The company accordingly executed a note to the bank for the sum of $5,000, and $4,000 was placed to its credit. The obligation of Wood to the bank, which was extinguished in that transaction, was included in the terms of the sale by Wood of his interest in the company to Frost. In the latter transaction Wood surrendered his stock in the company and received two promissory notes signed by Frost and Flanigan, one in the sum of $7,000 and the other in the sum of $2,000. The $7,000 note was transferred by Wood to Mrs. Turner in partial satisfaction of his indebtedness to her, her son Raymond, and her daughter, on account of money loaned to him in operating the ranch under his lease and before the advent of Frost on the scene. This note was not paid when due, whereupon Mrs. Turner commenced an action in the superior court in and for the county of Modoc against Frost and Flanigan, and on the default of Frost to appear within the time prescribed by law a default judgment was entered against him in the sum of $8,393.50. Later on Frost moved the court to set aside the default and permit him to answer, and upon a denial of that motion took an appeal from the judgment. The judgment was affirmed. Turner v. Frost, 51 Cal. App. 196, 196 P. 290. On proceedings supplementary to execution and on what must be conceded to have been questionable advice on the part of Hamilton, Frost failed to appear, whereupon he was cited for contempt, and upon his failure to appear was arrested and taken before the court. He was released on $1,000 bail pending the determination of his application to set aside the default. Frost paid $400 on the $2,000 note held by Wood, and on his default in the payment of the balance Wood commenced an action against him in the city and county of San Francisco. It does not appear that he had any defense to that action, but through the negligence of his attorney, Hamilton, so Frost alleges, a default judgment was obtained against him for the sum of $1,848.97. The foregoing judgments are sought to be set aside and annulled in this action.

On June 10, 1919, H. Raymond Hall, as assignee, and for the benefit of Frost, commenced an action against Wood in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for $3,333.33 as the alleged proportionate share of Wood's stockholders' liability on the note for $10,000 issued to Frost by the live stock company. On the same day Frost commenced an action against Wood in the same court to enjoin the defendant therein named from enforcing his judgment against Frost. In that complaint Frost recited the pendency of the action filed on the same day, entitled Hall v. Wood, and sought to establish an equitable set-off against Wood to the extent of the latter's alleged stockholders' liability. In both of the actions last mentioned Hamilton appeared as attorney for the plaintiff. Shortly thereafter a settlement of all the differences between Mrs. Turner, Wood, and Frost was proposed. To that end, and under date of June 17, 1919, an agreement in writing was executed by them and witnessed by their respective attorneys. In this agreement it was recited that Mrs. Turner held the judgment for $8,393.50 against Frost in Modoc county, that Wood held the judgment for $1,848.97 against Frost in the city and county of San Francisco, and the pendency of the actions of Frost v. Wood and Hall v. Wood in said city and county. In this compromise agreement Frost agreed to pay at the time of the execution thereof the sum of $750 in partial satisfaction of the judgment in the action of Turner v. Frost, and the further sum of $750 in partial satisfaction of the judgment in the case of Wood v. Frost. In addition, Frost agreed to pay Mrs. Turner and Wood the further sum of $8,085.72, being $671.75 less than the balance due on said judgments, on or before August 16, 1919, and Mrs. Turner and Wood agreed to accept the reduced amount in full satisfaction of their claims provided said payments should be made when agreed. As security for his performance of the agreement Frost assigned and transferred to Mrs. Turner and Wood three promissory notes owned by him, aggregating $12,100, with a stipulation that if he should fail to make the payment on August 16, 1919, the said securities should be sold to satisfy said judgments, any balance remaining to be paid to Frost. It was further agreed that proceedings of any kind or nature in all of said actions should be suspended to and including the 16th day of August, 1919. In conclusion the said agreement of compromise provided as follows:

"This agreement is intended and is hereby declared to be a full and complete settlement of all claims of whatsoever character or nature that Charles E. Wood and Sallie C. Turner now have or ever have had against Herman Frost, and all claims of every character and nature that Herman Frost now has or ever had had against Charles E. Wood or Sallie C. Turner, and upon a compliance with the terms and conditions of this agreement in the manner and at the times herein specified will be a full release and discharge of all such claims."

In negotiating this compromise agreement the parties thereto were represented by their respective attorneys, Mr. J. E. White, representing the defendants Turner and Wood, and Milton S. Hamilton, representing Herman Frost. Frost failed to make the payment due August 16, 1919, and nearly two years thereafter, to wit, on July 5, 1921, commenced the present action to annul said judgments, cancel the assignments, and compel the surrender of said securities on the ground of fraud and deceit.

The agreement for the purchase of the Turner ranch contained a provision that on or before the 1st day of March of each year the purchaser should execute a chattel mortgage on the crops of that year in the sum of $10,000 as security for the payment of the ensuing installment of the contract price. Early in the year 1918 it was foreseen by Flanigan, who was in the actual charge of the ranching enterprise, that it would be impossible to raise the necessary money for such operations if the chattel mortgage due March 1, 1918, were executed. In lieu of the requirements of the contract and with Mrs. Turner's acquiescence Flanigan caused his wife to hypothecate certain laundry stock owned by her for the sum of $10,000, and deposited the same in the First National Bank of Alturas in the place and stead of the required chattel mortgage. For default of the purchaser in making further payments on the contract price Mrs. Turner repossessed the ranch in February, 1919, and about two months thereafter commenced an action against the bank to recover the deposit made in lieu of the chattel mortgage. That suit was compromised, and in the settlement Mrs. Turner received the sum of $4,000 in cash. Before she repossessed her property she had received $14,030 on account of payments required by the contract of purchase, which was much less than she would have received had the contract been complied with. The live stock company had taken the 1917 and 1918 crops from the ranch, and had removed $10,000 worth of produce and other property from the Hedgpeth ranch. Frost, as treasurer of the live stock company, received as returns from the ranches from December, 1917, to November, 1918, the sum of $17,951.30, and out of his own funds he paid out in financing the enterprise the sum of $18,008.15, including the $10,000 for which he received the company's note as reimbursement.

The foregoing is an outline of the principal transactions disclosed by the plaintiff's evidence. Upon these facts, and additional matters hereinafter adverted to, he predicates his inferences that the defendants were acting in concert with a design to separate him from his money and property by fraudulent means.

[1-3] In a conspiracy there must be the concert of action between two or more persons to accomplish an unlawful purpose, or a lawful purpose by unlawful or fraudulent means. Parkinson v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 593, 98 P. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165. When the purpose of the conspiracy is accomplished each participant in the wrongful act is responsible as a joint tort-feasor for all damages ensuing from the wrongful act. Revert v. Hesse, 184 Cal. 295, 193 P. 943. Unlawful concerted purpose and action is charged by the plaintiff against Flanigan, Turner, Wood, Hanscome, and Hamilton. It appears that Flanigan died before the commencement of this action, which accounts for the fact that he was not made a party defendant herein. His actions, however, are called in question, and concerning them it must be said that his participation in the enterprise appears to have been entirely consistent with his good faith, and that no reasonable inference of bad faith on his part may be drawn from the evidence. All of the money which he borrowed from the plaintiff was repaid. In order to safeguard the contract of purchase acquired by the live stock company, two-thirds of whose stock the plaintiff was the owner, Flanigan caused the laundry stock of his wife to be hypothecated for a loan of $10,000 to be used in satisfying the requirements of the contract of purchase. It would be unreasonable to suppose that if he were actuated by a purpose to defraud the plaintiff he would risk $16,500 of the funds of himself and wife in endeavoring to carry on the enterprise. This amount, together with his own time and energy, appear to have been wholly lost.

[4-6] Concerning Mrs. Turner's part in the transaction, it appears beyond question that she was dealing at arm's length with Flanagan and Frost and her codefendants herein. She was represented at all times by an attorney, whose conduct appears to have been diligent in her behalf. She made no representations as to the value of the ranch. The fact that some stranger to the transaction told Frost after the purchase that "he had paid too much for the ranch" was not competent evidence of misrepresentation on her part, nor was it evidence that the ranch and personal property sold were not worth what was agreed to be paid for the same. Frost was a ranchman, and on his first visit to the Turner ranch he stated, in the presence of Mrs. Turner in response to an inquiry as to what he thought of the ranch, that he had made his money ranching and could see the possibilities of the Turner ranch. The fact that the Turners had theretofore sold the ranch, or thought they had, and had been compelled to take back the property, was not sufficient proof of misrepresentation, nor does it give rise to a rational inference that the transaction was permeated with fraud. Mrs. Turner was the owner of a large ranch. Her husband had recently died, and she desired to sell. She placed upon the ranch a price which the purchasers agreed to pay. There is no evidence that the agreed price was not the reasonable price of the property. The corporation went into possession and remained in possession for more than a year, and when it failed to fulfill its agreement she terminated the lease.

[7] As to the defendant Wood: He was in possession of the Turner ranch and personal property under a lease beginning January 4, 1917, with an unexpired term of four years. He also owned a contract to purchase the Hedgpeth ranch, from which about $10,000 worth of produce and other personal property was removed by the live stock company while it was in possession of the same. For his interest in both ranches Wood received one-third of the capital stock of the corporation. This stock he sold to Frost for $10,000, taking his promissory notes to the extent of $9,000, the corporation assuming an indebtedness of Wood to the extent of $1,000. There is no evidence to show that Wood's interest in the ranches which was transferred to the corporation was not worth all he received for the same. The plaintiff stresses the fact that under date of January 4, 1918, an agreement was entered into between Mrs. Turner and Wood whereby Wood was to receive for and on account of his surrender of his lease and his participation in the sale theretofore consummated the sum of 10 per cent. of the contract price when the same should be paid. The plaintiff insists that this contract is an indication of conspiracy as between Mrs. Turner and Wood to defraud him. The contract is somewhat ambiguous, but it is reasonably susceptible to the construction, and the undisputed evidence supports the contention, that under it Wood was to receive the said percentage as compensation for surrendering his leasehold interest and thus permitting the sale to become effective with right of immediate possession in the purchaser. From an examination of the record we find nothing to support the contention of plaintiff that the defendant Hanscome was guilty of any unfair dealing with the plaintiff or with any of the parties to the transaction.

[8] Concerning the conduct of the defendant Hamilton, it appears that he was acting as the attorney for Frost in all actions and matters in which Frost was interested from a time antedating the contract of purchase of the Turner ranch until the final agreement of compromise was consummated. There is sufficient in the record to indicate that he was lacking in diligence in representing Frost in the cases of Turner v. Frost and Wood v. Frost, as a consequence of which inconvenience and embarrassment were suffered by Frost in being cited for contempt in response to a citation to appear before the superior court of Modoc county to be examined as a judgment debtor, but it does not appear that he had any meritorious defense to either of said actions. The difficulties in which Frost found himself from time to time appear under the evidence to have been attributable to his failure to discharge his obligations at the time appointed in his agreements.

[9-11] Equity will not afford relief against a final judgment unless extrinsic fraud and a meritorious defense be both alleged and proved. Amador C. & M. Co. v. Mitchell, 59 Cal. 178; Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. 323, 67 P. 282, 87 Am. St. Rep. 98; Silva v. Santos, 138 Cal. 542, 71 P. 703; Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 417, 77 P. 1007. Assuming that the allegations of the complaint herein were sufficient, the proof fell far short of establishing either requirement. The proof must be sufficient to raise more than a mere conjecture or surmise. "It must be such that a rational, and well-constructed mind can reasonably draw from it the conclusion that the fact exists, and when the evidence is not sufficient to justify such an inference," the court may and should grant a motion for a nonsuit. Janin v. London & S. F. Bank, 92 Cal. 14, 27, 27 P. 1100 14 L. R. A. 320, 27 Am. St. Rep. 82.

From a consideration of the record we are satisfied that neither the facts standing alone nor any rational inferences to be drawn therefrom were sufficient to support a judgment for the plaintiff upon the allegations of the complaint. The trial court therefore properly granted the motion for an nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed.

SILVEIRA v. SMITH et al. (S. F. 11220.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1926.)

1. Easements ⇨16—Purchaser of tenement or portion of estate sold by owner of two tenements or entire estate takes with all apparent benefits as between land purchased and property retained by vendor.

Where owner of two tenements sells one, or owner of entire estate sells part of it, purchaser takes land sold with all benefits apparently belonging to it at time as between it and property retained by vendor.

2. Easements ⇨14(3)—Reservation of only limited easement for benefit of particular parcel should not outweigh intention to reserve, for benefit of other parcels retained by grantor, right to use roadway and landing place as easement appurtenant to all.

That grantor of parcel of land expressly reserved only limited easement for benefit of particular parcel retained by him should not outweigh intent to reserve, for use and benefit of other parcels retained, right theretofore existing and thereafter continuously asserted to use roadway and landing place as easement or quasi easement appurtenant to all parcels.

3. Easements ⇨16—That roadway across land conveyed ended in public highway separating it from tracts retained by vendor held not to militate against easement for benefit of such tracts.

That roadway across land conveyed did not lead entirely to tracts retained by vendor, but ended in public highway separating them from such land, held not to militate against existence of easement therein for benefit of such tracts.

4. Easements ⇨32—Fencing of land conveyed and establishment and maintenance of gate across roadway did not destroy easement appurtenant to lands retained by vendor, where gate was never locked, and owners of dominant tenement continued to use roadway.

That grantee and its successors fenced land conveyed shortly after acquiring it and established and maintained gate where roadway across it entered highway did not constitute such interference with exercise of easement appurtenant to parcels retained by vendor as to destroy it, where gate was never locked, and owners of dominant tenement continued to use roadway without obstruction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Antonio F. Silveira against Sam Smith and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Roy C. Lewis and Thos. P. Boyd, both of San Rafael, for appellants.

George H. Harlan, of San Rafael, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is one prosecuted by the defendants for the purpose of assailing and overthrowing a judgment entered herein in favor of plaintiff, whereby the latter was decreed to be entitled to an easement over a certain roadway leading from what is known as "Lucas Embarcadero" and up Gallinas creek, in Marin county, to the public highway between San Rafael and Petaluma, together with a right to use said Embarcadero with sufficient convenient space around the landing place thereon for the shipment or transshipment of supplies, goods, produce, etc., to and from certain parcels of land held in tenancy by the plaintiff. These parcels of land are denominated in the record as parcels A, B and C, and are subdivisions of a larger tract of land, originally known as the rancho San Pedro Marguerita y Las Gallinas, comprising an area of five leagues, being a rancho granted to one Timothy Murphy in the year 1844. The parcel of land owned by the defendants and upon which the rights and easements claimed by the plaintiff are sought to be imposed is designated in the record as parcel I (one) and was also a subdivision of said original rancho. The said original rancho lay to the northward of the city of San Rafael. Extending from San Pablo Bay to the easterly boundary line of the rancho was a body of water, known as Gallinas creek or slough, upon which small vessels were accustomed to ply, and upon the bank of which there came very early to be established a landing known as Lucas Embarcadero, which was the landing place for supplies coming in and for products going out, for the convenient use of the entire rancho and its occupants, and which was connected with the public highway leading through said rancho to Petaluma by a private roadway extending on up Gallinas creek, and which was also used for the convenience of the entire rancho and its occupants in connection with said Embarcadero. The rancho was early subdivided into the parcels or tracts of land above referred to, and parcel I thereof was the parcel bordering upon the slough and upon which the said Embarcadero was located, and from which the aforesaid private roadway extended across said parcel I (one) to the public highway. In the year 1851 Timothy Murphy conveyed parcel A to James Miller, the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff herein. In January, 1853, Timothy Murphy by his last will and testament bequeathed parcels B, C and I to John Lucas, and these parcels were thereafter held by said Lucas as one ranch under the name of Lucas Rancho, until December, 1863, at which time John Lucas, through his trustee, James Dickson, conveyed parcel I and parcel C to John Thomas Code. Said conveyance contained a reservation to the party or parties of the first part of a perpetual right of way to the Embarcadero, known as Lucas Landing, for the benefit of parcel B, over the private road leading from said Embarcadero to the highway; the said right of way being used and to be used "only for hauling wood, timber, lumber, and farm produce from other portions of said Lucas ranch to said Embarcadero, together with the right to pile and store convenient for shipping 100 cords of wood and 1,000,000 feet of lumber and timber at said Embarcadero." In March, 1870, one Martin Miller acquired the title from Code to said parcel I, subject to the reservation of the easement contained in said former deed; and in October, 1870, Martin Miller conveyed to James Miller, who was then the owner of parcels A, B, and C, said parcel I, subject to the same easement. By virtue of said latter conveyance James Miller thus became the owner and holder of the title to parcels A, B, C, and I of said original rancho. In March, 1876, said James Miller conveyed parcel I to a corporation known as the Patent Brick Company, and in said conveyance embodied the following reservation:

"This grant is made subject to a certain right of way reserved in said deed from James Dickson et al. to J. T. Code, dated December 2, 1863, recorded," etc.

Thereafter said parcel I by mesne conveyances became the property of the defendants and appellants herein.

The foregoing recitals as to the original ownership and subsequent transfers of the title to these several parcels of land are summarized from the findings of the trial court and are entirely undisputed. The matters which are in dispute upon this appeal are those which are embodied in certain portions of findings V, VI, VII, VIII, and IX of said findings of the trial court, and which, according to the contention of the appellants herein, are unsupported by the evidence in the case. The portion of said findings of the trial court thus objected to refer to the use or uses which from time to time were made of that certain roadway extending from the Lucas Embarcadero to the public highway by the owners, tenants, and inhabitants of said rancho and of the foregoing subdivisions thereof from the time of the original acquisition of said rancho by Timothy Murphy continuously down to a date shortly prior to the institution of the present action in connection with the use and right to use the navigable waters of Gallinas slough and the space occupied by the Embarcadero situate thereon. With respect to these uses of said roadway and Embarcadero during the period when Timothy Murphy was the owner of the entire rancho and thereafter and during the period when James Miller was the owner of parcel A thereof, and when John Lucas was the owner of parcels B, C, and I thereof, and when, subsequently, James Miller became the owner and holder of the title to each and all of said separate parcels of said rancho, and during the time of his said ownership thereof and thereafter and during the time when the ownership of the title to parcel I thereof was in the Patent Brick Company and its successors down to and after the inception of its ownership by the defendants and appellants herein, we are satisfied from a careful examination of the record that the findings of the trial court with respect to the foregoing use or uses of said roadway and Embarcadero are fully supported by the evidence in the case. The dispute between the parties to this appeal is not so much over the insufficiency of the evidence as showing the foregoing uses as it is over the conclusion which the trial court has deduced therefrom as to the rights from time to time of those who thus made use of the said roadway and Embarcadero.

It is the contention of the appellants herein that when, in the year 1870, James Miller, who had theretofore become the owner of parcels A, B, and C of said tract, became also the owner of parcel I thereof, there was thereby worked an extinguishment, not only of whatever easement had been referred to and reserved in the deed from James Dickson et al. to John Thomas Code, but also of whatever other easement or rights of user had theretofore existed in connection with each or any of said parcels of said tract, and which were thus joined in his common ownership of parcels A, B, C, and I thereof. On the other hand, it is the contention of the respondent herein that, even though it be true that there was thus united in James Miller the several titles to these separate tracts and that they, thus, came under his single ownership, nevertheless, the use or uses of said roadway and Embarcadero continued in connection with these several parcels of land in the form of a quasi easement for the benefit thereof, and that, when the said James Miller undertook to convey the title to these several and separate tracts of the original rancho and of his united ownership for a time thereof, he thereby revived into a full easement the former right of the owners and occupants of these separate parcels of land in and to the use of said roadway and Embarcadero to the full extent of the continuous use and enjoyment thereof during the entire period wherein these several changes in the title and ownership of the several tracts were taking place.

Each of the parties to this appeal makes, respectively, their foregoing contentions and each urges in support thereof a decision of this court which it is contended is on all fours with the instant case. The appellants herein rely upon the case of Taylor v. Avila, 165 P. 533, 175 Cal. 203, as fully sustaining their contention, and hence requiring a reversal of this case. In the case of Taylor v. Avila, the plaintiff brought suit to establish and quiet title to her alleged right to maintain and use a certain water ditch extending from a main canal through the lands of the defendant to and over the plaintiff's land. It appeared that in the year 1903, at or about the time of the construction of said water ditch, the plaintiff was the owner of an 80-acre tract of land adjoining land owned by the defendant or his predecessors, and the ditch in question was so constructed as to run along the eastern edge of defendant's land to and into the plaintiff's 80-acre tract for use in irrigation thereof. In that year plaintiff conveyed to another the 25 acres of her tract adjoining the defendant's land without reservation, but, notwithstanding said conveyance, continued to use the ditch as before for the irrigation of her remaining land and by so doing acquired, as the court found, a prescriptive right as against her said grantee to maintain and use said ditch as before. In 1913 the plaintiff and her said grantee united in conveying the said 25-acre tract to the defendant and in their deed of conveyance not only described and conveyed said land, but also embraced therein an express grant of "all water rights, ditch right, or interest in ditches, canals, water, or water rights made use of for the purpose of irrigating or draining said land or any of said land above described." Notwithstanding such express grant, the plaintiff in that case continued her former use of said ditch for the purpose of irrigating her remaining 55 acres of land and, such use being interfered with by the defendant, brought suit to quiet title to her alleged right to continue to maintain and use said ditch. This court, upon appeal, denied her that right upon the ground that its exercise would be a use in direct opposition to the express terms of her grant. The distinction between the case of Taylor v. Avila, supra, and the instant case is thus made clear. In the case as presented to us upon the present appeal the plaintiff is not seeking to have established and maintained an easement in and to the use of the roadway and Embarcadero, which are the direct subject of this litigation, in opposition to his express grant of such easement to another. What the plaintiff herein was seeking to have the trial court do and is now seeking to have this court approve upon appeal is to establish the continued existence of an easement in and to the use of said roadway and Embarcadero existing and inuring to the benefit of the several parcels of land above referred to as an easement and as a corresponding servitude upon parcel I of said entire tract, notwithstanding the several changes in ownership of said respective parcels of land, and notwithstanding the fact that for a time the ownership of all of said parcels of land had been reunited in a single person.

This contention on the part of the plaintiff herein may be more specifically illustrated by reference to the foregoing undisputed facts in this case. Originally and prior to 1851 Timothy Murphy was the owner of the entire Rancho San Pedro, and while such owner established upon the bank of Gallinas slough the Embarcadero in question and also created the roadway in question leading to the various parcels of said rancho above designated as parcels A, B, C, and I thereof for the use and benefit of the occupants of each of said parcels of land. In 1851 Timothy Murphy conveyed parcel A to James Miller. In 1853 Timothy Murphy bequeathed parcels B and C and I to John Lucas. In 1863 John Lucas, through his trustee, James Dickson, conveyed parcels I and C to John Thomas Code. During this period, and down to the year 1870, the use of said roadway and Embarcadero, as the evidence abundantly shows, continued on the part of the several owners of each of said parcels of land and was unquestionably an easement inuring to the benefit of parcels A, B, and C thereof and a corresponding servitude upon parcel I thereof. In 1870 the title to these four parcels of land came to be within the ownership of James Miller, but, notwithstanding such reuniting of title thereto, the uses of said roadway and Embarcadero for the benefit of each of said respective parcels continued as before. In 1876 James Miller conveyed parcel I to the Patent Brick Company and in said deed embraced only a reservation of the right of way over said roadway, which had theretofore been reserved in the deed from Dickson et al. to Code, and which beneficially affected only parcel C. Aside from said reservation, he did not attempt in said deed to reserve to himself any easement in favor of tracts A and B, but, notwithstanding this fact, he and his successors in the ownership of parcels A and B, as well as parcel C, continued the use and exercise of an easement over said roadway and Embarcadero in the same manner and to the same extent as the same had been used and exercised during all of the previous years and such use and exercise, as the record shows, continued down to a time shortly before the institution of the present action.

[1] To such a situation the plaintiff and respondent herein contends that the case of Cheda v. Bodkin, 158 P. 1025, 173 Cal. 7, has a direct and controlling application. The litigation in that case arose out of a controversy over the right to use a portion of the water flowing from certain springs on a tract of land known as the Molinari ranch to and over an adjoining property known as the Foster ranch. One Marie L. Velasco in her lifetime owned both ranches and, while such owner, built dams to impound and laid pipes to convey the water from said springs upon the upper or Molinari ranch to various lower portions thereof, and from thence permitted said water to continue its flow to and over that portion of her property which was later to be known as the Frank Foster ranch. By her will Mrs. Velasco devised to her granddaughter, Frances O. Pacheco, said Foster ranch, and devised and distributed among her four sons the Molinari ranch. Thereafter the use of said water continued as before in the various parties who had become the owners of said respective tracts of land down to the year 1903, when the title to both the Molinari and Frank Foster ranches came to be in Frances O. Pacheco and so continued for about two years, when the latter sold the Molinari ranch to Julia C. Bodkin, who has since been the owner thereof, and a year later sold the Frank Foster ranch to the predecessor of Silvio H. Cheda, the plaintiff in said action. The use of said water upon these ranches had continued notwithstanding these changes in title up to the time of these last-named transactions and thereafter continued as before down to the year 1909, when Julia C. Bodkin, as the owner of the Molinari ranch, undertook to cut off the flow of water therefrom to the Frank Foster ranch, and it was this interference with the use of said waters which gave rise to the litigation in the case of Cheda v. Bodkin, supra. This court, in dealing with the foregoing facts, applied the doctrine of a quasi easement thereto as the same had been theretofore developed and applied in the case of Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135, and Quinlan v. Noble, 17 P. 69, 75 Cal. 250, and in so doing stated the principle underlying said doctrine to be this:

That, "where the owner of two tenements sells one of them, or the owner of the entire estate sells a portion of it, the purchaser takes the tenement or portion sold with all the benefits and with all the burdens that appear at the time of the sale to belong to it as between it and the property which the vendor retains."

In the application of said principle to the case then in hand, this court further stated:

That, "where the owner of one heritage consisting of several parts has so adapted them that one derives a benefit from the other, when he sells one of them without making mention of the incidental burdens of one in respect to the other, an implied understanding arises that the burdens and correlative advantages shall continue as before the separation of the title"—citing in support thereof Powers v. Heffernan, 138 Ill. App. 12; Denton v. Leddell, 23 N. J. Eq. 64; and the notes of Rollo v. Nelson, 96 P. 263, 34 Utah, 116, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 315.

The following additional cases from our own tribunals uphold the same doctrine: Jersey Farm Co. v. Atlanta Realty Co., 129 P. 593, 164 Cal. 413; Kallenburg v. Long, 179 P. 730, 39 Cal. App. 731; Nay v. Bernard, 180 P. 827, 40 Cal. App. 364; Palvutjian v. Terkanian, 190 P. 503, 47 Cal. App. 47. The foregoing doctrine as enunciated in Cheda v. Bodkin, supra, would seem to have direct application to the facts of the instant case as found by the trial court and which facts, in so far as they were matters in dispute during the trial of this cause, we think, were fully established by the evidence in the case.

[2] It is true, as insisted by the appellants, that James Miller, in his conveyance of parcel I to the Patent Brick Company, expressly reserved but one easement therein; that one being a limited easement for the benefit of parcel B of said tract referred to in the deed from Dickson et al. to Code. This fact, however, ought not, in our opinion, to outweigh the intention of the grantor in said conveyance to reserve for the use and benefit of the several other parcels of said tract retained in ownership by him the right theretofore existing and thereafter continuously asserted to the use of said roadway and Embarcadero as an easement or quasi easement appurtenant to all of said parcels of land and a continuing burden and servitude, both before and after said conveyance, upon parcel I thereof.

[3] It is the further contention of the appellants herein that the undisputed fact that the roadway in question did not lead entirely to the said several tracts of land to which said Miller after his conveyance to the Patent Brick Company retained the title, but only ran up to and ended in the public highway which separated parcel I, the servient tenement, from the other parcels in said tract, militates against the existence of any such easement as the plaintiff has insisted upon in this action. We do not perceive any particular merit in this contention. The public highway referred to was in existence and use during that early period when Timothy Murphy was the owner of the entire rancho; and, when he conveyed or devised the respective parcels thereof to those who became the separate owners thereof prior to the reuniting of the title to the several tracts of land in James Miller in 1870, the easements then created and thus existing in said several parcels of land inured to the benefit of said several tracts, notwithstanding the existence of said highway, and continued so to do after the uniting of title in Miller, and, so existing and so continuing as easements or quasi easements appurtenant to said several tracts of land, must be held to have been from their inception unaffected by the circumstance that a public highway separated said dominant tenement from the servient tenement after the same had passed under the separate ownership of said corporation and its successors.

[4] The final contention of the appellants herein seems to be that, since the Patent Brick Company and its successors in the ownership of parcel I not long after the acquisition thereof fenced the exterior boundaries of said parcel of land and established and maintained a gate at the point where said roadway entered the highway, its action in these regards constituted such an interference with the exercise of the easement which the plaintiff herein seeks to have established as to operate to destroy the same. This contention would have a considerable, if not, a controlling, persuasiveness, were it not for the fact that after the inclosure of said servient tenement by the owners thereof and the establishment and maintenance of the gate above referred to such gate was never locked and the owners of said dominant tenement continued as before in the use of said roadway and Embarcadero in the same manner and to the same extent as their predecessors had anciently used and enjoyed the same and that such unobstructed use and enjoyment continued down to a period shortly before the institution of the present action.

In view of the foregoing facts and of the law applicable thereto as applied by the trial court under the authority of Cheda v. Bodkin, supra, we are satisfied that no error was committed by the trial court in awarding its judgment in the plaintiff's favor.

Such judgment is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CARMICHAEL. (Cr. 2748.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 29, 1926.)

1. Homicide ☞250.

Conflicting evidence held to warrant conviction for manslaughter.

2. Criminal law ☞1166½(6)—Refusal to permit defendant to interrogate prospective juror, afterwards excused, as to his belief in right of self-defense, held not prejudicial, where defendant was permitted to examine all accepted jurors on such question.

Refusal to permit defendant to interrogate a prospective juror whether he believed in right of self-defense, which juror was afterwards excused, held not prejudicial, where defendant was permitted to fully examine all jurors on such question, who were finally accepted to try the case.

3. Criminal law ☞1166½(6)—Refusal to permit defendant to ask certain jurors whether they would compromise upon a verdict, and find defendant guilty of lesser offense, held not prejudicial, where question was permitted as to eight jurors accepted, and defendant did not further interrogate other jurors accepted, on such question.

Refusal to permit defendant to ask certain jurors whether they would compromise upon a verdict and find defendant guilty of a lesser offense, as long as they had a reasonable doubt of his guilt, held not prejudicial, where same question was answered without objection by eight of jurors who were finally accepted to try the case, and defendant expressed no desire to further interrogate the other four jurors accepted on such question.

4. Jury ☞131(8)—Defendant, if desiring to interrogate jurors tentatively passed by him, and to whom question had not been propounded as to their attitude regarding compromise verdict, should have done so, where court, in permitting question to be answered by other jurors, indicated that its previous attitude that question was improper had changed.

Where court, in permitting certain jurors to be questioned whether they would compromise upon a verdict and find defendant guilty of a lesser offense as long as they had a reasonable doubt of his guilt, indicated that it had changed its previous attitude that question was improper, defendant was required, if he desired to further interrogate four jurors tentatively passed by him, and to whom question had not been propounded, to have asked permission of court or to have proceeded without such permission to examine such jurors as to their attitude regarding a compromise verdict.

5. Criminal law ☞1186(4)—Refusal to permit defendant to interrogate jury as to what influence failure of former jury to agree upon a verdict would have upon their verdict held prejudicial error, since answer to question would have tended to show existence or non-existence of bias (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Refusal to permit defendant to interrogate jury relative to failure of former jury to agree upon a verdict, and what influence action of such jury would have upon their verdict, held prejudicial error, not harmless under Const. art. 6, § 4½, since answers would tend to show existence or nonexistence of bias, it being immaterial that defendant did not attempt to use any further peremptory challenges for purpose of excusing jurors finally sworn to try the case after exhausting all challenges allowed him by law.

6. Criminal law ☞1166½(6)—Error of court in refusing defendant permission to examine jurors as to result of former trial held not cured by answers of jurors to general questions.

Error of court in refusing defendant permission to examine jurors as to result of former trial held not cured by answers of accepted jurors to questions whether they had formed or expressed any opinion regarding defendant's guilt or innocence, whether they could give him a fair and impartial trial, and whether they had talked with any person purporting to be a witness in the case or a member of former jury.

7. Criminal law ☞304(2)—That result of jury failing to agree on a verdict becomes topic of general conversation within community held matter of general knowledge.

It is a matter of general knowledge that frequently result of a jury failing to agree upon a verdict becomes topic of general conversation within the community, and is subject of much comment and discussion.

8. Witnesses ☞268(1)—Cross-examination of witness as to threatening remarks of deceased held proper, where it was apparent that they were made in presence of defendant.

Cross-examination of witness, testifying on direct examination as to boisterous and threatening attitude of deceased towards other men, whether deceased did not say on afternoon of day that he was shot by defendant that night before he had been in a fight, and broken two ribs of a man, and smashed his nose, held proper, where it was apparent that remark was made in presence of defendant.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 1170(2)—Error in refusing to permit defendant to cross-examine witness for prosecution as to threatening statement by deceased held not cured by admission of defendant's own testimony as to same statement.

Error in refusing to permit defendant to cross-examine witness for prosecution whether deceased did not say on afternoon of day that he was shot by defendant that night before he had been in a fight, and injured a man, held not cured by admission of testimony of defendant himself that such statement was made by deceased in presence of defendant and others on same afternoon.

10. Criminal law $\S$ 829(1).

Refusal of defendant's proposed instructions held not erroneous, where covered by court's instruction.

11. Homicide $\S$ 300(5)—Instruction that to justify person killing another in self-defense it must appear that killing was "absolutely" necessary should omit word "absolutely" to avoid tendency to mislead.

Instruction that, to justify a person in killing another in self-defense, it must appear that killing of deceased by defendant was "absolutely" necessary held objectionable in use of quoted word, since there may be a justifiable homicide, where actual necessity for killing is not present.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Thomas Carmichael was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed.

W. E. Duncan, Jr., and Mrs. Alta Duncan Hengy, both of Oroville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. The appellant was charged with the crime of murder. The jury found him guilty of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment, and also from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The district Court of Appeal reversed the judgment, and the case comes before this court after an order granting a hearing herein. The facts in the case show substantially that the deceased met his death from a gunshot wound inflicted by the appellant on the 18th day of December, 1923. The homicide occurred at a place known as Bidwell Bar Canyon in the county of Butte. In this canyon the deceased, just prior to his death, was residing with his father, Thomas Lucas, in a small house owned by the latter. Appellant at the same time was living with one Joseph Bukal, in Bukal's house located near the Lucas place. The shooting occurred in the evening. On this day Bukal had been engaged in killing hogs in a shed or slaughterhouse belonging to Thomas Lucas, and located in the near vicinity of the respective houses of Lucas and Bukal. Besides Bukal, the appellant, the deceased, and Thomas Lucas, there were also present Oscar Carlson and a man named Stillwell. With the exception of Carlson, these men were all assisting Bukal in the slaughtering of the hogs. About 2 o'clock in the afternoon they finished their work and went up to the Bukal house for lunch. There, in addition to eating their lunch, they drank some wine furnished them by Bukal. They had also had a pitcher of wine at the slaughterhouse before lunch. The appellant drank very little of the wine, and Carlson did not drink any. The others imbibed more or less freely, especially the deceased and his father, who became to a perceptible extent under the influence of the wine. After lunch there was considerable boisterous conduct, called by some of the witnesses "horse play," in which the deceased unquestionably took the leading part. For some reason, probably from the effects of the wine, the deceased became quite boastful and demonstrative. He was a large man, over six feet three inches in height, and he appeared bent upon demonstrating his physical prowess. This was apparently done in a spirit of good feeling, and received by the other men in the same spirit. While many oaths and much foul language was employed, both by the deceased and his companions, there is nothing to indicate that the use of such oaths or language was for the purpose of expressing any ill feelings or anger on the part of any of the men. About 5 o'clock in the afternoon the men returned to the slaughterhouse for the purpose of preparing the hogs killed in the early part of the day for domestic use. Here the deceased continued his boisterous conduct towards other members of the party. This lasted for some time, but without any serious results, although some of the men, including the appellant, had been rather roughly handled by the deceased. In the meantime the appellant returned to the Bukal house. While in the house he could hear the men at the slaughterhouse, including the deceased, as he continued his threatening conduct towards the others. After listening to them for a short time, he armed himself with his pistol, and returned to the place where the men were. At the time of his arrival there, or shortly thereafter, the deceased had turned his attention to Bukal, who was a much older and smaller man than the deceased. Bukal had a lantern in his hand, and, fearing that it might be broken by the deceased, handed it to the appellant and started on a run towards his house. The appellant followed him, and behind both of them came the deceased. The latter was swearing and cursing the men in front of him, and Bukal, probably in a milder vein, replied to deceased in language far from complimentary. Finally the deceased said: "Go on, go on, go on to bed," and almost immediately thereafter four shots were fired in rapid succession. These shots, the evidence shows, were fired by the appellant, and resulted in the death of the deceased. No one saw either the appellant or the deceased at the precise time the shots were fired. Bukal, who was from 10 to 12 feet from the appellant at the time, testified that he heard three shots. When he heard the first shot, he turned around, and saw the deceased "tumble down at the side of the road, and then Carmichael run into the house." He also testified that the shots were "right one after the other," and that he did not see the appellant shoot, but the shots had all been fired when he turned around. Carlson, who was also only a short distance from the place where the men were at the time of the shooting, heard the deceased say: "Go on, go on, go on to bed," and, after a lapse of some seconds during which a few words were spoken that he could not understand, "rapidly after that three shots were fired right close together, one after another." All the witnesses, testifying on the subject, except the appellant, stated that they did not see the deceased have any weapon in his possession on that day. The appellant testified that the deceased during the day had a knife in his hand. The appellant, however, made no mention of the knife in the hand of the deceased to the sheriff or to the deputy sheriff of the county to whom he told his story a few hours after the shooting. He admitted, however, that he had fired four shots at the deceased, and claimed that the latter just before the shots were fired had rushed upon him and threatened to kill him, and that he shot deceased in defense of his own life. Dr. Whiting, who examined the body of the deceased about 10 hours after the shooting, testified that he found five bullet wounds upon the body. Two of these were in the right arm, and were caused by a bullet entering the back of the arm, and, passing along the axis of the arm, sharply downward, came out along the surface of the arm about 3 inches from the point of entrance. Another wound on the body was caused by a bullet entering the right side of the body about on the level of the tip of the twelfth rib. A bullet was found on the corresponding left side of the body at about the same level up and down and from the back to the front as the wound made by the bullet entering the right side of the body. This bullet was pointed in the outer direction, and was embedded next to the skin. The doctor could not say that this bullet was the same one that caused the wound just described. A fourth wound was found in the back of the body, and was caused by a bullet entering the body at a point about 2½ inches to the right of the middle of the spinal column, the middle of the back, in other words, and about 5 inches above the crest or tip of the hip. This bullet passed right through the body from backward to forward and to the left, and cut a crease in the front portion of the backbone at a level of the fourth lumbar or loin vertebræ, fracturing the body of the vertebræ, and cut into, and almost severed, the large aorta artery which lies in front of the vertebræ, and which carries the blood from the heart to the abdomen. The exit of this bullet was evidently the fifth wound found by the doctor upon the body of the deceased. The bullet found in the body was a 44 caliber steel jacket missile. Either of the wounds made by the two bullets last mentioned, in the opinion of the doctor, was sufficient to cause death, but the one made by the bullet entering the body from the back and cutting the aorta artery would cause death more rapidly. It would have caused death inside of 20 seconds. There was evidence given by the defendant himself, which, if believed by the jury, tended strongly to justify the appellant in slaying the deceased in self-defense. He also introduced depositions and other evidence from men of standing in the community in which he had lived, testifying to his good reputation.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the verdict of conviction. It is true that he tells a story to the jury which, if accepted by them at its full face value, would have justified a verdict of acquittal. But the evidence of other witnesses heretofore set forth is not such that this court can say that as a matter of law it fails to show the appellant blameless in the killing of the deceased. The jury, who heard all the evidence, both that in favor, and that against, the appellant, concluded that he was guilty of the crime of manslaughter. Their verdict, in our opinion, was based upon competent evidence adequate to support it, and should not be disturbed by this court on the ground of its insufficiency.

[2-4] The next contention of appellant is that the court erred in refusing to permit him to ask certain questions of prospective jurors upon their voir dire examination. Various assignments of error are made under this contention. Some of these assignments are entirely without merit. For instance, appellant assigns as error the refusal of the court to permit him to ask a prospective juror whether he believed in the right of self-defense. This question was asked juror Prince, the first juror interrogated regarding his qualifications to act in the case. An objection to this question was made by the prosecution, and sustained by the court, and thereupon the appellant stated to the court that he wished it understood that he desired to ask this question of each and every juror examined in the case, and in reply the court stated that it would be so understood. The juror Prince was subsequently excused, as were a large number of other members of the panel upon their voir dire examination. The twelve jurors, however, who were finally accepted to try the case, and who actually did so, notwithstanding the sustaining of the objection to the question asked of the juror Prince and the understanding between the court and counsel following said ruling, were all questioned fully by appellant, without objection, upon the subject of self-defense and as to their belief in this right by a person in danger of either death or great bodily injury. It is evident, therefore, that appellant was not in any way prejudiced by the refusal of the court to permit him to interrogate a prospective juror, afterwards excused, upon a matter concerning which he was permitted to fully examine all the jurors who were finally accepted to try the case. It is not even claimed by appellant that he was forced to use any of his peremptory challenges for the purpose of excusing juror Prince or any other juror whom the court refused to permit him to examine as to his belief in the right of self-defense. Another instance in which appellant claims that he was unduly limited in his voir dire examination of prospective jurors was the refusal of the court to permit him to ask certain jurors whether they would compromise upon a verdict and find the appellant guilty of a lesser offense as long as they had a reasonable doubt of his guilt. This question was also asked the juror Prince, and, upon objection, the court refused to permit him to answer it. A like understanding was had as that relating to the previous question that it might be understood that appellant desired to ask the same question of each and every juror examined in the case, and that the court would refuse to permit the same. While the court sustained an objection to this question when asked the juror Prince, subsequently, and after the voir dire examination of four of the jurors (finally accepted to try the case) had been concluded, the same question was asked and answered without objection by a number of other jurors called in the case, including eight of the jurors who were finally accepted to try the case. It must have become apparent to appellant that the court, in permitting this question to be answered by a large number of jurors during the progress of the trial, but subsequent to the examination of the juror Prince, had changed its attitude as to the propriety of asking this question. It was appellant's duty, therefore, if he desired to further interrogate the four jurors tentatively passed by him, and to whom this question had not been propounded, to have asked permission of the court, if any such permission were necessary, and if it were not, to have proceeded without such permission to examine these jurors as to their attitude regarding a compromise verdict. As the court, at least during the latter portion of the examination of the jury, was permitting this question to be asked of the jurors generally, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he would have granted appellant permission to have asked it of the four remaining jurors. No claim is made by appellant that he asked said question or any question similar thereto of any of said four jurors, or that he had sought leave of court so to do, or that the court refused him this right, except in so far as the court had expressed its attitude in this respect when it sustained the objection to a like question propounded to the juror Prince. It would be highly technical under these circumstances to hold that appellant was denied any substantial right to which he was entitled by the refusal of the court in the first instance to permit examination of the jurors in the respect complained of. His failure to further interrogate the four jurors must be taken as a waiver on his part of his right to do so, and he has now no just reason to complain. In a number of other instances, objections to questions asked by appellant to prospective jurors upon their voir dire were sustained by the court. We have carefully considered the rulings of the court in this respect and the claim of the appellant that he was prejudiced thereby. With one exception, which we will deal with at length hereafter, we are unable to agree with appellant that he sustained any substantial damage by the failure of the court to permit him to so examine said jurors.

[5] The one exception above referred to presents a more difficult, and, to our minds, a more serious, question. This was the second trial of the defendant upon the charge stated in the information. Upon the first trial the jury had disagreed, and for this reason they had been dismissed and the case reset for trial. Upon the present trial, after the first twelve persons summoned as jurors in the case had been called to the jury box, the attorney for the appellant sought to interrogate them relative to the failure of the former jury to agree upon a verdict, and what influence, if any, the action of the former jury would have upon their verdict. An objection to such inquiry was made by the prosecution and sustained by the court. Furthermore, the court forbade appellant from further mentioning the former jury to the members of the present jury, and, upon appellant's attorney stating to the court that he desired to ask certain questions of the jury relative to said subject, the court refused to permit him to ask any of such questions, but suggested that he might submit such questions in writing, as he desired to ask, to the reporter in the absence of the jury. The following proceedings show the action taken:

"Mr. Duncan (attorney for appellant): I wish it understood that I desire to ask these questions of each and every juror that may be called in the case, and I assume the court's ruling will be the same in each case?

"The Court: The same in each case.

"Mr. Duncan: And it may be understood for the purpose of the record?

"The Court: Yes.

"Mr. Duncan: And we may file with the reporter such questions as we may wish to ask?

"The Court: You may."

Some two weeks after the jury rendered its verdict, the attorney for appellant, pursuant to the above understanding, filed with the reporter the following list of questions:

"Do you know, or have you heard, that this case has already been tried before a jury in this court?

"Would the fact, if it be such, that the former jury trying the case had failed to agree prejudice you against the defendant?

"Did you know or have you heard how the jury trying this case stood on the question of 'Guilty' or 'Not guilty'?

"If you know, or have you heard that the former jury stood ten for guilty and two for not guilty, would that prejudice you in any way against the defendant?

"Do you recognize that evidence might be produced on this trial which was not brought out on the first trial?

"Do you think that your knowledge or information as to how the former jury stood, has left your mind as open and impartial as though you had never heard of the case?"

It is now contended by appellant that the court committed prejudicial error in refusing to permit him to interrogate the jurors by asking the above questions. It is not clear from the record upon just what theory the court sustained the objection of the prosecution. We think the questions were proper, as the answers thereto would tend to show the existence or nonexistence of actual bias on the part of the jurors with reference to the case then on trial. If any of the jurors had heard the result of the former trial, and that the jury therein had stood ten for conviction and two for acquittal, we do not think it unreasonable to conclude that such a juror might be influenced by such knowledge, and that he might well conclude that, if ten out of twelve of the former members of the jury believed the appellant guilty, there was a strong probability of his guilt. Persons entertaining such opinions, we think it must be conceded, are not, and cannot be, fair and impartial jurors such as one accused of crime is entitled to have pass upon the accusations against him. The only argument presented by the Attorney General to justify the ruling of the court in sustaining objections to these questions is that the appellant is not prejudiced thereby for the reason that the record shows that, although he had exhausted all of his peremptory challenges during the trial, he did not request or show any desire to use any one or more further peremptory challenges for the purpose of excusing any of the jurors who were finally sworn to try the case. In support of his position he cites the case of People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 576, 119 P. 920, 921. In that case the defendant challenged a juror for cause, which challenge the court denied. Thereupon the defendant peremptorily challenged him. On appeal the appellant claimed that the trial court erred in disallowing his challenge of the juror for cause. The court held that he was not prejudiced thereby, for the reason that, although he subsequently exhausted all of his peremptory challenges, "it does not appear that he had occasion or desire to use an additional peremptory challenge, or that each and all of the twelve jurors finally accepted and sworn were not entirely satisfactory to him." We cannot accept this case as an authority in the present action. The facts thereof are not in anyway analogous to those now before us. In that case the objectionable juror was excused, and no showing was made that any of those finally accepted to try the case were not satisfactory to the appellant. In the present action the appellant, by the rulings of the court sustaining objections to his questions, was denied the right to show that the jurors were objectionable to him. It would have been an idle act for him, therefore, to have asked for a further peremptory challenge after exhausting all allowed him by law, for the reason that, had the court granted him an additional challenge or any number of them, and had he exercised all that the court allowed, his position would in no way have been improved, for the reason that he would still be in the dark as to the state of mind of those jurors who might have heard of the result of the former trial, and there still might be among the jurors he was forced to accept one or more and possibly all of them who had heard of such result, and who entertained a belief that, by reason thereof, there was great probability of appellant's guilt. Other authorities expressing a similar rule to that found in People v. Schafer, supra, are cited in the petition for a hearing herein by the Attorney General, but, in our opinion, they are not more in point than is the Schafer Case.

[6, 7] Certain general questions were asked and answered by each of the jurors upon their voir dire examination. Among these questions was whether the juror had formed or expressed any opinion regarding the guilt or innocence of the defendant; whether he knew of any reason why he could not give the defendant a fair and impartial trial; and whether he would be willing to be tried by a jury "who felt towards you as you feel towards the defendant." The jurors all gave a negative answer to the first two questions, and an affirmative answer to the last one. Each juror was also asked whether he had talked with any person who purported to be a witness in the case or was a member of the former jury, and replied that he had not. It is contended by the respondent on this hearing that the error of the court, if any such error was made, in refusing to permit appellant to examine the jurors regarding the result of the former trial and as to their state of mind upon learning of such result, if any of them had learned of said result, was cured by these general and special questions asked of the jurors. We are not certain that this is the case. The asking of a general question of a juror does not always direct his attention to all the elements which go to make up the subject-matter of such question. For example, a juror in answer to a general question might state with perfect sincerity that he knew of no reason why he could not give the defendant a fair and impartial trial, but upon a further and more minute examination it might be shown that his conception of a fair and impartial trial for one who had been previously tried by a jury, ten of whom believed him guilty, differed in many material respects from that which the law accords to all persons accused of crime. Furthermore, he might presume the defendant innocent until proven guilty, but his state of mind might be such that it would require less evidence to convince him of defendant's guilt in a case where the latter had been previously tried with the result as above indicated than if no previous trial had been had. He might be in perfect accord with the law which declares that a defendant shall not suffer conviction until proven guilty beyond all reasonable doubt, but having heard that the former jury stood ten to two for conviction, he might not feel called upon to scrutinize and weigh the evidence with that extreme care and caution which the law enjoins of every juror in passing upon the life and liberty of one against whom a criminal accusation has been made. We are not satisfied, therefore, that the error of the court in refusing permission to appellant to examine the jurors as to the result of the former trial was cured by the answers of the jurors to these general questions. Nor do we think that their statements that they had not talked with any of the former jurors or persons purporting to be witnesses in the case necessarily indicated that they had not heard of the result of the former trial. There were other means through which they could have gained this information than through the former jurors and witnesses in the case. We all know as a matter of general knowledge that frequently the result of a jury failing to agree upon a verdict becomes the topic of general conversation in the community, and is the subject of much comment and discussion. It is not unreasonable to suppose that this case, where the defendant was on trial for murder, attracted the attention of the public at large, and that the failure of the jury to agree at the first trial became the topic of general conversation, and that the standing of the jury was known generally by the public. It would have been somewhat unusual, then, if some of the jurors, and possibly all of them, had not heard that the first jury stood ten to two for conviction, and to gain this information it would not have been necessary for any of them to have talked with the members of the former jury, or with any of the witnesses in the case. The answers of the jurors, therefore, that they had not talked with the former jurors or any person purporting to be a witness in the case did not necessarily show that they had not heard how the former jury stood, and did not in our opinion cure the error of the court in denying the appellant the right to interrogate the jurors upon that subject.

The Attorney General contends that the method adopted by the court in permitting the appellant to file with the court reporter a list of questions which he desired to ask of prospective jurors was hardly fair to the prosecuting attorney, and that it would not be assumed that he would object to questions which he had not seen, and which, in fact, had no existence as far as the record goes until long after the trial. We agree that this practice is not usual, and, in our opinion, it has little to commend it for favorable consideration. But any defect which might be attributed to it cannot be chargeable to the appellant. He simply followed the suggestion made to him and which afforded to him the only means whereby he could perfect his rights and present a record of the proceedings had at the trial to the appellate court.

No authority has been called to our attention which can be construed as holding that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution can be relied upon to sustain the judgment herein. As we have already said, in our opinion it was prejudicial error for the court to refuse the appellant the right to examine the jurors as to the effect on their minds of the standing of the former jury. The ruling of the court in thus limiting the appellant in his examination of the jurors was, in our opinion, the deprivation of the appellant of a fundamental right—a right to be tried by an impartial jury. It was never intended by this provision of the Constitution to take from the defendant in a criminal action his fundamental right to a jury trial or in any substantial manner to abridge this right. People v. Wismer, 58 Cal. App. 679, 688, 209 P. 259.

[8, 9] Oscar Carlson, who was a witness for the prosecution, testified to many of the events which took place on the day of the tragedy, both at the Bukal home and later at the slaughterhouse, between the appellant, the deceased, and other members of the party, and particularly as to the boastful and boisterous conduct of the deceased and his threatening attitude towards the other men. He detailed the conversations that took place on these occasions between the deceased and the others, quoting largely, as he remembered them, the exact words used by the different members of the company. On cross-examination the appellant asked this witness whether the deceased did not say on the afternoon of the day of the shooting that the night before he had been in a fight and broken two ribs of a man and smashed his nose. This question was objected to by the prosecution, and the objection sustained by the court. The ground upon which the court apparently sustained the objection was that it was not proper cross-examination. In view of the direct testimony of this witness, in which he was permitted to give all that he heard and saw on that afternoon regarding what took place between the men, we think this question was not subject to the objection that it was not cross-examination. While it is not entirely clear from the language of the question that this remark was made in the presence of the appellant, yet, in the direct examination of this witness in which he detailed the transactions of the day, he invariably included the appellant as among those present at the various conversations which the deceased carried on with the others. We think it must have been apparent from what had preceded that, at the time the question was asked, it was the intention to prove that the deceased made the remarks attributed to him in the presence of the appellant. If made in the presence of the appellant, the statement was material, and might have had an important bearing upon his plea of self-defense. We think the question was properly asked upon cross-examination, and that the court erred in sustaining the objection. We cannot agree with respondent that this error was cured by the admission of the testimony of the appellant himself to the effect that this same statement was made by the deceased in the presence of himself and others on the afternoon of the day of the tragedy. The appellant was entitled to prove by disinterested witnesses, if he could, that the deceased made the statement attributed to him. It might be that the jury would hesitate to accept the uncorroborated evidence of a defendant in a case, when, if his testimony were supported by the evidence of a disinterested witness, they might take an entirely different attitude toward it. The cases cited by respondent do not go to the extent claimed for them, nor support the contention that the error complained of was cured by the subsequent testimony of the appellant.

There are other assignments of error involved in the rulings of the court as to the admission and rejection of evidence. They are not, however, of any serious consequence, and we do not consider it necessary to refer to them in detail.

[10] The court refused to give any of the instructions proposed by appellant. The judge of the court did, however, in instructions prepared with great care by himself, instruct the jury fully upon the law applicable to the case. We think these instructions covered all the matters upon which the jury were required to be informed, and that there was no error in refusing the proposed instructions of appellant. The appellant criticizes the instructions prepared and given by the court, and insists that in many respects they failed to correctly state the law applicable to the case. We think on the whole these criticisms are not well founded.

[11] We are, however, in accord with the opinion of Mr. Justice Hart, the writer of the decision rendered by the Court of Appeal of the Third District in this case, in which the court says:

"One of the given instructions, however, is to some extent subject to the criticism urged against it by counsel for the defendant—not that we think that it does not, when rightly read and understood, contain a correct statement of the rule, but for the reason that the word 'absolutely,' as used therein, might render it misleading to the average lay mind. The instruction states, 'to justify a person in killing another in self-defense, it must appear that the danger, either real or apparent, was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life or Bukal's life, or to prevent himself or Bukal receiving great bodily harm, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary.' The word 'absolutely' might have the effect of leading jurors to believe that, to bring it within the right of self-defense, the act of killing must have actually been necessary. Such an impression of the law would, of course, be erroneous, since there may be a justifiable homicide where the actual necessity for killing is not present. If the circumstances be such as to excite the fears of a reasonable person, and it appears that the party killing 'acted under the influence of such fears alone,' then the slaying is justified, although it may thereafter transpire that there existed no real ground for such fears. Of course, if such fears existed, then, apparently, the killing would be as 'absolutely' necessary as it would be if the danger of death or bodily harm at the hands of the assailant were actual. In the latter sense the criticized portion of the instruction was undoubtedly intended to be understood by the court. However, the elimination of the word 'absolutely' in the connection in which it is used in the instruction under review is recommended."

For the reasons stated herein, the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed.

(246 P.)

CITY OF ALAMEDA v. CITY OF OAKLAND.
(S. F. 11762.)(Supreme Court of California. April 29, 1926.
Modified and Rehearing Denied
May 27, 1926.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞25 — Prayer, in boundary dispute between Alameda and Oakland, held to warrant judgment fixing boundary as down center of San Antonio creek and along deepest channel to westerly boundary of Alameda county (St. 1878, p. 89; St. 1889, p. 513; St. 1907, p. 1051; St. 1921, p. 1607).

In boundary dispute between city of Alameda and Oakland, brought under St. 1921, p. 1607, prayer of former that boundary be established as embodied in its charter, which specified portion of boundary in dispute as "along center line of Tidal canal and the north or Brooklyn channel through Oakland Harbor and the center line of San Antonio estuary to its mouth" held to warrant judgment describing boundary line as "down the center of San Antonio creek and along the deepest water channel to the westerly boundary of Alameda county," in view of evidence and St. 1878, p. 89, St. 1889, p. 513, and St. 1907, p. 1051, that phrase, "and along the deepest water channel thereof," is but an amplification of the phrase, "center of San Antonio creek."

2. Municipal corporations ☞25—Boundary between city of Alameda and Oakland held established by acquiescence in center of San Antonio estuary and along the deepest water channel.

Boundary between city of Alameda and Oakland held established by acquiescence in center of San Antonio estuary and along the deepest water channel, where its location was uncertain and indefinite, and charters of both cities recognized boundary as established in center of estuary, and city of Alameda for years actually exercised jurisdiction over disputed territory in both a governmental and proprietary capacity, without any protest or adverse claim of right on part of Oakland.

3. Trial ☞391—Decision is not against law because findings of fact are silent as to validity or construction of statutes.

Decision of boundary dispute between municipalities is not against law because findings are silent on questions of constitutionality or construction of statutes; such being questions of law as to which findings of fact were unnecessary.

4. Municipal corporations ☞24—State, in fixing boundary between Alameda and Oakland and in approving their charters, is deemed to have acted for benefit of public.

State, in passing statutes fixing boundary between Alameda and Oakland and in approving freeholders' charters of such cities, is deemed to have acted in manner most conducive to public welfare.

5. Navigable waters ☞37(8)—Cities on either shore have natural right of access and privilege to construct wharves, docks, piers, and other aids to commerce.

Cities located on either side of navigable estuary have a natural right to unrestricted access to it and the privilege of constructing wharves, docks, piers, and other aids to commerce.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by the City of Alameda against the City of Oakland. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Markell C. Baer, Asst. City Atty., both of Oakland, for appellant.

Wm. J. Locke, City Atty., of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal by the city of Oakland from a judgment defining and establishing that portion of the boundary line between the cities of Oakland and Alameda running westerly from the Park street bridge in the San Antonio estuary to the boundary line of the city and county of San Francisco.

On the 1st day of March, 1922, the city of Alameda filed its petition in the superior court in and for the county of Alameda, pursuant to an act of the Legislature, entitled, "An Act to provide for determining, defining and establishing the location of the boundary lines of cities, towns, counties, or cities and counties, where the same are indefinite or uncertain or have been obliterated." Stats. 1921, p. 1607. In the special proceeding thus authorized and initiated, the city of Alameda set forth in its petition such facts and exhibits as were deemed pertinent, relevant, and essential to a proper determination of the matter, all as required by said act. It was alleged that both of said cities are situated in the county of Alameda on the eastern shore of San Francisco bay, and lie on either side of a narrow arm of salt water extending easterly from the bay for about 4 miles, then continuing in the form of an oval-shaped basin for approximately one mile, from whence it extends about 4 miles further through an artificial canal and connects with another part of the bay of San Francisco known as San Leandro Bay; that the westerly 4 miles of said arm of salt water is known as "San Antonio estuary"; that the oval-shaped basin at the easterly end of said estuary is known as "Tidal basin," also as north or "Brooklyn basin"; that the artificial canal at the easterly end of said basin is known as the "Tidal canal"; that the city of Oakland lies on the northerly side of said estuary, basin, and canal, and that the city of Alameda lies on the southerly side thereof; that, until improved, the said San Antonio estuary was shallow and had very irregular shore lines, with numerous sloughs and branches running therefrom; that the largest of said sloughs or branches ran northerly from a point near the eastern end of the estuary and connected with a body of salt water in the city of Oakland known as Lake Merritt; that about 4 miles east of its mouth said estuary made an irregular curve northerly, easterly, and southerly on an approximate radius of 2,500 feet, passing round an irregular shaped peninsula of high land in the city of Alameda, which formerly protruded northerly from the central portion of said city.

The petition then set forth by reference the Act of May 4, 1852, originally incorporating the town of Oakland by special enactment (Stats. 1852, p. 180), the Act of March 25, 1854, incorporating the city of Oakland also by special enactment (Stats. 1854, p. 183), the Act of May 15, 1861, amending the Act of March 25, 1854 (Stats. 1861, p. 384), the Act of April 24, 1862, also amending the Act of March 25, 1854 (Stats. 1862, p. 337), the concurrent resolution filed in the office of the secretary of state on February 14, 1889, approving the first freeholders' charter of the city of Oakland (Stats. 1889, p. 513), and a similar resolution filed on February 15, 1911, approving the new and present charter of the city of Oakland (Stats. 1911, p. 1551).

It further appears from the petition that the town of Alameda was originally incorporated by special enactment approved April 19, 1854 (Stats. 1854, p. 209). It was reincorporated by special act approved February 21, 1878 (Stats. 1878, p. 89). The first freeholders' charter of the city of Alameda was approved by the Legislature on February 7, 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 1051), and the second charter, which is now in effect, was approved January 25, 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1752).

In the prayer of the petition it was sought to have said boundary line established as the same was set forth in the charter of the city of Alameda approved January 25, 1917. The pertinent part of that description, so far as the present controversy is concerned, is as follows:

"Commencing at a point where the center line of the Tidal canal intersects the western line of Park street produced northerly; thence westerly along the center line of the Tidal canal and the north or Brooklyn channel, through Oakland Harbor and the center line of San Antonio estuary to its mouth, as said Brooklyn channel and pierhead lines of San Antonio estuary were established by the United States Harbor Line Survey of one thousand nine hundred ten; thence along the center line of San Antonio estuary produced westerly to its intersection with the western boundary of Alameda county."

In its answer, the city of Oakland alleged that the southern boundary of said city "is located and lies in said estuary, basin, and channel and that the major portion of said basin and channel lies north of said southern boundary and within the territorial limits of said city of Oakland." It also denied that said irregularly shaped peninsula of high land mentioned in the petition, was within the limits of the city of Alameda. Additional allegations were set forth in the answer with reference to the legal effect of certain statutes above referred to.

The court found that the said cities are situated on either side of the center and deepest water channel of the San Antonio estuary. It also found: That the said peninsula was entirely within the city of Alameda. "That pursuant to an Act of Congress of March 3, 1905, 33 Stat. 1117, 1142, amended March 2, 1907, 34 Stat. 1073, 1106, the United States of America, as part of a system of harbor improvements, cut a channel through and across the neck of said peninsula and deposited the spoil dredged therefrom on or about the point of said peninsula, thereby creating the artificial island shown on" certain maps filed as exhibits in the case. "That Oakland and Alameda were each incorporated three different times under the old Constitution by special acts of the Legislature, the last of which was an act incorporating the city of Alameda on February 21, 1878. * * * That said act described the boundaries of Alameda as being 'the same as now form the said township of Alameda.' That the township boundaries thus adopted by reference were those which had been established by the board of supervisors of Alameda county six weeks before, to wit, on January 5, 1878, wherein that portion of the boundary line involved in this proceeding was described as being 'the center of San Antonio creek and along the deepest water channel.' That this Act of February 21, 1878, * * * by which Alameda was incorporated for the last time prior to the adoption of the new Constitution, was never repealed. That that portion of the boundary line involved in this proceeding has never been changed by the annexation or exclusion of territory under the general laws of the state or otherwise, and that a line along 'the center of San Antonio creek and along the deepest water channel,' as described in Alameda's incorporation of 1878, has never been disclaimed as being the same line referred to in all the freeholders' charters adopted by both cities since that time. That said line is shown and delineated on Plaintiff's Exhibit K and is particularly described as follows, to wit: [Then follows the said description by courses and distances.] That ever since its incorporation of February 21, 1878, aforesaid, the city of Alameda has exercised undisputed jurisdiction in a governmental and proprietary capacity over all the territory lying immediately south of said line, while the city of Oakland has never exercised or attempted to exercise jurisdiction of any kind or character whatsoever over said territory." As a conclusion of law, the court decided that the act of 1878, incorporating the city of Alameda and describing its boundaries, was constitutional and valid, and established the boundary line between the said cities, and that said boundary line as so established is the line described by courses and distances in the findings of fact, and that said line had been lawfully established by reason of the long acquiescence therein and its recognition by citizens, taxpayers, and public officials.

[1] It is first insisted by the city of Oakland that the judgment is at variance with the prayer of the petition. As above stated, Alameda prayed that the boundary be established as embodied in the Alameda city charter of 1917, which specified the portion of the boundary in dispute as "along the center line of the Tidal canal and the north or Brooklyn channel, through Oakland Harbor and the center line of San Antonio estuary to its mouth." In its findings of fact and conclusions of law the court found and decided that the said line was that established by the act of 1878, which described the boundary line as "down the center of San Antonio creek and along the deepest water channel to the westerly boundary of Alameda county." In its answer the city of Oakland prayed that its boundary be established as that set forth in its charter approved February 14, 1889. This charter specified the said boundary as "following the center of the slough and the center of the estuary of San Antonio," without adding the phrase "along the deepest water channel" as contained in the act of 1878. Counsel for the city of Oakland state:

"Were it not for the addition of the phrase 'along the deepest water channel,' no difficulty would have arisen in this case because, as hereafter pointed out, under the charter of 1889 the southern boundary of Oakland was fixed in the center of San Antonio creek. But the addition of the phrase 'along the deepest water channel' makes this boundary line antagonistic to Oakland's boundary line of 1889."

The argument is that:

"The phrase 'center of San Antonio creek' would be the center of the entire body of water known as San Antonio creek inclosed within the banks of said creek, while the phrase 'along the deepest water channel' means along the deepest water channel, which may or may not be the same as along the entire channel inclosed within the banks. The two phrases are therefore, to a certain extent, antagonistic, and the second qualifies the first and limits the boundary to the center of the deepest water channel of San Antonio creek as distinguished from the center of the entire body of water between the banks."

It is the contention of the city of Alameda that the phrase, "and along the deepest water channel thereof," is but an amplification of the phrase "center of San Antonio creek"; in other words, that the two phrases were intended to convey one and the same meaning. The trial court adopted the theory of the city of Alameda, and in so doing was supported by the evidence adduced. Mr. Burnett Hamilton, city engineer of the city of Alameda, testified that he had prepared the description of the boundary line which was later adopted by the court as the true line. In connection with his testimony, a map was offered and received in evidence on which the witness had platted the center line of the San Antonio estuary approximately as it was located in 1889, and indicated the same by courses and distances by a red line drawn equidistant between the pierhead lines as established by the United States government engineers. He testified that before dredging and reclamation work had been done in the estuary it spread out at high tide over marsh lands and tidelands on either side and that the marsh lands had been filled in so that the estuary now lies within well-defined banks. From his observation and experience as an engineer, and from the record evidence in the case, he testified that:

"The center of the estuary and the deepest water channel is approximately in the same condition to-day as it was in 1878 and 1889. * * * As near as possible the line was located midway between the pierhead lines with the idea of getting as near as may be the center of the deepest water of the channel. Because the pierhead lines usually extend out to the channel of deep water, a line midway between them would be in the deepest water of the channel as nearly as could be determined. If this red line which I have indicated on my map here were established in any other course or at any other place, it would not, to the best of my knowledge, run along the deepest water of the channel. * * * This line which I have established, indicated on this map, designated as Plaintiff's Exhibit K, depicting the fact that it is midway apparently in many cases between the pierhead lines, is established in the center of the estuary and along the deepest water of the channel as near as I can establish it. * * * By the phrase 'center of the channel' I mean the center of the deepest water channel."

The foregoing and other evidence, both oral and documentary, which need not be specifically referred to, was sufficient to warrant the conclusion that when the act of 1878 defined the boundary of the town of Alameda as running down "the center of San Antonio creek and along the deepest water channel," and when the first charter of the city of Oakland, approved February 14, 1889, defined said boundary as "following the center of the slough and the center of the estuary of San Antonio," and when the first freeholders' charter of the city of Alameda, approved February 7, 1907, defined said boundary line as following the "center line of the Tidal canal," in each case one and the same line in the description was referred to and was intended by both cities and by the Legislature to be the boundary line between the said cities. If, then, the statute of 1878 and the charters of 1889 and 1907 described the same boundary line, the trial court was justified in concluding, in fact was compelled to conclude, that the said boundary line was not only the legal boundary line of the city of Alameda as contended for by it, but was also the legal boundary line described in the Oakland charter of 1889 as contended for by that city. It but remained for the court to ascertain as a matter of fact the actual location of the legal boundary line. County of Sierra v. County of Nevada, 155 Cal. 1, 99 P. 371. This it did by the aid of competent evidence before it. The fact that there was also evidence before the court on behalf of the city of Oakland which might be construed as contradicting the evidence upon which the court based its conclusions would not warrant a reversal of the judgment on the ground that the findings were unsupported. There is therefore no substantial variance between the prayer of the petition and the judgment. In fact, an examination of the judgment discloses that the boundary line is fixed by a definite description by courses and distances, without reference to the provisions of any statute or charter referred to in the pleadings. This form of the judgment was appropriate under the statute pursuant to which these proceedings were taken.

The greater portion of the peninsula of high land mentioned in the petition as "protruding northerly along said Tidal basin from the center portion of said city" of Alameda is now an island known as "Government Island." This island was created by dredging operations and cutting an artificial channel along the southerly portion of the peninsula, terminating at both ends in the estuary, and in dredging out the north or Brooklyn channel. The city engineer testified that the original northerly boundary of the city of Alameda, following the Peralta grant line, extended entirely around the peninsula, and in this statement he was corroborated by other evidence. It is obvious that the dredging of this artificial channel would not in and of itself have the effect of excluding the island created thereby from the territorial limits of the city of Alameda, if said island was theretofore in the city of Alameda, or of including the island in the city of Oakland if it was not theretofore included. Prior to the adoption of the first Alameda charter of 1907 there was only one channel in the estuary, and the description in that charter was therefore properly caused to follow "the center line of the Tidal canal," but between 1907 and the adoption of the second charter of Alameda, in 1917, the federal government had cut the new channel across the neck of the peninsula. It was therefore properly deemed necessary to specify in the second charter which of the two channels was the boundary line, and the description was accordingly caused to proceed along "the center line of the Tidal canal and the north or Brooklyn channel."

In its answer, the city of Oakland denied the validity and constitutionality of the Act of February 21, 1878, in so far as said act purported to include within the boundaries of the town of Alameda any territory already included in the town of Oakland under the Act of May 15, 1861, and the Act of April 24, 1862, which specified the boundary of the city of Oakland as "along the eastern and southern highest tide line of said slough, and of the estuary of San Antonio." It is the position of the city of Oakland that, as it had jurisdiction under the acts of 1861 and 1862 to the southern high tide line of the estuary, it was not competent for the Legislature by the act of 1878 to include within the boundary of Alameda the strip between the center of the estuary and the southerly high tide line, and that the act of 1878 was therefore unconstitutional to that extent, under the authority of Petition of East Fruitvale Sanitary District, 158 Cal. 453, 111 P. 368. It may be assumed that, even under the Constitution of 1849, the Legislature could not, by special act or otherwise, include a portion of the territory of one municipality within the limits of another municipality, but it would not necessarily follow that under the facts presented in this case the judgment should be reversed. Subsequent legislation, adjudications, and facts shown in evidence have rendered the alleged conflict between the acts of 1861 and 1862, on the one hand, and the act of 1878, on the other, quite immaterial. It was held in the case of Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Company, 118 Cal. 160, 50 P. 277, that by the proper construction of the original act of incorporation of the town of Oakland of May 4, 1852, the southerly line of San Antonio creek or estuary intended by the act was the line of low tide and not the high tide line, and that the act of 1854, inferentially, and the acts of 1861 and 1862, by direct language, purporting to extend the southern boundary of the city of Oakland to the "high" and "highest" tide lines, were nugatory. True, the case just cited primarily involved conflicting claims to real estate and the land granted to the town of Oakland by the original act of incorporation, but incidentally and necessarily it also involved the location of the boundary line. The determination in that case therefore resulted in the alleged overlapping of the territory of the two municipalities only to the extent of a strip of land between the center of the estuary and the southerly low tide line, a strip of land completely and continuously covered by water.

It is noted that the Oakland charter of 1889 fixed the southern boundary along "the center of slough and the center of estuary of San Antonio," thus contracting its southern boundary by eliminating the strip of submerged land and constituting the alleged overlap. It was observed in People v. Oakland Water Front Company, 118 Cal. 234, 50 P. 305, that more recent legislation (presumably the Oakland charter of 1889) had "contracted the southern boundary of Oakland so as to exclude from its limits the southern half of the estuary, and this amounts to a renunciation on the part of the city and resumption by the state of the control of so much of the grant as may have been covered by the excluded portion of the city." It seems to be conceded by all parties that there was not in effect at the time of the approval by the Legislature of the Oakland charter of 1889 any law of the state prohibiting a municipality from contracting its boundary and thus excluding a portion of its territory in the manner pursued by the city of Oakland, viz., by the adoption of a freeholders' charter. But it is insisted by the city of Oakland that the existence of general laws of the state, particularly the act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 358), prescribing the mode and manner of changing the boundaries of municipal corporations, including the annexation of territory thereto, was an effectual bar to the inclusion of said strip of land in the city of Alameda through the medium of the description of the boundaries of that city as included in its freeholders' charter adopted in 1907. The answer of the city of Alameda is that the city of Oakland is not in the position to raise this question by reason of long acquiescence in the location of the boundary as contended for by the city of Alameda. The rejoinder of the city of Oakland is that, while the doctrine of long acquiescence is admittedly applicable in cases where the location of the boundary line is indefinite and uncertain, there is no uncertainty in the description in this case, and consequently no occasion for the application of the doctrine of acquiescence.

[2] The contention of the city of Alameda must be sustained. This proceeding is predicated on uncertainty and indefiniteness in the location of the boundary line. The act under which it was taken provides for a proceeding thereunder only when the location of the boundary lines of the city are "indefinite or uncertain or have been obliterated." No objection has been made that this proceeding was not properly taken under that act. The issues presented in this case from the standpoint of both the law and the facts were properly the subject of legitimate controversy because of the uncertainty of the location of said boundary line, and were therefore the proper subject of the application of the doctrine of acquiescence. McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, vol. 1, § 260; 28 Cyc. 182; People v. Town of Antioch, 17 Cal. App. 751, 121 P. 945; Belknap v. City of Louisville, 93 Ky. 444, 20 S. W. 309; Louisiana v. Mississippi, 202 U. S. 1, 26 S. Ct. 408, 50 L. Ed. 913. The latest exposition of the doctrine of acquiescence, with its application to an interesting state of facts in the consideration of the present controversy, is found in Michigan v. Wisconsin, 46 S. Ct. 290, 70 L. Ed. —, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States on March 1, 1926. There can be no question of the efficacy of the rule in cases properly coming within its purview.

What, then, are the facts in this case, which bring it within the rule? It is to be remembered that from the first incorporation of the town of Alameda, in 1854, the boundary line in dispute was always designated as along the center of the San Antonio estuary. The first statute was an attempt on the part of the Legislature to fix the boundary line at that location, and would constitute some recognition on the part of the state that such was the boundary. The same may be said of the statutes of 1872 and 1878, reincorporating the town. We then find the first freeholders' charter of the city of Oakland fixing the boundary of that city in the center of the estuary. It would be difficult to imagine a more solemn recognition and acquiescence on the part of the city of Oakland of the location of said boundary than by the vote of its people in adopting its freeholders' charter in 1889. The approval of that charter by the Legislature in the same year is persuasive of the acquiescence of the state in that location of the boundary line. A like situation was presented when the new and present charter of the city of Oakland was adopted by the people of that city in 1911 and approved by the Legislature in the same year, fixing in effect, but with slightly different wording, the boundary line in the center of the estuary. From the very beginning of the town of Alameda as a municipal corporation, in 1854, to the adoption of its latest charter, in 1917, its northern city boundary of record was the center of the estuary. During all that time the city of Alameda would seem to have possessed a colorable claim to its boundary in that location, and the contraction by the city of Oakland of its boundary to that line in 1889 was a recognition by Oakland that such was the true line at that time. And since 1889 the state has unquestionably acquiesced in the attitude of both cities as to their common boundary line.

Furthermore, it appears that the city of Alameda for years has actually exercised jurisdiction over the territory in dispute in both a governmental and a proprietary capacity. It has levied and collected taxes without protest on the property located in said territory. It has furnished light and power from its municipal lighting plant in said territory. The police and fire departments of the city of Alameda have served this territory. All of these conditions have existed without any protest or adverse claim of right on the part of Oakland, until long after the creation of Government Island by the construction of said artificial canal. It would seem to follow, and we do readily conclude, that the facts herein presented satisfy the requirements of the long acquiescence rule. It is also apparent that the trial court was justified in concluding that the boundary line of the city of Alameda, as originally established and as later confirmed and acquiesced in, and as determined by the judgment herein, did not depend upon nor was it referable for its location to any general law of the state concerning the annexation or exclusion of territory.

[3] In the answer of the city of Oakland, it denied the constitutionality of the statute of February 21, 1878, incorporating the town of Alameda for the third time; it alleged that the Legislature by that statute never intended to include in Alameda the territory in dispute; denied the validity of Alameda's charter of 1917 in so far as it purported to include Government Island by more particular description. It is insisted that the findings are silent upon the issues thus tendered, and that such failure to find thereon renders the decision against law. We think the said denials and allegations presented questions of law to be determined on a consideration of the statutes, and upon which no finding of fact was necessary. It was also denied in Oakland's answer that the deepest water channel in the San Antonio estuary was in the location shown by Alameda's maps, nor was it in any other location than as shown by its map, and complaint is made because a specific finding was not made upon that issue as tendered. There is no merit in the contention for the reason that said issue was necessarily found upon in favor of the city of Alameda when the court found the location of the disputed boundary line as the ultimate fact to be determined.

[4, 5] In conclusion, it may be well to say that we are convinced that the findings and judgment of the trial court were in harmony with the requirements and necessities of both municipalities. The state acts for the public good, and, in passing the statutes above referred to and in approving the freeholders' charters of the cities involved herein, the state is deemed to have acted in a manner most conducive to the public welfare. The city of Oakland as incorporated was situated on one side of a navigable estuary, and the city of Alameda as incorporated was situated on the other side. It must be assumed that each was entitled to equal consideration at the hands of the state.

"These communities * * * had a natural right to * * * this body of navigable water, to unrestricted access to its shores, and to the privilege of constructing wharves, docks, piers, and other aids to commerce. * * *" Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co., 118 Cal. 160, 172, 50 P. 277, 281.

In fixing the boundary line, by competent and sufficient evidence as we have concluded, in the center of the estuary and along the deepest water channel, the judgment of the trial court would seem to have conserved that natural right.

The judgment is affirmed.

Verdict of jury on conflicting evidence must be accepted as conclusive by appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action by C. W. Burner against the American Bar Quartz Mining Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hiram W. Johnson, Jr., and Carl E. Day, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Raglan Tuttle and Fred P. Tuttle, Jr., both of Auburn, and Dixon L. Phillips, of Oakland, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff to recover the sum of $2,500 as damages for failure of the defendant to receive and pay for 65,000 board feet of lumber. Plaintiff had judgment for the sum of $1,400. Defendant appeals. The complaint, among other things, alleges as follows:

"That during the year 1923 plaintiff and defendant made and entered into a contract or agreement as follows: Defendant ordered from plaintiff 130,000 board feet of lumber, to be cut into such sizes and lengths as defendant might desire, and defendant agreed to pay for the same at the rate of $35 per thousand feet, and to be delivered at the mill of plaintiff. Plaintiff accepted said order as aforesaid.

"That plaintiff immediately thereafter proceeded to saw and cut said lumber, and defendant proceeded to take delivery of the same, and hauled away from said mill 65,000 board feet of lumber.

"That defendant has failed, neglected, and refused, and still refuses, to take delivery of the balance of said lumber so ordered by him, to wit, 65,000 board feet, and has failed, neglected, and refused, and still refuses, to pay plaintiff for the balance of said lumber so ordered by it.

"That, by reason of the aforesaid acts of said defendant, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $2,500, and neither said sum or any part thereof has been paid."

To this complaint the defendant interposed a demurrer worded as follows:

"That said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and especially and particularly in this: (1) That the alleged executory contract or agreement is insufficient and indefinite as to the kind, character, or quality of lumber to be cut, or the dimensions thereof; (2) that it does not state whether or not the balance of the lumber, to wit, 65,000 feet was or not cut.

"That said complaint is uncertain, for the reasons and upon the grounds hereinbefore assigned, and in addition thereto as follows: (1) That it cannot be determined therefrom what is meant or intended by the allegation in paragraph 11 'to be into such lengths and sizes as defendant might desire'; (2) that it cannot be ascertained or determined therefrom whether the alleged refusal of defendant to accept the balance of the lumber was before or after the same had been cut; (3) that said complaint is indefinite as to whether plaintiff relies upon the alleged contract, or its alleged breach."

The defendant's demurrer being overruled, an answer was filed in which the defendant, after making denials, for further defense alleged as follows:

"That in the year 1923 said plaintiff and this defendant entered into a mutual agreement whereby the former agreed to manufacture and deliver at his mill, in said county and state, and defendant agreed to accept and pay therefor at the rate of $35 per thousand board feet, all necessary and suitable building lumber for the erection and construction of certain buildings then in contemplation, and about to be constructed and erected by defendant, upon its mining properties nearby the mill and plant of the plaintiff; that there was no agreement or understanding either as to the amount that would be required for such construction, or that the plaintiff would manufacture or defendant receive, accept, and pay for, other than plaintiff would manufacture and deliver at his mill, as aforesaid, necessary and suitable lumber for the construction and erection of such buildings."

By reference to the allegations of the complaint and the paragraph of the defendant's answer herein set forth, it will be seen that the only issue between the parties is as to the number of feet of lumber ordered, the refusal of the defendant to accept and pay for all of the lumber, and the amount of damages.

[1] Under the circumstances pertaining to this case the vendor of the lumber would ordinarily have three remedies: (1) Standing strictly upon the sale, retain the property for the vendee, and sue the vendee for the purchase price; (2) acting as agent of the vendee, the vendor might sell the property and then sue to recover the difference between the contract price and the price obtained on a resale; (3) the vendor might treat and keep the property as his own and recover from the vendee the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery. Cuthill v. Peabody, 125 P. 926, 19 Cal. App. 304.

Section 3311 of the Civil Code provides:

"The detriment caused by the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is not vested been resold, pursuant to section three thousand and forty-nine, the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the net proceeds of the resale; or, 2. If the property has not been resold in the manner prescribed by section three thousand and forty-nine, the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the value to the seller, together with the excess, if any, of the expenses properly incurred in carrying the property to market, over those which would have been incurred for the carriage thereof, if the buyer had accepted it."

And in estimating damages under such circumstances, the rule for ascertaining the same is set forth in section 3353, Civil Code. In the case at bar the property was not sold in accordance with the provisions of section 3049 of the Civil Code, and the action is one simply for damages; the plaintiff treating the contract as rescinded and the title to the property as not having passed.

[2] The complaint is by no means a model but the demurrer, as a pleading, shows no improvement. The objection argued that the complaint does not distinctly show the remedy sought by the plaintiff is very well answered in the case of Lillie v. Weyl-Zuckerman & Co., 188 P. 619, 45 Cal. App. 607. There the three remedies were being considered, and it was contended that, as the contract was silent as to the method plaintiff adopted, it failed to state a cause of action. The court said:

"Conceding the complaint was uncertain in the respect named, nevertheless it was obnoxious to the general demurrer, for the reason that, under the allegations made and in the absence of any special objection to the complaint, plaintiff might introduce evidence tending to prove that upon defendant's breach he adopted, as he was entitled to do, any one of the three courses open to him. The question as to how or in what manner the damage arose, other than as appears from the general allegations, is the subject of evidence rather than of pleading."

[3] The complaint in that case was similar to the one at bar, save and except it did contain the further allegation that the plaintiff had tendered delivery of the merchandise contracted for by the defendant. The omission of such an allegation in the complaint in the case at bar, while technically rendering the complaint subject to demurrer, is not in any sense prejudicial, as it appears from the evidence that the defendant had explicitly refused to receive the 65,000 feet of lumber involved in this case. Hence, by the terms of section 1440, Civil Code, the plaintiff was not required to make any offer of performance on his part, as provided for in section 1439, Civil Code, before beginning this action. It does appear from the testimony that the plaintiff had already sawed the 65,000 feet of lumber and had the same on hand ready for delivery. It further appears from the testimony that, after the defendant had refused to accept further delivery of the lumber, the plaintiff sold 35,000 feet thereof at the average price of $25 per thousand, and that his loss on that number of feet of lumber amounted to the sum of $350, for which he had judgment. As to the remaining 30,000 feet of lumber, it appears from the testimony that efforts were made to sell the same, and that it had no market value. It appears that the lumber was of a quality suitable only for the building of flumes, and therefore not commercially merchantable lumber. Our attention has not been called to any testimony questioning these facts. Under such circumstances, the court allowed the contract price, to wit, $1,050, the amount of the damages. After 65,000 feet of lumber had been received by the defendant, it appears from the testimony that the superintendent of the defendant notified the plaintiff that they did not want any more lumber, and that they were through with the plaintiff. The testimony of the plaintiff concerning the value of the lumber and its size is as follows:

"Q. Referring to the sizes that you cut there, Mr. Burner— A. The sizes— Q. Were they commercial sizes? A. No.

"Q. Cut especially for this yard? A. Especially for flume lumber.

"Q. Did that lumber have any market value? A. It did not; practically no value for market.

"Q. You tried subsequently to sell it? A. I did—tried and in fact tried in every way to dispose of it.

"Q. You did dispose of some of it? A. Yes sir; 1,000 feet, here and there.

"Q. And approximately how much did you dispose of? A. I disposed of somewhere around 35,000 feet.

"Q. And what was the average price for that? A. $25 was the best I could get for it."

Also:

"Q. With whom was the contract made for the 130,000 feet, and where? A. It was a verbal agreement. Mr. Wilson wanted at least 100,000 feet to start with, and Mr. Duffey said they would want at least 30,000 feet of building material. * * * The bigger part of the mining company order was red fir, which is not marketable; very hard to dispose of red fir to any one who is not building flumes. The lumber yards refused to buy it."

[4] No question appears to have been raised by the testimony as to the fact that the plaintiff had sawed and had on hand ready for delivery the 65,000 board feet of lumber ready for the defendant, nor is there any question raised as to the market value, or of the fact of there being no market value, of the lumber not accepted and paid for by the defendant. There is some question as to the amount of lumber ordered, whether 100,000 feet or 130,000 board feet, but, as there is sufficient testimony to support the verdict of the jury that 130,000 board feet of lumber were ordered, we must accept the verdict of the jury as conclusive upon this point. The appellant has argued at considerable length that, as the plaintiff was able to sell 35,000 board feet of the lumber in question for an average price of $25 per thousand feet, such price was thereby fixed as the market value of the unsold lumber. This, however, overlooks the fact that the lumber was cut for a specific purpose, was cut in a country where the market for such lumber is limited, and, if not accepted and paid for by the person creating the limited market, it would practically have no market value. It might have a value for special use, if any one could be found having use for such lumber, but it does not appear from the testimony that any such facts existed. The fact of there being no market value for the lumber, as testified to by the plaintiff, was left entirely uncontroverted by the defendant, or, at least, our attention has not been called to any testimony contravening the fact of the unaccepted lumber having no market value. The evidence showing that the 65,000 feet of lumber was sawed, that the defendant had notified the plaintiff that the same would not be received, and as the cause was tried upon issues which involved the real merits of the case, we think this is an instance where the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution apply, where it is said that no judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted for any error as to any matter of pleading, etc., which has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice. The issues tried out in this case and determined by the jury and the real merits involved in the controversy between the plaintiff and defendant would not have been affected or altered in any particular had all the technical allegations insisted upon by the appellant as necessary to constitute a sufficient complaint been inserted therein. The case of Donlon v. Meyer, 169 P. 447, 35 Cal. App. 225, sets forth the rule that we have followed herein showing when offer of performance or pleading offer of performance is unnecessary.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action by C. W. Burner against the American Bar Quartz Mining Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hiram W. Johnson, Jr., and Carl E. Day, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Raglan Tuttle and Fred P. Tuttle, Jr., both of Auburn, and Dixon L. Phillips, of Oakland, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. In this case, No. 7083 in the trial court, the plaintiff had judgment against the defendant for the sum of $2,870, from which judgment the defendant appeals. The action was brought by the plaintiff to foreclose a materialman's lien and for personal judgment. Foreclosure of lien was denied and personal judgment entered.

The record shows that some time during the year 1922 the defendant entered into a written contract with one Edward Martin for the erection of a certain flume for the sum of $31,000. The agreement specified that the contractor was to furnish all labor and materials, etc., and two certain bonds were executed in the sum of $16,000 each, one for the faithful performance, and the other for labor and materials, etc.

After the execution of this written agreement, Edward Martin entered into an agreement with the plaintiff whereby the plaintiff was to cut and deliver at the site of a certain sawmill operated by him some 400,000 feet of lumber at the contract price of $23 per thousand. In accordance with this contract, it appears that approximately 410,000 board feet of lumber were sawed by the plaintiff and delivered to Martin. After the plaintiff had begun sawing lumber under his contract with Edward Martin, and after about 140,000 feet of said lumber had been cut and delivered, the plaintiff ascertained that the price of $23 per thousand was not sufficient to compensate him for the expenses of furnishing, cutting, and delivering the said lumber. In other words, that he had a losing contract. Thereafter, and somewhere about the 10th of October, the plaintiff had a conversation with a certain Mr. Duffey, the superintendent of the defendant mining company, as follows:

"Q. You had a conversation about the 1st of October? A. Somewhere about the 10th of October—somewhere about the 1st of October.

"Q. Up to that time you had delivered some lumber, had you? A. I think up to that time I think about in the neighborhood of 130,000 or 140,000.

"Q. Where did this conversation take place? A. Why, I went to the river to see Mr. Duffey. I wanted money to pay my men, and went down to the river to see Mr. Duffey, and, while there, I told him I could not continue the way I was going. With the small mill I had I could not continue at the price, and, also, if there was no chance of getting more pay for my lumber I could not keep cutting at $23 a thousand, and—

"Q. What did he say to that? A. He seemed to be worried—he was worried as to the lumber—he was afraid the winter would come, and storms and the lumber not be cut.

"Q. Did he say that? A. He did, and he informed the job had been started, and, if I discontinued cutting, it would probably not get the lumber, and they never would get the job completed. I spoke to him about the price. He told me by no means to stop cutting, and asked me about the price, money was no object; that they would see me through if I would guarantee to get the lumber for them.

"Q. Did he say anything else? A. I informed him I could not cut the lumber. I suggested to him I would put on a night shift to do so. It would cost me considerable money, and I did equip my mill—I sawed at nights to fulfill my order with them.

"Q. What was the language used by Mr. Duffey, as near as you can recollect it in that conversation? A. Why, as near as I can recollect, he realized—

"Q. What did he say? A. He said he was willing for me to go ahead—he said they had put up the money for this flume—a certain amount of it, and he said if it stopped there would be no chance to get it started again, probably stop entirely.

"Q. Say anything with reference to the payment of the amount of $23? A. He did not—he said he would see me through, gladly see that I was well paid for my work.

"Q. Did he say anything about paying any thing above the $23? A. He did.

"Q. What did he say? A. He said to go ahead and cut, and they would take care of me under the circumstances, at any cost."

Following this conversation, the plaintiff in November had a conversation with the bookkeeper of the defendant, and with two directors, Mr. Kunz and Mr. Stevens. This conversation is as follows:

"Q. Now, coming to November, 1922, did you have any conversation with any of the officers or directors of the company at that time in regard to this matter? A. I did.

"Q. Where? A. In their office in San Francisco.

"Q. You went to San Francisco? A. I did; I went to San Francisco in November.

"Q. And you went to the company's office, the defendant in this case? A. I did.

"Q. Who was present at that conversation? A. Why, Mr. Kunz, Mr. Stevens, and Willie Fink.

"Q. Who was Mr. Fink—how connected with the company, what position did he hold? A. I could not say; he was with the company at the American Bar at that time.

"Q. Do you mean as an employee? A. Yes, I think he was.

"Q. Explain what the conversation was in the company's office, what was said? A. I went down with Mr. Fink—I had been talking with Mr. Duffey, but I was commencing to get worried as to how I was coming out, and I went to the city with Mr. Fink for the purpose of seeing some of the company, and informed them in the office as to how I was coming out; that I was behind several hundred dollars, and I wanted them to give me something definite, whereas I was sure I could receive my extra money on this order of lumber.

"Q. What extra money are you referring to? A. Extra money over the $23.

"Q. What did they say? A. They informed me they could not give me anything in writing, as Mr. Martin—as the contractor was using the lumber, he had a bonding company behind him, and, if they interfered between me and Mr. Martin, the bonding company, that would let the bonding company out from under—the way they expressed it.

"Q. Did they say anything to you about paying extra compensation? A. They did; they said they would assuredly take care of me, this mine with millions, and not let a man go hungry and walk out with his blankets on his back—that they were not that kind of people.

"Q. Who told you that? A. Both Harry Kunz and Walter Stevens, also Billie Fink interrupted and assured me they were telling me right."

Again, in February, 1923, plaintiff had a further conversation with Mr. Duffey as follows:

"Q. Did you have a further conversation with Mr. Duffey in the following February in regard to this matter again? A. I did.

"Q. Where was that? A. Down on the ditch.

"Q. At the mine? A. It was on the river, on the flume above the mine, on the flume leading to the mine.

"Q. Who was there? A. Mr. Duffey, Orrin Jones, and myself.

"Q. What was that conversation? A. We went to the river. He was not there. They said he was on the ditch. We went up to meet him, and he said to me all the way in the conversation, 'You got stung, my God, I feel sorry for you,' and he went jumping around, and finally he said, well, he said, 'By golly, we have to pay these men, and want to pay these men now; I cannot do anything else at present, the McCandlesses are not here'—but said—'I have that power enough, whereas I can pay the men's wages that you owe.'

"Q. Your pay roll? A. He told me to go ahead and send in my pay roll for the men, and he would send it to the city office and pay them at once. He said as to the other money I was entitled to it.

"Q. What other money? A. He said as to the money I had run behind, whatever was fair for me to have, he would take it up with the McCandlesses, and he said they would be in San Francisco about the 15th of May, and they would get together and straighten everything up."

The plaintiff further testified that during the period covered by these conversations he was furnishing lumber to Edward Martin, under the contract herein referred to. He further testified that neither Mr. Kunz nor Mr. Stevens made any definite promises. It does not appear either that in any of the conversations had with Mr. Duffey any definite promises were made as to compensation. Mr. Martin, a witness called for the plaintiff, testified to being present at one of the conversations between the plaintiff and Mr. Duffey, and gives this version:

"A. Mr. Burner was there. Before receiving payment, at the previous conversation, and before receiving it, he said, 'This is not in full.' It is full according to my original agreement with him, but additional money promised—which I too, had promised him, having all the confidence we could in the good intentions of the mining company.

"Q. What was said about Burner? A. Burner got his payment to continue operating which was the thing Burner was interested in—getting money enough to pay his men. The men already harrassed him from all sides.

"Q. He said he would not accept payment in full? A. Yes, that is right.

"Q. What else. A. Went back cutting lumber to finish the 400,000 feet.

"Q. What took place with Burner? A. He was satisfied to abide the time until the meeting of the board of directors, and they would officially give him the money.

"Q. That is what took place? A. Yes.

"Q. That was when? A. Some time in November—22d of November, 1922.

"Q. In November, 1922, a payment was made, and the result of that agreement was that the understanding there was that Mr. Burner would abide by a presentation of the subject to the board of directors—correct? A. Now, ask that question again, please.

"Q. In conversation that took place in November, 1922, Burner received payment, and it was agreed at that time that Mr. Burner would present and abide by the board of directors' determination of the matter? A. I want to change that a little—I want to say this: At that time Mr. Burner was satisfied to await the time until Mr. Duffey could make a recommendation—to lay all the facts before the board of directors, because there never was any question in my mind but what Mr. Burner could get the money from the mining company.

"Q. The understanding was Mr. Duffey would lay the matter before the board of directors and Mr. Burner would abide by the result?"

[1] It thus appears that the plaintiff is suing upon an oral contract, if any, to pay extra compensation for the performance by the plaintiff of his written contract with Edward Martin for the sawing and delivering of the 410,000 feet of lumber, such compensation to be paid by other than a party to the contract. As grounds for reversal, the appellant alleges that Duffey, as superintendent, was without authority to make any contract such as claimed by the plaintiff, and, secondly, that the alleged contract is without consideration.

In support of the theory that Duffey, as the superintendent of the defendant mining company, has authority to promise additional compensation, the plaintiff introduced testimony simply to the effect that Duffey was the superintendent and general manager. In further support of the authority of Duffey, the respondent cites the following:

"Where an agent is by his principal put in charge of a business in a certain locality as the manager thereof, it is a general rule that he is clothed with apparent authority to do all things that are essential to the ordinary conduct of the business at such place." 1 Cal. Jur. p. 745.

And also:

"Where one has the actual charge and management of the general business of a corporation, with the knowledge of the members, or the directors, this is sufficient evidence of authority and the company will be bound by his contracts, made on their behalf, within the apparent scope of the business intrusted to him"—citing Aigeltinger v. Burke, 169 P. 376, 176 Cal. 626, and Leavens v. Pinkham & McKevitt, 128 P. 399, 164 Cal. 248.

It does not appear from the testimony that Duffey, as the superintendent of the mining company, had anything to do with the contracts for building the flume, entered into between the company and Mr. Martin, or with the contract entered into by Martin and the plaintiff for furnishing the former with the necessary lumber with which to build the flume. Under such circumstances, the following from 31 Cyc. 1387, appears to be applicable:

"Presumptively an agent is employed to make contracts, not to rescind or modify them, to acquire interests, not to give them up, and no power to cancel or vary an agreement is to be inferred from a general power to make it, nor has the agent any implied power to waive or give up rights or interests for his principal, nor to increase his obligations and liabilities for the mere benefit of third persons, unless the principal knew or approved of such modifications by the agent. However, a general agent may act under such broad power to contract in his own name, or to make terms or to settle upon his own discretion, as to overcome this presumption, and bind the principal by the modification, rescission, or release of his agent."

The testimony set forth in the transcript distinguishes the case at bar from the case of Western Lithograph Co. v. Vanomar Producers, 197 P. 103, 185 Cal. 366, hereinafter referred to in this opinion, in which it was held that the president of the defendant company had authority to make the contract there involved in this; in the Western Lithograph Co. Case, the president and secretary of the company had executed the contract for the corporation, and the contract concerning which the extra compensation was promised was the contract of the corporation. In the case at bar the contract was not executed by the superintendent, and was not, in fact, the contract of the corporation at all. It was a contract entered into by the plaintiff and Martin, for the performance of which it is alleged that Duffey, representing the corporation as a third party, promised extra compensation. It does not appear that Duffey in behalf of the corporation, had anything to do with the execution of the contract between Martin and the corporation concerning the erection of the flume by Martin, nor does it appear that the corporation had anything to do with the contract between the plaintiff and Martin concerning the lumber. It does not show either that Duffey was charged with any other duty by the corporation than that of seeing that the flume was properly constructed by Edward Martin, the contractor with whom the defendant had a written contract.

We do not very well see how the mere fact that Duffey simply as superintendent of the defendant mining company, charged with the general duty of seeing that the company obtained from Mr. Martin a flume constructed according to a contract entered into between Edward Martin and the mining company, would authorize Duffey, as such superintendent without any further authority conferred upon him by the board of directors of the mining company, to compensate the plaintiff, because the plaintiff had ascertained that he had entered into a losing contract with Edward Martin, who had previously agreed in writing with the company to perform certain labor, furnish materials, and erect a certain structure for the sum of $31,000.

[2] It is also clear from the testimony herein set forth that there is nothing definite or certain as to the promises made to the plaintiff by Duffey, even though the testimony were sufficient to show authority vested in Duffey to bind the corporation by any such promises or agreement.

[3] The objection that the alleged promise, if any, is void for want of consideration we also think is well taken. It may be stated that it does not appear from the transcript that the defendant in this case obtained anything to which it was not entitled under its contract with Edward Martin, nor does it appear that the defendant agreed and promised that, if the plaintiff would do certain things which he was not obligated to do, and thereby furnish something to the defendant which it was not otherwise entitled to receive, additional compensation would be paid. The most that does appear is that the plaintiff stated he would put on a night shift, and in this way be able to fill his contract. The plaintiff in this particular sets forth section 1605 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

"Any benefit conferred, or agreed to be conferred, upon the promisor, by any other person, to which the promisor is not lawfully entitled, or any prejudice suffered, or agreed to be suffered, by such person, other than such as he is at the time of consent lawfully bound to suffer, as an inducement to the promisor, is a good consideration for a promise."

However, it does not appear that the alleged promisor in this case was obtaining anything to which it was not legally entitled under its contract with Martin, and which the plaintiff, in turn, under his contract with Martin, was obligated to furnish to Martin, in order that Martin might comply with his contract with the defendant. A very similar question came before the Supreme Court of this state in Western Lithograph Co. v. Vanomar Producers, 197 P. 103, 185 Cal. 366. In that case a contract had been entered into for the furnishing of labels at a certain price. Thereafter it became apparent that the contract was a losing one on the part of the plaintiff. The plaintiff obtained from the president and general manager of the defendant a promise of an increase in the price to be paid for the labels in the sum of 35 cents per thousand extra. The president wrote the following letter:

"Gentlemen: Referring to the conversation held between your Mr. Courtlander and the writer, we wish to say that we shall be very glad to pay you a sum equal to 35 cents per m., beyond our contract price, for all labels which we may receive from you this season's pack. We appreciate the efforts you have made in the past to meet our wishes and requirements, and thoroughly understand some of the obstacles which confront you in the endeavor to take care of your large business this season."

In this case it appears that the president had been by the company permitted to carry on business in such a way as to bring the contract in question within the apparent scope of his authority, but it was held that the agreement was without consideration, and this notwithstanding the fact that the defendant in that case received and paid for a considerable quantity of labels at the increased price. The court, in commenting upon this phase of the case, said:

"Now, the letter of June 15, 1917, was merely an agreement to pay an increase over the prices at which the plaintiff was already lawfully bound to the defendant to deliver labels. It is evident that because of the promise the defendant received no benefit, nor was it agreed that it should receive any, to which it was not already lawfully entitled. It is likewise evident that the plaintiff did nothing, and agreed to do nothing, which it was not already obligated to do. A plainer case of a mere naked promise it would be difficult to imagine. The courts in some instances have held that, where one party to a contract refuses to go on with it, and the other party to induce him to go on promises to pay him additional compensation, such promise is supported by a consideration. The theories upon which this conclusion is reached are various, and it is exceedingly doubtful if any of them are sound. Alaska Packers' Ass'n v. Domenico, 117 F. 99 (54 C. C. A. 485). The authorities are collated and their different rules well stated in 13 Corpus Juris, 351-355. But, so far as we are aware, the authorities are in practical agreement that where, as here, all that appears is that one party found himself with a losing contract and, without abandoning it, requested the other party to pay him more, which the other party promised to do, the promise is without consideration."

The court further in that case commented upon the decisions of the Minnesota Supreme Court (Michaud v. MacGregor, 63 N. W. 479, 61 Minn. 198; King v. Duluth, etc., Co., 63

N. W. 1105, 61 Minn. 482), apparently holding to a different rule, and pointed out the inapplicability of the ruling of the Supreme Court of Minnesota to the case at bar. It is further set forth that extra costs and difficulties, such as increase in the cost of manufacture, inadequacy of the contract price, which is the result of error of judgment and not of some inexcusable mistake of fact, is not sufficient upon which to predicate a consideration for a promise to pay extra compensation. To the same effect is the case of Marinovich v. Kilburn, 96 P. 303, 153 Cal. 638. In 6 Cal. Jur. 180, § 123, the rule is also clearly set forth relating to alleged promises of extra compensation showing that under the circumstances at bar the alleged promise is not supported by any consideration. Likewise, in 13 C. J. 351 to 357, the cases holding that the promise of extra compensation alleged as the basis or consideration by the promisee to perform an obligation which he is already under legal obligation to perform is without consideration. As heretofore stated, the only consideration in this case, was the furnishing of Edward Martin with the lumber which the plaintiff was already under legal obligation to furnish, and we think this case comes clearly within the rules laid down in the authorities which we have cited showing that the alleged contract is void for want of consideration. It follows that the judgment of the trial court must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

HORSCHMAN v. KIZIRIAN et al.

Contracts — 322(3).

Evidence held to sustain finding that note given to secure payment of services rendered by plaintiff in drilling certain wells for water was supported by consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by P. B. Horschman against K. Kizirian and another, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Stanley Moffatt, of Fresno, for appellants.
Briggs & Sorensen, of Fresno, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover on a promissory note. The defendants answered and also filed a cross-complaint. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, and a trial was had in the lower court before the court sitting without a jury. The court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and a judgment was entered in accordance with the findings. The defendants have appealed from the judgment under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The appellants make but one point, and that is that the finding that there was a consideration for the note is not sustained by the evidence. In this behalf the appellants claim that the note was given to secure the payment of services rendered by the plaintiff in drilling certain wells for water, and the appellants contend that the plaintiff held himself out as specially qualified to perform that particular work, and that there was an implied warranty that the work which he undertook to do should be reasonably fit for its intended use. No other question is presented by the record. We think that the point is without merit for the following reasons:

In the spring of 1923 the defendants employed the plaintiff to drill for water on the property owned by the defendants. Under the contract the plaintiff was to be paid so much per foot. He commenced the work, and the defendants worked with him. From time to time the defendants exercised their judgment in directing or supervising the work; however, they did not claim to be informed on such matters. At times they counseled with the plaintiff, and accepted his suggestions as to how deep they would sink any particular well, and as to when that well would be abandoned and an attempt made to sink in a different place. There are two different methods more or less in use in the neighborhood of the farm owned by the defendants. One is known as the "open-bottom" well, and the other may be called the "perforated-casing" well. The plaintiff followed the first method. That method is executed by using solid casing and sinking to a solid formation, and on that formation resting the casing. The driller then proceeds to drill a hole through the solid formation into a water-bearing stratum. By this method all intervening strata of water are excluded. In following the theory which the plaintiff had adopted he sunk one well without getting water. Then he sunk another well without getting water, and he had moved his outfit to another point and was about to sink a third well when the defendants adopted a different course of procedure.

Being dissatisfied with the results obtained by the plaintiff the defendants interrupted the proceedings by employing Mr. Burris to inspect the work as far as it had proceeded and to advise the defendants in premises. On inspecting the first well Mr. Burris advised hiring a perforator. It was hired, and the casing in the first well was sunk a few feet lower, and then it was perforated at the level of the water-bearing sand, and, after pumping out some water and sand, the defendants found that they had a satisfactory well. The latter method is the second method above mentioned.

On this appeal the defendants asserted that one who does not follow the latter method is not skilled, and that there is no evidence to the contrary; hence they argue that the finding of the trial court that there was a consideration for the note is not supported by the evidence. The answer is that there is an abundance of evidence in the record contrary to the contention of the appellants. Mr. Bramblett, one of the witnesses called by the appellants, testified that the first method was one of the recognized methods, but he preferred the latter method. There was testimony that both methods are used in the neighborhood of the property owned by the appellants. There was testimony that about one-half of the wells are sunk following one theory, and about one-half are sunk following the other theory.

It was shown to the trial court that each method has its good points, and that each method has its bad points. In using the "perforated-casing" system it sometimes happens that when the perforations are made the sand flows in in such quantities as to give one a sand well instead of a water well. Furthermore, the perforations must be made after the casing is in place, and it is not every driller that has the machinery necessary to do the perforating. On the other hand, when one adopts the "open-bottom" system, he may have such difficulties as were experienced in sinking the wells on the defendants' property.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

3. Justices of the peace §146(1)—"Order" of justice's court reinstating original judgment held "final judgment," within statute investing superior court with jurisdiction of appeal (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 974, 980).

"Order" of justice's court reinstating original judgment held "final judgment," within Code Civ. Proc. § 974, investing superior court with jurisdiction of appeal taken from "final judgment" of justice's court, and court being authorized to reverse such "order," under section 980.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Final Decree or Judgment.]

4. Prohibition §9—Prohibition held not proper remedy to prevent trial of action in justice's court on remand from superior court after reversal of order "or judgment" of justice's court reinstating original judgment, where superior court had jurisdiction of matter before it.

Writ of prohibition held not proper remedy to prevent trial of action in justice's court on remand from superior court after reversal of order "or judgment" of justice's court reinstating original judgment, where superior court had jurisdiction to decide matter before it, and it being immaterial whether its decision was correct.

5. Prohibition §11—Writ of prohibition cannot annul acts already done, unless they are flagrantly wrong in a judicial sense.

Writ of prohibition cannot annul acts already done, unless they are so flagrantly wrong in a judicial sense as to entitle them to no consideration.

Application for writ of prohibition by Morris Himovitz and another to be directed against the Justice's Court of the Sixth Township, County of Kern, and Edward V. Jones, as Justice of the Peace of such court. Application denied.

E. A. Klein and R. W. Henderson, both of Bakersfield, for plaintiffs.

Siemon & Garber, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

YORK, J. An original application is made to this court in this case for writ of prohibition for the purpose of prohibiting the respondent, a justice of the peace, from hearing and deciding a case pending before him as such justice. The case was within the jurisdiction of the justice's court, and jurisdiction over the person of defendant had been legally obtained. A default had been duly entered in said case and a judgment thereon for plaintiff had been duly entered on January 17, 1924. The defendant in that action (respondent herein) moved to set aside the default and judgment on January 30, 1924. Said justice granted said motion, "with the provision that defendant paid accrued costs up to the present date." At the hearing of the motion and before the order was made, the defendant offered to pay the costs as required by the order, but plaintiff's counsel declined to inform him what the costs were, and defendant had no means of ascertaining what they were. Defendant thereupon filed an answer to plaintiffs' complaint without paying the costs, which the justice permitted him to do. The case was then at issue. The answer remained on file without any objection by plaintiffs and without plaintiffs informing defendants what the costs were and without moving to set the case for trial, until the 19th day of June, 1925, when the justice, on motion of plaintiffs and without notice to defendants, entered an order setting aside the order of January 30, 1924, and adjudging that the original judgment be "reinstated." The defendant appealed from this "so-called judgment or order," to the superior court. Plaintiffs made a motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the purported appeal was from an order and not from a judgment, and that the superior court was without jurisdiction of the action. The superior court denied the motion and decided the appeal on questions of law alone. It was there held by the court that the so-called order of June 19, 1925, was in effect a judgment, erroneously rendered by the justice's court. Therefore the judgment was reversed, and the case remanded to the justice's court, to be tried. It is to prevent such trial that this proceeding has been brought here.

It is the contention of petitioners herein that the justice has no jurisdiction to try the case, and that the judgment on appeal has not settled the law of the case on that question, since (so they contend) the superior court was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the attempted appeal.

[1] While section 974, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that an appeal may be taken from a final judgment of a justice's court and no appeal from an order is provided for, section 980, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, on an appeal heard on a statement of the case, the superior court may review and may set aside, modify, or confirm proceedings subsequent to judgment, and may order a new trial. Although the appeal was taken on questions "both of law and fact," the superior court properly heard and determined the appeal, as above stated, on questions of law alone. Peacock v. Superior Court, 126 P. 796, 163 Cal. 701. While no formal statement of the case had been made, it would have served no useful purpose, because the proceedings in the justice's court were fully before the superior court in the record made in the justice's court, of which the facts were and are undisputed. Rauer's Law, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 152 P. 957, 26 Cal. App. 289.

[2-5] The appeal from the "so-called judgment or order" simply indicates that defendant was in doubt what to call it. The proceedings on appeal, although unusual, were not prejudicial to the plaintiffs for that reason, and we are required to construe the provisions of the Code liberally with a view to effect its objects and promote justice. The only judgment existing in the action at the time of taking the appeal was that entered on June 19, 1925, which was considered by the superior court as a final judgment. It could be rightfully so construed, because of the adjudication "reinstating" the original judgment. We therefore hold that it was within the jurisdiction of the superior court to consider the appeal and reverse the order "or judgment" of June 19, 1925. We are not called upon to consider whether the decision of the superior court was correct. It is sufficient for the purpose of this matter to decide that it was within the jurisdiction of the superior court to decide it. It is evident that the petitioners are here making a collateral attack on both the acts of the justice of the peace and the superior court. The writ of prohibition cannot annul acts already done unless they are so flagrantly wrong in a judicial sense as to entitle them to no consideration. Alexander v. Crollott, 26 S. Ct. 161, 199 U. S. 580, 50 L. Ed. 317; Ex parte Oklahoma, 31 S. Ct. 426, 220 U. S. 191, 55 L. Ed. 431; Estate of Bond, 225 P. 450, 193 Cal. 482; *County of Sutter v. PEOPLE v. KIRKPATRICK. (Cr. 1271.)

1. Embezzlement ⚡44(5)—Evidence held to show that money advanced by wife to defendant for purchase of store was a loan, and, therefore, not the subject of embezzlement by him.

Evidence in prosecution for embezzlement held to show that money advanced by wife to defendant for purchase of store was a loan to defendant, and, therefore, could not have been the subject of embezzlement by him.

2. Embezzlement ⚡8—Money received by defendant from his wife for express purpose of purchasing home for her did not cease to be trust fund or her separate property by husband's mere act of mingling it with other moneys in his bank account.

Where wife delivered check to husband for the express purpose of purchasing a home for her, the mere act of the husband in mingling it with other moneys in his bank account did not cause it to cease to be a trust fund or her separate property.

3. Embezzlement ⚡44(6)—Evidence held sufficient to establish fact that defendant embezzled money given to him by wife for express purpose of purchasing home for her.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, evidence held sufficient to establish fact that defendant embezzled money delivered by wife to him for express purpose of purchasing home for her.

4. Criminal law ⚡829(9)—Refusal of requested instructions relating to community property and to presumption attending acquisition of property by married person held not error, where court gave correct and sufficient instructions relating thereto.

In a prosecution for embezzlement by husband of wife's funds, refusal of requested instructions relating to community property, and to certain presumptions attending acquisition of property by married person, held not error, where court gave correct and sufficient instructions relating thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Joseph Lee Kirkpatrick was convicted of embezzlement on two counts, and he appeals. Judgment reversed as to first count, and affirmed as to second.

Homer C. Mills, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Hamish B. Eddie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The information is in two counts, and the defendant was convicted on both of the charges. The first count charges embezzlement, on or about the 27th day of November, 1924, of the sum of $3,500 belonging to Elizabeth Gnabe Kirkpatrick. The second count charges embezzlement, on the same date, of the sum of $1,989.29, also the property of Elizabeth Gnabe Kirkpatrick.

The defendant and Elizabeth Gnabe became acquainted with each other in January, 1924. The defendant very promptly learned that Miss Gnabe, who had been a domestic servant for many years, owned cash and securities amounting to about $8,000. During the month of February they were engaged to be married. They agreed that Miss Gnabe would furnish money for the purchase of a grocery store, which would be operated by the defendant, who was experienced in that business, and they found a grocery store belonging to one Hanson, which seemed to be suitable for their purpose. Defendant and Miss Gnabe examined the store together on the 28th day of February. Hanson's price for the property was $3,500. In describing the transaction, Mrs. Kirkpatrick testified as follows:

"Mr. Kirkpatrick and Mr. Hanson talked about the store, and made the arrangements about it, looked at it, and then he came out to me, and said, 'Why, Libby, Mr. Hanson wants $3,500 for it, and I would like to get it for less,' and I said, 'Well, if Mr. Hanson won't sell for less, you pay him the $3,500 for the store,' so he did. They arranged about the store, and we talked about it, Mr. Kirkpatrick and Mr. Hanson and I, and I was satisfied for him to get the store, but before that we had planned about getting one. * * * Well, Mr. Kirkpatrick said that he would take the store for that, and that we would go the next day to Santa Ana and be married. We had talked about it before about—about being married before I turned the money over to him."

The sale was completed on that day; Miss Gnabe paying for the property by assigning to Hanson two mortgages, each in the principal sum of $1,750, which Hanson accepted as payment of the purchase price. A bill of sale was executed by Hanson in the name of the defendant Kirkpatrick. Mrs. Kirkpatrick admitted that this was done with her knowledge and approval.

On the following day, February 29, 1924, the defendant and Miss Gnabe were married. From that time until the following November they lived together in a rented apartment, and the defendant conducted the business of the grocery store. In November, 1924, without the consent of his wife, the defendant sold the grocery store for the cash sum of $2,700.

Concerning the charge contained in the second count of the information, Mrs. Kirkpatrick testified in substance as follows: In April and May she and the defendant began to talk about buying a home. As a result of those conversations she sent East for some money which she had in a building and loan association. This money came to her in a check, which she indorsed and delivered to the defendant. He said to her:

"If you send East for your building and loan, it will enable me to buy this home. * * * I am unable to pay for it all."

She spoke to him about the business being in his name and suggested that it was no more than right that the home should be deeded to her. He replied: "The home will be deeded to you." On the next day after Mrs. Kirkpatrick indorsed the check to the defendant he showed her the bank book showing the deposit of said check. It was deposited in the same account in which he was accustomed to depositing the proceeds from the store; this account being in the name of the defendant. The proposed property for a home never was purchased. The defendant has never repaid to the plaintiff any of the money received from her on either one of said transactions.

On the evening before Thanksgiving Day of 1924, which was after the store had been sold, the defendant made an appointment to meet Mrs. Kirkpatrick at a place down town in the city of Los Angeles and go with her to a theater. While she was waiting there for him he went home and removed therefrom his personal belongings. Later he called on her, and together they discussed the situation. There had never been any trouble between them prior to this time. She asked him:

"You mean that you are going to willfully desert me like this?"

He replied that he was going to Tia Juana. He said:

"I have something in view down there, and, if you don't do anything, I might reconsider this act that I am about to do and come back."

He never did return, and she did not see him against until she saw him in the county jail in February, 1925.

Before the marriage, and before the purchase of the store, the complaining witness said to the defendant:

"In case I turn this money over to you to buy the store and anything should happen between us, you never can tell, will you turn this money—will you give me this money back?"

He replied:

"Absolutely; but there is nothing going to happen; we are going to lead a happy life, and we are going to get along."

The use of the money for the purchase of the store was never talked about as a loan. Some time after the store had been purchased, the defendant said to his wife that, since he had taken her interest from her when she turned this money over to him he was going to arrange to pay her the interest on it. She replied that, if he did, she would use the interest for her clothes. Afterwards, he gave her some payments of money as interest on the sum of $5,300, which was on the $3,500 together with another sum of $1,800 not involved in this action.

In February, 1925, Mrs. Kirkpatrick commenced an action against the defendant to recover from him the sum of $8,000, which, in her verified complaint, she alleged that the defendant had received from the plaintiff "to be used by said defendant for the use and benefit of said plaintiff." She made in that action an affidavit for attachment in which she alleged that the defendant was indebted to her in the stated sum of $8,000 on an express contract for the direct payment of money, etc. Default judgment in favor of the plaintiff was thereafter duly entered. The complaint and affidavit and judgment in that action were introduced in evidence in this action at the instance of the defendant, presumably for the purpose of showing that the transactions included in the information herein were solely in the nature of loans of money, which, therefore, could not be the subject of embezzlement.

In the present action no other evidence was introduced on behalf of the defendant, and there is no substantial conflict in the evidence of the facts which are in effect as shown by the foregoing statement.

The principal contention of appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. This contention is made separately for each count.

[1] With regard to the first count, appellant contends, among other things, that the transaction relating to the $3,500 was a loan, and that the evidence is insufficient to prove that the store and its contents, purchased with that money, or that the proceeds of the sale of the store, were held in possession by him as agent or bailee of Mrs. Kirkpatrick or in trust for her or for her use. We are of the opinion that this contention must be sustained. Upon the undisputed facts it clearly appears that the money (in the form of said mortgages assigned to Hanson) was advanced by Mrs. Kirkpatrick (or Miss Gnabe, as she then was) to the defendant as a loan. Therefore, it could not have been the subject of embezzlement by him.

[2, 3] With regard to the second count, there is nothing in the evidence to indicate either a gift or a loan. Neither do we think that the money included in the second count became community property. The contention of appellant is that, when the $1,829.29 check was deposited by him in the bank account kept for the business of the store, it was thus mingled with funds that presumably were community funds; that, when Mrs. Kirkpatrick promptly learned that fact, and made no objection, she thereby consented to such mingling of funds, and there is no evidence of their subsequent segregation; that (as the court instructed the jury) if the money alleged to have been embezzled was community property, the jury was bound to render a verdict of not guilty; that there is no evidence that any specific sum of money appropriated by the defendant to his own use was other than community property. We are of the opinion, however, that the money received by defendant from his wife did not, by the mere act of mingling it with other moneys in his bank account, cease to be a trust fund, and her separate property. Noble v. Noble (Cal. Sup.) 243 P. 439. The evidence is clearly sufficient to establish the fact that defendant embezzled this money.

[4] It is contended by appellant that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury certain requested instructions relating to community property and to certain presumptions attending the acquisition of property by a married person. It seems not necessary to enter into a detailed discussion of these items. The court did give some instructions, conceded to be correct, in relation to that subject. We are satisfied that the instructions so given were sufficient to protect all rights of the defendant concerning this phase of the case.

Although the jury convicted the defendant on each count of the information, the court suspended judgment on the first count. The order denying defendant's motion for a new trial on the first count is reversed. The judgment on the second count is affirmed. The order denying defendant's motion for a new trial on the second count is affirmed.

LEWIS v. SHAW, Judge. (Civ. 5197.)

1. Appeal and error — 803.

Dismissal of appeal from consent order appointing receiver does not uphold sufficiency of pleadings or validity of order appointing receiver.

2. Receivers — 36, 55.

A complaint, not alleging fraud, and merely asking the impounding of certain funds and the appointment of a receiver, was insufficient to warrant appointing receiver, and gave court no authority to allow him or his attorney compensation.

3. Receivers — 31.

Jurisdiction to appoint a receiver cannot be conferred on a court by stipulation or consent of the parties.

4. Courts — 24.

Jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action cannot be conferred by stipulation admitting jurisdiction, without making a statement of facts sufficient within themselves to constitute a cause of action.

5. Pleading — 8(2) — Complaint, asking impounding of funds and appointment of receiver, insufficient in failing to allege fraud, is not aided by amendments merely averring as conclusions that moneys paid on certain contracts were trust funds, without setting forth facts sufficiently to show trust.

A complaint to impound money and to appoint a receiver which was insufficient in failing to allege fraud would not be aided by amendments containing averments as set forth in affidavits which were mere conclusions to effect that moneys paid on certain contracts were in fact trust funds, without setting forth facts sufficiently to show the trust.

Original application by Charles J. Lewis for writ of mandate prayed to be directed against Hartley Shaw, Judge of the Superior Court of the State of California within and for Los Angeles County, to compel him to annul and vacate an order setting aside an order appointing a receiver and to pass on and determine questions arising on a final report, wherein George W. Hughes and others were real parties in interest, and whose interests were directly affected by the proceedings. Writ denied.

Walter Desmond and Harry L. Cohn, both of Long Beach, for applicant.

Denio & Hart, of Long Beach, for respondent.

YORK, J. The petitioners herein are asking a peremptory writ of mandate to compel Hartley Shaw, as judge of the superior court, to annul and vacate an order rendered by him setting aside an order appointing a receiver in certain consolidated actions set forth in the petition, and to compel said judge to pass upon and determine all questions arising on a final report. The petitioners admit that their complaints in these various consolidated actions do not, nor does any one of them, state a cause of action, except that petitioners state that they would have amended the same to state causes of action, except for the consent of the defendants in their various actions to the making of an order appointing a receiver therein. They further contend that this court should consider said complaints as they would have amended the same, and that the order appointing the receiver was affirmed by the Supreme Court by a dismissal of an appeal from such order, although the appeal was dismissed upon a motion made upon the sole ground that the order appealed from was an order made by consent. It appears to this court that the only question involved, therefore, is whether or not the order appointing the receiver was and is absolutely void.

[1] The dismissal of the appeal by the Supreme Court upon the ground stated would merely hold that the parties appealing were estopped from taking an appeal on the ground that they had consented to the order from which they were attempting to appeal. Such a dismissal does not in any way pass upon the sufficiency of the complaints involved in the various actions, or of the validity of the order appointing the receiver.

[2] It cannot be contended that a complaint merely asking the impounding of certain funds and the appointment of a receiver would state a cause of action, yet petitioners herein admit that this is in effect the form of their complaints, unless the court considers the complaints amended to conform to their affidavits. In matters of this kind a receiver can only be appointed in certain cases where fraud is specifically alleged. That being so, in the matter before the trial judge he was without authority to pass upon or determine any questions arising upon the final report. All that he could do would be to discharge the receiver. He could not, therefore, fix any fees for the services of the attorney for the receiver or any fees for the services of the receiver in such matters so consolidated. Miller v. Oliver, 163 P. 355, 174 Cal. 407; Smith v. Los Angeles & P. R. Co., 34 P. 242, 4 Cal. Unrep. 237, 238; Smith v. Superior Court, 32 P. 322, 97 Cal. 348; Elliott v. Superior Court, 145 P. 101, 168 Cal. 727; Grant v. Los Angeles & P. Ry. Co., 47 P. 872, 116 Cal. 71, all give abundant authority for the foregoing conclusions. In Sullivan v. Gage, 79 P. 537, 541, 145 Cal. 759 to 771, inclusive, the Supreme Court says:

"This, it will be observed, does not present the case of a reversal of an order appointing a receiver for mere error or irregularity in its procurement. It presents the case of an order void for want of legal authority, where the receiver, in point of law, was not a receiver but a trespasser. * * * The cases are not infrequent where the court has settled the account of a receiver erroneously appointed and made the amount a charge against the party who has procured the appointment, but no case has been brought to our attention where a court has made such an order when its own judicial act in appointing the receiver was nugatory and void for want of jurisdiction. The receiver is not obliged to accept such appointment, and in such a case as this, as the court was without power to appoint him, it must equally be without power to make any other order depending for its validity upon the order of appointment. The utmost that is left for a receiver appointed under such circumstances is his right of action for compensation against the party procuring his appointment. * * * So here it must result that the order allowing compensation, being based upon a void order appointing the receiver, is itself void."

79 Am. St. Rep. 140, that jurisdiction to appoint a receiver cannot be conferred upon a court by stipulation or consent of the parties. A stipulation of facts which would state a cause of action, of course, could be made, but jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action cannot be conferred by stipulation merely in so many words admitting jurisdiction. It would require a statement of facts, sufficient within themselves, stripped of any conclusion of law. If the complaints had been amended so as to contain all of the additional facts as set forth in the affidavits referred to by the petitioners, they would have contained conclusions of the affiants only. For instance some of the strongest averments being:

"The moneys were in fact trust funds and were intended to be held in trust for the making of said improvements. * * * The improvements would be seasonably and timely made."

And, further, in one of their affidavits which the petitioners apparently rely on is a statement which could be nothing more than a conclusion of what other parties might have concluded:

"We have no hesitancy in stating that each of said purchasers was led to believe that the money they were paying upon said property was to be used for the purpose of making the improvements that we have stated, prior to the time that it was diverted for any other purpose."

The mere averment that moneys paid on certain written contracts were in fact trust funds and were intended to be held in trust for making the improvements could not and would not add anything to any complaint, unless the facts were set forth sufficiently to show a trust. But in this case before the court, all of the things set forth in the affidavits were merely oral statements, or conclusions that were reached by affiants by reason of conclusions made at the time the oral statements were made by the parties, and would not and could not modify the written agreements, unless they were executed oral agreements.

We have treated this proceeding as being directed against Hartley Shaw as judge of the superior court, and we are not passing upon the question as to whether the peremptory writ would have to be limited to the exact, identical and full scope of the alternative writ.

The petition for a writ is denied.

GERMAN PUB. CO. v. SCHEIDT.
(Civ. 5337.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 22, 1926.)

Corporations §319(3) — President sued by corporation for recovery of money, paid to corporation for treasury stock and appropriated by him, cannot contend that contract for sale of such stock was illegal.

President sued by corporation for proceeds of check, given to corporation as purchase price for shares of treasury stock and appropriated by him, cannot question validity of contract for sale of such stock, in that corporation did not at the time have permit of corporation commissioner to sell such stock.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action for money had and received by the German Publishing Company against J. H. Scheidt. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for appellant.

Hugh P. Graves, of Fresno, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the defendant from a judgment against him in an action brought by plaintiff corporation to recover $1,500 alleged to have been received by defendant as the president of said corporation for the use and benefit of the corporation and wrongfully appropriated to his own use. The record contains a mass of conflicting testimony, rendered particularly unsatisfactory and confusing, in many instances, by the fact that many of the witnesses had a most imperfect and limited knowledge of the English language. However, out of the conflict, the trial court has found: That on or about November 3, 1922, defendant, while acting as president and director of plaintiff, received for the use and benefit of plaintiff the sum of $1,500 in cash; that plaintiff at said time was, and ever since has been, the lawful owner of and entitled to the immediate possession of the said $1,500; that defendant appropriated and used in his own private business the said $1,500 in cash received by him for plaintiff's use as aforesaid.

Our discussion will be confined merely to the evidence in the record which supports the findings. The transcript reveals that the plaintiff was the owner and publisher of a newspaper called the "California Post," with offices at Fresno, Cal. Defendant, while acting as president and director of plaintiff, received on November 1, 1922, a certain check for $1,500 belonging to plaintiff, drawn in favor of the "California Post Building Fund." This check had been given to Mr. Mayer, secretary of the plaintiff company, for the company by F. K. Emich in payment of the purchase price of 300 shares of the treasury stock of the company which it was agreed should thereafter be issued to Emich when a permit to issue additional stock could be obtained from the commissioner of corporations.

Before this payment by Emich the directors of the plaintiff company had passed a resolution and made plans for a new building for the conduct of its business, and to obtain the necessary funds for this purpose had agreed to levy an assessment upon the outstanding stock and to sell such additional stock as might be necessary to raise the amount required, and had also agreed that the money to be received from these sources should be deposited in the bank to the credit of the plaintiff, but in a special account, to be designated "California Post Building Fund" account. As we have stated, the check in question was drawn in favor of this fund. When it was received by the secretary he took it to the president of the corporation, the defendant here, who accepted it, expressly promising to deposit it in the account of plaintiff. At this time defendant had full knowledge of the facts herein recited, and promised to issue the treasury stock to Emich as soon as the permit should be received from the corporation commissioner. On December 12, 1922, this permit was received.

Instead of depositing the check in the account of plaintiff, defendant cashed it and used the proceeds in his personal business dealings and concealed this fact from the other stockholders and directors of the plaintiff corporation, who did not discover the misdirection of this money for several months.

During all this time, and until October, 1923, defendant retained in his own possession, at his store, the stock certificate book of the company, and refused to deliver it up or return it to the company's office, though repeatedly requested to do so by the secretary. On March 17, 1923, after repeated demands made upon defendant by Emich for issuance to him of the 300 shares of treasury stock which he had subscribed for, defendant, while acting as president and director of plaintiff, issued and delivered to Emich a certificate for 300 shares of company treasury stock.

Defendant refused to repay to plaintiff the $1,500 paid by Emich, and when action was brought to recover this amount he sought to justify his retention of it by claiming that the certificate for stock issued to Emich was not for company treasury stock, but represented a sale by him of 300 shares of his own stock in the company, and that this transaction was in accordance with an agreement between himself and Emich. There is testimony in the record emphatically contradicting such claim, and the trial court has found that there was no understanding or agreement of any kind at any time between John Mayer, F.

K. Emich and defendant, or either of them, that defendant should, at his election, apply the said $1,500 received by him for plaintiff's use and benefit in payment to himself for 300 shares or any shares of his own stock which he might thereafter elect to sell and transfer to said Emich, and that the $1,500 was not delivered to nor received by said defendant for such purpose. This last finding is supported by the record.

The foregoing discussion of the evidence and findings disposes of the appeal. The only question raised, outside of the claim that the evidence does not support the findings, is that the contract between the company and Emich for the sale of stock was illegal because at the time it was made the company did not have the permit of the corporation commissioner to sell this stock. This question cannot be raised by defendant in a collateral proceeding. He was not a party to the contract. He received the money for the corporation, and must account to the corporation for it.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte McDERMOTT. (Cr. 1331.)

1. Infants ⇐19—Order adjudicating minor a ward of juvenile court gives court discretion in determining custody of minor.

Order adjudicating minor ward of juvenile court transfers matter of her guardianship from parents to court, making it discretionary with court whether to permit minor to return to parents or to place minor in state institution.

2. Infants ⇐19—Giving custody of minor adjudicated ward of juvenile court to parents does not affect power of court to change custody (Juvenile Court Act, § 9 [St. 1915, p. 1225]).

Exercise of discretion by juvenile court in giving custody of minor adjudicated ward of court to her parents does not affect power of court to thereafter change order as to person or institution to be vested with custody of minor, in view of Juvenile Court Act, § 9.

3. Infants ⇐19—Change in custody of ward of juvenile court from parents to juvenile home for conduct not involving criminal charge does not require trial or hearing, and refusal to permit interview with attorney violates no rights of minor.

Change in custody of minor originally adjudged ward of juvenile court from parents to juvenile home because of irregularity in conduct not involving a criminal charge is within discretion of juvenile court, not requiring trial or hearing, and hence no rights of minor are violated by refusal to permit interview with attorney.

Application by Rosella McDermott, sometimes known as Rosalie McDermott, for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court, Erwin W. Owen, Judge, to secure the release of petitioner from the custody of the juvenile probation officer. Writ discharged.

Dorris & Henderson, of Bakersfield, for petitioner.

H. E. Schmidt, Dist. Atty., and Edward West, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. From the petition herein and the return thereto it appears that on January 22, 1922, after due proceedings had in the juvenile court in and for the county of Kern, an order was made by said court by which three minors, including the petitioner, were adjudged wards of the juvenile court. In connection therewith the said court further ordered "that until the further order of the court they (said wards) be allowed to go home with their parents upon the condition that they be properly cared for."

It further appears that nearly four years later, to wit, on the 14th day of November, 1925, at which time petitioner still being a ward of the juvenile court, under the direction or order of the judge of the said juvenile court, petitioner was removed from the home of her parents and placed in the juvenile home of the county of Kern; that thereupon the father of said petitioner employed a firm of attorneys to represent him "in preparing to resist any order of the said juvenile court in any wise changing the custody" of petitioner, and to represent petitioner "in any proceedings before said juvenile court"; that thereupon one of the members of said firm of attorneys applied to the judge of said juvenile court and to the probation officer of the county of Kern, who at that time had the custody and control of petitioner, for permission to consult with petitioner relative to the change in her custody, but that such permission was, and ever since has been, refused. Whereupon petitioner has besought this court to grant a writ of habeas corpus to the end that the rights of petitioner in the premises may be by this court determined.

In the case entitled In re Rider, 195 P. 965, 50 Cal. App. 797, a ward of the juvenile court, who was detained in a juvenile hall on a felony charge, complained that she was unlawfully restrained of her liberty by the superintendent thereof, in that the ward was denied the right of private consultation with her attorney for the purpose of enabling the ward to prepare for her defense on the said criminal charge. It was held that the claimed right of the ward was one of the fundamental guaranties of the American criminal law and one which no Legislature or court could ignore or violate. In re Snyder, 217 P. 777, 62 Cal. App. 697, is to the same effect.

One of the essential differences between the Rider Case and the case at bar is that in the former the ward was being detained on a felony charge against her which was about to be prosecuted, which of necessity involved the preparation of a defense, and, as ordinarily incidental thereto, frequent confidential consultations between the defendant and her attorney; while in the instant case the ward has not been accused of the commission of any criminal offense, but is being detained in the juvenile home primarily under the original order by which she was adjudged a ward of the juvenile court; and, secondarily, because of some alleged irregularities in her conduct necessitating or at least suggesting the desirability of a change in her care and custody. It does not appear that any trial or proceeding of any character is pending or contemplated with reference thereto.

[1, 2] The order of the court by which petitioner was made a ward of the juvenile court of necessity had the effect of transferring the matter of her guardianship from her parents to the court itself, and it thereupon became discretionary with the court whether to permit the minor to return to the home of her parents or to place her within the care and custody of some state institution. In re Hunter, 195 P. 76, 50 Cal. App. 285. Although the actual physical care of the minor was in the parents, the ward was rightfully under the final control of the court, rather than under the control of her parents. The discretion of the court as to the custody of the minor having been exercised in favor of the parents of the minor at the time she was declared to be a ward of the court did not of itself in any manner affect the power of the court to thereafter change the order as to the person in whom or the institution in which should be vested the custody of the minor. The authority of the court to make the necessary order changing the custody of the minor from her parents to the officers of the juvenile home is contained in section 9 of the Juvenile Court Act (Stats. 1915, p. 1225), as follows:

"Any order made by the court in case of any person subject to the jurisdiction of the court * * * may at any time be changed, modified or set aside as to the judge may seem meet and proper. * * *"

[3] As heretofore suggested, the case here is not that of a person accused of the commission of a crime who is denied the privilege of consulting with his attorney. It is simply a question of the right of the lawful guardian of a minor to change the physical custody of the ward. The facts involved are somewhat similar to those which might be present if the prison board, having jurisdiction over some person who theretofore had been convicted of a criminal offense and who had been committed to one of the state prisons, were to order that the prisoner be transferred to some other state penal institution, or if the proper authorities in charge of the state insane hospitals were to direct that a patient therein should be transferred from one state hospital for the insane to another such institution. No question of a trial or a hearing of any sort is involved in such a transaction. It involves purely a matter of judgment or discretion on the part of the person, board, or tribunal having authority or jurisdiction in the premises. In the instant case, for reasons apparently sufficient to the judge of the juvenile court, he has directed or ordered that the ward be taken from the care and custody of some person or persons, and that thereafter the ward be in the care and custody of some other person or institution. No trial or hearing or court proceeding is necessary or incident to such a transaction, and consequently no rights of the ward in such a connection can be violated or abridged in the premises. So far as this particular order is concerned, it appearing that no legal rights of the ward are involved therein, neither necessity nor occasion exists for the advice of an attorney in relation thereto.

It is ordered that the writ be and it is discharged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Charles A. Black against W. O. Black. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Cowan and A. W. Hollingsworth, both of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

R. M. Barrett, of Santa Rosa, and F. W. McConnell, of Healdsburg, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action in unlawful detainer. The plaintiff was, prior to and at the time of the commencement of this action, the owner of a certain tract of improved land in Sonoma county, which is described in the complaint by metes and bounds, and which has been and was, down to the time of the filing of the complaint herein, devoted to farming, horticultural, and viticultural uses and purposes. The complaint alleges that, on or about the 1st day of November, 1923, the plaintiff, by an oral lease made on said day, leased to the defendant the said land, together with certain farming tools and implements, for the term of one year beginning November 1, 1923, and ending October 31, 1924, upon an agreement upon the part of defendant that he would, at his own expense, prune, plow, cultivate, "and carefully tend the said farm and the orchards and crops thereon in a good and farmerlike manner for the said term, and harvest said crops and deliver the same at the place of market, and which said crops were to be sold by and in the name of the plaintiff herein, and the gross proceeds were to be equally divided between plaintiff and defendant." It is further likewise alleged that defendant, by virtue of the provisions of said agreement of lease, entered into and took possession of said farm, and continued to possess and occupy the same during said term; that, ever since the termination of said lease on the 31st day of October, 1924, the defendant, contrary to the terms of said agreement of lease, has wrongfully continued in the possession of the said land or farm in person, after the expiration of the term for which it was let to him, and without the permission of plaintiff; that, on or about the 1st day of July, 1924, "and thereafter repeatedly, and at various times before the expiration of the term of said lease" on the 31st day of October, 1924, plaintiff expressly notified defendant that he (plaintiff) would not renew said lease, and demanded and requested him (defendant) to vacate and surrender the said premises upon the expiration of said term, and that the said defendant refused, and still refuses, to vacate the said farm and premises and property or to deliver the same to plaintiff, and has ever since the termination of said lease withheld, and still withholds, the possession thereof from the plaintiff, to his damage in the sum of $500.

The prayer is for a restitution of the premises to plaintiff, and for damages for the alleged wrongful withholding of the same in the sum above named.

A demurrer to the complaint on both general and special grounds was interposed by defendant and by the court overruled. Thereupon the defendant answered, admitting plaintiff's ownership of the land or farm described in the complaint, but specifically denying all the other material averments thereof.

The cause was tried by the court without the aid of a jury, and findings and judgment were for the plaintiff for the restitution of the premises, and costs. The defendant appeals from said judgment upon a bill of exceptions.

[1-4] The general contention urged by the defendant on this appeal is that the findings do not derive support from the evidence. This contention, however, involves and submits to us for solution this question: Whether the lease to defendant of the premises was, according to the evidence, or the testimony of plaintiff himself, for a definite and limited term of one year, or only from year to year, which, as the cases sometimes characterize such an estate, is a "periodic tenancy." The importance of the question thus propounded is thus to be explained: That, if by the agreement of lease, an estate for years was created—that is to say, a lease for a determinate term, as for a year—then, in that case, the holding over the term fixed or agreed upon by the tenant would amount to a trespass, and the landlord, without first giving the tenant written notice to quit the premises, would be authorized to take possession, or, in case the tenant refused to deliver up possession, proceed in and maintain an action of unlawful detainer or proceed in any other authorized way, for restitution or possession of the premises. On the other hand, if the tenancy was from year to year, and the tenant held over after the termination of the tenancy as fixed by the lease, then, in order to terminate the tenancy notice to vacate as prescribed by law (see section 789, Civ. Code, and section 1162, Code Civ. Proc.) must be given the tenant as a prerequisite to the maintenance by the landlord of an action to secure possession, which notice, it is conceded, was not given to nor served on defendant. Certain other rules relating to the leasing of real property may as well be stated at this point, viz.: (1) That an agreement not in writing for the leasing of real property for a period longer than one year is invalid (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5); (2) that, "if a lessee of real property remains in possession thereof after the expiration of the hiring, and the lessor accepts rent from him, the parties are presumed to have renewed the hiring on the same terms and for the same time, not exceeding one month when the rent is payable monthly, nor in any case one year" (Civ. Code, § 1945). But this is a disputable presumption, the force of which is subject to be overcome by other evidence.

"The implication of a new term created by the payment of rent after the expiration of the first term is an implication of fact merely. It is evidence from which an agreement for a new or further term may be inferred or presumed. If it be shown that, in point of fact, a new agreement was made, such new agreement would, of course, destroy the implication of a different term, which might otherwise be presumed from the subsequent payment of rent." Skaggs v. Elkus, 45 Cal. 154, 160.

Or, as the rule is stated in 35 C. J. 1104:

"Where the holding over is in conformity with a new and express agreement, a tenancy from year to year inconsistent with such agreement will not arise, as, for example, * * * where the tenant holds under express successive renewals of the lease for definite terms of a year, he is tenant for years and not from year to year."

[5] As to the evidence, it appears that the plaintiff, who is the father of the defendant, first let the latter have possession of the premises described in the complaint in the year 1916, upon an agreement and understanding that they were to divide between them in equal parts or shares the crops raised on the farm during said year; that, after the crops for the year 1916 were gathered, the defendant departed from the premises, but, in the year 1917, returned and proposed to plaintiff a lease of the property upon the same terms as those upon which he worked the farm in the previous year. The proposition was assented to by plaintiff. The proposition of a written lease was discussed between them, but it was finally decided that defendant would take a verbal lease. The defendant thereupon entered into the possession of the premises under said lease at some time between the 1st and 10th of April, 1917. At the end of the year in 1918, so plaintiff testified, a new oral agreement of lease was entered into between the parties. By said agreement the plaintiff leased the premises to the defendant for the term of one year, beginning with the 1st of November, 1918, upon the same terms as those upon which defendant held possession under the previous lease. The defendant continued in the possession of the property down to the date of the commencement of this action.

The plaintiff testified that the leases during the period from and including the year 1917 to and including the "lease" year ending on the 30th of October, 1924, were made each year "from year to year." Thus he testified:

"Q. When did Oscar first go on the place? A. 1916—some time in February.

"Q. And then, after that, did you and he have any agreement with reference to the year 1917? A. We had.

"Q. When was that agreement made? A. Between the 1st and 10th of April, 1917.

"Q. Now, what was that agreement? A. Oscar was to take the property and lease the property, take good care of it, harvest the crops, deliver them, and pay all the expenses of the ranch, and give me half.

"Q. Was anything said as to how long that was to run? A. That was just from year to year.

"Q. The first time you said this was done was in April, 1917? A. That would be from the 1st of April to November 1st of the same year.

"Q. What was your arrangement, if any, between you from November 1st on thereafter? * * *

A. Same agreement.

"Q. November 1, 1917? A. Yes.

"Q. From year to year you say? A. From year to year.

"Q. For how long? A. From November 1st each year.

"Q. Down to what time; down to the present time? A. Down to the present time.

"Q. That is down to last year, 1924? A. Yes.

"Q. What was your arrangement, if any, with Oscar for the year 1924 beginning November 1, 1923? A. Just the same as the others.

"The Court: Q. Did you have a conversation in 1923 about the renewal of the lease? A. In '23—that would be from '23 to '24?

"Q. That would be a year ago last November. A. Yes, they are all identical, the same all the way through for each year. I had several talks with Oscar between November 1, 1923, and November 1, 1924, about renewing the lease from 1925. In July of 1924 I told him I would not renew the lease."

On cross-examination plaintiff testified:

"Q. Did you say anything to him about the terms on which he was working in 1916? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did you say? A. He had the property leased under the same terms he has always had. He continued in 1916 the same as in 1914 and has continued ever since the same way.

"Q. And did you say anything each particular year; you just let it run along the same way? A. No; each year he would just rent from year to year.

"Q. Well, there was nothing said about it; you just let it go on the same old way? A. Yes, there was always something said. * * * In 1916 he left after the crop was harvested. He went away from the place. I don't know that he went right exactly just at that particular time. He was backwards and forwards. Nothing was said about leaving that I know of. They came back and wanted to lease the place in '17.

"Q. He came back, and wanted to draw up a lease? A. Yes, sir; this was the one we were talking about.

"Q. There was nothing said about leaving in 1916; whether he was coming back or not? A. Not that I remember of.

"Q. In 1917 you say he came back in April? A. No, about the 1st of April.

"Q. What conversation did you have with him then about the place? A. He had it in 1916, and I said I would give it to him on the same terms, and those were the terms agreed upon. I told him we would have it drawn up in writing. He asked for a lease. I went to Mr. Ornbaum and had it drawn up, and took it out to the ranch. He had never moved his things away from there. We read the lease over, and he objected to signing it, and neither of us signed it. Then he started in doing the work, harvesting the crop, and continued there during 1917. My wife and I were living there all the time. The 1917 crop was sold under the name of C. A. Black & Son, and we divided the money from that crop. I collected the money for the crop, and then divided it with Oscar.

"Q. He went on in 1918 in the same manner? A. Same manner.

"Q. And then he went on in 1919 in the same manner? A. '19 same manner.

"Q. You and your wife lived there a portion of that time, did you? A. We left there in the spring of 1919, but I worked there during the summer of '19.

"Q. He continued there in 1920 in the same manner? A. In 1920 in the same manner, all except the payment.

"Q. I mean in reference to the farming and the place, they went on just the same as in 1919? A. Oh, yes.

"Q. And did the same in 1920? A. Yes.

"Q. 1921? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. 1922? A. Yes.

"Q. 1923? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And 1924? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Continued on, Oscar as he always had? A. As he always had.

"Q. And you never had any new or any different understanding with him? A. No, it was just always handled the same way from one year to another.

"Q. You just settled up at the end of every year? A. A true and correct statement of each and every year.

"Q. Now you mean you rendered him a statement every year? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Do you mean that you rendered a statement to Oscar at the end of each year showing just exactly how much was received and how much was paid out? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And also a statement showing how much you had taken in? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. Now, in 1918 after the crop was taken off, did you say anything to your son about renting the place? A. '19 and '18?

"Q. Yes. A. We leased it to him for the same terms.

"Q. Well, did you talk about it? A. Well, nothing more than we had an agreement that he would stay on the place and lease it under the same terms.

"Q. Until you sold the place or in case of your death? A. No; no understanding he was to stay there until I sold the place. I just leased it to him from year to year.

"Q. At the end of the '19 year did you say anything to him about continuing on the place? A. Except continuing on the place from year to year.

"Q. What did you say at the end of 1919? What did you say about staying there? A. Just leased it to him the same as we had been.

"The Court: Q. He is asking you after your crops were harvested and sold in the fall of 1919, did you and your son have any talk about the renewal of the lease for the following year? Did you have any talk about it? If so, what was the talk? A. Nothing more than we just agreed upon the terms for the next year the same as we had been running on.

"Mr. Cowan: Q. You told him if he wanted to stay on another year he might stay on the same terms? A. Yes.

"Q. 1920 did you have any conversation? A. About the same each year.

"Q. Now in 1922 where did you have any conversation with him? A. I don't know of any particular place.

"Q. Did you ever have any with him? A. Yes, we have always had an understanding at the end of each year.

"Q. Do you mean to say you talked it over at the end of each year? A. Yes; we always had an understanding whether he wanted to stay on the place, I re-leased it to him.

"Q. If he wanted it, he could have it? If he wanted to move off, he could leave it? A. If he wanted to run it again he could?

"Q. Yes. A. Yes; he could go on with it.

"Q. You didn't have any talk with him in 1923? A. Yes; we had.

"Q. Where? A. I think we were over in the prune dipper somewhere.

"Q. Who was there? A. Oscar and I.

"Q. Anybody else? A. Nobody as I know of.

"Q. What did you say to him then? A. We just talked it over, and said he would go ahead with the ranch; lease it on the same terms again."

[6, 7] Emphasis is put upon the statements frequently made by plaintiff that the agreement "was made from year to year," and "on the same terms" as those upon which the premises were leased for the preceding year or years, the interpretation of those statements by counsel for defendant being that plaintiff thus intended to say, and, in fact, did say, that the lease was from year to year; that is, not for a definite or limited period of time. But the trial court, as its findings indicate, interpreted those statements by the plaintiff by the light of his unqualified statement, repeatedly made, to the effect that in each year prior to the expiration of the term then existing he took up with defendant the matter of a further lease of the property for another year upon the terms upon which defendant then had possession thereof under the lease or leases previously made. We find no reason for doubting the soundness of that interpretation of those statements. The plaintiff repeatedly stated in a positive way that, at the end of each term in every year of the several during which the defendant held the property as the tenant of plaintiff, he would ask the defendant whether he desired to continue with the leasing of the property upon the terms upon which he had always held it from the time he first took possession thereof as a tenant, and that the latter invariably agreed to the proposition, and proceeded as under the previous leases. What, therefore, plaintiff intended to say, when making the statement that the lease was "from year to year and upon the same terms as the other leases were made and carried out (and this was the view of the trial court, as we must construe its findings), was that in every year succeeding the first year of the lease of the premises to him a new agreement of lease was made upon the same terms, as to rental, as the preceding lease or leases had been made." In other words, "from year to year he made a new agreement upon the terms upon which the previous agreements of lease were made." This is a reasonable and just interpretation of the statements referred to, and, as stated, presumptively, in view of the conclusion upon the facts arrived at by the trial court, as indicated by the findings, the interpretation thereof by that court. If, indeed, the interpretation thus given said statements is not sustainable, or, if, as defendant contends, plaintiff intended thus to say that the tenancy at all times was one "from year to year" in the legal concept of that expression, said statement would then involve purely a legal conclusion and, therefore, wholly lacking in probative quality, and thus there would be left of an evidentiary character before the trial court upon the question at issue the testimony of plaintiff only that he always asked defendant each year whether he desired to continue to hold the property under lease for another year, the irresistible inference from which is, if believed (and, obviously, the trial court believed it), that the lease each year was for a definite and fixed term, limited to one year, and, of course, the testimony of defendant inconsistent therewith or tending to prove that there never was any determinate or definite term agreed upon, but that he took possession and retained it from year to year upon the general understanding between himself and plaintiff that he (defendant) should continue to maintain such possession as a tenant until plaintiff should at or before the expiration of any one year elect to terminate it. Thus the findings as to the nature of the tenancy created are safely grounded on plaintiff's testimony other than the statements referred to. Of course, the testimony of the defendant at variance with that of plaintiff merely created a conflict in the evidence which it was solely the duty of the trial court to resolve and settle.

In their nature, the facts, as they were testified to by plaintiff concerning the hiring or leasing of the premises for the year ending October 31, 1924, are strikingly similar to those in the case of Johnson v. Foreman, 40 Ill. App. 456. In that case, the original leases were written, and each provided for a definite term of one year for each of nine consecutive years. The tenant, after the expiration of the term covering the ninth year, no written lease having been executed for the tenth year, nevertheless remained and continued in possession and occupancy of the demised premises. The plaintiff in said case testified:

"Q. What was done when that (the written lease for the ninth year) ran out? A. He continued on another year.

"Q. Without a written lease? A. Without a written lease.

"Q. Was any new arrangement made at all? A. None at all, except for the year. He said he would stay another year."

The Court of Appeal held that the latter part of the testimony of the plaintiff in that case, "he said he would stay another year," effected a lease of the premises for a definite term, to wit, one year. The court said:

"When one is a tenant of premises for a year, under either a written or a valid verbal lease, and the tenant and landlord come together at the end of the year, and the tenant says to the landlord that he will stay for another year, and the landlord assents to it and rent is paid at the former rate, that is leasing for one year, and does not create a tenancy from year to year. A tenancy from year to year will be created where a tenant holds over, after the expiration of a former lease, for one or more years, and pays rent, nothing being said between the parties, no agreement as to the time he shall hold being made."

The case here, candor will force the admission, is much stronger in the showing of the creation of a tenancy for years than is the case from which the above excerpt is taken, and we agree that the testimony of plaintiff in that case was amply sufficient to show the creation of a tenancy or an estate for a definite and limited time or term.

The judgment is affirmed.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for occupying room with paraphernalia for recording or registering bets in violation of Pen. Code, § 337a.

2. Criminal law ☞535(2)—Corpus delicti held sufficiently established independently of extrajudicial confession by defendant (Pen. Code, § 337a).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 337a, for occupancy of room with paraphernalia for recording bets, corpus delicti held sufficiently established independently of extrajudicial confession by defendant.

3. Criminal law ☞535(1).

Conviction cannot be had on extrajudicial admissions or confessions of defendant, unless corroborated by proof aliunde, the corpus delicti.

4. Criminal law ☞680(2).

Admission of proof of extrajudicial confession before corpus delicti is fully established is not prejudicial error.

5. Criminal law ☞404(4)—Large sheet and tickets taken from defendant's possession held properly admitted in prosecution for occupying room with paraphernalia for registering bets (Pen. Code, § 337a).

Exhibits consisting of large sheet, paper, and tickets taken from defendant's possession held properly admitted, in prosecution under Pen. Code, § 337a, for occupying room with paraphernalia for registering bets, as tending to throw light on transaction, though there was no evidence that defendant was using them for purposes alleged.

6. Indictment and information ☞98.

Information charging in separate paragraphs violations of Pen. Code, § 337a, subs. 2, 3, and 4, is not fatally defective for want of numbering of such counts.

7. Criminal law ☞1032(4).

That counts of information were not numbered cannot be successfully urged on appeal, in absence of demurrer in lower court.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

T. H. Hatfield was convicted of occupying a room with paraphernalia for registering bets, in violation of statute, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Edwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the people.

CRAIG, J. An information filed by the district attorney of San Diego county charged the appellant with having violated certain subdivisions of section 337a of the Penal Code, one of which prohibits the occupancy of a room or any part thereof "with a book or books, paper or papers, apparatus, device or paraphernalia, for the purpose of recording or registering any bet or bets, or any purported bet or bets, * * * or of selling pools, or purported pools, upon the result, or purported result, of any trial, or purported trial, or contest, or purported contest, of skill, speed or power of endurance of man or beast," etc. The information consisted of three counts, alleging, respectively, the violation of subdivisions 2, 3, and 4 of said section, in that appellant maintained and occupied such a room with the books, papers, and paraphernalia for registering bets and selling pools on horse races; that he received, held, and forwarded money to be staked and bet on the results of horse races; and that he recorded and registered bets and wagers on the results of such contests. He was convicted upon the first count only, and appeals from the judgment upon several grounds.

The argument urged for reversal divides itself into two points: (1) That the corpus delicti was not proven independently of the admissions or confessions of the defendant; and (2) that such admissions or confessions were admitted in evidence before the corpus delicti had been shown or established.

[1, 2] It appears that appellant and a partner conducted a cigar store in the city of San Diego, over which they maintained a clubroom, which contained a dice counter or gambling table, a telephone, and card tables, and chairs. The first evidence offered by the prosecution was that of a police sergeant, who testified that on the afternoon of December 4, 1923, he entered the clubroom conducted by appellant; that appellant and one Tubbs were then standing by the dice counter, where they had some small tickets and papers, which they were marking; that, upon the approach of the officer, appellant folded the tickets and papers, and a large sheet upon which were some markings, and held them down behind the counter. The officer testified that he took possession of these tickets and papers and arrested appellant, with the remark:

"You know that you have been warned time and again about bookmaking, and I will have to take you down to the police station for bookmaking this time."

He also swore that he retained possession of all such tickets and papers until the preliminary examination, whereupon he identified them, and they were delivered into court upon the arraignment. They were identified by the witness at the trial, and were then introduced and marked for identification.

Motion to exclude the statement of the officer, above quoted, was made, and was denied by the court. The district attorney thereupon propounded the following question: "What, if anything, further did he say at that time?" Strenuous objections were made that—

"It is attempting to prove the corpus delicti by statements on the part of the defendant before any crime has been proven at all; attempts to prove the corpus delicti by statements, admissions, or confessions of the defendant which are incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial at this time."

Counsel for the people promised to connect it up later, and the objection was overruled. The trial court held that the statements might be considered in establishing the corpus delicti; that there must be some evidence at least to make a prima facie case without them, but that it was a question of order of proof, and, if the corpus delicti should subsequently be established, the statements might be considered. The witness was then permitted to testify that the defendant said:

"Can't you let me off this time; I will promise you that I will not do this again. I have been taking bets here, but I won't do it again."

Another police officer who testified that he had had about five years' experience with bookmaking paraphernalia as used in San Diego and at Tia Juana, Mexico, stated that he had observed their operation about every day or so during that time, and understood them. This witness testified that the slips marked for identification bore the name and number of the horse, and the odds on its chances to win races, and that such was the general method of bookmakers in registering and recording bets on horse races; that the large sheet was a bookmaker's chart, bearing the name and position of each horse, the particular race, the weight each horse would carry, and the odds offered. A third witness identified the documents in the same manner, pointing out the names of horses, odds, initials of persons who had placed bets, and the results of various races. The papers and slips were introduced in evidence, and appear in the record before us. There were seventy-eight such slips, and a chart, as described by the witnesses, the latter bearing headings, "First Race, 6 Furlongs," "Second Race, 6 Furlongs," etc., to and including the "Seventh Race, Mile and Seventy Yards."

We think there was ample evidence to warrant the jury in believing that appellant occupied a room with the alleged paraphernalia. It is objected that there was no evidence that he maintained the room for gain, hire, or reward, but the section in question specifically includes "every person * * * who, whether for gain, hire, reward, or gratuitously, or otherwise," shall keep or occupy for any period of time, a room for such purposes, and applies to "every person or persons who may do in a single instance any one of the acts specified." Appellant was not convicted of the offense of receiving wages upon horse races, nor of having recorded and registered them, but a thorough, careful review of the evidence, an exhaustive outline of which we have set forth, is manifestly convincing in its tendency to establish the fact that appellant was, when arrested, occupying a room with papers and paraphernalia for the purposes forbidden by the statute. And we should be equally impelled to deny a reversal upon this ground, in the absence of appellant's alleged admission, since the witnesses positively testified as to the nature and purposes of the documents which were taken from the defendant when arrested, and they were not impeached, nor was their testimony denied.

Cases are also cited to the effect that extrajudicial statements should not be introduced until after the corpus delicti has been proven, and holding that "then and then only may the admissions of the accused be used to show that he is the one committing it." People v. De Martini, 194 P. 506, 508, 50 Cal. App. 109, 113. But in each of the cases mentioned the order of proof was not directly attacked. It was held that there was no evidence outside of the confessions, except hearsay, and the Supreme Court, in People v. Frey, 131 P. 127, 165 Cal. 140, 145, said that without such other proof a conviction could not be sustained.

[4] It has repeatedly been held, however, that, while it is ordinarily the proper practice to establish the corpus delicti previously to offering evidence of admissions or confessions, "we are, however, not to be understood as holding that a mere variation in the order of proof would be prejudicial to the defendant." People v. Jones, 55 P. 698, 123 Cal. 65; People v. Fallon, 86 P. 689, 149 Cal. 287." People v. Besold, 97 P. 871, 873, 154 Cal. 363, 368. Other authorities announcing the same principle are: People v. Ward, 66 P. 372, 134 Cal. 301, 306; People v. Wilkins, 111 P. 612, 158 Cal. 530, 535; People v. Saunders, 110 P. 825, 13 Cal. App. 743, 747; People v. Barnovich, 117 P. 572, 16 Cal. App. 427, 430; People v. Hinshaw, 182 P. 59, 40 Cal. App. 672.

[5] It is next insisted that the exhibits were not admissible, because there was no evidence that appellant was using them for the purposes alleged in the information. We think there was strong circumstantial evidence of appellant's guilty connection with the exhibits in question, and it is not here material whether or not he was registering wagers thereon when apprehended. Appellant concedes that exhibits may be received in evidence, if they tend to throw light upon the transaction and to prove the offense itself, and we therefore take his proper enunciation of the rule to be that, if the exhibits inhibited by the statute were such as they were alleged to be, they were admissible. The jury must have believed the testimony of the officers, one of whom testified that the defendant was, at the time of his arrest, occupying the room, and then possessed, and apparently was attempting to conceal, the slips and papers used by gamblers for recording and registering purported bets upon the results of races or contests of speed of horses. These documents cast a convincing light upon the transaction, and constituted the major element of the offense charged. There is no merit in this contention.

Another reason advanced to support the claim that the exhibits were inadmissible is the assertion that it was not shown that they were ever used in an unlawful manner or for unlawful purposes, and that until such showing was made it was erroneous to receive expert testimony as to what they were. Appellant concedes that People v. Hinkle, 221 P. 693, 64 Cal. App. 375, has held that it is permissible for an officer to testify that certain exhibits were registers of bets. He attempts to differentiate this case from the one before us by calling attention to the fact that the defendant here was acquitted of having received and held money for bets and of recording bets. We fail to see how this fact alters the rule of evidence which permitted the admission of the testimony of an expert. We think the case of People v. Hinkle is controlling, and that further discussion of the point is unnecessary. However, it may be added that the record does not disclose that any objection was interposed to the testimony of the officers; hence, their testimony having been admitted, a sufficient foundation was laid for admission of the exhibits themselves.

[6, 7] The third point raised by appellant is that the information did not separately state the three offenses which he was charged with having committed. They were alleged in separate paragraphs, and it is said in the briefs that each was founded, respectively, upon subdivisions 2, 3, and 4, of section 337a of the Penal Code. We cannot say that the omission of the numbering of the charges or counts rendered the information so defective that the rights of the defendant were prejudiced thereby. At all events, no demurrer was interposed to the information, and it cannot be questioned here. People v. Gonzales (Cal. App.) 237 P. 812.

The only remaining contention of appellant is that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the verdict. This point we have heretofore discussed, and, having decided that it is untenable, it requires no further consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; WORKS, J.

PEOPLE v. WARDWELL. (Cr. 870.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 10, 1926. Rehearing Denied April 9, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 3, 1926.)

1. Banks and banking ⚡62—Embezzlement ⚡44(6)—Evidence held to show actual shortage of assets, not mere book shortage.

In prosecution for embezzlement and falsification of bank records, evidence held to show an actual shortage of assets, caused by defendant's manipulations, and not a mere book shortage.

2. Embezzlement ⚡44(1).

Evidence held to warrant conviction of embezzlement of bank funds.

3. Banks and banking ⚡62—Embezzlement ⚡42.

In prosecution of bank manager for embezzlement of bank funds and falsifying certificate of deposit, record evidence of general shortage of assets held admissible.

4. Banks and banking ⚡62—Charge of felonious omission to make entry of certificate of deposit issued by defendant, sufficiently states public offense, though not alleging that omission pertained to business of bank.

Charge that defendant, as manager of bank, with intention to deceive, willfully and feloniously omitted to make record of time certificate of deposit issued by him, sufficiently states a public offense, though it is not alleged that omissions and false entry pertain to business or affairs of bank, since this reasonably appears from facts alleged.

5. Embezzlement ⚡48(1)—Instruction that crime of embezzlement is proved if money was used to cover another shortage or in transaction with which bank had no connection, held proper.

Instruction that crime of embezzlement is proved, if defendant used money of bank to cover up some other shortage in assets of bank or in some transaction with which bank had no connection, held proper.

6. Criminal law ⚡720(7)—On proof that assets of bank had disappeared and records falsified, district attorney may draw any reasonable inferences therefrom as to means by which assets were appropriated.

In prosecution for embezzlement and falsification of bank records, on proof that assets of bank intrusted to defendant had disappeared, and that defendant had falsified records, district attorney had right to draw any reasonable inferences therefrom as to means employed in appropriating assets.

7. Criminal law ⚡1129(1)—Statements of district attorney not assigned as misconduct, which defendant requested court to instruct jury to disregard, cannot be complained of on appeal.

Where defendant requested court to admonish jury to disregard statements of district attorney, but did not assign such statements as misconduct, they cannot be complained of on appeal.

8. Criminal law ⚡720(7).

Argument of prosecuting counsel in embezzlement case held not beyond bounds of permissible deduction.

9. Embezzlement ⚡44(6)—Particular method by which embezzlement was affected need not be shown, where bank assets were fraudulently appropriated by some means for some unlawful purpose (Pen. Code, § 504).

Prosecution need not prove particular method by which embezzlement was affected, where it appears that defendant fraudulently appropriated assets of bank by some means to some unlawful use, as required by Pen. Code, § 504; it being a fair inference that defendant appropriated assets to own use.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

G. E. Wardwell was convicted of embezzlement and falsification of bank records, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. K. Wylie, of Alturas, and N. J. Barry and Hardin Barry, both of Susanville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The information herein contains 18 counts. The first 14 counts charge embezzlements of moneys, and the remaining counts charge falsifications of bank records. Counts 1 and 10 were dismissed, and the defendant was convicted of the crimes charged in the others. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

The Lassen Industrial Bank is located at Susanville. It maintains a branch bank at Bieber, which will be referred to as the Bieber Bank. During the times herein mentioned, the Bieber Bank had funds on deposit in the Anglo & London Paris National Bank of San Francisco. The latter bank will be referred to as the Anglo Bank. The defendant entered the employ of the Bieber Bank as a clerk December 3, 1916. In the early part of 1922 he became assistant manager, and about May 10, 1923, he was promoted to the position of manager, and thereafter served in that capacity until May 10, 1924. During the first years of his employment he "made the remittances, sorted checks, kept the individual ledger." He kept all the records for two or three years before he became manager and made the daily reports to the Lassen Bank. During the time he was manager, he was alone in the bank, except that he had a boy to assist him for about two months and another boy for two or three months. Immediately prior to the time he became manager, he was engaged "in the garage business * * * a little over a year or a year and a half." He was agent for and sold "some" automobiles, sold automobile accessories, and carried on a general garage business. He also "had a sporting goods store and selling guns and taxidermy work." In June, 1923, he sold his store and his garage business.

The second count charges the embezzlement of $5,400 on or about July 20, 1923. The evidence shows that on July 11, 1923, John Pallido presented his personal check, drawn on the Alturas Branch Bank of Ft. Bidwell, and payable to the Bieber Bank, for the sum of $5,400, and that a time certificate of deposit was thereupon issued to him by defendant for the amount of the check. The certificate was left with defendant, but was not paid until after he left the bank. The defendant properly entered the certificate in the time certificate register. In the "date paid" column he wrote in red ink "6/24/23." He entered the $5,400 as a credit in the time certificate of deposit account in the general ledger on the 12th day of July, 1923, and the same sum on the debit side 4 days later. He then made out and kept a deposit slip showing a credit to Pallido's checking account in the sum of $5,400, and entered the same on the cash sheet, but not in the general ledger. Neither did he credit Pallido's check account in the ledger with any sum. The defendant testified:

"Pallido come into the bank with a check for $5,400 and put it on time certificate. I sent the $5,400 into the Anglo in the regular way, and issued him time certificate, and he gave the check (certificate) to me, and left it there in my charge, and it was my impression he said he would leave it there, and, if he wanted any money to buy sheep, all he would have to do was to notify us, and we would transfer it to the checking account, and on the 20th day of July I transferred it to his checking account, but didn't give him a ledger sheet for some cause or other."

Pallido had not directed the transfer, and he then had to his credit in his checking account about $1,800. The net result of the defendant's acts was to reduce the bank's liabilities on the records in the sum of $5,400. The other charges of embezzlement all relate to amounts for which certificates of deposit were issued by defendant. In two instances he made no record whatever, and in the others he entered them in the time certificate register and marked them "paid" without any payment having been made. The course pursued was not the same in every instance as that in connection with the Pallido certificate, but the effect was to so falsify the records as to show that all of such certificates had been paid and had ceased to be liabilities of the bank, when in fact they were all outstanding obligations. There is no contention to the contrary. It would serve no useful purpose, therefore, to lengthen this opinion by a detailed statement of the various false entries made by defendant in connection with the other certificates. The amounts charged by the other counts to have been embezzled are as follows: July 10, 1923, $1,000; December 2, 1923, $1,000; December 14, 1923, $560; December 8, 1923, $500; January 4, 1924, $550; February 15, 1924, $1,000; February 10, 1924, $500; February 13, 1924, $1,200; February 13, 1924, $3,800; April 28, 1924, $1,600; August 7, 1923, $6,073.35. The foregoing amounts and dates correspond with the amounts of the certificates and the false dates of payment thereof as entered by defendant in the register. By the fifteenth and sixteenth counts the defendant is charged with failure to make any record of the two certificates which he did not enter in the books of the bank. By the seventeenth and eighteenth counts he is charged with making false entries in the records of the bank.

After defendant had left the bank, and while its officers were endeavoring to disentangle its affairs, upon inquiries made by them, they were informed by defendant that he had removed some of the sheets from the ledger and placed them in a safe deposit box, of which he had the key. The defendant surrendered the key, and 139 individual ledger sheets were found in the box, also some checks and deposit slips. These ledger sheets showed balances due depositors in the aggregate sum of $61,455.91. The outstanding certificates of deposit were over $30,000 more than the books showed. The sum of $6,000 more than the books showed was due depositors in the savings department. The savings account of one depositor had a balance of $4,270.83 on the 11th of February, 1924. The defendant transferred the whole thereof to the general commercial account of the bank, closed the savings account of the depositor, without giving him any credit in his checking account or otherwise, and drew a draft on the Anglo Bank for the exact amount of such savings account. The defendant testified that he did this because the Bieber Bank's commercial account with the Anglo Bank was running low. Numerous other manipulations of the books were shown which had the effect of lowering the record liabilities of the Bieber Bank, but it is deemed unnecessary to enumerate them all. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the assets of the bank had been depleted in the aggregate of more than $100,000.

tors, employed E. M. Wilson, a competent expert accountant, to audit its books and affairs. Wilson was given every opportunity to make a thorough investigation, and the defendant was permitted to work with him. The bank later employed Wilson to make a further examination. He testified that there did not appear to have been any shortage on the 31st of August, 1920; that on August 31, 1921, there was a shortage of $13,609.05; on May 14, 1923, $47,191.98 in the commercial accounts and $525 in the certificate of deposits account; and on May 22, 1924, $59,441.95 in the commercial accounts, $20,986.83 in recorded certificates of deposit, $13,215.84 in unregistered certificates, $4,000 in notes receivable, $6,063.27 in savings account, and $1,943.63 in the account with the Anglo Bank, making a total shortage at that time of $105,651.52.

The account books of the bank are of the loose-leaf type, the sheets thereof being unnumbered and interchangeable. The defendant testified:

"There was a shortage when I took charge of the bank, and I took those leaves out of the ledger and filed them away to get by the bank examiner and keep the bank on its feet until such time as I could find the errors and go and show what happened. * * * I thought I could show the bankers where it was and make a big name for myself and get some place."

He further testified that he then thought the shortage was about $30,000; that he first discovered there was a shortage in August, 1921; that it was then about $28,000 and kept increasing; that "the ledger was off balance that much"; that he never reported the shortage to any person; that he did nothing to cover it up and removed none of the ledger sheets until after he became manager; that he did not include the hidden accounts in his daily reports to the Lassen Bank because "they wouldn't have balanced"; that he "took out the accounts that wasn't apt to change"; "I would take out a bunch, and as the accounts would go down or get active I would move them back into the active ledger and take out some that wasn't so active, they were changing all the time." He did not explain the method by which he made the books balance prior to the time he became manager. One of the officers of the bank testified:

"I questioned him (defendant) as to how this shortage had grown and what was the cause of it. He indicated by statements to me that it was on account of allowing overdrafts; that he had allowed individuals and corporations to draw or that they had been allowed to draw against the accounts that didn't exist in fact, * * * indicating that had continued for a considerable time, and the bulk of it occurred previous to the time he became manager of the bank. * * * He stated that was the cause of practically all the shortage. * * * He told me these checks that had been drawn would be paid, and, without making any record of them whatever, they would be returned to the drawer, leaving no evidence in the bank who obtained the money. I said, 'You want me to understand you have been fool enough to let money go out that way without keeping a record of it,' and he said, 'Yes,' he had. * * * He referred to the account of the Juniper Mining Company. This had taken place during the management of Sanders (the man who preceded defendant as manager). * * * A check would come in when the mining company didn't have a balance to its credit. * * * Regardless of whether the Juniper people came in and actually put in the money for them, they were returned to the Juniper people and not kept as a record of the bank. * * * No record of them kept at the bank. * * * He said the shortage that existed was largely made up in that way. He didn't say it was all made up through the drawings of the Juniper Mining Company. The Juniper Mining Company was the only one he referred to. * * * As to the other overdrafts, there wasn't any fixing of time."

The defendant testified that he once called Sanders' attention to the fact that the Juniper Mining Company had overdrawn its account by a check for $1,360, and "I passed him the check, and that was the last I seen of it, and I knew there was something wrong about it," that the Juniper Mining Company's account was not charged with the $1,360, and that he did not know whether the check was paid by the bank or whether the company thereafter deposited sufficient money to cover the overdraft. He did not testify that the company had overdrawn its account at any other time. He did not deny the various false entries made by him or explain why he made them, except as herein stated. Other witnesses testified that the defendant stated that the ledger sheets "had been coming out for a long time," a few at a time; that "he said he did all the manipulating and made most of the figures"; that "he didn't receive any benefit from them (the certificates of deposit) himself whatever; it was used for other purposes, but never told me what purposes, * * * straightening up other things that had been done creating shortages"; that "he said no one else was implicated with him."

[1] Admitting that the books and records of the bank were improperly kept, appellant contends that the evidence does not show any actual diminution of the assets of the bank, but merely a "book shortage." The uncontradicted testimony of several witnesses, however, shows that the assets of the bank had been depleted to the extent of more than $100,000. Mr. Wilson testified that the shortages of August 31, 1921, and May, 1923, were book shortages. The statement is obviously correct. He had no means in May, 1924, of ascertaining what the assets of the bank actually were in 1921 or 1923, but could only determine what the records of the bank disclosed in that regard. At the time of his audit he was able to count the cash then on hand, compute the amount of the notes, and determine the other assets actually in the possession of the bank. He testified:

"You couldn't say absolutely it was a cash shortage. It is simply a deficiency of the resources over liabilities. * * * Your resources are deficient that much to balance your liabilities. * * * I wouldn't say absolutely it was a cash shortage in a way. I would say the resources are simply deficient."

Other witnesses gave testimony to the same effect. There is also testimony to the effect that the assets were not depleted in any amount between the time that defendant left the bank and the time of the Wilson audit. It is clear that an actual shortage of assets, not a mere book shortage, was shown.

[2] There is abundant additional evidence showing that the assets of the bank were depleted during the time the defendant was in full charge of its business. The Bieber Bank and the Lassen Bank transferred funds back and forth as necessity required. In case of a heavy reduction in the total amount of deposits in the Bieber Bank, without a corresponding reduction in the amount of bills receivable, that bank was under the necessity of replenishing its funds by drawing on the Lassen Bank. No other reason appears for so drawing during the time defendant was manager. During that time the deposits in the Bieber Bank decreased in the total amount of $8,524.13 and the loans in the sum of $7,766. It thus appears that during the time the defendant was manager there was no necessity of drawing on the Lassen Bank for any large amount. During that period, however, as such manager, he drew on the Lassen Bank in the total amount of $81,500 and transferred to it $39,000, making a net transfer to the Bieber Bank of $42,500. Practically all of this large sum is wholly unaccounted for. What defendant did with it must be left to inference from the other facts in evidence. Those facts point unerringly to defendant's guilt. Every time he failed to record a certificate of deposit or falsely entered a record of payment thereof, he created the opportunity to embezzle a corresponding amount of the bank's assets. Corresponding amounts of such assets must have been withdrawn, otherwise his daily statements of assets and liabilities would have been out of balance, and the evidence shows that they balanced, except for minor errors. Such statements, of course, did not include the liabilities shown by the hidden records, but the fact that such records were secreted merely tends to show that other and additional assets had been embezzled, either during the time of defendant's management or prior thereto. The evidence, therefore, is sufficient to show, without any reasonable doubt, that the defendant embezzled the amounts charged and at about the times charged. There is no rational basis upon which the jury could have returned a verdict of not guilty.

[3] Appellant contends that evidence of a general shortage of assets was not admissible to prove the embezzlements charged in the information, citing People v. Walker, 75 P. 658, 142 Cal. 90, 93. The facts of this case are unlike those of the Walker Case, and are similar to those involved in the case of People v. Rowland, 106 P. 428, 433, 12 Cal. App. 6, 19, where it is said:

"Counsel for appellant refers to the case of People v. Walker [75 P. 658] 142 Cal. 94, where it is held by a divided court that evidence of a general indebtedness is not admissible as proof of the specific crime of embezzlement charged in the information. But that case does not sustain the position of counsel here for the reason that the facts there are decidedly different from those here. The court says: 'In the case at bar the said testimony objected to was not of any other embezzlement; it was simply of a general indebtedness, and it appears affirmatively that the $80.35 charged to have been embezzled was not included in the general balance which the books showed.' * * * Here there is a direct relation existing between the crime charged and the general shortage, because the former is shown to be one of the several transactions from which the general shortage arose, and the latter has, therefore, a tendency to establish the offense charged."

[4] It is contended that counts 15, 16, and 17 do not state facts sufficient to constitute public offenses. Count 15 charges that:

Defendant "was manager and an officer and employee of the Bieber Branch of the Lassen Industrial Bank * * * and * * * as such manager * * * there came and was under his control and possession a certain record known as a 'Time Certificate Register,' which said record was then and there the property of and kept by said corporation and by said G. E. Wardwell as manager, officer, and employee thereof, and said G. E. Wardwell, * * * the 7th day of August, 1923, with intent in him the said G. E. Wardwell, to deceive the officers and directors of said Lassen Industrial Bank, * * * did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously omit, at said time or at all, to make any record of the issuance of a time certificate of deposit to Clara Bieber for the amount of $6,073.35 though in truth and in fact a time certificate of deposit was actually issued by him on said date to Clara Bieber for said amount."

The sixteenth count is in like form. In similar language, the seventeenth count alleges that the defendant made a false entry in the general ledger relative to a deposit of $5,400 made by John Pallido. The objection urged is that it is not alleged that such omissions and false entry pertained to the "business or affairs of the bank." It reasonably appears from the facts alleged that such omissions and false entry did pertain to the business and affairs of the bank. Besides the failure to so allege could not by any possibility have prejudiced the substantial rights of the defendant.

It is urged that the court erred in refusing to give 6 instructions proposed by defendant. Appellant has failed to point out wherein the proposed instructions were material to the case. A careful examination of them shows that they contain no statement of law not fully covered by instructions which were given.

[5] The court instructed the jury to the effect that, if the defendant used the money of the bank "to cover up some other shortage in the assets of said bank, or if it was actually taken from the possession of said bank by the defendant and used in some transaction with which the bank had no connection, the crime with which he is charged is, in either event, proved." The instruction is in accordance with the law as stated in People v. Rowland, 106 P. 428, 12 Cal. App. 6, 16. Even if it be conceded that the instruction should not have been given, the evidence of defendant's guilt is so overwhelming that it cannot be said that the giving of the instruction has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

[6-8] Appellant strenuously contends that the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in his argument to the jury. The district attorney therein said:

"Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, we have seen how Mr. Wardwell marked the certificates of deposit 'Paid,' reducing the amount of the time certificates of deposit on the time certificate register and in the general ledger, drawing on the home office in Susanville for the amount of money, which would increase the amount which the Bieber Bank owed the home office, transferring that money into Anglo London and Paris National Bank of San Francisco and diverting it out of there—that was one method. It was then subject to his check, and could be diverted by him."

On objection by counsel for defendant, to the effect that the district attorney's statement was outside the evidence and prejudicial error, the court said:

"I think counsel is merely giving his deductions from the evidence that has been introduced, and I think he is entitled to give his deductions. * * * The objection is overruled."

The prosecution was unable to prove, and was not required to prove, the particular method by which the embezzlements were effected. Having proved that the assets of the bank entrusted to defendant had disappeared, and the manner in which the business of the bank was conducted, including falsifications of the records by defendant, the district attorney had the right to draw any reasonable inferences therefrom as to the means employed in appropriating such assets. Drafts were admitted in evidence showing that defendant, as manager, had drawn on the Lassen Bank, through the Anglo Bank, about $80,000. The funds so transferred to the Anglo Bank were subject to "his check," as manager, and "could be diverted by him." Appellant argues that there is no evidence that "the defendant did or could have drawn his personal check" on the Anglo Bank "for any money whatever." But the district attorney did not so state. At another point in his argument the district attorney said:

"That cash was taken right from the home office here and Anglo—$100,000 transferred in to the Anglo Bank and checked out by Mr. Wardwell. Now that is the situation."

Counsel for defendant said:

"We object to the statement that any money was checked out of the Anglo account. There is no such evidence in the record. It would have been an impossibility for Wardwell to have checked any money out of Anglo. He had no checking account with Anglo. When he makes that statement to the jury he is stating something that isn't in the record, and I ask the jury be instructed and admonished to ignore any such statement."

The court said to the jury:

"The jury will understand that they are to be governed only by the evidence introduced in the case, and, if counsel don't get the statements of the evidence correct, if you desire to have the evidence read to you, we will do so. He is merely drawing his conclusions from the evidence, and he is entitled to draw such conclusions as he desires. Objection overruled."

Counsel for defendant requested the court to admonish the jury to disregard the statements of the district attorney, but did not assign such statements as misconduct.

"Such assignments and requests were necessary as a foundation for a complaint to this court of misconduct." People v. Routh, 189 P. 436, 438, 182 Cal. 561, 567.

[9] Neither does it appear that the district attorney transcended the bounds of legitimate argument in drawing the conclusions stated by him. It clearly appears that such statements were mere deductions, and reasonable deductions, from the evidence. The assistant cashier and auditor of the Anglo Bank testified that the checks paid by that bank and charged to the Bieber Bank were returned twice a month to the latter bank; that in one instance the defendant "drew a draft on the Susanville bank for $6,000 and charged it to the Anglo-London Paris National Bank's account on his books, but it was never sent to San Francisco at all for credit, nor had Susanville ever received that item." Under such circumstances, the defendant had the opportunity to embezzle the $6,000 without any shortage appearing in his book accounts. Similar deductions may be made from his many other falsifications of the bank's records. It was naturally beyond the power of the prosecution to show the particular method or means by which the defendant appropriated the funds of the bank. Whether he directly took the money, or paid checks which were fictitious or drawn by persons having no moneys on deposit, and which were returned to such persons without any record being made thereof, as he said was done in cases of overdrafts, or whether some other method was pursued, does not appear. But it was not incumbent upon the prosecution to prove such particulars. That he fraudulently appropriated the assets of the bank, by some means, to some "use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust" (Pen. Code, § 504) appears with great clearness and certainty. Since crimes are not usually committed for the philanthropic purpose of benefiting others, it is a fair inference that the defendant appropriated such assets to his own use.

The other errors complained of are of slight importance, and need not be specially considered. None of them could have affected the verdict.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

STEVENS v. FETTERMAN et ux.
(Civ. 3024.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 4, 1926.)

1. Mortgages $\S$ 36—Although deed absolute on its face may be shown by parol to have been intended as security for payment of debt, presumption is that deed granting real property is absolute conveyance.

Although deed absolute on its face may be shown by parol to have been intended to stand as security for payment of debt, presumption of law independent of proof is that deed granting real property is absolute conveyance, and such presumption must prevail, unless evidence to contrary is sufficient to overcome or entirely destroy it.

2. Mortgages $\S$ 36.

Burden of proving that deed was intended by parties to operate as mortgage is on party taking affirmative of that issue.

3. Mortgages $\S$ 38(2)—Oral testimony, to justify court in determining that deed was intended as mortgage or trust, must be clear and convincing.

Testimony must be clear and convincing to justify the court in determining from oral testimony that deed purporting to convey real property in fee simple was intended to be something different, as a mortgage or trust.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 1010(1)—It is function of trial court to determine from evidence whether deed was what it purported to be, or whether it was intended to operate as mortgage.

It is solely function of trial court to determine sufficiency of evidence to overcome presumption that deed was not intended to operate as mortgage.

5. Appeal and error — 1010(1).

Trial court's finding, supported by evidence, that deed was not intended as mortgage, will not be disturbed.

6. Quieting title — 44(4)—Evidence in action to quiet title held to support finding that defendant, alleging that conveyance was made from owner to plaintiff as security for debt owing by him to plaintiff, had acted only as real estate broker, and had transferred nothing of value in consideration, and was not indebted to defendant (Code Civ. Proc. § 738).

In action to quiet title under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, evidence held to support finding that defendant claiming interest in property on ground that conveyance was made to plaintiff by owner as security for debt owed by defendant, had acted only as broker in bringing grantor and plaintiff together for exchange of properties, and that defendant did not transfer anything of value as consideration, and was not indebted to plaintiff at time of exchange, and had no interest whatsoever in property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Auber B. Stevens against George C. Fetterman and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James P. Clark, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Henry L. Knoop, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is by the plaintiff to remove a cloud from the title to the real property described in the complaint and so to quiet his title thereto. Judgment passed for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal therefrom upon a bill of exceptions.

The controversy is the outgrowth of several transactions, involving, in so far at least as it is required to present a clear understanding of the situation as it is portrayed by the record, three different and distinct pieces of real estate. The real property described in the complaint, and as to which relief is herein sought by the plaintiff, was at one time owned by one James Keeney, and is situated near the city of Azusa, in Los Angeles county. The other two properties are, respectively, a certain bungalow court, in which there are or were several bungalows, said property being situated in the city of Los Angeles and was formerly owned by the plaintiff, and the third consisting of five lots located in the city of Pasadena and owned by Rosa Fetterman, codefendant and wife of George C. Fetterman. For convenience and clarity, and, following the briefs of the parties in that respect, we will refer to these properties herein as the "Keeney property," the "Stevens dwellings" or "Diamond Hill tract" and the "Fetterman or Pasadena lots or property."

On August 22, 1923, the plaintiff and defendant George C. Fetterman entered into a contract whereby they agreed to an exchange of the Stevens dwellings and the furniture in the bungalow occupied by plaintiff for the Pasadena lots and the sum of $15,000. As stated, the Pasadena lots were the property of Rosa Fetterman, but George C. Fetterman, in the transaction just mentioned, was her duly appointed attorney in fact. Each of the conveyances, in case the agreement of exchange was consummated, was to be subject to certain incumbrances on the respective properties. The terms of the agreement were to be carried out through an escrow to be handled and administered by the Los Angeles Title Insurance Company. Accordingly, the parties deposited with said company the said agreement and deeds to the respective properties, together with escrow instructions.

The agreement provided, among other things, that one William H. Dennis should act as the agent of plaintiff in negotiating the exchange of said properties upon the terms specified in the agreement, and that, "when he has secured an acceptance of the proposition to exchange the above-described property on the above terms, I will then pay the sum of $250 as commission for such services." The escrow instructions on the part of said Fetterman contained the following:

"I will hand you $15,000 which you are authorized to use in connection with your above escrow number (No. 237985) on condition that you issue your one continuation guaranty of title in your usual form on the following described property situated in the County of Los Angeles"—following which is a description of the Stevens Dwellings or the Diamond Hill tract.

The escrow instructions on the part of the plaintiff contained, among other things, the following:

"I will hand you a mortgage and note for $15,000 and a Tr. deed and note for $20,000 to be shown as first and second incumbrances on said lots. I will hand you a bill of sale of furniture in buildings on said lots. I will hand you an agreement to buy said lot which you are authorized to use in connection with your above escrow number on condition that you issue your one continuation guaranty of title in your usual form on the following described real property situated in the county of Los Angeles"—following which is a description of the lots in the city of Pasadena and owned by the defendant Rosa Fetterman.

Said instructions also contain the following:

"Pay $250 commission to William H. Dennis. Received from me $15,000 as a bonus in exchange."

The life of the escrow was to be for 30 days—that is, the agreement for the exchange was to be consummated within 30 days. Fetterman failed to perform the agreement on his part within the time limited by the instrument, and, on October 8, 1923, the plaintiff addressed to him a letter demanding compliance by him with the terms of said agreement. The letter concluded thus:

"Unless you fully perform said terms, promises, and conditions on or before the 13th day of October, 1923, the undersigned will take such proceedings as in the premises he may be justified. He notifies you, however, that he will hold you at all times bound by the terms of said agreement, and he will at all times hold and consider said agreement binding and in full force and effect."

Notwithstanding the above notice to or demand upon him to perform the terms of the agreement, Fetterman failed to do so, and on October 23, 1923, the plaintiff instituted an action against him for damages for a breach of said agreement. The summons and a copy of the complaint in said action were duly served on Fetterman, but the litigation was not proceeded with because of an agreement entered into by and between the parties on the 30th day of October, 1923. The salient provisions of said agreement read:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises above recited and of the following promises and terms, the parties hereto agree one with the other as follows:

"1. G. S. Fetterman will cause to be delivered at once to Auber B. Stevens a certain deed now held by California Title Insurance Company in connection with the escrow instructions hereinabove referred to, being said company's said escrow No. 237985, and said deed conveying to said Auber B. Stevens the following described property, to wit (the five Pasadena lots). * * *

"2. Auber B. Stevens will upon the delivery to him of said deed give to said G. C. Fetterman a dismissal in writing in form required by law of the said action hereinabove referred to, being case No. 130802.

"3. Auber B. Stevens hereby grants G. C. Fetterman an option to purchase from him (the Stevens dwelling) * * * including furniture now in said tenements, for the total purchase price of $15,000, said sum to be paid as follows: $12,000 in cash on or before forty-five (45) days from the date hereof, and $3,000 on or before six (6) months from the date hereof, the said $3,000 to be evidenced by a promissory note executed by said G. C. Fetterman and Rosa Fetterman, his wife, and delivered to said Auber B. Stevens simultaneously with the said $12,000. * * * Unless the said G. C. Fetterman exercises the said option within the period of 45 days from the date hereof, said option shall be null and void and the said G. C. Fetterman shall have no interest, right, title or estate whatsoever in or to the said last described real property or any part thereof.

"5. * * *

"6. The parties hereto will prepare proper escrow instructions and deliver same to California Title Insurance Company for the purpose of further carrying out the terms of this agreement."

Said agreement was deposited in escrow with the Title Insurance Company, above referred to, accompanied by certain instructions, in substance as follows:

"You may deliver the deed of (Pasadena lots) * * * to the grantee therein named at this time, and hold escrow open for completion later, provided said Auber B. Stevens extends time of closing escrow to 45 days from this date (October 30, 1923). You will not be held responsible for any loss on my part for so doing, as I assume all responsibility, and in case I do not deposit in escrow $12,000 of the $15,000 to be deposited by me on or before December 15, 1923, and a trust deed and note for $3,000 secured thereby for balance of said $15,000 to be shown as a next lien on said (Stevens dwellings), * * * I will not call for return of deed. * * *

"In case you use my deed as above provided for, you will receive a dismissal of suit No. 130-802 Sup. Ct. and file same in said suit."

Fetterman did not exercise the option to purchase the Stevens dwellings given him by the agreement of October 30, 1923, within the 45 days to which the life of said option was limited. Fetterman never at any time deposited with the Title Insurance Company, nor did he ever pay to plaintiff, the sum of $12,000 which he was to have deposited with said company in pursuance of the agreement, nor was the trust deed for the $3,000 ever delivered to the Title Insurance Company or to plaintiff. After and upon the expiration of the period of 45 days within which the said Fetterman was at liberty under said agreement to purchase the Stevens dwellings, the action by the plaintiff against George C. Fetterman for damages for the failure of the latter to perform the terms of the agreement between plaintiff and said defendant, executed on and dated the 22d day of August, 1923, was dismissed and the deed by said Fetterman conveying to plaintiff, the Pasadena lots was delivered to the latter, all in pursuance of the terms of the agreement of October 30, 1923.

After the transactions above spoken of were closed, George C. Fetterman, who was, during all the times mentioned herein, a real estate broker, continued to make efforts to negotiate the sale of the Stevens dwellings, although, according to the testimony of plaintiff, he (Fetterman) had never been by plaintiff clothed with authority to do so. While thus engaging his attention, said Fetterman met James A. Keeney, who, with his wife, owned the Keeney property, which is the real property described in the complaint and involved in this action.

"Toward the latter part of December" (1923), proceeds the respondent's brief, which accurately states the facts in this immediate connection, "a tentative deal was arranged by Mr. Keeney and Mr. Fetterman. By the terms of this deal it was provided that Mr. Keeney should secure a first mortgage loan of $10,000 upon the Keeney property; that Mr. Keeney should convey the Keeney property subject to said incumbrance to the plaintiff, and should pay the plaintiff the $10,000 so borrowed, and the plaintiff, in consideration thereof, should convey the Stevens dwellings subject to existing incumbrances to Mr. Keeney. The plaintiff's first knowledge of this deal, as well as of all prior negotiations between Mr. Keeney and Mr. Fetterman, came to him during the latter part of December from Mr. Wm. H. Dennis, the broker mentioned in the original exchange agreement. Mr. Dennis no longer represented any of the parties to this action, nor did he represent Mr. Keeney. He was, however, very anxious that the plaintiff should consummate some sort of a deal involving the Stevens dwellings with Mr. Fetterman, inasmuch as he had agreed with the plaintiff not to demand the payment of the commission which he had earned by securing the acceptance of the original exchange agreement by Mr. Fetterman unless and until the plaintiff should consummate a deal of some kind with Mr. Fetterman. * * *

During the last week in December the plaintiff first discussed this deal with Mr. Fetterman, and, after some bickering, he finally agreed to convey the Stevens dwellings to the Keeney and give Mr. Fetterman a 90-day option to purchase the Keeney property for five thousand and some odd dollars in consideration of the conveyance to him of the Keeney property, subject to the $10,000 mortgage, and the payment of $10,000 in cash. The Keeney received nothing in this deal from Mr. Fetterman. No agreement in writing was executed by any of the parties, but suitable escrow instructions were executed by the plaintiff and Mr. Keeney on the 3d day of January, 1924. Mr. Fetterman did not become a party to this escrow until January 29th, when he executed the following instructions:

"You may close escrow in accordance with instructions of James A. Keeney, who is to acquire title to said lots 3, 4, and 5 (the Stevens dwellings), and is conveying as part payment thereof certain property of which he is the owner; the intention being that I pay all charges of which I agree to pay, and you will not be called on to deliver any papers or property to me by reason of this escrow, as I have arranged an option and agreement as to the property in section 4 (the Keeney property), outside of escrow."

"On January 9, 1924, an option agreement was executed by the plaintiff and Mr. Fetterman. By the terms of that agreement the plaintiff gave and granted to George C. Fetterman an option to purchase the Keeney property at any time within 90 days from the date thereof for $5,033.33, and certain interest and other sums. At the request of Mr. Fetterman, that agreement was amended by interlineation by substituting Rosa Fetterman in the place of George C. Fetterman. Some time thereafter, but under the same date, the option agreement involved in this action was executed by plaintiff to the defendant Rosa Fetterman, the latter acting through George C. Fetterman, her attorney in fact. The latter agreement was intended to, and did, supersede the former. Both agreements were identical in form except that in the latter all the sums required to be paid by the defendant Rosa Fetterman in order to exercise the option were set out in dollars and cents. That agreement reads as follows:

"1. Auber Browne Stevens agrees to sell and convey to Rosa Fetterman that certain real property situated in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and bounded and described as follows (the Keeney property). * * *

"2. Rosa Fetterman agrees to pay to and said Stevens agrees to take and accept for said property the sum of $5,033.33, together with interest upon $5,000 of said sum at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of this agreement to the date of payment of the principal sum of $5,033.33. Said Rosa Fetterman further agrees to repay to said Stevens (1) the sum of $98.61 paid by Stevens to James A. Keeney and Louella Keeney on account of the premium upon unexpired fire insurance on the house situated on the above-described property; (2) such sum or sums as said Stevens may be required to pay on account of taxes and assessments levied upon and against the above-described property; and (3) such sum as said Stevens shall be required to pay as interest upon that certain $10,000 mortgage executed by James A. Keeney and Louella Keeney to Azusa Valley Savings Bank of Azusa, Cal.

"3. The term of this option is 90 days from and after the date hereof.

"4. If the said Rosa Fetterman pays the said sum of $5,033.33 and the interest accrued thereon, and repays the amount paid on account of premiums on fire insurance and taxes and assessments, if any, to said Stevens during the term of this option, said Stevens promises and agrees to execute and deliver to said Rosa Fetterman forthwith a grant deed conveying said property to said Rosa Fetterman, subject, however, to the liens and incumbrances herein specified.

"5. If said Rosa Fetterman fails to pay the said sum of $5,033.33 and accrued interest, and fails to repay such sum or sums as said Stevens shall have paid on account of premiums on fire insurance and taxes and assessments during the term of this option, then this option and all the rights of the parties thereunder shall forthwith cease and determine."

The defendants, on the 8th day of April, 1924—the last day of the period of time within which they were authorized by the above option agreement to exercise their right or option to purchase the Keeney property—filed the said option agreement with the county recorder of Los Angeles county for recordation, and the same was duly recorded by said recorder. The evidence without conflict shows that the defendants, or either of them, never exercised the option within the time specified and limited by the option agreement, and that there never was any attempt by either to exercise said option until the 22d day of May, 1924, or approximately a month and a half after the option had expired by force of its own terms, and 21 days subsequent to the commencement of this action, when the defendant George C. Fetterman addressed and mailed a letter to the plaintiff to the effect that he was "now prepared to pay" plaintiff the sum of $5,033.33, together with interest upon the $5,000 and the amount of money paid by plaintiff for insurance and taxes on the Keeney property, and offering to deposit the money in any responsible bank or title company, in the discretion or at the pleasure of plaintiff, the latter to deposit a deed to the Keeney property "as per our agreement" (the option agreement of January 9, 1924).

As before stated herein, the purpose of this action was to remove from the real property described in the complaint the cloud created and existing by reason of the recordation by the defendants in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county of said agreement of option.

The complaint is in the usual form of actions instituted under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the purpose of determining a claim by a party to an interest or estate in real or personal property, and sets forth facts substantially as they are above stated respecting the option agreement last hereinabove referred to and the outcome thereof.

The answer denies that plaintiff is or at any time ever was the owner of the real property described in the complaint, alleges that defendants acquired title to said property by purchase from said Keeney, on the 9th day of January, 1924; that at that time defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $5,000 and two other smaller sums totaling $131.94, and, to secure said indebtedness, defendants caused said Keeney to convey said property to plaintiff, said sums so secured to be paid within 90 days after January 9, 1924; that defendants have not paid said sums to plaintiff, averring, however, that, on the 22d day of May, 1924, they offered to pay plaintiff the full amount of their indebtedness to him, as indicated above, but that plaintiff refused to accept the same. The relief prayed for by defendant is: That the deed by Keeney conveying said property to plaintiff be determined and declared to be a mortgage to secure the payment of the indebtedness of defendants to plaintiff; that defendants be given the right to pay said indebtedness and discharge said mortgage, and that, upon the payment of said total indebtedness or any sum or sums found to be due to plaintiff from them, said defendants are entitled to a deed from plaintiff reconveying said real property to them. The plaintiff, upon the assumption that the answer of defendants was as well a cross-complaint, filed an answer to the affirmative averments of defendants' pleading.

The findings are specific, and embrace a decision favorable to plaintiff upon every vital fact in the case. Among other things, the court found that at some time prior to the 3d day of January, 1924, the defendant George C. Fetterman learned that the Keeneys were desirous of selling or otherwise disposing of the property involved herein; that he succeeded in bringing the Keeneys and plaintiff together in negotiations for the exchange of their respective properties, and that on the date just named the Keeneys and the plaintiff entered into the exchange agreement above mentioned and finally consummated the same as above indicated; that defendant George C. Fetterman "did not pay, give, transfer, convey, or assign to the plaintiff or to the said Keeneys anything of value whatsoever as a consideration or inducement for the transfer of said properties other than his services as a real estate broker"; that, at the time said exchange was effected, said defendants were not, and neither of them was, indebted to plaintiff in any sum or amount whatsoever, and "neither of them is now" so indebted.

The defendants contend, as is indicated by their answer, that they acquired the real property in dispute by purchasing the same from the Keeneys, that, being indebted to the plaintiff in the total sum of $5,131.94, they authorized the Keeneys to convey the property to plaintiff, to be by him held as security for the payment to him of said indebtedness, and that the agreement of January 9, 1924, while upon its face an option agreement only, was in fact intended and understood by the parties to be a defeasance agreement, and that it and the deed from the Keeneys to plaintiff should together be considered as a mortgage or trust deed to secure the payment of the several sums therein mentioned, and totaling, as stated, the sum of $5,131.94. They undertook, in the court below and undertake here, to connect the transaction culminating, through the efforts of George C. Fetterman, in the conveyance of the Keeney property to plaintiff with the previous transactions involving an attempt upon the part of George C. Fetterman to purchase from the plaintiff the Stevens dwellings, and which, as above shown, failed of consummation, contending, however, that the conveyance by said Fetterman to plaintiff of the Pasadena lots was not part of the consideration moving from him for the dismissal of the damage action above explained, but as in part payment for the Stevens dwellings, there remaining still to be paid on that transaction under the agreement relating thereto the sum of $15,000; that the payment by the Keeneys to the plaintiff of the sum of $10,000 on the deed resulting in the conveyance of the Keeney property to plaintiff constituted a payment on the said $15,000 then still due on the Stevens dwellings transaction, and that there then remained due plaintiff from defendants on the latter transaction the sum of $5,000, together with some smaller sums incidentally accruing in the Keeney transaction, aggregating $131.94, making, as seen, a total of $5,131.94, to secure which the deed from the Keeneys to plaintiff was given and the defeasance (option) agreement between plaintiff and defendants was executed to become effective as in destruction of the force of the Keeney deed upon the payment of said sum by defendants to plaintiff.

[1-4] As will be seen, the important ultimate question submitted for decision by the trial court was whether the transfer of the Keeney property to plaintiff was intended by the defendants and the plaintiff to operate as a mortgage and as security for a debt due the latter from the former. Obviously, if defendants were in no way indebted to plaintiff by reason of the Stevens dwellings transaction under the agreement of August 23, 1923, then the very foundation upon which they have planted their position in this case, as indicated by their special defense or cross-complaint, is demolished. If there was no debt or other legal obligation to be paid or performed by defendants to or for the plaintiff, then, of course, the conveyance could not be a mortgage. Ahern v. McCarthy, 40 P. 482, 107 Cal. 382; Henley v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 22, 27; Montgomery v. Spect, 55 Cal. 352, 353; Todd v. Todd, 128 P. 413, 164 Cal. 255, 258; Chapman v. Hicks, 182 P. 336, 41 Cal. App. 158, 162. It is also true, as a legal proposition, that, while a deed absolute upon its face may be shown by parol to have been intended by the parties thereto to stand as security for the payment of a debt and therefore to operate as a mortgage only, and not as an absolute conveyance of the fee, or whatever mortgageable estate or interest the grantor may have therein (Ahern v. McCarthy, 40 P. 482, 107 Cal. 382, 383; Pomeroy's Equity Juris. [2d Ed.] § 1196), it is also true that the presumption of law, independent of proof, is that a deed granting real property is what it purports to be, viz. an absolute conveyance, and that this presumption must prevail unless the evidence to the contrary is sufficient in probative force to overcome or entirely destroy it. Wadleigh v. Phelps, 87 P. 93, 149 Cal. 627, 637. Equally settled are these propositions: (1) That the burden of proving that a deed was intended by the parties to operate solely as a mortgage is upon the party taking the affirmative of that issue (Woods v. Jensen, 62 P. 473, 130 Cal. 200, 203); (2) that, to justify a court in determining from oral testimony that a deed purporting to convey real property absolutely in fee simple was intended to be something different, as a mortgage or trust, "such testimony must be clear, convincing, and conclusive—something more than that modicum of evidence which appellate courts sometimes hold sufficient to warrant a finding where the matter is not so serious as the overthrow of a clearly expressed deed, solemnly executed and delivered" (Sheehan v. Sullivan, 58 P. 543, 544, 126 Cal. 189, 193; Mahoney v. Bostwick, 30 P. 1020, 96 Cal. 53, 58, 31 Am. St. Rep. 175; Sherman v. Sandell, 39 P. 797, 106 Cal. 373, 375; Ganceart v. Henry, 33 P. 92, 98 Cal. 281, 284; Emery v. Lowe, 73 P. 981, 140 Cal. 379, 384-385; Kohn v. Parent, 163 P. 1008, 174 Cal. 570); (3) that whether the evidence is of such character and strength as to produce the conviction that a deed was in fact intended as a mortgage is a question for the trial court to determine (Mahoney v. Bostwick, supra; Brisson v. Brisson, 27 P. 186, 90 Cal. 323). In other words, it is solely the function of the trial court to determine whether the evidence introduced to overcome the presumption that a deed is what it purports to be or that it was not the intention of the parties that it should operate as a mortgage is or is not clear, satisfactory, and convincing. See, also, Barry v. Beamer, 96 P. 373, 8 Cal. App. 200, 213.

As is to be inferred from the above general statement of the facts, the Fettermans do not claim that they were or became indebted to the plaintiff in the aggregate sum named in their answer or cross-complaint or in any sum by reason of any transaction other than that eventuating in the execution by George C. Fetterman and plaintiff of the agreement last hereinabove considered. It will be noted that the last agreement between plaintiff and George C. Fetterman relative to the purchase by the latter of the Stevens dwellings (hereinabove quoted in part), after specifically setting forth the consideration therefor, to wit, on the part of plaintiff, the dismissal of his damage suit against George C. Fetterman and giving to the latter an option of 45 days from the date of the agreement to purchase the Stevens dwellings on the terms therein specified, and on the part of said Fetterman to convey to plaintiff the Pasadena lots, expressly states:

"Unless the said G. C. Fetterman exercises the said option within the period of 45 days from the date hereof, said option shall be null and void, and the said G. C. Fetterman shall have no interest, right, title, or estate whatsoever in or to the last-described real property or any part thereof."

It will further be noted that in his escrow instructions (also in part quoted above) accompanying said agreement, and addressed to the Title Insurance Company, holder of the escrow, it is stated that George C. Fetterman, in case he did not, within the time specified, comply with the terms of said agreement as to prepayments to be made and other cognate conditions to be performed, he would not call for a return of his deed conveying the Pasadena lots to plaintiff. Thus it is plainly apparent, from the face of the last agreement and the escrow instructions themselves, that the intention of the parties was that either the consummation of said agreement by a compliance with its terms by Fetterman or the latter's failure to comply therewith within the period of time named therein, would close or terminate the deal respecting the Stevens dwellings, and that the dismissal of the damage suit referred to would be all that would be left to be done by plaintiff in the performance of the consideration for the deed of said Fetterman transferring to the former the latter's Pasadena lots. The terms of said agreement and the escrow instructions relative to the same are in clear, unambiguous, and unqualified language. Construction is not necessary to get their meaning and intent. They were self-operating; the holder of the escrow having no discretion as to the matter of the delivery of the Fetterman deed to plaintiff after the lapse of the time within which such delivery should be made in case the grantor therein failed within said time to meet the conditions without the performance of which he would not be entitled to a conveyance of the Stevens dwellings. But defendants stress as of singular significance, in support of their contention, that the Keeney transaction was related to and the final act in the consummation of the agreement of August 22, 1923, the following which is the concluding language of the written notice served by plaintiff upon defendants, and dated October 8, 1923, demanding of them, on penalty of an action for damages for the breach thereof in case they failed to heed such notice, that they perform the terms of said agreement on or before October 13, 1923, to wit:

"He (plaintiff) notifies you, however, that he will hold you at all times bound by the terms of said agreement and he will at all times hold and consider the said agreement binding and in full force and effect."

The above language cannot reasonably be viewed as meaning anything more than that the plaintiff would insist upon the enforcement of the agreement to which it related. Manifestly, the moment said contract was carried out or terminated in any way, it became functus officio. Its existence thereafter could not be to any purpose, and it would therefore be absurd to say the effect of the above language of the notice demanding of defendants compliance with the terms of said contract would be to keep it alive after that time. This view of the meaning, the effect, and the scope of said language coincides with the court's findings which necessarily involve a construction thereof at variance with the effect which defendants would impart to it. And this brings us to the point where it should be considered whether the findings are afforded sufficient support by the proofs.

[5] The findings are, of course, to be interpreted to mean that, according to the judgment of the trial court, to which properly the determination of the questions of fact was submitted, the defendants failed to sustain the burden cast upon them of countervailing or overcoming the presumption that the Keeney deed is what upon its face it purports to be, to wit, an absolute conveyance of the land therein described to plaintiff. The duty of this court is limited to the determination of whether there is sufficient evidentiary support to the findings, although, in asking us to hold that the findings are not so supported, the defendants necessarily assume that this court can say, as a matter of law, that the evidence introduced by them to support their attack upon the presumption above referred to was of so satisfactory and convincing a character as to have justly persuaded the court below to the conclusion that thus the force of said presumption was entirely destroyed, and that, per consequence, the evidence preponderated in favor of their position that the Keeney deed to plaintiff was intended by the parties to operate as a mortgage to secure a debt owing from defendants to plaintiff. The record here affords no ground for such a course.

The several transactions involved herein were, on behalf of defendants, conducted entirely by George C. Fetterman. The defendant, Rosa Fetterman, was not called as a witness, doubtless because she took no direct or active part in said transactions. Principally upon George C. Fetterman's version of the transactions as given at the trial and the several written agreements and escrow instructions the defendants relied in the court below to sustain their special defense or the allegations of their cross-complaint, and upon which they rely here in support of their contention that the findings are not well grounded, evidentially. It is not necessary to enter herein upon a minute examination or to present a detailed statement of the facts to which said defendant testified. It will be enough for the purposes of the present consideration to state that he testified that there never was at any time, from the date of the agreement between plaintiff and defendant G. C. Fetterman of date October 30, 1923, and the time when Keeney deeded his property to plaintiff, a termination by any means of the agreement between plaintiff and defendants for the acquisition of the Stevens dwellings by defendants; that, prior to the execution and delivery of the Keeney deed to plaintiff, the latter was informed by George C. Fetterman that he (said Fetterman) had arranged to purchase the Keeney property, and that upon such purchase said property would be conveyed to plaintiff as part of the consideration for the conveyance by plaintiff to defendants of the Stevens dwellings; that subsequently the Fettermans did purchase the Keeney property, but caused the same to be directly conveyed to plaintiff in pursuance of the agreement of option of January 9, 1924. Said Fetterman further testified that the Pasadena lots of Rosa Fetterman were conveyed to plaintiff as part of the consideration for the conveyance to them of the Stevens dwellings and not as a consideration for a compromise of the damage suit by plaintiff against George C. Fetterman. In addition to said Fetterman's testimony, all the agreements and escrow instructions, of which there were many, and of which a number were modifications of like instructions previously deposited with the holder of the escrow by both plaintiff and defendants, such modifications being made to conform to modifications of the several written agreements, were introduced in evidence by the defendants upon the theory, of course, that they would sustain the case of the latter. A number of witnesses testified for defendants to certain matters pertaining to some of the transactions.

[6] The plaintiff's testimony upon all the important facts involved a flat contradiction of George C. Fetterman's testimony (except certain admissions made by said Fetterman) as well as much of that given by the other witnesses of defendants, and his testimony as to certain facts was corroborated by the testimony of his attorney, who, it appears, was conversant with all the several transactions, he having acted therein as the legal adviser of the plaintiff. His testimony derived further corroboration from the several written agreements as they were impliedly construed, and reasonably so, apparently, by the court in its findings, and also certain circumstances of potent significance. We have already seen that there is nothing on the face of the agreement of January 9, 1924, or the escrow instructions deposited by defendant therewith, from which, when considered alone, or by themselves, the inference follows that, after the expiration of the time within which said agreement might be performed, any further negotiations for the acquisition by defendants, or either of them, of the Stevens dwellings, were still to exist or to continue. We have also seen that plaintiff testified that the negotiations for the exchange of the Stevens dwellings for the Keeney property on the terms and conditions above specified were inaugurated by George C. Fetterman without his (plaintiff's) authority and entirely independent of any consideration of any of the agreements or transactions previously made and had by and between plaintiff and the defendants relative to the plaintiff's property. Stevens positively testified that the defendants never owed him any money on account of the Keeney deal, or on account of any of the transactions mentioned herein, except what he claimed for the damage suffered by him from the breach by George C. Fetterman of the agreement of August 22, 1923. Besides that testimony is that of both Keeney and George C. Fetterman that the latter did not pay to the former as much as a single cent as a consideration for the transfer of the Keeney property to himself or to plaintiff. Moreover, Keeney testified (and in this he was corroborated by George C. Fetterman) that it was understood and agreed by and between himself, said Fetterman, and plaintiff that, for a few months after the making of the conveyance of his property either to the Fettermans or plaintiff, he (Keeney) was to and in fact did continue to occupy the premises and pay the rent to plaintiff, the defendants Fetterman or either of them never at any time exacting or asking for the payment of said rent to them. This is how George C. Fetterman testified on that subject:

"Mr. Keeney did not at any time pay me any rent for the use and occupation of that property (Keeney property), nor did any one else. I did not claim or demand the right of possession of the property from Mr. Stevens, never made no demand on him."

He further testified that he never at any time paid any taxes on the Keeney property, either before or after Keeney conveyed it to plaintiff, nor, he continued, did he offer to pay the taxes assessed thereon; that he never paid any interest on the $10,000 mortgage on said property subject to which plaintiff took the conveyance from Keeney, although, he stated, he knew that said mortgage was a subsisting lien upon the Keeney property when he caused the same to be conveyed to plaintiff. Keeney testified that the bank holding the $10,000 mortgage notified him, after he had conveyed to plaintiff, that there was interest due on the note which said mortgage was given to secure; that he did not call the attention of George C. Fetterman to said notice and demand for the payment of interest, but did notify plaintiff thereof; that he (Keeney) had paid the taxes on the property, and that he looked to plaintiff for reimbursement for the expenditures so made, and made no demand upon the Fettermans or either of them for such reimbursement. He stated that he "had no transactions with Mrs. Fetterman," and received no consideration from her or from her husband for the property transferred by him to plaintiff. A further review of the testimony is not required. Enough thereof has been herein considered to confirm the conclusion that the findings are strongly fortified. There is no intrinsic weakness in the testimony of the plaintiff. It seems to be positive, consistent, and probable. Indeed, the circumstances surrounding the Keeney deal to which we have above adverted vouchsafe the verity of plaintiff's testimony. On the other hand, the testimony of George C. Fetterman does not appeal to us as being reasonable or probable, and it is to be presumed the trial court so viewed it. If the transactions leading to and embracing the act of the conveyance of the Keeney property to plaintiff were intended to have the effect claimed for them by defendants, it would seem to be highly probable that some of the several writings between the parties would have so indicated in language as to the meaning or real purport of which there could be no serious doubt or misapprehension. This would, it seems natural to suppose, be the course the most likely to be pursued in cases in which there were at stake property interests of the magnitude of those involved herein and of a corresponding degree of importance to both parties, particularly where, as here, the party claiming from the transaction a benefit not expressly or even impliedly given in the writing covering the terms of such transaction is a real estate broker of the usual business acumen of the average person engaged in the prosecution of that profession. But further comment on the evidentiary phases of the case need not be pursued. It is enough to say generally, as before we have declared, that all the findings vital to the judgment are afforded sufficient support by the evidence.

The claim that there is no evidence which lends support to the finding that the Keeney deal was conducted by George C. Fetterman in the capacity of a real estate broker, and that he had no further or different connection with that transaction, is not well founded, although it is not of material importance here. Said Fetterman testified that his business, at the times of the initiation and the consummation of the Keeney transaction, was that of a real estate broker. The evidence shows it was through him that the plaintiff and the Keeneys were brought together on the Keeney transaction. These facts, together with the evidence from which the court deduced its finding that said transaction involved a transfer of the Keeney property, not to George C. Fetterman, but directly to plaintiff, upon a consideration moving wholly from the latter, are sufficient to support the finding as to the capacity in which Fetterman acted in that transaction. But, with the well-supported finding that the Keeney property was conveyed directly to plaintiff, and the finding that the Fettermans were not at the time of that transaction indebted to plaintiff in any sum whatsoever, and that the Keeney deed was exactly what it purported to be, it would not make the slightest difference, so far as the decision here is concerned, whether Fetterman acted as a real estate broker in the Keeney transaction or performed the service incident to bringing the principal parties together in that deal merely as an act of friendship and without compensation or expectation of receiving any.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RUSSELL. (Cr. 1283.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 16, 1926.)

1. Criminal law —1159(4)—Appellate court is limited to solving questions of law; jury and trial judge alone determining credibility of witnesses.

Function of appellate court is limited to solving questions of law; jury and trial judge being charged with exclusive responsibility of determining credibility of witnesses.

2. Criminal law —1159(3)

Conclusion of jury that defendant was present when robbery was committed cannot be disturbed on appeal, though flatly contradicted.

3. Criminal law —517(1)—Confession, to be evidence, must be free and voluntary and not made under promise of immunity or hope of reward.

Before confession may be offered in evidence, foundation must be laid for its introduction by showing it to be free and voluntary and not under promise of immunity or hope of reward.

4. Criminal law —273.

Plea of guilty to grand larceny is confession of guilt of offense included in charge of robbery.

5. Criminal law —273.

Whether plea of guilty of grand larceny was freely and voluntarily made depends on circumstances surrounding defendant at or near time when plea was made.

6. Criminal law —406(4)—Where trial judge fully considered the only evidence surrounding defendant's change of plea from not guilty of robbery to guilty of grand larceny, admission of plea as confession rested in sound discretion of court.

Where trial judge fully considered transcript of reporter's notes which were only evidence of proceedings surrounding defendant's change of plea from not guilty of robbery to guilty of grand larceny in ruling on defendant's objection that no sufficient foundation had been laid for admission of confession, determination whether plea should be admitted in prosecution for robbery rested in sound discretion of court.

7. Criminal law —1144(12)—Judicial discretion in admitting confession of grand larceny in trial of robbery is presumed not to be abused, where record of circumstances of confession is not before court.

Where record of what transpired at time defendant changed plea from not guilty of robbery to guilty of grand larceny is not before court, presumption is that judicial discretion, in admitting confession in prosecution for robbery, was not abused.

8. Criminal law —531(3)—Evidence held to justify finding that change of plea from not guilty of robbery to guilty of grand larceny was freely and voluntarily made.

Evidence held to justify finding that defendant was not induced to change his plea of not guilty of robbery to guilty of grand larceny by reason of any promise of immunity or hope of reward, but that change of plea and confession of guilt were made freely and voluntarily.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Bennie James Russell was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Webb, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of robbery, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The first point urged by appellant as a reason for the reversal of the judgment is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict—it being his contention that the identification of defendant as the man who committed the offense was weak and unsatisfactory as against the positive denials by defendant of his guilt and a strong “alibi” which was presented by several disinterested witnesses. It is evident, therefore, that the real complaint of appellant is that, because the preponderance of the evidence was in favor of the innocence of defendant, the verdict was unjustified, and not as a matter of law that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict.

[1, 2] The rule is thoroughly settled that an appellate court cannot be a trier of fact—its function being limited to the solving of questions of law only—and that the jury and the trial judge are charged with the exclusive responsibility of determining the credibility of the various witnesses. In the instant case it is unquestioned that the evidence introduced by the prosecution was sufficient in itself to establish the guilt of defendant. Assuming that evidence in behalf of defendant flatly contradicted that which was offered by the prosecution, and, in addition thereto, that substantial evidence was produced of the fact that defendant was not present when the crime was committed, nevertheless the duty of weighing all the evidence in the case and determining where lay the truth rested solely with the jury. Its conclusion is final in the premises, and cannot be disturbed by this court.

It appears that, some time after defendant had entered his plea of not guilty to the charge of robbery, which had been preferred against him, through an arrangement with the office of the district attorney, which arrangement was concurred in by the judge of the trial court, defendant was permitted to withdraw the plea which he had formerly made and in lieu thereof to plead guilty to a charge of grand larceny. In that connection it is contended by the appellant that the trial court erred to the prejudice of defendant in permitting the deputy district attorney to read to the jury a transcript of the record of the proceedings had in the lower court, a copy of which being as follows:

“Mr. Vobayda (reading): ‘The Court: I would like to take his statement. You tell me, Russell, what the facts were about this offense. Tell me right now all about it, briefly. Having pled guilty to it, there is nothing to conceal any more. A. I was taking the money. Q. How? A. I was taking the money. Q. Come up closer, so that I can hear you. Did you know this man? A. No, sir. Q. No? A. No, sir. Q. Speak up now, so that I don't have to keep cautioning you. How did you come to go in his place of business? What did you go in there for, to rob him? A. No, sir. Q. What did you go in there for? A. I just went in there to buy some things. Q. To buy some things? A. Yes. Q. Did you buy anything? A. No, sir. Q. What did you do after you got in? (No answer.)’”

The record discloses the fact that at the time such evidence was first offered defendant objected thereto on the ground that no proper foundation had been laid for its introduction, in that the admission or confession by defendant was not shown to have been made freely and voluntarily, or without any promise of immunity or hope of reward having been made or held out to defendant to induce him to make such confession. Although the record here is incomplete with reference to the proceedings which supposedly occurred in connection with the change of plea by the defendant, sufficient appears that it may be inferred that considerably more conversation took place between the judge of the trial court and defendant at that time than was offered in evidence. A transcript of the entire proceedings, together with a memorandum indicating the parts of the transcript which were and those parts which were not offered in evidence, were handed to the judge for his examination; whereupon an adjournment of court was had for the express purpose of enabling the court in chambers, with the assistance of respective counsel, to determine how much, if any, of defendant's statements or admissions had been made freely and voluntarily, without promise of immunity or hope of reward. Subsequently and during the trial of the action, the question of the admissibility of the record showing what had occurred at the time when defendant so changed his plea was again before the court, at which time the following occurred:

“Mr. Broker (Attorney for Defendant): I don't mean to object on a technical ground, your honor. The reason I wanted the objection in here was this: That the objection is based upon the fact that the statement or confession, as it purports to be, was not made freely and voluntarily. That is the reason.

“The Court: Well, the court has gone into it up to that point. It is the court's ruling that it was free and voluntary up to a certain point, which I have indicated. After that point, the court has not permitted anything to be said, but up to that time it was, in my opinion, a voluntary statement. Something was said at that time which changed the conditions, and whatever followed after that might be considered not free and voluntary. Up to that point, and that is the point I am allowing, in my opinion that was free and voluntary.

"Mr. Broker: But, if your honor please, the witness on the stand here testified that he was allowed, before that, I believe—and I believe the record will bear me out and I don't believe Mr. Vobayda (deputy district attorney) will dispute it—

"The Court: Well, he pled guilty on the advice of his counsel, as I say, and if there is any objection and you want the minutes, you can have it.

"Mr. Broker: No; I don't want the minutes, your honor.

"The Court: Very well.

"Mr. Broker: But the witness stated the defendant was allowed to plead guilty to grand larceny, and that was some intimation—

"The Court: Well, when we get to that point we will clear it up. Up to that point the objection is overruled."

After the admission or confession of defendant had been introduced in evidence, and the case for the prosecution had been closed, defendant testified, not for the purpose of enabling the trial court to determine the admissibility of his purported confession of guilt, but for the apparent general purpose of establishing his innocence of the crime of robbery, as follows:

"A. Well, I—I was brought into court and my attorney, Mr. Grasty, at that time told me that he had talked to the district attorney and the judge, and that I probably wouldn't get a trial that day, I would probably be in jail for two or three more months before I got a trial, and that he had it arranged so that if I pleaded guilty to grand larceny I would get probation. He told me that I probably wouldn't get probation right then, but he would have me sent to the road camp for a month, or probably two months, so that I might earn some money. At that time my wife was sick in the hospital, and I had an account with the Eastern Outfitting Company, and I didn't have any money, and they was writing me letters up to the jail here that they would have to take the furniture away—

"The Court: Speak up. A. So he told me to plead guilty to grand larceny.

"Q. By Mr. Broker: And, relying on that, you did plead guilty to grand larceny at that time? A. Yes, sir."

In rebuttal thereof, the attorney who represented defendant at the time he made such change in his plea testified, in substance, that, in connection with the arrangements among all the parties, including defendant, his said attorney, two deputies from the district attorney's office, and the trial judge, although defendant had suggested to his attorney the possibility of probation being granted, after consultation with the deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution, defendant had been informed by his attorney that probation was impossible and that nothing would satisfy the district attorney's office "except this man going to San Quentin," and that defendant "had better go to trial"—defendant said, "I will change my plea;" and that thereupon defendant withdrew his former plea of not guilty to the charge of robbery and in place thereof substituted his plea of guilty to the lesser charge of grand larceny.

[3-8] It is a well-recognized rule of law that, before a confession may be offered in evidence, a foundation must be laid for its introduction by a showing that the confession was freely and voluntarily made and not under a promise of immunity or hope of reward. In the instant case the defendant's plea of guilty to the crime of grand larceny could be understood in no sense other than that it was a confession of guilt of at least an offense included in the charge of robbery which had been preferred against him. The question of whether such confession had been so made as under the legal safeguards for defendant's protection it could be admitted in evidence against him depended entirely upon the circumstances surrounding defendant at or near the time such confession was made. As has been heretofore indicated herein, the record in this case is practically silent with reference thereto. Enough appears that it may be concluded that a transcript of the reporter's notes of the proceedings in question was placed in the hands of the trial judge at the time when the confession of defendant was sought to be introduced on the trial of the action. The fact that defendant changed his plea from not guilty of the crime of robbery to that of guilty of the offense of grand larceny; that the proceedings had on such occasion were transcribed from the reporter's notes thereof; that the judge of the trial court ordered an adjournment of court for the express purpose of looking "this thing over," and upon reconvening of court stated that he had "gone into it," etc., show conclusively that whatever had been said or done in the course of the proceedings before the court at the time the change of plea by defendant was had were in the mind of the trial judge and fully considered by him with reference to defendant's objection that no sufficient foundation had been laid for the introduction of the evidence of defendant's confession. It should be borne in mind that no evidence touching the question of the sufficiency of the required foundation other than what was contained in such transcript was before the court prior to the time when the confession was admitted in evidence, but that, after the case for the prosecution had been closed, defendant gave some testimony which, if it had been seasonably given might have had a bearing on the question of the admissibility of the confession. Also that the former attorney of defendant gave testimony with reference thereto. In such circumstances the determination of whether the confession of defendant should be admitted in evidence rested in the sound discretion of the court. The record of what transpired at the time defendant changed his plea not being before the court, the presumption in such circumstances must obtain that judicial discretion was not abused. As the entire record was before the trial court, the judge thereof was undoubtedly fully conversant with what had been said at and immediately prior to the time when defendant changed his plea. At any rate, in view of the conflict between the testimony which was later given by the defendant and by his former attorney, it is clear that the trial judge was justified in his conclusion that defendant was not induced to change his plea by reason of any promise of immunity made to him or by any hope of reward, but, to the contrary, that such change of plea and confession of guilt were made by him freely and voluntarily.

In the case of People v. Jim Ti, 32 Cal. 60, where the court was considering the admissibility of a certain confession, among other things, it is said:

"And this is one of the class of questions upon which the judge is to exercise a judicial discretion, to be guided by all the circumstances of the case."

And in the later case of People v. Siemsen, 95 P. 863, 866, 153 Cal. 387, 394, the court made the statement that:

"Whether a confession is free and voluntary is a preliminary question addressed to the trial court and to be determined by it (People v. Miller, 67 P. 12, 135 Cal. 69), and a considerable measure of discretion must be allowed that court in determining it. The 'admissibility of such evidence so largely depends upon the special circumstances connected with the confession, that it is difficult, if not impossible, to formulate a rule that will comprehend all cases. As the question is necessarily addressed, in the first instance, to the judge, and since his discretion must be controlled by all the attendant circumstances, the courts have wisely forbore to mark with absolute precision the limits of admission and exclusion.' Hopt v. Utah, 4 S. Ct. 202, 110 U. S. 574, 583 [28 L. Ed. 262]."

In the case of People v. Boyd, 227 P. 783, 67 Cal. App. 292, 302 (comment by Supreme Court in denying rehearing), the question of the admissibility of an offer on the part of the defendant to plead guilty to one of the offenses charged against him in the information, was considered by the court. It was ruled that such an admission, if voluntarily made, was competent evidence against the defendant, and the fact that such admission was made in court could not detract from either its relevancy or its competency.

No other reasons for reversal being suggested by appellant, it is ordered that the judgment and order be, and the same are, affirmed.

Seller's setting up of pump having column so short that it would not hoist water to surface, though of length provided for in contract, held not an "installation," though within meaning of contract, in view of provision for payment for extras found necessary; "installation" of machinery meaning to place in position where it will reasonably accomplish purposes for which it is set up.

2. Appeal and error ⚡1170(10)—Error, if any, in finding as to date when pumping plant was to be installed held harmless, in view of want of any effective installation (Civ. Code, § 1657; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Error, if any, in court's finding that seller was to install pumping plant by particular date held not prejudicial, where absence of any effective installation was established, in view of Civ. Code, § 1657, Const. art. 6, § 4½.

3. Sales ⚡62—Sale of pump and engine held single contract as affecting buyer's right to rescind for want of proper installation.

Sale of pump and engine held a single contract, though evidenced by separate written agreements, as affecting buyer's right to rescind for want of proper installation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by J. M. Long against the Ulmer Machinery Company for rescission of contract, wherein defendant filed cross-action. Judgment for plaintiff in both main action and cross-action, and defendant and cross-complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Waldo E. Burford, of Porterville, for appellant.

C. V. Anderson, and Wiley & Harvey, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. On the 5th day of December, 1922, the plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement for the purchase and sale of a Johnson pump, which agreement is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Agreement for the sale, purchase, and installation of Machinery & Electrical Equipment. Ulmer Machinery Co. (Inc.) of Porterville, Tulare county, Cal., party of the first part, and J. M. Long, of Bakersfield, in the county of Kern and state of California, party of the second part, do hereby agree upon the 5th day of December, 1922, as follows:

"The party of the first part agrees to furnish and install the following described machinery on land belonging to the party of the second part, and situated W. of Bakersfield in Kern Co., to wit: 1 Johnson pump complete as follows: 232"6" col shaft and tubing; 5#10 HC vane stages; 1 Type F head; 20' suction; installed ready for belt.

"The party of the second part agrees to pay the party of the first part, or order, at their office in Porterville, Cal., for the above-described machinery, and labor, the sum of two thousand fifty-three dollars ($2,053) on the following terms: $500.00 cash with order; $500.00 90 days after installation; bal. in 3 notes of $351.00 each due 6, 9, and 12 mon. from installation respectively; notes to bear 8% int. per annum; additions of engine to contract to be added to notes later.

"The party of the first part guarantees the above-described pump to have a capacity to deliver approximately 360 gallons of water per minute from 230 feet below the surface to no feet above the surface, provided the well is straight and plumb, supply of water is ample, and sand not excessive. Also agrees to replace any defective parts for a term of two years when brought to their shop at Porterville.

"It is hereby agreed and understood by the said parties that, in case actual conditions are different from those stated above, and that additional expense is necessary in order to meet such conditions, said extra expense shall be paid by the party of the second part. It is also further agreed that, in case of any changes or alterations in this agreement in the way of machinery or labor specified, and not furnished, or furnished and not specified, the regular price of same shall be added or deducted from the contract price, as the case may be.

"It is also agreed that the above machinery is, and shall remain, the personal property of the party of the first part, until all payments as above described shall have been made in full, whether evidenced by note, book, account or otherwise, and, in case payments are not made in the amounts and at the same time as agreed, party of the first part shall have the right to remove the said machinery from whatever it may be located without process of law and retain all payments that have been made to apply as rental and damage to machinery; however, the return of said machinery does not relieve the party of the second part from fulfilling the terms of this agreement.

"This agreement is contingent on delays caused by conditions beyond the control of the party of the first part, and does not become a contract until countersigned by an officer of the party of the first part."

On the same day and at the same time the plaintiff and defendant entered into a sales agreement, which agreement, so far as is necessary to be considered herein, is in the words and figures following, to wit:

This agreement further provides that the title shall remain in the seller until all of the notes are fully paid; that the buyer agrees to keep the property in good condition; that, upon default, the seller may take the property, and all payments might be retained by the seller as compensation for rentals, etc. It appears from the transcript that the plaintiff had, prior to December 5, 1922, installed or dug a well on certain lands and premises controlled by him, the water in which well stood at an elevation of about 232 feet from the surface; that the plaintiff and the defendant, after the plaintiff had finished digging the well in question, entered into negotiations concerning the purchase and installation of a Johnson pump and a gas engine thereafter to be determined upon for the purpose of hoisting the water from said well and installing the same for irrigation purposes. The contracts entered into by the parties made no mention of the time when the installation of the pump and engine should be completed, but the circumstance that the water was wanted for irrigation purposes, and that the necessity for the use of the water would arise at the beginning of the irrigation season of the following year, to wit, some time along in March, was apparently well known to all the parties. The court admitted testimony to the effect that it was orally agreed that the installation should be completed by the 1st of March of the year 1923. It appears from the evidence that the pump was installed by the 24th day of February, 1923, and the engine referred to was placed in position ready for use on or about the 19th day of March, 1923. After the pump and engine were placed in position, as herein stated, the defendant tested the same for something like 30 minutes, and was not able to raise any water from the well. The pump and engine not having been so installed as to enable plaintiff to hoist any water from the well, plaintiff notified the defendant on or about the 10th day of April, 1923, of the rescission of the contract, offered to deliver the pump and engine to the defendant, placed the same at the defendant's disposal, and demanded return of the payments made thereon, the surrender of the notes, and also the return of certain personal property taken by the defendant as part payment for the Johnson pump. Thereafter, and on or about the 20th day of May, 1923, the defendant pulled out the pump from where it had been installed, but, nothing further being done, on or about the 20th day of June, 1923, the plaintiff began this action. Judgment was awarded the plaintiff as prayed for, and the defendant appeals.

[1] While there is some contradictory testimony in the record, we think it sufficiently appears that C. A. Moore, the defendant's district manager, who negotiated the agreements with the plaintiff, and who testified as to the kind of pump, length of shafting, and tubing necessary for successful operation, knew that the water in the well where the pump was to be installed stood at a point from 230 to 232 feet from the surface of the ground. The record shows that, after the shafting and tubing were withdrawn from the well, the rust marks on the suction pipe at the end of the column showed that the water level was 18 inches below the lowest bowl, and, therefore, the pump would draw no water. As installed, there were 232 feet of column, 6 feet for bowls, and 22 feet of suction pipe. There were six bowls, one foot apart. The well itself was 315 feet in depth. According to the testimony, the bowls referred to must be submerged in order that the revolutions will force the water to the surface. The defendant, through its agent, had complete charge of the installation of the pump, but it does not appear anywhere in the transcript that any effort was made at any time to ascertain the water level. This appears from the testimony of Mr.

Moore in answer to a question of what he knew concerning the length of column required, when negotiating for the sale of the pump. His answer to such question is as follows:

"Only guessing at what it would be by reason of the fact that no man could tell in an undeveloped country what would be necessary. It is impossible. No man could tell it; it is just a guess; I estimated and I thought that was about what it would take."

This witness then testified that he was told by one Harry Lewis, not a party to the contract, that the water level was about 218 feet from the surface. This statement, however, is contradicted, and, as we have said, there is abundant testimony showing the defendant's agent had knowledge of the water level as hereinbefore stated. After the installation of the pump and engine and the trial thereof without the successful hoisting of any water, it does not appear that defendant did anything to remedy the condition, although the plaintiff demanded that some such action be taken. At the conclusion of the trial the court made and filed its findings, and the appellant assigns eleven grounds as to why the judgment should be reversed, among others, that some of the findings are not supported by the evidence, especially the finding that March 1st was fixed as the time when the installation of the pump and engine should be fully completed; also, that the court erred in permitting oral testimony as to conversations between the plaintiff and the defendant's agent of the date as to when the pump and engine should be installed, and as to the fact that the defendant was to furnish the plans and specifications, in order to determine the capacity of the pump necessary to hoist water from the well in question sufficient for irrigation purposes. Objection is also urged to the fact that the court considered the agreement for the purchase of the pump and engine as really one transaction, although the papers were signed at different dates. From the view which we take of the agreements entered into between the parties we think it unnecessary to pass upon the question as to whether the court erred in admitting testimony that March 1st was understood as the date by which time the pump and engine should be fully installed and ready for operation.

The appellant, in considering the agreement for the purchase of the pump, relies upon the fact that it actually furnished 232 feet of column, 5 # 10 H. C. 8 vane stages, 1 type "F" head, and 20 feet of suction pipe, and that the pump in question had a capacity of delivering 360 gallons of water per minute from a distance of 230 feet below the surface, and that, if it installed machinery capable of performing that service, it had completed its contract irrespective of whether the pump so installed would or would not hoist any water from the well in question. This reasoning is based upon the paragraph of the agreement hereinbefore first set out, wherein it is guaranteed that the pump furnished has such a capacity. In making this argument the appellant entirely overlooks the next following paragraph in the agreement wherein it is set forth that, in case the actual conditions are different from those thus stated above, and that additional expense is necessary to meet such conditions, said extra expense shall be paid by the party of the second part. "It is also further agreed that, in case of any change or alterations in this agreement in the way of machinery or labor specified, and not furnished, or furnished and not specified, the regular price of same shall be added or deducted from the contract price, as the case may be." In the light of this paragraph in the contract it is evident that it was the duty of the party furnishing the pump which it had agreed to install to ascertain the exact length of the column necessary in order to place the bowls in such a position in relation to the water level that they would be properly installed so as to reasonably perform the services for which the installation was being had. It appears from the testimony that the plaintiff had no knowledge of the manner in which the pumping machinery would be installed; that it was necessary to have the bowls submerged in water to make their operation effective, but that the defendant and appellant did have such knowledge. It is further argued that no one can forecast the quantity of water that would be produced by the well, and no one can guarantee that any pump would hoist a certain quantity of water from the well, but that is a different question entirely from the one which goes to the fact that it was the duty of the appellant in installing the pump to so install its machinery as to render it capable of actually hoisting water from the well. Reading the two paragraphs together which we are considering, we think they mean that the appellant undertook to install a pump, and so install it that it would hoist water from the well belonging to the plaintiff, and that the capacity of the pump was such that, from a distance of 230 feet below the surface, the pump would deliver 360 gallons per minute, and that the delivery of water would be decreased in proportion to the distance of the water level from the surface. It appears from the evidence that the pump in question had a lifting capacity of 252 feet. The appellant knew that the pump had to be installed in such manner that the revolving bowls should be submerged, and, when it so performed its part of the contract that these bowls were left in the air above the water, we do not very well see how it can be argued that installation, as that term is interpreted when applied to placing machinery in position, can effectively be claimed. Installation means, as we understand the word, to place machinery in that position where it will reasonably accomplish the purposes for which it is set up. As defined in 32 C. J. 939 we find that "installation" includes all that we have just stated. The definition there given is as follows: "Installation, as applied to machinery, a word with a technical meaning, referring to the whole of a system of machines, apparatus and accessories set up and arranged for working, as in electric lighting, transmission of power, etc.," and to install means, "to set up or fix in position for use or service." To the same effect is the definition given in Metzler v. Thye, 124 P. 721, 163 Cal. 96, where a covenant in a lease to install an elevator was held to mean that the elevator should be so installed as to be suitable for use.

[2] As the appellant pulled out its pumping plant prior to its ever having been installed, as we think that term must be construed and understood as found in the agreement where the seller covenanted to install a pumping plant and failed to make any effort to properly install the same, when it ascertained that no water could be raised by the pump as it had been set up and installed, the finding of the court as to March 1st being the time when the contract was to be completed is wholly immaterial. The record shows that the plaintiff did not take any steps towards rescinding the agreement or agreements until nearly a month and a half after that date, and a considerable period of time after the appellant had made its alleged installation, and apparently ceased to complete its work. It would appear from the testimony that, when the pump was installed, and the engine started up, the pumping machinery operated without any difficulty, showing that the well was sufficiently perpendicular for successful operation. The testimony of the appellant's witness who made the tests is as follows:

"The pump was working, it was turning.
* * * Probably tried the pump out for half an hour, and maybe a little more. * * * It didn't pump water during that period."

The witness further testified as follows:

"Q. Now, from any subsequent investigation made after that time, other than from the pulling of the pump, you are able to inform the court why the pump did not pump water? A. Yes.

"Q. Why not? A. Because the pump wasn't in the water.

"Q. Because the pump wasn't in the water? A. No, sir.

"Q. When you refer to the pump what do you mean? A. I mean the pump bowls.

"Q. It would have been necessary for the pump bowls to be submerged in the water in order to pump water? A. Yes."

[3] It is next urged that the court erred in finding that the agreement in relation to the purchase of the gas engine was in fact, though not in time, a part and parcel of the original agreement, and that the parties intended a purchase and sale of the pump and engine as a single unit. The agreement dated December 5, 1922, contains the following:

"Addition of engine to contract to be added to notes later."

The testimony as to what was understood by this part of the contract dated December 5th and that of the later agreement covering the engine is as follows: Mr. Moore, the district manager of the appellant, testified on that subject as follows:

"Q. That engine referred to in this contract is the same engine that was referred to in this original contract, this original contract, which reads: 'Addition of engine to contract to be added to notes later,' that is the same one? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That is intended to cover the obligation of the Ulmer Machinery Company in that contract in producing an engine? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. The engine described here then is not necessarily the engine described in Defendant's Exhibit 1? A. I don't know how it would be construed, this engine we purchased for Mr. Long as we agreed to do in the original contract, because there was no specification of the engine at first, just 'an engine.'

"Q. You had not agreed on what he should pay, what kind of an engine it should be? A. No.

"Q. That was to be determined later on? A. Yes, sir."

J. A. Ulmer, president of the appellant company, testified as follows:

"Q. Mr. Ulmer, how did you construe at the time this provision, 'addition of engine to contract to be added to notes later'? A. I construed that we were going to get an engine, I didn't know what size it would be, how much it would cost, or anything about it, I couldn't put it in the contract.

"Q. You expected to add that engine to this contract when you signed it? A. I expected to add it to the notes.

"Q. What did you intend by this language: 'Addition of engine to contract?' A. I considered they wanted me to find an engine for them somewhere, I didn't know how big the engine was going to be, or how much it would cost. I couldn't put it in that contract, because I didn't have the information at that time.

"Q. You didn't know what type of engine? A. Didn't know what type it was or what size, or what it cost.

"Q. For that reason it was not specifically described? A. It wasn't described, and the price wasn't on there.

"Q. If you had had an engine at that time for the purpose of describing it, it would have been described? A. If I was selling an engine at a certain specified price, knew what kind of an engine they were going to have, I would have put that in.

"Q. In this first contract in lieu of that it provided that the engine should in the future be added to the contract? A. The price would be added to the contract, which was done in that third contract.

"Q. This contract was drawn by your agent, wasn't it? A. Mr. Moore.

"Q. Mr. Moore? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That is his handwriting in there? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Why did it not state then that it was simply to be added to the price, or the amount of said bill, instead of that it was to be added to the contract? A. Added to the price.

"Q. Yes. A. The price and contract are the same thing.

"Q. Not necessarily. A. I would think so.

"Q. Why was it necessary in the contract to state further it was to be added to the notes later if the contract and the price are the same? A. Why?

"Q. Yes. A. Because I didn't know the price at that time; I didn't know what engine I was going to get; I couldn't add the price at that time because I didn't know anything about what the price was, or the make of the engine, or where it was to come from, or anything else."

There was some other testimony along the same line, but it is no different in effect from that herein set forth.

Without passing, as we have said, one way or the other upon the alleged error of the court in admitting testimony as to the time when the pumping plant should be installed, we think that section 1657, Civil Code, which provides if no time is specified for the performance of an act required to be performed, a reasonable time is allowed, would bring this case within the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution of the state, when the circumstances surrounding the contracting parties are taken into consideration. All the parties knew that the water was wanted for irrigation beginning with the opening of the irrigation season of 1923, which the testimony shows to be about coincident with the beginning of the month of March, and, in view of the fact that an additional one and one-third months were allowed to elapse after that date before notice of rescission was given, the alleged error of the court, if admitted to be error, has not operated in a miscarriage of justice. The testimony which we have set forth, we think, justified the court in coming to the conclusion that the parties contemplated the purchase and sale of a pump and engine as a single unit. If this is not true, then the words concerning the engine and the addition of the purchase price contained in the agreement dated December 5, 1922, become meaningless. What we have said also disposes of the appellant's cross-complaint for the notes alleged to be due at the time of the beginning of this action. We think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

HUTCHINSON LUMBER CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5429.)

1. Master and servant $\Rightarrow$ 419—Injury first believed to be temporary held to constitute "new and further disability" when it became permanent disability (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11, subd. c. [St. 1917, p. 841]).

Injury to knee of employee of lumber company, which was first believed to be temporary held to constitute "new and further disability" within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11, subd. (c), when permanent disability developed.

2. Master and servant $\Rightarrow$ 419—Injured workman held not required to file application for compensation, based on new and further disability, within six months (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11, subd. [c] [St. 1917, p. 841]).

Injured workman held not required, by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11, subd. (c), to file application for compensation, based on new and further disability, within six months after he became aware of it.

3. Master and servant $\Rightarrow$ 419—Injured workman held not guilty of laches in applying for compensation for new and further disability.

Employee who knew in July that knee injury received in preceding October was no better, but, relying on statement of insurance company's doctor that he would be all right, did not ascertain that such injury was permanent until December, held not guilty of laches in waiting till following May to apply for compensation for new and further disability.

Application for certiorari by the Hutchinson Lumber Company and another against the State Industrial Accident Commission and another to review the named defendant's order awarding compensation for injuries to John Bohan. Award affirmed.

H. C. Kelsey, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Petitioners hereby apply for a writ of review whereby they seek to have annulled an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission.

[1] On October 28, 1923, respondent John Bohan, 63 years of age, sustained a severe injury to his knee while working for the Hutchinson Lumber Company near Oroville. The petitioners recognized the compensability of the injury by furnishing him with medical treatment and compensating him up to April, 1924. In December, 1924, Bohan ascertained for the first time that the injury, which the insurance company's doctor had previously indicated to him was only of a temporary nature, had developed into one of a permanent character, and on May 12, 1925, after said insurance company had refused to recognize the permanent nature of the disability, or to compensate him therefor, filed an application with the respondent commission for an adjustment of his claim. Petitioners filed no answer to the application, but at the hearing urged the objection that Bohan's claim was barred by lapse of time. This objection was not sustained, and the commission held, properly we think, that Bohan's injury, having changed from a temporary to a permanent disability, constituted a "new and further disability" within the meaning of subdivision (c) of section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 841), and therefore entitled him to further compensation. In support of its decision on this latter point the respondent commission calls attention to the fact that recently the Supreme Court has denied two petitions for writs of review, having for their purpose the annulment of awards made in proceedings involving facts similar to those presented here; that is, where temporary disabilities had afterwards become permanent. Imperial Ice and Development Co. et al. v. Industrial Acc. Com., L. A. No. 8334; Otis Elevator Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com. and M. J. O'Connor, S. F. No. 11819. See, also, Anaheim Co-operative Orange Ass'n v. Industrial Acc. Com. (Cal. App.) 233 P. 1115; Assurance Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 207 P. 60, 57 Cal. App. 257.

[2] The main contention made by petitioners is, however, that under section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation Act a claim based upon a new and further disability must be filed within a period of six months after the date on which the new and further disability is ascertainable, and that, since it appears in the instant case that Bohan knew in July, 1924, that he "was no better," and could have ascertained then through medical advice the true character of the injury, his failure to file an application within six months thereafter bars his right to have his claim considered. To this contention the respondent commission replies that subdivision (c) of section 11 of said act, which confers upon the commission continuing jurisdiction for a period of 245 weeks to grant additional compensation for a new and further disability, contains no requirement that an application for compensation based upon that ground shall be filed within a period of 6 months after the nature of the disability is ascertainable. The respondent commission concedes that in a series of causes it has denied relief where the claim has not been filed within a period of 6 months after the claimant had become aware of the fact that a new and further disability had developed, but it is pointed out that the enforcement of such rule of limitation was not based upon express statutory enactment, but was grounded upon the doctrine of laches, and that in the present case there is no evidence to establish any of the elements of such doctrine.

[3] We are of the opinion that the position taken by the commission must be sustained. The statute specifies no such limitation of time for the filing of an application based upon a new and further disability; and, as to the matter of laches, the facts revealed by the record, including those set forth in Bohan's application, are as follows: For a week or two following the happening of the accident Bohan was cared for by petitioners in a hospital in Oroville, and was then sent to San Francisco to the insurance company's doctor for further treatment, arriving there in November, 1923. He called first at the office of the respondent commission, but was referred to the representative of the petitioner insurance company, who, after paying Bohan a certain amount of compensation and expenses, told him that he "should not go further to the commission"; that the insurance company "would take complete care of him and pay him everything that was coming to him." He was thereupon sent by said company to a hospital. On March 12, 1924, an operation was performed on his knee, the report of the surgeon showing that the quadriceps extensor to the right leg were sutured about one inch above its insertion at the patella, at which point it had been almost completely ruptured, and that there was only a small portion of the vastus externus which had not been ruptured, and it was through this small portion that the little motion the leg had was carried on. Bohan continued to remain in the hospital until March 26, 1924, on which date he received his last medical and surgical treatment. At that time the doctor supplied him with an elastic bandage, telling him to wear it for 2 months, and that he "would be all right." He was then discharged, the doctor telling him further to write "how he was getting along." Bohan thereupon went to Sacramento to stay with friends until he was able to go to work. About 2 weeks later, and on April 8, 1924, his compensation was discontinued, although at that time it was apparent that he would not be able to work for approximately 2 months. Bohan continued to wear the elastic bandage as instructed for 2 months, but at the end of that period his knee "did not feel any better." The wound caused by the operation had not healed, and as Bohan expressed, when he "would walk up" his knee would "nearly fall out," and going down stairs he could "hardly walk." In July his knee "felt a little better," and, although it had not healed, he accepted employment with another company, but, after working a few hours, was forced to quit. Thereupon Bohan wrote to the insurance company's physician as instructed, stating that he "was not getting well," and asking for additional compensation. He waited until December of that year for a reply, and, receiving none, returned to San Francisco. He called first upon the insurance company's doctor, and afterwards visited the commission, whereupon an examination of his knee was made under the direction of the assistant medical director of the commission. It was then determined that the injury to his knee was permanent, and Bohan was so informed. In fact, there had been no improvement in his condition since July but the advice thus imparted to him by the medical department of the commission in December was the first information he had received that his disability was permanent. In February, 1925, he was given a new rating by the medical department of the commission, which the insurance company refused to recognize, and also refused to pay Bohan further compensation. On May 12, 1925, formal application for further compensation was filed with the commission.

There is no contention made by petitioners that prior to December, 1924, Bohan knew that his injury was permanent; and obviously, in view of the statements made to him in March by the insurance company's doctor, the only reasonable impression Bohan could have formed in regard to his condition in July was that his injury was still of a temporary nature, requiring only further medical treatment. This he endeavored to obtain by writing as directed to said doctor, but his letter, so far as the evidence discloses, was ignored and after vainly waiting a reasonable length of time, in the apparent hope that the doctor's statement to him that he "would be all right" would prove true, went to San Francisco in December, where he was told for the first time the true extent of his disability. The delay thereafter in filing the application was attributed by Bohan to the fact that he still depended upon the insurance company to carry out its promises made to him in November, 1923, that they would take complete care of him and pay him everything that was coming to him. Their refusal to do so did not take place until February, 1925, and, in any event, Bohan's application for further compensation was filed within 6 months after he learned of his condition.

In view of the foregoing facts, it is our opinion that the commission's conclusion that the situation presented was not a proper one for the application of the doctrine of laches must be sustained.

The award is therefore affirmed.

In re NISBET. (Civ. 5265.)

1. Attorney and client ⚖️61—It is not policy of law that attorney who has been disbarred for misconduct shall never be readmitted to practice.

It is not the policy of the law, and is not considered to be in interest of justice, that attorney who has been disbarred for misconduct shall never under any circumstances be readmitted to practice.

In determining whether disbarred attorney should be readmitted to practice, court must endeavor to exercise reasonable discretion, uninfluenced by sympathy on the one side or by harsh severity on the other.

3. Attorney and client ⚖️61—Letters from attorneys and business men, supported by affidavits, expressing faith in integrity of disbarred attorney, held sufficient to warrant reinstatement.

Letters from attorneys and business men, supported by affidavits as to truth of their contents stating that writers had faith in integrity of disbarred attorney who had successfully occupied positions of trust and confidence since being disbarred, and expressing confidence in him, and willingness to employ him professionally if readmitted to practice, held sufficient to warrant reinstatement.

In the matter of the application of Henry W. Nisbet for an order of reinstatement as counselor and attorney at law. Application granted.

Byron Waters, of San Bernardino, and Henry M. Willis, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Kenyon F. Lee, of Los Angeles, for Los Angeles Bar Association.

CONREY, P. J. In May, 1918, a judgment of disbarment was entered against petitioner herein, who for many years had been a member of the bar of California. The specific charges of which he was found guilty were, in substance, that Mr. Nisbet had obtained property or money upon the faith of two certain small checks drawn by him upon banks in which, as he well knew, he had no money on deposit, and wherein he had no account. Prior to that time, in the year 1911, he had been suspended from practice for the period of one year for a breach of his duties as an attorney and counselor at law.

The disbarment of petitioner has been in force nearly eight years. In his petition herein he shows that during this period he has lived continuously in the city of Los Angeles; that during a considerable part of that time he has occupied positions of trust and confidence, and has at all times conducted himself with integrity and propriety. The petition is accompanied by letters of indorsement from a large number of men of high standing in the legal profession, who inform the court that they know Mr. Nisbet personally; that they have faith in his integrity, and, in substance, that they believe that if he is restored his future conduct will be above reproach.

There are also letters from business men by whom the petitioner has been employed, who express their confidence in him, and in some instances their willingness and intention to employ him professionally in the event of the restoration of his license to practice. As mere letters in support of such an application would not be satisfactory, it should be added that some of these are supported by affidavits that the statements therein are true. There is no evidence of misconduct of petitioner since the date of his disbarment.

[1] It is not the policy of the law, and is not considered to be in the interest of justice, that an attorney who has been disbarred for misconduct shall never under any circumstances be readmitted to practice. In the Matter of Stevens, 241 P. 88, the Supreme Court, in connection with its ruling that applicants for restoration to practice need not in all cases be required to submit to a re-examination as to their mental qualifications, said:

"No adequate reason occurs to us for making the rule invariable. The law is interested in the regeneration of erring attorneys, and in the enforcement of a sound discipline its disposition ought not to be to place unnecessary burdens upon them."

In his separate opinion in that case Mr. Justice Richards stated that in such an inquiry the sole question concerning the petitioner is "whether by his good conduct since his disbarment he has shown cause for restoration to his former position at the bar; whether the doctrine of locus penitentiae shall be applied to his case." In the case of In re Mash, 179 P. 897, 39 Cal. App. 548, the Supreme Court, in its opinion on denial of rehearing of an order made by the District Court of Appeal, defined the purpose of such an order as follows:

"It should always be kept in mind that in determining such a question the District Court of Appeal is not considering an application to relieve the applicant from punishment or to give him an opportunity to reform, but that its sole object is to determine whether or not the character of the applicant is such that he should be admitted to an office of trust and recommended to the public as a trustworthy person fit to be consulted by others in matters of confidence. A certificate of admission to practice law is a standing affirmation that he is of that character, and it invites others to enter into intimate confidential relations with him. The interest and safety of those who may be thus led to consult him should be regarded as the end to be accomplished."

[2, 3] In applying the principles thus declared, the court must endeavor to exercise a reasonable discretion, uninfluenced by sympathy on the one side or by harsh severity on the other. The petition for restoration should be granted when, and only when, the court upon the case as presented to it is convinced by positive evidence that the applicant has established, and now possesses, that good moral character which will make of him a trustworthy and honorable member of the bar. In this case we are satisfied that the application should be granted.

It is ordered that petitioner, Henry W. Nisbet, be, and he hereby is, restored to the rights and privileges of an attorney and counselor at law, and is authorized to practice in all courts of this state.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by the California Credit & Collection Corporation against Albertis Goodin. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. R. Cunyningham and Daley B. Robnett, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. G. Bailey, of Woodland, for respondent.

HART, J. The object of this action is to recover on a promissory note executed and delivered by the defendant to the Virden Packing Company for the sum of $750. The note was dated November 7, 1920. Prior to the commencement of the action, and after it had matured or become payable, the note was assigned by the payee therein named to the plaintiff. These facts, and the fact that no part of said note has been paid, and the further fact of the refusal of defendant to pay the note upon its maturity, are alleged in the complaint, and the prayer is for judgment in accord with the claim of plaintiff as to the several amounts (principal, interest and attorney's fee) alleged to be due, owing, and unpaid on the obligation.

The amended answer admits the execution and delivery of the note by defendant to the Virden Packing Company, and that the same has not been paid, and alleges that the same was made without "any consideration whatsoever." Said answer also sets up fraud on the part of the plaintiff's assignor in inducing defendant to execute the note and a certain agreement, of which said note was the outgrowth. The facts upon which said defense is predicated are set out with much particularity of detail, and are, as so alleged, substantially embraced within the findings of the court, and so declared to be true. It should here be explained that the transcript here contains the record in several different actions brought by the plaintiff against as many different defendants, including the respondent herein, upon promissory notes given by said defendants to the plaintiff's assignor, and that these actions, for the purposes of the trial thereof, were consolidated and tried together, and it was stipulated by counsel on both sides that the testimony taken in the several cases should be considered as applying to all the cases, where applicable.

The facts, however, as found by the court, are, in substance, as follows: That the Virden Packing Company, a corporation, organized as such for the purpose of establishing and carrying on a meat packing plant, and to that end to buy and sell and slaughter cattle, sheep, and hogs, and to refrigerate and preserve the same, and to build the necessary buildings for the same, and also in connection therewith to establish and maintain stockyards, procured the defendant to enter into an agreement to subscribe for ten shares of its stock at $100 per share; that, upon the execution of said agreement by the parties, and as a part of the same transaction, the defendant paid to said corporation in cash, in part payment for said stock, the sum of $250 and his promissory note (the one in suit) for the balance of $750; that, in order to induce defendant to make said subscription agreement and also said note, said corporation "falsely and fraudulently represented to this defendant that said * * * packing company had located its packing house, packing plant, and stockyards at West Sacramento, in Yolo county, state of California"; that it had purchased land in West Sacramento upon which to erect and maintain its packing house, etc.; that, when soliciting said subscription for said shares of stock from defendant, said company exhibited to defendant pictures of the buildings and plans for a packing plant, etc., and at the same time stated to defendant that said pictures and plans represented the buildings, etc., of said packing plant which were to be erected by said corporation upon said lands so purchased in West Sacramento for that purpose, and where said corporation had theretofore located its packing house, packing plant, and stockyards; that said corporation had voted to spend $1,500,000 in the construction of said buildings, packing plant, stockyards, etc., upon the lands purchased by it for that purpose in West Sacramento; that said corporation further falsely and fraudulently stated and represented at said time to the defendant that it had put in a spur track to their premises so purchased by it in West Sacramento, and that it had theretofore placed and, at said time, was placing, materials on said premises at West Sacramento for the erection of said buildings, packing house, and packing plant; that said corporation further falsely and fraudulently stated and represented to defendant that many persons with whom he (defendant) was acquainted, and upon whose judgment he relied, and whose names defendant cannot "at this time recall," and particularly stated to defendant, that "J. W. Browning, of Grimes, had subscribed for $25,000 worth of stock of said Virden Packing Company; that Fred McCullough, of Dunnigan, Cal., had subscribed for $25,000 worth of the capital stock; and that Frank Edson, of Knights Landing, Cal., and one of the supervisors of the county of Yolo, Cal., had made a very liberal subscription; that each and all of said men so mentioned, as aforesaid, were men of large financial interests, business experience, and capacity, and were successful business men, and that said defendant was well acquainted with each and all of said persons; and that he relied upon said representations and upon the business experience and capacity of the said

Browning, McCullough, and Edson"; that said Virden Packing Company "furthermore stated and represented that it had finally and definitely located its buildings, packing plant, and packing house and stockyards in West Sacramento, county of Yolo, state of California." It is then found that said company had not located its buildings, packing house, etc., or either or any of them, in West Sacramento, Yolo county, or at any other place in the said county; that it had not purchased land in West Sacramento upon which to erect buildings, etc., for a packing plant, and had not established stockyards at West Sacramento or elsewhere in the county of Yolo; that it never intended to do so; that it never voted to spend $1,500,000 or any other sum in the erection of buildings, packing plant, etc., and stockyards at West Sacramento, or elsewhere, in said county of Yolo; that said company never "put in a spur track in to their premises in West Sacramento," nor placed materials thereon for the erection of buildings, etc., at West Sacramento; and that said company "had done nothing toward the building and erection of said buildings, or any of them; that neither said J. W. Browning nor said Fred McCullough purchased any stock in said packing company, of any kind or in any amount whatsoever, and that neither is a stockholder in said company, and did not subscribe for stock in said company in any amount whatsoever; that said Frank Edson did subscribe for one share, and only one share, of the stock of said company, and that he had never at any time subscribed for more than one share therein; that said Browning and said McCullough, at the time the representations were made by said company that they had purchased or subscribed for shares of the stock of said company, were not subscribers to the capital stock thereof, and that said Edson had subscribed for but one share thereof; that all of said representations were by said Virden Packing Company at said time known to be false, and were false, and that said Virden Packing Company never intended at said time and had no intentions of building and erecting said buildings, packing house, packing plant, and or stockyards, or either or any of them, at West Sacramento, or elsewhere in the county of Yolo, state of California, but that said representations, and each and all of them, so made, as aforesaid, were made by the said Virden Packing Company, with the express intent and purpose of cheating and defrauding this defendant, and of inducing him to subscribe for said shares of stock of said Virden Packing Company, and to induce this defendant to make, execute, and deliver to the said Virden Packing Company said promissory note as hereinabove set forth; that this defendant is a farmer and resident of the county of Yolo, state of California, and engaged in raising live stock in the county of Yolo, state of California, and was desirous of supporting a corporation that would build and erect and maintain a packing house, packing plant, and or stockyards in the county of Yolo, state of California, which would thereby give to this defendant a ready local market for the stock that he might raise, and would build up and increase the stock business and the transactions arising therefrom in which this defendant was and is engaged; that this fact was well known to the said Virden Packing Company, a corporation, at said time; and that this defendant would not have purchased stock in said corporation, or any other corporation, to build, erect, and maintain a packing house, packing plant, and or stockyards, or any, or either of them, at any other place than in the county of Yolo, state of California."

The defendant claimed and asked for no affirmative relief, and the judgment was that "plaintiff take nothing by reason of its complaint," and that defendant "do have and recover from said plaintiff his costs of suit herein incurred."

The appeal is by the plaintiff from said judgment, and is supported by a record of the proceedings of the trial prepared under the authorization of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1-6] The point first made by the appellant is that the defendant, if in any event he was entitled to avoid the obligations of the note in suit, should have invoked either of the only two remedies available to one claiming that he was induced to enter into a contract through the false representations or fraud of the other party, to wit: (1) Upon the discovery of the fraud to rescind the contract and ask for the recovery of whatever he may have paid or parted with by reason of the contract, in which case he must of course, give notice of the rescission, and return, or offer to return, everything of value which he had received under the contract; or (2) affirm and stand upon the contract, and sue to recover whatever damages he may have suffered by reason of the fraud. To support that position appellant cites these cases: Hickman v. Johnson, 178 P. 145, 36 Cal. App. 342; McColgan v. Muirland, 82 P. 1113, 2 Cal. App. 6; Field v. Austin, 63 P. 692, 131 Cal. 379; Brandenstein v. Johnson, 73 P. 744, 140 Cal. 29; Munson v. Fishburn, 190 P. 808, 183 Cal. 206, 216; Hines v. Frode, 143 P. 729, 168 Cal. 507. Those cases, while, of course, laying down sound principles governing actions at law or suits in equity founded upon fraudulently procured contracts, do not sustain the contention of appellant. Some of them are actions based upon rescission in which the plaintiff failed to maintain his action because he had not restored, or offered to restore, what of value he had received under the contract from the other contracting party. There is to be found in one or two of the cases a statement which, when considered without reference to the facts of the particular case in which it is made, might be understood as an announcement by the court that a party defrauded into entering into a contract for the sale of property has but two remedial courses open to him, and that they are those suggested by appellant and mentioned hereinabove. Obviously, as the cases named declare, one who rescinds a contract on the ground of fraud in its procurement must restore, or offer to restore, to the other party what he has received of value under the contract, or, as the rule is often stated, he must restore the other party to statu quo before he is entitled to a rescission. A party cannot rescind a contract whereby he has purchased, or agreed to purchase, property, and at the same time keep the property. It is likewise true, as some of the cases named declare, that, in an action for damages for deceit, based upon fraud in the procurement of a contract, damage must be pleaded and proved. The defendant never received anything of value from plaintiff under or by reason of the contract. As shown, the contract expressly provided, and so it was agreed by the parties, that no stock "is to be issued until the amount of this subscription and the note or notes given therefor are paid in full in cash" and it is admitted by the pleadings, and was at the trial, that defendant never paid the amount of the note given for the balance to be paid on his subscription and that the stock was never issued to defendant. There was, therefore, as before stated, nothing of value received by defendant under the terms of the contract. Hence the title to the stock remained in the packing company, and the defendant really never became a stockholder therein. Rose v. Foord, 30 P. 1114, 96 Cal. 152; Vulcan Fire Ins. Co. v. Jorgensen, 166 P. 835, 33 Cal. App. 768; 14 Cor. Juris, pp. 428, 429. As shown, defendant asks for no affirmative relief. He merely interposes a defense involving an objection to the enforcement of the note on the ground that it is in law without obligatory force, for the reason that he was procured or induced by plaintiff's assignor to execute and deliver it to the latter by fraud or false representations. That such a defense is available in a case of this character—that is, where defendant has not received anything of value from the other party, as has been shown is true here—is definitely attested by the authorities. See Toby v. Oregon, etc., R. Co., 33 P. 550, 98 Cal. 498; Russ L. & M. Co. v. Muscupiabe L. & W. Co., 52 P. 995, 120 Cal. 521, 527, 65 Am. St. Rep. 186; Hart v. Church, 58 P. 910, 59 P. 296, 126 Cal. 471, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195; Simon Newman Co. v. Lassing, 74 P. 761, 141 Cal. 174, 178; Cox v. Schnerr, 156 P. 509, 172 Cal. 375, 383; Estate of Cover, 204 P. 583, 188 Cal. 133, 140; Mundorff v. Ramm, 226 P. 825, 66 Cal. App. 553; California Credit & Coll. Cor. v. Randall (Cal. App.) 244*P. 958. Nor, in a case of this character, where the consideration has not passed, is it necessary for the defendant to plead and prove damage. Kelly v. C. C. P. Co., 16 P. 386, 74

Cal. 557, 561, 5 Am. St. Rep. 470; Munson v. Fishburn, 190 P. 808, 183 Cal. 206, 218; Vulcan Fire Ins. Co. v. Jorgensen, 166 P. 835, 33 Cal. App. 763, supra. This statement is to be understood as meaning that damage in such a case—that is, where the effect of the defense set up would only be to vitiate or destroy the binding force of the contract on the ground of fraud and compensation by way of damages is not sought—need not be specially pleaded or proved. Of course, in all such cases damage or injury is of the essence of the action. Every transaction brought about by fraud must result in damage or injury to the party who has thus been drawn into it. Damage necessarily follows from the fraud. This is so whether substantial damage susceptible to appraisal in terms of money has or has not resulted. The damage is in the fact that, because of the fraud by means of which the contract has been procured, the defendant will not, and cannot, secure the thing he contracted for, and which constituted an important part of the consideration for the contract. So, in such case, or even where substantial detriment has been suffered by reason of the fraud, but damages therefor are waived by the defendant, and no other relief is asked for than that of being released from the obligations of the fraudulently procured contract, the mere plea and proof of the fraud is sufficient, and amounts to the plea and proof of the damage or injury which is essentially the concomitant of the fraud. At all events, it would be entirely incompatible with a just conception of a rational system of remedial law to hold it to be true that a party drawn into the making of a contract through fraudulent representations as to the subject-matter thereof may not obtain judicial sanction of an application, in appropriate form, for his release from the obligations of such contract without pleading and proving that by reason of such engagement he has actually suffered substantial damage or damage which must be measured and may be compensated for in money. But such is not the law. Section 3412 of the Civil Code opposes such a theory or notion. That section gives a specific remedy for the cancellation of a contract obtained by fraud or which is voidable for other reasons, or is void, and, as has been shown, the cases above named and others not named are as one in holding that, where a note or other contract has been obtained by fraud, and innocent third parties have not acquired equities therein, the defendant, instead of proceeding under section 3412 of the Civil Code, "may abide his time, and when enforcement is sought against him excuse himself from performance by proof of the fraud." Hart v. Church, 58 P. 910, 913, 126 Cal. 471, 479, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195.

[7] The findings are amply supported. It was admitted by the plaintiff that Thomas J. Brooks, the party representing the packing company in the transactions upon which this action is founded, was the duly appointed and acting agent of the Virden Packing Company, and as such authorized to sell the stock of the company. Defendant admitted the execution by him of the subscription contract and the note in suit. The defendant testified that, at and before the time he executed the contract and the note, the said stock salesman of the packing company stated and represented to him that the company intended locating its packing plant and stockyards at West Sacramento, in Yolo county, and had already purchased land at said place suitable and sufficient for that purpose; that it had laid a—“spur track connecting with the plant, and had the machinery on the ground to start up business, and he also said that he had sold stock around there to his neighbors, Fred McCullough Bros., Perry Hiatt and Johnny Browning; and he said Mr. Edson had taken a large portion of it.

“Q. Did he tell you the amount of the stock that any of these men had subscribed for? A. Well, he said Fred McCullough had bought a large portion of the amount; that Mr. Edson had bought a large share. He didn't say what Mr. Browning or Hiatt had bought. He said they were going to spend over $1,000,000 in machinery in fixing up the plant.

“Q. Did he say what kind of a plant it was?

A. A packing house, he said.

“Q. And did you understand what kind? A. He told me we would have a local market for our stock close home in Yolo county.”

Defendant further testified that he was acquainted with Fred McCullough, John Browning, Perry Hiatt, and F. B. Edson, the last named a member of the board of supervisors of Yolo county, and that he knew they were men of extensive business interests, and that he had confidence in their business judgment. Defendant testified that he believed all the said representations, and would not have executed the subscription contract and the note in suit or the note of which it was a renewal, if he had known at the times of those transactions that such representations were untrue. It was shown that, although the Virden Packing Company purchased some land at West Sacramento subsequent to the occurrence of the above-mentioned transactions, it never proceeded further toward the establishment of a packing plant and stockyards at said place, but finally took over an established packing plant in the city of San Francisco, where, ever since, the company has carried on the packing business. It was further shown, and, in fact, not denied, that the company never caused the machinery necessary for the building and equipment of such a business to be brought to West Sacramento. It was further shown that Browning, Hiatt, and McCullough, at the time Goodin entered into the engagements involved herein, had not purchased, or agreed to purchase, a single share of stock in the company. Edson did purchase one share of said stock, but only one share.

[8-10] Defendant testified that he did not learn of the falsity of the representations until after he had renewed the note. His testimony in that particular was not contradicted. Indeed, there was no attempt to controvert any of the facts to which defendant testified, nor was there any attempt to contradict the testimony of other witnesses to the effect that the packing company never at any time took any steps in the direction of establishing a packing plant at West Sacramento other than the fact that it purchased some land at said place, as to which fact, however, the court, with apparent justness, found, from all the circumstances which the evidence showed preceded, attended, and succeeded such purchase, that the same was not made with any definite or settled intention on the part of the company of building thereon a packing plant and stockyards, or at any time ever had any such intention definitely established in its mind. The statements made to defendant by the agent of plaintiff's assignor, and which statements the court upon sufficient evidence found not to be true, that the company had definitely decided to locate its plant at West Sacramento, in Yolo county, and to that end had voted to appropriate a prodigious sum from its financial resources for the purpose of constructing the necessary buildings and of installing the machinery required for the operation of such an enterprise, and had constructed a spur railroad track to facilitate such construction and for its conveniences otherwise, constituted material representations. They involved more than a mere promise to do certain acts in the future. They involved representations that the company had already fixed or definitely decided and determined to establish its plant in the county in which defendant resided and carried on the stock-raising business, thus making it the more convenient for, and advantageous to, him in the matter of disposing of the products of his business, and that such decision and determination had already been accentuated in a practical manner by making certain essential preliminary arrangements for the establishing of the packing plant and stockyards at said place. While a mere promise to perform an act in the future is not, in a legal sense, a representation, nor the effect of a failure to perform such promise is to convert it into a false representation, yet, if, as is the fact here, “the promise is accompanied with statements of existing facts which show the ability of the promisor to perform his promise, and without which the promise would not be accepted or acted upon, such statements are denominated representations, and, if falsely made, are grounds of avoiding the contract, though the thing promised to be done lies wholly in the future.” Russ Lumber & Mill Co. v. Muscupiabe L. & W. Co., 52 P. 995, 998, 120 Cal. 521, 529, 530 (65 Am. St. Rep. 186). But the representation made to defendant by the packing company's agent, and upon which he in part relied in executing the subscription contract and the note made at the same time, to the effect that four well-known, well to do, prosperous, and prominent citizens of Yolo county, with whom and whose business success defendant was acquainted, had bought large blocks of stock in said company, when, as a matter of truth, they, with the exception of one, had bought no stock at all therein, and had not at that time agreed to do so, is itself sufficient to vitiate the contract and the note in suit because of the falsity of such representation. Munson v. Fishburn, 190 P. 808, 183 Cal. 206, 213, 214. That case expressly approves the following from Talmadge v. Sanitary Security Co., 52 N. Y. S. 139, 31 App. Div. 498, and which applies with cogent pertinency to the proposition presently in hand:

"The fact that other persons had subscribed to the stock of the defendant in a large amount, especially that the two experts mentioned had thought well enough of the scheme to invest in it, would naturally influence the determination of the plaintiffs in reference to subscribing to the stock. With the exception of men of extremely cool judgment and great confidence in their own judgment, we are all apt to be influenced in our action and conduct by the action and conduct of our fellows. Especially is this the case in speculations. * * * Now, of course, what concerns the purchaser is the value of the property. In itself the price paid by the vendor is not of any moment, but it is of vital importance to the purchaser in forming his judgment as to value. The law recognizes this fact and holds a false statement as to price paid actionable. The principle is equally applicable to representations that other persons have purchased similar property or subscribed for stock on the same terms upon which it is sought to induce any person to become a subscriber."

See, also, Garrett Co. v. Clark, 87 N. Y. S. 580, 42 Misc. Rep. 610; Rose v. Merchants' Trust Co. (Sup. Ct.) 96 N. Y. S. 956; 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 477, note; 20 N. Y. Ann. Cas. 86, notes; 2 Elliott on Contracts, 105.

Our conclusion is that the decision and the judgment following therefrom are impreguably grounded, and the judgment is, accordingly, affirmed.

received nothing of value, and asked for no affirmative relief, defense of fraud held available without exercise of right to rescind.

2. Corporations ⚡80(7)—Representation of corporation, when inducing defendant to purchase stock, that it had definitely decided to locate a packing plant and stockyard at certain point, related to an existing fact, and was material, and, if false, justified rescission of purchase.

Representation of corporation, when inducing defendant to purchase stock, that it had definitely decided to locate packing plant and stockyards at certain points, and that it had financial ability to properly operate it, held to relate to an existing or present fact, and to be material, and to justify rescission of contract, if false.

3. Contracts ⚡94(6)—Promise, made with intention of not performing it, constitutes a fraud, for which a contract may be rescinded (Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4, section 1710, subd. 4).

While a mere promise is not a representation, a promise, made with intention of not performing it, constitutes a fraud for which a contract may be rescinded or avoided, in view of Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4, and section 1710, subd. 4.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by the California Credit & Collection Corporation against J. A. Carpenter. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James R. Cunyningham, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thomas Rutledge, of Colusa, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover on three different promissory notes, executed and delivered by defendant to the Virden Packing Company, a corporation. Each of the notes is dated July 17, 1919, and each is for the sum of $250, with interest after maturity at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. The notes represented the remainder of the total purchase price of ten shares of stock of the Virden Packing Company subscribed for by defendant after the payment thereon by the latter of the sum of $250 in cash, and were made payable, respectively, 4, 8, and 12 months after date. The complaint is in three separate counts, and therein the notes are separately declared upon in the order of the seniority of their maturity. It is alleged that the notes were, prior to the commencement of this action, duly assigned to the plaintiff, and that it "is now the owner and holder thereof."

The answer, admitting the execution and delivery of the notes as alleged in the complaint, charges that they were made and delivered by defendant, and that he was induced to make and deliver them to plaintiff's assignor by and upon certain false and fraudulent representations by the latter. The special defense set up to the different counts of the complaint is, mutatis mutandis, identical, and is as follows: That the consideration for the notes in suit was the purchase price of certain stock of the Virden Packing Company for which defendant subscribed, and which he agreed to purchase; that, at and prior to the time defendant subscribed for said stock and executed said promissory notes, he (defendant) was engaged extensively in the cattle and live stock business in the northern part of California, "and, as an inducement to defendant to subscribe for, and purchase, said stock, and execute said promissory note, said Virden Packing Company represented, promised, and stated that it would establish a union stockyard and a packing plant at or near the city of Sacramento, which would be a great advantage to the defendant in marketing his live stock and live stock products, and thus enable him to save large sums in freight in so marketing his live stock; that at the time said representations were made there was no stockyard or packing plant for such purposes in the state of California north of the city of San Francisco, and the establishment of such a stockyard and packing plant at the city of Sacramento would have been a great advantage to said defendant, and was the sole inducement to him for subscribing for said stock and the execution of said note; that a copy of the letter of said Virden Packing Company making said representations as aforesaid is hereto attached and made a part of this answer; that said Virden Packing Company did not, and never has, established a stockyard or packing plant, or any stockyard or packing plant, or any plant, market, or place, at or near the city of Sacramento, where said defendant could sell or market his cattle, live stock, or live stock products, but established the same at and near the city of San Francisco, where there was already such a stockyard and market and live stock, and the inducement and consideration for the subscribing for said stock and the execution of said note thereby has wholly failed, and the representations and promises on the part of said Virden Packing Company that said stockyard and packing plant would be located at Sacramento were fraudulent, and made without the intention of performing the same, and made for the purpose of inducing the defendant and other persons to subscribe for said stock."

The letter referred to by and expressly made a part of the answer was written upon the letter head stationery of the plaintiff's assignor, and is here given in full:

"Executive Offices—Capital National Bank Building. Virden Packing Company (and Union Stockyards). Chas. E. Virden, President. J. H. Glide, Vice President. F. F. Atkinson, Secretary. C. M. Hartley, Treasurer. Peter B. Newman, Asst. Treasurer. Capital Stock $5,000,000.00.

"Sacramento, Cal., May 3, 1919.

"Mr. G. A. Carpenter, Box 741 Colusa, Cal.—My dear Sir: I would like very much to meet you personally, and tell you what the plans of the Virden Packing Company are, what it hopes to do for the live stock men of the West, and how it came into being; but I find it impossible to talk personally to all the cattle, sheep, and hog men of California, and so must write to you instead.

"After a three years' thorough investigation of the live stock and packing situation in the Western States, I came to the conclusion that the most vital need of California's agricultural industries at the present time is a union stockyards, open to all, and large enough to handle the live stock of California and adjacent states, and packing plants capable of handling the raw products of these states.

"A union stockyards means the establishment of a market for live stock near the point of production; not thousands of miles away. A union stockyards open to all buyers and sellers alike, where lean as well as fat marketable stock may be consigned and find a ready purchaser, where prices will be established, and where the stock man will receive fair prices for his products, the same as prevail in Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, and Portland.

"As it is now, a large percentage of the live stock raised in the Western States is shipped to eastern markets, where higher prices prevail at all times, owing to an open market existing at those points. Thus the live stock men of the West are handicapped by having to ship large quantities of their live stock East in order to obtain satisfactory prices. The freight charge per carload of live stock to Chicago is $285. Then it costs the consumer of packing house products in California $2.50 per 100 pounds to have delivered to him these products made from western live stock.

"Naturally, the first question to arise, when the establishment of the union stockyards and packing house plant was contemplated, was the one of location. My associates and I investigated this question thoroughly, for we realized its vital importance. We found that San Francisco is the financial center of the state, Oakland and Stockton the manufacturing centers, Fresno the center of the raisin industry, and Sacramento the agricultural center. San Francisco and Oakland, largely dependent upon the agricultural district of the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys, are no doubt interested in the growth of these districts.

"Our investigations showed that Sacramento is at the present time the home of the Swanson Packing Company, the Charles F. Silva Company, and many smaller meat concerns, which together with the Virden Packing Company and other packing concerns that will be attracted to Sacramento, creates an immediate demand for a union stockyards at this central point.

"Undisputable facts showed that Sacramento is the natural transportation and packing center of the vast agricultural area. By reason of her trunk lines of railroads, coming direct from the stock producing districts of the Western States, and her deep sea connections by way of the Sacramento river, Sacramento is capable of handling the vast volume of business which will result from making this the live stock center of the West.

"Will you not agree with me that it is time that, not only the live stock grower of the Pacific Coast, but the consumer of packing house products as well, awaken to the necessity of having at home an institution thoroughly prepared to handle the entire output from all over our own territory, instead of paying the heavy freight toll, which has been, and is being, paid to-day?"

"If a union stockyards is not a necessity to the grower of live stock, permit me to ask you why every state in the union, where live stock is raised, has for many years past maintained its central markets or union stockyards?"

"Although the Virden Packing Company and Union Stockyards is an absolutely independent institution, it extends an invitation to all growers of live stock, meat packers, and consumers of the Western States to co-operate with us for the good of all concerned.

"Sacramento is going to have located within its boundaries a well equipped and up to date packing plant and union stockyards. My associates and I ask you for your support and co-operation.

"I thank you for the time consumed in the reading of this letter, setting forth the plans of what I consider the most important California institution, indispensable if the live stock industry of the West is to keep pace with other agricultural developments.

"Yours very truly,

"Chas. E. Virden, President."

[1] An amendment to the answer, filed by leave of the court, alleged that, prior to the commencement of this action, defendant tendered and offered to restore to the packing company all the right, title, and interest to and in the stock agreed to be purchased by him, and for the balance of the purchase price of which he made and delivered the notes in suit. Defendant did not ask for affirmative relief.

The action was tried by the court, sitting without a jury. Findings as to the charge of fraud as set forth in the answer, and that defendant was induced by such fraud or false representations to subscribe for the stock of the packing company, and to execute the notes in suit as alleged in defendant's said pleading, were made by the court. The court also found that the fact of the fraudulent representations by which defendant was induced to subscribe for the stock and execute the notes in suit was known to plaintiff at the time it took over after their maturity the notes declared upon; that defendant, prior to the commencement of this action, in the year 1920, tendered and offered to the packing company said stock, so agreed to be purchased, and all the right, title, and interest therein and right thereto; that defendant, ever since making such tender and offer, has been ready and willing to "surrender up and cancel all his right, title, and interest in and to said stock, and did, with his answer herein," make such tender and offer; that the packing company then and always refused, "and still refuses, to accept return of said stock." In strange contrast to the allegations of the amendment to the answer and the finding that the defendant tendered a return of the stock to the packing company, the court further found "that none of said stock has ever been issued or delivered to the defendant." The evidence shows, however—in fact, it was not disputed at the trial—that the stock was never issued to defendant. But the case here is not, as to either of the parties, strictly one for the rescission of a contract or the notes in issue here. The defendant received nothing of value by reason of the transaction eventuating in the making and delivery of the notes to the packing company, and, as seen, asks for no affirmative relief. He merely sets up a legal excuse from the performance by him of a contract to which, in legal contemplation, he never assented or agreed. In other words, he simply asks for defensive relief, in support of which he has set up fraud, or, in other terms, has set up fraud as a basis of a defense to defeat "an action brought to enforce an apparent obligation or liability." Toby v. Oregon Pac. R. Co., 33 P. 550, 553, 98 Cal. 490, 498. This is one of the three methods for relief or defense afforded defendants in cases of this character (Toby v. Oregon Pac. R. Co., 33 P. 550, 98 Cal. 490, supra; Field v. Austin, 63 P. 692, 131 Cal. 379, 382; J. B. Colt Co. v. J. I. Freitas [Cal. App.] 244 P. 916), and where, as here, such defensive relief is sought, and no affirmative relief is asked, "it is not necessary for" the defendant "to have exercised an existing right to rescind." Simon Newman Co. v. Lassing, 74 P. 761, 141 Cal. 174; 12 Cal. Juris. 786; J. B. Colt Co. v. J. I. Freitas, supra. Our views upon these questions are also fully covered in our opinion in the case of California Credit & Collection Corporation v. Goodin, 246 P. 121, which was filed in this court March 8, 1926. Further consideration herein of the questions is, therefore, not required.

[2] The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and submits to us two propositions upon which he principally relies for a reversal. The first is that the statements or representations, as shown by the answer, the findings, and the evidence, by which the defendant was induced, to subscribe for the stock of the packing company, and to execute and deliver to the latter the notes in suit, amounted to no more than a mere promise or agreement to perform some future act, and, therefore, do not possess those elements of the representations which must be present to destroy the binding force of an obligation induced thereby, or, in other words, cannot be made the basis of an action for fraud. The second is that the defendant failed to show that he suffered any damage by reason of the fraud alleged to be at the bottom of the transaction involving the making of the subscription contract and the execution and delivery of the notes to plaintiff's assignor.

The defendant testified that he was, at the time he subscribed for the stock, and made and delivered the notes in suit, and had been a long time prior thereto, engaged in the business of raising and selling sheep and cattle in Lassen county, in the northern part of the state of California and north of the city of Sacramento; that an agent of the packing company called on him at his place of residence, and orally made substantially the same representations to him as are contained in the letter above reproduced herein with regard to the purpose of the company to establish a packing plant and stockyards in the city of Sacramento; that, in fact, said agent represented to him that the packing company intended to locate its plant and stockyards in Sacramento; that he emphasized the fact, as did the letter referred to, that it would in a financial way prove advantageous and profitable to him (defendant) and other stockraisers in the northern part of the state to establish a packing plant and stockyards at Sacramento; that he, in effect, said to said agent that he realized that, if, as he (the agent) and the letter stated, a packing establishment and stockyards were located at Sacramento, "there would be a special advantage to me from a hauling standpoint and general marketing conditions; the nearer our market would be to our place of produce, the less the shrinkage in getting our stock to market, and better marketing advantages." Defendant testified that, upon the representations by the agent and those contained in the letter above quoted herein, he subscribed for ten shares of the stock of the packing company at the rate of $100 per share; that he paid $250 cash down, and for the balance, or as evidence of the balance he owed on the purchase price, he gave to the packing company the promissory notes described in the complaint. Defendant further testified that, some time after the above negotiations and transaction took place, he made a visit to Sacramento, and thereupon discovered that no steps whatever had been taken by the company or any other person to establish a packing plant and stockyards or either at said place; that thereafter he learned, and found it to be the fact, that the packing company had taken over the Moran Packing Plant in San Francisco; that a packing plant and stockyards or either had never been established at or within the limits of the city of Sacramento by plaintiff's assignor, but that said company had definitely and permanently located its plant, etc., at San Francisco. He testified that, in subscribing for the stock, and making and giving to the packing company the promissory notes which constitute the foundation of this action, he relied upon the representations made to him by the packing company's agent, and those contained in the letter addressed to him by the packing company, and above incorporated into this opinion, to the effect that said company would establish its plant and stockyards at Sacramento, where, for the reasons given by him and above set forth, such an establishment would be of peculiar advantage and benefit to him and other stockraisers in the northern sections of California, in that they would, by reason of the nearness in proximity of such a plant and stockyards to his and their stock-producing farms, realize increased profits on their products, and that, but for the representations and assurances so made, he would not have subscribed for the stock or given the notes in question. He further testified that, after learning that the packing company had located its plant at San Francisco, as above indicated, and further learned that it did not intend to locate a plant and stockyards in Sacramento, he called at the office of the company in San Francisco, and demanded a rescission of his contract to buy the stock and the cancellation of the notes sued on, and at the same time offered to return, and tendered, to the company any right, title, or interest in and to any stock of the company which he might have acquired therein by reason of said subscription contract, but that the packing company refused to comply with said demand.

The testimony of defendant, of which the foregoing statement embraces a fair résumé, was not disputed by plaintiff, nor was there any attempt to contradict it. The letter from the Virden Packing Company to defendant, above presented herein, was introduced in evidence, and its authenticity was not questioned, nor its contents contradicted or disputed. We think the representations which the evidence shows were made by plaintiff's assignor to defendant and by which the latter was induced to subscribe for the stock and give the packing company the notes in suit were as to an existing or present fact and material.

In Russ L. & M. Co. v. Muscupiabe L. & W. Co., 52 P. 995, 120 Cal. 521, 65 Am. St. Rep. 186, it appears that the defendant, an irrigation company, represented to plaintiff that it had the ability to furnish the plaintiff with sufficient water to satisfy its needs for the purposes of irrigation, and that upon such representations the defendant obtained certain promissory notes from plaintiff as evidence of the latter's agreement to pay the amounts represented by the notes for the water so to be furnished; that said defendant was later shown to be wholly unable to furnish the quantity of water which it had represented to plaintiff that it was able to furnish; and that the representation was false and so known to be by defendant when made. It was there contended that "the representations were respecting future acts only," and that such representations "do not, in contemplation of law, amount to a fraud," and could be neither false nor true when made. To which proposition the Supreme Court replied:

"But counsel in this contention confuse and fail to distinguish between 'promises' and 'representations.' A mere promise to perform an act in the future is not, in a legal sense, a representation, nor does a failure to perform such promise convert it into a false representation; but if the promise is accompanied with statements of existing facts which show the ability of the promisor to perform his promise, and without which the promise would not be accepted or acted upon, such statements are denominated representations, and if falsely made are grounds of avoiding the contract, though the thing promised to be done lies wholly in the future."

See, also, California Credit & Collection Corporation v. Goodin, supra.

[3] In this case the plaintiff's assignor not only pointed out to the defendant what would obviously be true, to wit, the beneficial result to him as a raiser of live stock for the market of the establishment of a packing plant and stockyards in closer proximity to his cattle and sheep-raising farm than was any such enterprise then existing in California, but also represented to him, in clear, unqualified language, that "Sacramento was going to have located within its boundaries a well-equipped and up to date packing plant and union stockyards"; thus assuring defendant that the company had a settled and a fixed purpose and the financial ability, at the time such representations were made, to install, establish, and equip a packing plant and stockyards within the limits of the city of Sacramento. These and the other representations, both oral and written, made by the packing company to defendant, that such an establishment would be located at the place just named involved, as we have before declared, the representation of a material existing fact—the fact that the determination had then been fixed upon by the packing company to establish a packing house and stockyards at Sacramento. But the court found that the Virden Packing Company never at any time had any intention of locating a packing plant and stockyards within the limits of the city of Sacramento. All the circumstances, as disclosed by the evidence, indicated that that finding stated the truth, and, indeed, sufficiently support said finding. While, as stated:

"A mere promise is not a 'representation,' a promise made with the intention of not performing it constitutes a fraud for which a contract may be rescinded or avoided." Russ, etc., Co. v. Muscupiabe, etc., Co., supra; Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4, and section 1710, subd. 4.

The second proposition urged by plaintiff for a reversal, as indicated above, is that, in order to prevail in this action, it was essential that defendant should plead and prove that he suffered substantial or some actual damage from the fraudulent representation whereby, it is alleged, plaintiff's assignor induced defendant to execute and deliver to it (the packing company) the notes in suit. The precise question thus submitted here is considered and determined against the position of plaintiff here in the opinion of this court in California Credit & Collection Corporation v. Goodin, supra, and the cases therein cited. Nothing further of special force can here be added to what is said in the opinion in that case upon the proposition.

We have been shown no just reason for disturbing the result arrived at below, and the judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

In action on promissory note given to partner on his withdrawal from partnership, testimony by son of one of remaining partners as to when he finally determined whether there was loss or profit held properly excluded as immaterial, and as conclusion of witness.

2. Bills and notes ⇨501—Testimony by former partner suing on note given on his withdrawal from partnership as to preparation of bond for employee held properly excluded as immaterial.

In action on promissory note given to partner on his withdrawal from partnership, testimony by plaintiff as to preparation of bond of employee held properly excluded as immaterial.

3. Trial ⇨49.

Where no question is propounded to a witness, there is nothing for court to rule on.

4. Appeal and error ⇨201(2)—Comment of court that loss in business was not within knowledge of parties held not reversible error in suit on note given plaintiff on withdrawal from partnership, in absence of objection or exception.

In action on note given to partner on his withdrawal from partnership, statement by court that loss in business, if any, was not within knowledge of parties, but merely anticipated, held not reversible error, where no objection or exception was made thereto.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1).

Finding on issue fully presented on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Caba-niss, Judge.

Action by E. Franceschi against P. Nardi and another, individually and as copartners doing business under the firm name of Nardi Bros. & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. Klein and Arthur H. Darendt, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

O'Gara & De Martini, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover the amount due on two promissory notes. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed.

For several months prior to the 1st day of July, 1920, P. Nardi, his son-in-law, E. Franceschi, and F. Baccelli had been partners conducting a wholesale grocery business in San Francisco. On that date they agreed that the plaintiff might withdraw from the firm. Later, on the 24th day of July, 1920, he did withdraw. Following his withdrawal the two notes were given; one on September 27th and one on September 30, 1920. It was the contention of the plaintiff that the amounts represented by the notes were to be ascertained, and in fact were ascertained, by an accounting had and completed by Burt & Co., a firm of public accountants. The Burt accounting was completed on July 23, 1920. On the other hand, it was the contention of the defendants that the notes were accommodation notes, and that the settlement between the plaintiff and the defendants was to be based on an accounting to be had after the 24th day of July, 1920, and that by the agreement of the parties the dissolution would not be completed until such accounting was had, and that the plaintiff would be liable for his share of the losses that might have been incurred between the date of his retirement and the completion of such subsequent accounting. No question is presented to the effect that the theory of each party was not sufficiently set forth in the pleadings. Among other things, the trial court found that an accounting was had and a report thereof made to the plaintiff and defendants on the 23d day of July, 1920, and prior to the plaintiff's retirement; that that was the only accounting had between the partners; that plaintiff never consented to the taking of any other accounting; and that the plaintiff never promised or agreed to pay any losses which should be incurred in the said business after the date of his retirement.

As we understand the appellants, they claim that the trial court committed error by sustaining objections to the introduction of evidence to the effect that, after the plaintiff retired from the firm, it transpired that the firm had suffered heavy losses on certain un-completed business ventures which were pending on the date that the plaintiff withdrew. Before proceeding, it should be stated that there was not a particle of evidence in the record to the effect that any one of the contracting parties knew of any alleged loss at or prior to the dates on which the notes were executed. There was some evidence to the effect that at that time certain losses were anticipated.

[1] When Mr. Julius Nardi, a son of Mr. P. Nardi, was on the stand, the attorney for the appellants asked him:

"Q. When did you finally determine whether there was any loss or profit upon the business in which he was interested, from the time he entered this business until the time he left—in other words, his copartnership business?"

"Mr. O'Gara: Now, if your honor please, we object to that on the ground it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. It involves a conclusion of the witness; the determination of loss or profit. * * *

"The Court: The only way that can be determined is by a reference."

Assuming that the remark made by the trial court was a ruling, such ruling was not erroneous. The question did call for the conclusion of the witness; furthermore, it was immaterial. The plaintiff was claiming that he sold out on the basis of the Burt accounting. The question propounded was clearly not germane to that subject. The appellants were claiming that the rights of the parties were to be ascertained by an accounting to be had subsequent to the 24th day of July, 1920. If such an accounting was had, then the question should have been addressed to that fact, and not to secondary and tertiary facts connected therewith.

[2] While the plaintiff was a member of the firm a Mr. Torazani was employed. When the plaintiff was on the stand as a witness, he was asked the question:

"A bond was prepared to be executed so as to protect you against him, was it not?"

"The Court (interrupting): I am inclined to think, although there has been no objection, that these matters concerning which you are interrogating the witness, are not germane to the issues."

The ruling was clearly correct.

[3] The question and ruling just disposed of brought forth a somewhat extended colloquy between the court and the respective attorneys. No question was propounded to a witness, and consequently there was nothing to rule on. The court made some statements of fact, but no exception was taken to any one of the statements. Indeed, the remarks of the court were very conservative, and seem to have been addressed toward the assistance of counsel.

[4] When Mr. Henry Nardi was being examined as a witness at one time, the trial court remarked:

"I think, assuming that there was a loss, it was not within the knowledge of the parties but more or less anticipated."

That remark did not rule any objection; again no objection or exception was made to the remark; furthermore, the remark was altogether proper, and within the facts as contained in the record.

[5] Asserting at all times that the notes were accommodation notes, the appellants contend they were without consideration. Asserting that an accounting had not been had and no settlement had been had, they claim the respondent was liable for losses on business on hand. Those issues were fully presented, and the evidence was conflicting. The trial court made findings against the appellants. We may not disturb those findings.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

Evidence, in prosecution for arson, held sufficient to produce a conviction in an unprejudiced mind that fire was of incendiary origin and to establish corpus delicti.

4. Criminal law ☞517(4)—Where there has been received substantial evidence tending to prove corpus delicti, defendant's confession may be admitted as cumulative evidence to prove corpus delicti and to prove that defendant committed crime.

Where there has been received evidence of a substantial weight tending to prove corpus delicti, defendant's confession may be admitted as cumulative evidence to prove corpus delicti and to prove that defendant committed crime.

5. Criminal law ☞781(4)—Requested instruction that defendants' statements could not be used to establish any necessary element of commission of crime with which they were charged held properly refused, in view of other substantial evidence tending to prove corpus delicti.

In a prosecution for arson, where there was substantial evidence tending to prove corpus delicti, court properly refused an instruction that, in order to prove corpus delicti, all elements of crime must be made to appear before defendants' statements were admissible for any purpose, and that they could not be used to establish any element of the commission of the crime for which defendants were charged.

6. Criminal law ☞829(18)—Refusal to give requested instructions on weight of circumstantial evidence held not error, where court fully instructed on doctrine of reasonable doubt, and that it was duty of jury to acquit if two opposing conclusions could be, with equal propriety, drawn from evidence.

In prosecution for arson, refusal to give defendant's requested instructions on weight of circumstantial evidence held not error, where court gave jury full and correct instructions on the law of reasonable doubt and instructed an acquittal if two opposing conclusions could, with equal propriety, be drawn from the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; L. D. Jennings, Judge.

John Roganovich and Nick Duzich were convicted of first degree arson, and they appeal. Affirmed.

R. A. McKay and A. A. Howell, of San Diego, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

YORK, J. Defendants were charged with the crime of first degree arson and were convicted as charged. They moved the court for an arrest of judgment, and moved for a new trial, which motions were by the trial court denied and judgment was thereupon entered. They appeal to this court from the order of the trial court denying their motion for a new trial, and from the judgment of the court entered on the verdict of the jury.

[1, 2] The first objection urged by defendants is the denial of their motions for a directed verdict, but they make only general reference to the transcript for a statement of what the evidence was without making any precise statement of what they claim the facts to be. A review of the reporter's transcript shows evidence that the defendants purchased the business, stock, and equipment of a restaurant, where the fire was alleged to have occurred, for $200. They were renting a portion of the building of one Max Stiller, who testified that about midnight on May 3d, or 15 days before the fire, he was awakened by the defendant Roganovich, who stated that the telephone pole near the building was on fire. Before he could proceed to the building, said defendant "came running back, and said the fire was all out." Later, after the fire in the building, he examined the telephone poles near the building and could not find any sign of any fire. The fire broke out in the restaurant; fires were burning through the floor and an odor of gas was noticed by firemen extinguishing the fire. Shortly before the fire defendants were seen in and near the building. It was unusual for them to be in the building at such an early hour of the morning. A sack, which had coal oil on it, and which was partly burned, was found in the restaurant after the fire. There is direct evidence that no coal oil was in the restaurant before the night of the fire, and the evidence strongly tended to show that the fire was purposely set. The evidence showed, although the defendants had purchased the restaurant for $200, they had their bill of sale recite a much larger sum, and reported that they had paid $750 for this stock and equipment, and attempted to obtain insurance at a $2,000 valuation, and actually did obtain insurance for $1,000 on the equipment and $500 on the stock prior to the fire. These facts, none of which was disputed, were of themselves sufficient to justify the verdict of the jury. It is not for this court to substitute its opinion of the facts for that of the jury and the trial judge. We are limited to passing upon the question as to whether the circumstances justify the judge in denying the motion of the defendants for an instructed verdict. A careful examination of the transcript herein convinces us that the evidence adduced in this case was sufficient to produce a conviction in an unprejudiced mind that the fire in question was incendiary and not of accidental origin. There was no explanation as to why the defendants were in the restaurant at an unusual hour in the morning just before the fire broke out. Besides, their conduct at that time, taken in connection with the fire that followed, was unusual and of such a nature as to excite suspicion and tend to produce a conviction of the defendants' guilt. People v. Lang, 76 P. 232, 142 Cal. 488. This disposes of the contention that the corpus delicti was not established. In People v. Vertrees, 146 P. 890, 169 Cal. 404, cited by appellants, the court was considering an extrajudicial confession of defendant, admitted without other evidence establishing the corpus delicti. Held, that defendant's confession cannot be used to prove a necessary element of the crime that would be wholly lacking without such confession.

In the brief for appellants, it is claimed that the court erred in failing to give certain instructions requested by defendants. Of these the most important, apparently, were (a) upon the question of corpus delicti; (b) an instruction requested by them to the effect that there was no evidence to go to the jury warranting them to convict the defendants under the testimony in the case and the information filed therein; (c) defendants' requested instructions upon the weight of circumstantial evidence. It is further charged "that the court erred in refusing all of defendants' requested instructions." None of these proposed instructions is set forth in the brief. However, we have examined them in the clerk's transcript, and have examined the instructions given by the court to the jury.

"The corpus delicti involves the elements of crime, and, in order to prove it, all the elements of the crime must be made to appear before the defendants' statements (if any) are admissible for any purpose; and they cannot be used to establish any necessary element of the commission of the crime for which they have been charged under the information filed in this case."

The instructions given by the court relating to the matter of proof of the corpus delicti consist of a definition of the phrase "corpus delicti," together with the instruction that "the burden of proof is upon the prosecution to prove the corpus delicti in this case"; that mere proof of the burning of a building alone does not establish the corpus delicti of the crime of arson; that, where the evidence fails to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the building was criminally burned, there can be no conviction of arson; and that no conviction can be had without satisfactory proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the building described in the information was feloniously, willfully, and maliciously burned "by the defendants, or either of them, and was not accidentally burned." The jury was not instructed upon the proposition contained in the proposed instruction, to the effect that the defendants' statements, if any, "cannot be used to establish any necessary element of the commission of the crime for which they have been charged under the information filed in this case." In People v. Jenkins, 228 P. 405, 67 Cal. App. 631, it was decided by this court, pursuant to authorities there cited, that evidence of a confession of the defendant should have been excluded, for the reason that there was no separate and independent evidence tending to establish the corpus delicti. But it does not follow that, where there has been received evidence of substantial weight tending to prove the corpus delicti, a confession made by the defendant may not be used by the jury as cumulative evidence further tending to establish the fact of the corpus delicti, as well as to prove the fact that the defendant committed the crime. In People v. Jenkins, supra, and in the decisions there cited, the courts have gone no further than to hold in effect that proof of the corpus delicti may not rest solely upon the confession of the defendant. We therefore are of the opinion that the court did not err in refusing the instruction as offered by the defendants.

Enough has been said herein to show that the court did not err in refusing the instruction (b) above mentioned. The proposed instructions referred to under point (c), supra, relate to circumstantial evidence. It should be noted here that the so-called "confessions," assumed to have been made by the defendants, do not appear to have been actual confessions of guilt, but were limited to admissions of certain facts tending to support the theory of their guilt.

[5] The argument of appellants in support of their contention that the court erred in refusing to give their requested instructions "upon the weight of circumstantial evidence" is limited to a quotation from an Indiana decision, together with the citation of decisions from other states, declaring the rule that, where the state relies upon circumstantial evidence for a conviction, every circumstance necessary to constitute the chain relied upon must be established beyond a reasonable doubt. Very probably many decisions to like effect could have been cited from the reports of our own state. Without searching through the rejected instructions to find other grounds of criticism than those proposed by appellants, we think it sufficient to say that as to the suggested objections they are met by the fact that the same proposition in other terms was contained in instructions which were given by the court. For the court in this case did instruct the jury fully upon the doctrine of reasonable doubt, and also in relation to circumstantial evidence, including therein an instruction that, "if one set or chain of circumstances leads to two opposing conclusions, one or the other of such conclusions must be wrong, and therefore, if you have any reasonable doubt as to which of said conclusions the chain of circumstances points to, a reasonable doubt would be thereby created, and you should give the defendants the benefits of the doubt and acquit them"; also that, "until every material allegation and every ingredient of the crime has been proved to the entire satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt," it was the duty of the jury to acquit the defendants; and the further statement that, "if two opposing conclusions could with equal propriety be drawn from the evidence, that conclusion which favors innocence should be adopted, and the one which points to the guilt of the accused should only be adopted when convincing beyond a reasonable doubt."

Judgment affirmed; order denying motion for new trial affirmed.

HAURET v. PEDELABORDE. (Civ. 3080.)

1. Partnership ¶5.

Agreement to divide profits and losses is imported by every partnership agreement, independently of any stipulation.

2. Joint adventures ¶4(1).

Parties engaged in what in law is joint enterprise are entitled to accounting in equity on termination thereof.

3. Joint adventures ¶4(1).

Where contract is silent as to joint adventurers' duties and obligations, law implies right to equal division of profits.

4. Appeal and error ¶516.

Minute orders are not part of judgment roll, under Code Civ. Proc. § 670, and cannot be considered, though set forth and certified as correct.

5. Appeal and error ¶519.

Stipulations ordinarily constitute no part of judgment roll, under Code Civ. Proc. § 670.

6. Partnership ¶328(3)—Court's finding in suit for accounting that receipts exceeded expenditures and liabilities by stated amount held not supported by evidence and stipulations, where figures stipulated as correct and others set forth in brief did not appear in clerk's minutes or reporter's transcript.

Court's finding, in action for partnership accounting, that receipts exceeded expenditures and liabilities during certain period by stated amount, held not supported by evidence and stipulations, where figures stipulated as correct were not set forth in clerk's minutes or reporter's transcript, and latter did not contain figures set forth in briefs nor any testimony showing what conclusions should be drawn therefrom.

7. Partnership ¶344—Finding that allegation in complaint that defendant collected large sum of money and refused to account therefor to plaintiff was true held not to warrant judgment against defendant for definite sum, finding that he collected and had possession of, or had converted, definite sum, to which plaintiff was entitled, being necessary.

Finding that allegation of complaint in action for accounting, that defendant collected large sum of money and refused to account therefor to plaintiff was true held not to warrant judgment against defendant for definite sum, finding that he collected and had possession of, or had converted to his own use and withheld from plaintiff, definite sum of money to which plaintiff was entitled being necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by Henri Hauret against Vincent Pedelaborde. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Edward Schary, of Fresno, for appellant.
Harris & Hayhurst and R. C. Gibson, all of Fresno, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action for an accounting. Plaintiff had judgment against the defendant for $300. Defendant appeals.

On or about the 7th day of February, 1921, pursuant to an agreement relative to the purchase and sale of an interest in a certain laundry business conducted in the city of Fresno, county of Fresno, state of California, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff an instrument in writing, of which the following is a true copy:

"February 7, 1921.

"Received of Henry Hauret the sum of four hundred (\$400.00) dollars on account of the sum of twelve hundred (\$1,200.00) dollars, which said latter sum is the full purchase price of an undivided one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) interest in and to that certain business known as the "Parisian Laundry" in the city of Fresno, county of Fresno, state of California, together with a one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) interest in and to all the property, leasehold interest, and good will of said business; the balance of eight hundred (\$800.00) dollars payable on or before September 1, 1921.

"It is understood and agreed by the parties hereto that the said Henry Hauret may, at his option, withdraw from the purchase of the business and property aforesaid, and that if in the event he so desires to withdraw therefrom, the above said four hundred ($400.00) dollars will be returned to him without any deduction.

"Upon the payment of the aforesaid eight hundred (\$800.00) dollars, the undersigned will deliver to the said Henry Hauret a bill of sale to the one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) interest as aforesaid.

"V. Pedelaborde."

[1-3] At the time of the execution and delivery of said writing the plaintiff paid to the defendant the sum of $400 mentioned therein. Immediately after the execution and delivery of said writing and the payment by the plaintiff to the defendant of said sum of $400, the plaintiff and the defendant began and continued, until on or about the 1st day of May, 1921, to conduct the laundry business mentioned in said writing. The court found that the plaintiff and defendant conducted said business during said period of time as partners. The writing referred to is silent as to any division of profits, or as to the manner in which the business should be conducted, nor has our attention been called to any testimony showing any specific agreement as to the division of profits and losses. The testimony does show that the plaintiff and defendant at the expiration of every week during the period of time when the plaintiff and defendant were engaged in the conduct of said laundry business, that the cash receipts, after deducting the expenses of the enterprise, were equally divided between the plaintiff and the defendant. The absence of anything in the writing on this subject is wholly immaterial. As said in 20 Cal. Jur. p. 692, § 11, "An agreement to divide profits and losses is imported by every agreement of partnership, independently of any stipulation in this respect by the parties to the relationship," and as said in Duryea v. Burt, 28 Cal. 569, quoting from the opinion on page 577, "it is not necessary that there should be an express stipulation between the partners to share the profits and losses, as that is an incident to the prosecution of their joint business." Irrespective of whether the plaintiff and defendant were or were not partners, as that term is applied to relationships expressly created and stipulated to be such, the plaintiff and the defendant were engaged in a joint enterprise or undertaking, and therefore entitled to an accounting in the event of a termination of such enterprise. That an accounting may be had of the relationship which, in law, constitutes a joint enterprise in equity has been expressly decided by this court. Peardon v. White, 224 P. 263, 65 Cal. App. 463, and cases there cited. Where parties have entered into a joint enterprise and the contract is silent as to their respective duties and obligations, it has been held that the law implies that the parties are entitled to an equal division of profits. El Paso Ice Co. v. Consumers' Ice Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 141 S. W. 551. Other cases might be cited supporting what has just been said, but we think the foregoing sufficient.

The court did not err in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to an accounting, as that would necessarily follow from the relationship constituting the partnership or a joint enterprise. Upon the termination of the business relation between the plaintiff and the defendant on the 1st day of May, 1921, the defendant returned to the plaintiff the $400 mentioned in the writing hereinbefore set forth, and the controversy now relates only to a settlement of accounts appearing on the books kept of the business conducted by the plaintiff and defendant during the continuance of their business relations.

[4, 5] The main reason urged by appellant for reversal herein is that the record contains no testimony supporting finding No. 12, which finding is as follows:

"The court further finds from the evidence and the stipulation made in open court by the attorneys representing the respective parties, that the receipts from February 1st to May 1st, during the year 1921, exceeded all expenditures and liabilities incurred during said period, by the sum of six hundred dollars and eighty-five cents ($600.85)."

There is nothing in the reporter's notes, certified by the judge of the trial court to be correct, showing what the stipulations referred to in the finding may have been, or that there were, in fact, any such stipulations. It is true that in the clerk's transcript, included with the papers constituting the judgment roll, as provided by section 670, Code of Civil Procedure, there appears the following copy of the clerk's minutes:

"The above-entitled cause came on this day for further hearing, Rue Gibson appearing as counsel for the plaintiff, and Edward Schary appearing as counsel for the defendant. Henri Hauret is recalled and testifies for the plaintiff, and it is adjudged that a partnership existed between the parties, and, by stipulation of counsel, it is agreed that the figures given the court as taken from the books are correct, and that the court may render judgment without an accounting. It is ordered that judgment be, and it is hereby entered herein in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $300.42, each party to pay his own costs."

This copy has since been certified by the clerk of the trial court of Fresno county as being a true and correct copy of the original minute order entered in said cause. Minute orders, however, do not constitute any part of the judgment roll, and cannot be considered even though set forth and certified as being correct. In deciding this question, the Supreme Court in Knowles v. Baldwin, 57 P. 988, 125 Cal. 224, used the following language:

"We cannot notice the entries in the transcript purporting to be minute orders. They are inserted after the certificate of the clerk to the judgment roll and are not certified as being a part of it, and if so certified they would not be a part of it."

That minute orders are not any part of the judgment roll is also held in Harper v. Minor, 27 Cal. 107; Von Schmidt v. Widber, 34 P. 109, 99 Cal. 511, 515. This court, in Brown v. Canty, 159 P. 1056, 31 Cal. App. 183, ruled as follows upon this question:

"The statute does not make these minute orders part of the judgment roll. * * * They are, therefore, improperly in the record—there being no bill of exceptions—and we cannot notice the points attempted to be made in regard to them."

See, also, Bossen v. Bean, 216 P. 404, 62 Cal. App. 293.

[6] Likewise stipulations ordinarily constitute no part of the judgment roll. Spreckels v. Ord, 13 P. 158, 72 Cal. 86; 2 Cal. Jur. 519, § 258. Even if the minutes of the court could be resorted to in this case, they are so indefinite and uncertain as to the stipulations of counsel in relation to the figures given to the court that no inferences can be drawn therefrom to support the challenged finding. What the figures were does not appear. They are not set forth in the clerk's minutes, nor do they appear in the reporter's transcript of the testimony. It is true that counsel for the respective parties have set forth in their briefs certain figures and argued that certain conclusions should be drawn therefrom. We have no means of ascertaining the correctness of the figures, whether they were introduced in evidence or which conclusion is correct. The figures nowhere appear in the transcript as having been introduced in evidence, nor is there any testimony in the transcript to show what conclusions should be drawn therefrom. It may be here stated that the findings do not show the receipts of the partnership, nor do they show the expenditures and liabilities of the partnership.

[7] There is a conclusion to the effect that the receipts from February 1 to May 1 exceeded all expenditures and liabilities in the sum of $600.85. As the cause must be reversed and sent back for want of testimony to support the finding referred to, we also call attention to the fact that the findings do not show that the defendant has collected and has possession of the sum of money referred to in the finding. There is an allegation in the complaint that the defendant has collected a large sum of money and refused to account therefor to the plaintiff, and that such allegation is true, but that is not a finding as to the amount of money which the defendant has collected and has in his possession to which the plaintiff is entitled. It must be found that the defendant has collected and has in his possession a definite sum of money to which the plaintiff is entitled, or has converted to his own use and withheld from the defendant a definite sum to which the plaintiff is entitled, before judgment can be entered in favor of the plaintiff against defendant for such definite sum of money. Being controlled by the decisions to which we have referred and section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it becomes necessary on account of the reasons herein stated to reverse the judgment of the trial court, and it is so ordered.

FRANK MELINE CO. v. KLEINBERGER.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 19, 1926.)

1. Brokers $\Leftrightarrow$ 49(1)—Broker has earned commission on producing ready, able, and willing purchaser on satisfactory terms, and obtained binding and valid contract for sale, or when he has brought seller and buyer together, enabling entry into contract, or produced purchaser who verbally accepts seller's terms and offers to enter binding contract.

Broker has earned commission when, within life of contract, he has produced person ready, able, and willing to purchase property on terms satisfactory to seller, and obtained valid contract for sale, or when he has brought seller and buyer together, and enabled them to enter contract, or has produced purchaser who has verbally accepted seller's terms, and offered to enter binding written contract.

2. Brokers ⇐52.

To entitle broker to commission, intending purchaser must enter binding contract, or offer to do so to vendor, and not merely to broker.

3. Brokers ⇐52—Intending purchaser's instruction to broker to buy property, if he considered it good, and broker's intention to buy, is not production of purchaser who has accepted seller's terms, entitling broker to commission.

Intending purchaser's instruction to broker to buy property for him, providing broker considered it good buy, and broker's intention to close deal and pay deposit, is not sufficient production of purchaser, who has verbally accepted seller's terms, and offered to enter binding contract, entitling broker to commission, offer being made merely to broker, and not to vendor.

4. Brokers ⇐8(3).

Evidence held to show that exclusive listing contract for 30 days and thereafter until notice of termination, to which was added extension until certain date, expired on last day of extension.

5. Brokers ⇐60—Broker is entitled to commission under exclusive listing contract when seller accepts purchaser, regardless of whether written contract is executed or sale consummated as required by statute of frauds to effect valid transfer of realty. (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1971, 1973.)

Broker is entitled to commission under exclusive listing contract involving payment of compensation for services in connection with sale, when seller accepts agent's purchaser, regardless of whether written contract of sale is actually entered into, or whether sale is consummated, as required by statute of frauds (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1971 and 1973) to effect valid transfer by realty.

6. Brokers ⇐88(1)—Nonsuit improper where evidence made prima facie showing that property was sold by another prior to explanation of plaintiff's exclusive listing contract.

In action for broker's commission under exclusive listing contract, evidence held to make prima facie showing that property was sold by another before expiration of plaintiff's contract, and, therefore, nonsuit was improper.

7. Trial ⇐139(1).

Motion for nonsuit should be denied if there is any substantial evidence which, with aid of legitimate inferences favorable to plaintiff, tends to establish averments of complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by the Frank Meline Company against Mrs. L. Kleinberger to recover real estate commissions. From a judgment of dismissal, entered after nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Ward Chapman and L. M. Chapman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Milton K. Young, Lyndol L. Young, William K. Young, Forrest F. Murray, and Young & Young, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of dismissal entered after a nonsuit had been granted, in an action brought to recover real estate commissions.

The material provisions of the contract out of which the controversy grew are as follows:

"Los Angeles, California, Feb. 24, 1922.

"I hereby appoint Frank Meline Company sole agent for the exclusive sale of the here(i)n described property, upon the terms stated; and in case the said property is sold by me or any agent, or any agent of said company sends or introduces to me a customer who buys it, I agree to pay said company five (5) per cent. of such a price as I may accept. In consideration of Frank Meline Company using their efforts to sell said property, this agency shall extend for a period of 30 days from date hereof and until such further time as I shall notify said Frank Meline Company in writing of the termination of this agency." * * *

"[Signed] Mrs. L. Kleinberger."

Later a supplementary clause was added, reading:

"We hereby extend the exclusive sale until April 5, 1922 (Inc.). Mrs. Kleinberger."

The sale price was fixed at $45,000, one-half of which was to be a cash payment, but the terms for the payment of the balance were not specified.

Appellant's cause of action as set forth in the complaint was based upon the theory that within the period of the exclusive agency respondent sold the property through another agent, and that, therefore, under the terms of the contract, appellant was entitled to a commission on that sale. The complaint alleges in this regard that—

"Up until the 5th day of April, 1922, plaintiff was diligently engaged in the effort to sell the property, and did have responsible prospective buyers negotiating for the purchase of the same when the defendant herself made a sale of said property through an agent, by name James J. Donahue, for a price plaintiff * * * alleges to be $55,000, and defendant thereupon attempted to repudiate said agency contract, and claimed that the same had terminated."

Defendant, answering, denied any attempted repudiation of the contract, alleged that the same expired on April 5, 1922, and that on the day following, April 6, 1922, the property was sold, together with certain furniture, through the said Donahue, as agent, for the sum of $55,000. At the trial, as here, the parties presented the additional issue of whether or not within the life of the agency appellant performed the contract by procuring a purchaser who was ready, able and willing to buy the property on respondent's terms.

The substance of the evidence offered in support of appellant's case was that, after obtaining the agency contract, appellant advertised the property for sale, and endeavored to interest several buyers. When the 30-day period mentioned in the contract was about to expire, appellant sought a 20-day extension, which respondent refused to give, but consented to an extension to and including April 5, 1922. Prior to that date appellant had procured a prospective buyer named Oesterreich, with whom Frank Meline, the principal owner of the appellant corporation, had been associated in other business transactions. On the afternoon of April 5th one of appellant's salesmen drove Oesterreich and his wife to the premises to be sold, where they met and talked with respondent. Oesterreich offered respondent $43,000 for the property, which offer respondent refused to accept. Thereupon Oesterreich, his wife, and the salesman retired to their automobile, which was standing at the rear of the premises, and, after discussing the matter between themselves, the salesman, acting under instructions from Oesterreich, re-entered the house, and on behalf of Oesterreich, but out of his presence, offered respondent $45,000 for the property, $25,000 thereof to be paid in cash, and the balance to be secured by a mortgage bearing interest at 6½ per cent. per annum. Respondent declined the offer, demanding 7 per cent. interest. The Oesterreich party then left, saying they would notify respondent by 6 o'clock that evening whether or not they would meet respondent's terms. They drove to appellant's office, where Oesterreich discussed the matter at some length with Frank Meline. Finally Oesterreich told Meline that, if Meline believed the purchase would be an advantageous one, out of which he, Oesterreich, would be able to make money, to close the sale on the best terms obtainable. Oesterreich thereupon departed, taking with him a check for $2,000, which he had previously deposited with Meline for the purpose of making a deposit on the prospective purchase. Meline, accompanied by two salesmen, then proceeded to respondent's premises for the purpose, as Meline claims, of closing the sale. As they entered respondent's house they were met by respondent, who informed them that they were too late; that she had waited for an answer from them until 6 o'clock, and, having received none, sold the property, including the furniture, through an agent named Donahue to a Mr. Hart, and had accepted Hart's check. One of the salesmen asked respondent if she had not been a "little hasty," stating that the exclusive contract held by his company did not expire until midnight of that night, to which respondent replied that it was useless to discuss the matter further, because the property had been sold. Respondent then asked Meline if he desired to inspect the property, to which the latter replied that, since the property had been sold, an inspection would avail nothing, and he departed. Meline testified that his object in going there that night was to verify his belief that the prospective purchase was a good one, whereupon he intended to pay a deposit. After respondent refused to continue the negotiations with him, however, no tender of deposit was made. The trial court held that appellant failed to establish a prima facie case either upon the theory that appellant had procured a purchaser within the life of the agency or that the property had been sold within that time by any other agent.

[1, 2] In regard to the first proposition, it seems to be well settled that, in the absence of any specific agreement to the contrary, a broker employed to sell real estate has earned his commission when, within the life of his contract or any extension thereof, he has produced a person who is ready, able, and willing to purchase the property on terms satisfactory to the seller, and has obtained a binding and valid contract for a sale on terms proposed by the seller, or has brought the seller and buyer together, and thus enabled them to enter into a contract of sale, or has produced such a purchaser who has verbally accepted the seller's terms and offered to enter into a written contract embodying the said terms and binding upon both parties (Twogood v. Monnette, 215 P. 542, 191 Cal. 103); but, unless the intending purchaser has entered into such binding contract, or has offered to the vendor, and not merely to the broker, to make such an agreement, the broker has not earned his commissions (Hicks v. Christeson, 164 P. 395, 174 Cal. 712).

[3] Appellant concedes that no written agreement was ever entered into by Oesterreich for the purchase of the property, and it was neither alleged in the complaint nor proved at the trial that he was a ready and willing purchaser within the meaning of the rule just stated, the evidence in this respect showing without conflict that on the afternoon of April 5th, the only occasion on which the parties were brought together, Oesterreich declined to buy the property on respondent's terms. The fact that later Oesterreich instructed Meline to buy the property, providing the latter considered it a good buy, and that accordingly Meline went to respondent's house intending to "close the deal" and to pay a deposit—which was not authorized by the agency contract—was not sufficient to meet the requirements of the law; the final offer of Oesterreich, if it may be called such, being made merely to the broker and not to the vendor. Hicks v. Christeson, supra. We conclude, therefore, that as to the first point mentioned the ruling of the trial court must be sustained.

[4] In reference to the other branch of the case, the question presented is whether, as the complaint alleges, the property was "sold" by respondent through another agent during the life of appellant's contract. If it was, appellant, under the terms of the contract, was entitled to the stipulated commission on the sale. Kimmell v. Skelly, 62 P. 1067, 130 Cal. 555. The evidence shows beyond much doubt, we think, that the agency expired on April 5th. As originally written and signed, the contract fixed no time limit to the duration of the agency. It provided that it should continue "for a period of thirty days from date, and until such further time as I shall notify said Frank Meline Company in writing of the termination of this agency." If the contract had been allowed to stand in that form, it would have been immaterial, as appellant contends, so far as the payment of appellant's commissions were concerned, whether respondent sold said property on the 5th or the 6th of April, because at no time did respondent attempt by written notice to terminate the agency. Kimmell v. Skelly, supra; Knox v. Modern Garage, etc., Shop, 229 P. 880, 68 Cal. App. 583. But, when the 30-day period mentioned in the contract was about to expire, the parties added a clause thereto, the plain effect of which was to definitely limit the life of the agency to April 5th, and the declarations and conduct of the parties clearly indicate that such was their intention and understanding. Elsea v. Fassler, 154 P. 1067, 29 Cal. App. 187. It is apparent, therefore, that, in order to collect a commission on the sale made through Donahue, it was essential for appellant to prove that the property was "sold" by Donahue on or prior to April 5th.

[5] Respondent contends that a sale was not established because the evidence failed to show that on or before April 5th there was a conveyance of title, or that any written agreement of sale was entered into between respondent and Hart, and that, therefore, in view of the statute of frauds (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1971 and 1973), the oral declarations of respondent to the effect that the property had been sold were insufficient in law to prove that fact. As to the meaning of the word "sold" as it is employed in said contract, it should be kept in mind that this controversy does not involve the relationship of vendor and vendee, and, therefore, the questions of whether or not the transaction which took place on April 5th between respondent and Hart constituted a valid sale or was legally sufficient to support an action between them for specific performance are not important. The contract here is the usual one between an intending seller and the broker, involving merely the payment of compensation for personal services to be rendered in connection with a sale, and the language of the contract must be construed in the light of that relationship. Purcell v. Firth, 167 P. 379, 175 Cal. 746. Under a contract of that nature, the property is deemed to be "sold" so far as the matter of the agent's commissions are concerned when the seller accepts the agent's purchaser, regardless of whether a written contract of sale is afterwards actually entered into with him or whether the sale is ever consummated. Purcell v. Firth, supra; Twogood v. Monnette, supra, citing cases; Hicks v. Christeson, supra. The case of Houston v. Williams, 200 P. 55, 53 Cal. App. 267, is not unlike the instant one upon this point. There the issue was as to whether under the agency contract the owner reserved the right to make a sale himself, and, if so, how far it was necessary for him to proceed in his negotiations with a prospective buyer before the transaction constituted a sale which would deprive the agent of his commissions. The court said that "there can scarcely be any doubt that, if the power to sell without liability was reserved by the owner, it included the right to secure a purchaser ready to buy and thereby avoid the payment of any commission," even though the sale was not fully consummated by the owner until after the agent had procured a purchaser.

[6] The evidence in the case at bar is to the effect that about 6:30 o'clock on the evening of April 5th respondent declared to appellant's representative that at five minutes past 6 on that same evening she sold the property to Hart through Donahue, who was admittedly a real estate broker, and at that time she accepted Hart's check. She further stated "they were here before 6, but I made them wait until 6:05." These declarations were proved by three witnesses, whose testimony on this point was not conflicting, nor was it in any manner contradicted. The only fair inference to be drawn from this evidence is that on the evening in question respondent accepted the purchaser procured by Donahue, agreed with him upon terms, and accepted his check as payment on the purchase price. It was furthermore established by respondent's answer that on the next day the sale was consummated with Hart for a selling price of $55,000, including the furniture, which was ample proof that on April 5th Hart was ready, able, and willing to buy the property. In our opinion the evidence narrated was sufficient under the authorities cited to establish prima facie that Donahue, as agent, "sold" the property on April 5th within the meaning of the agency contract. That being so, we believe the motion for a nonsuit was improperly granted.

[7] The question of the amount of weight that should be attached to the evidence of the oral declarations of respondent is immaterial. A motion for nonsuit presents for determination a question of law, and, if there is any substantial evidence which, with the aid of legitimate inferences favorable to plaintiff, tends to establish the averments of the complaint, the motion for nonsuit should be denied.

JOHNSON v. TYRRELL et al. (Civ. 3062.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 18, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 17, 1926.)

1. Mortgages $\hookrightarrow$ 516—Deputy of officer making sale is prohibited from becoming purchaser at foreclosure sale of mortgaged property, and purchase may be set aside by any one having sufficient interest in property to give him right of action (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 684, 694, 726).

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 684 and 726, held, that section 694, prohibiting officer holding execution or his deputy from becoming purchaser at sale, applies to foreclosure sale of mortgaged property, and, where deputy purchased at such sale, any one interested in property sufficient to give him right of action can have such sale set aside as to him.

2. Mortgages $\hookrightarrow$ 512—Failure to sell real property consisting of several lots separately is mere irregularity, for which sale will not be set aside, where judgment provided for sale in one parcel (Code Civ. Proc. § 694).

Failure to comply with Code Civ. Proc. § 694, requiring sale of real property consisting of several lots to be sold separately, is a mere irregularity, and, where judgment provides for sale in one parcel, a mortgage foreclosure sale will not be set aside on that ground alone, and judgment directing such sale when not appealed from becomes final.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County;
E. P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action to quiet title by F. E. Johnson against T. J. Tyrrell and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

Frank A. Duryea and Crofton & Wetmore, all of Marysville, and Russell P. Tyler, of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff to quiet title to the south half of lot 6 and the north quarter of lot 7, in block 5, range F, city of Marysville, and for other relief. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals.

The record shows that on or about the 26th day of February, 1917, Emma A. Boggess and her husband, E. A. Boggess, for a valuable consideration, made, executed, and delivered to the defendant T. J. Tyrrell a mortgage on the above-described property to secure the payment of a promissory note for $4,500; that thereafter, and on or about the 17th day of March, 1917, the said Emma A. Boggess and R. A. Boggess made, executed, and delivered a certain deed of trust to Harold E. Haven and Lloyd D. Hare, as trustees, to secure the payment to C. F. Oldham and Joan Oldham of a certain promissory note in the sum of $1,000; that on or about the 23d day of February, 1922, one R. E. Colling, to whom the said T.

J. Tyrrell had assigned the note and mortgage for collection, began suit against the said Emma A. Boggess and others to foreclose the mortgage executed and delivered as aforesaid on the 26th day of February, 1917; that on or about the 17th day of August, 1922, a decree of foreclosure of said mortgage was entered in the superior court of the county of Yuba, in which said action was pending; that on or about the 19th day of August, 1922, an order of sale was issued out of said court directing the sheriff of the county of Yuba to sell the said property, pursuant to the decree of foreclosure entered in the case just referred to; that thereafter the sheriff of said Yuba county proceeded to sell said property, and on or about the 25th day of September, 1922, at the time and place specified in the notice previously given of said sale, did offer said mortgaged property for sale at public auction, and that at such sale T. J. Tyrrell became the purchaser thereof; that said T. J. Tyrrell, the defendant in this case, at all the times during the pendency of the foreclosure proceedings herein referred to, and at the time of the sheriff offering said property for sale, and at the time of the purchase thereof by the said defendant T. J. Tyrrell was a deputy sheriff of the county of Yuba, holding such office by appointment from the sheriff of said county, making the foreclosure sale; that, after the foregoing proceedings were taken and had, the trustees appointed in the trust deed herein referred to proceeded to make sale of the property, and at such sale one Mabel I. Reisner became the purchaser thereof, and on the 22d day of March, 1923, said Mabel I. Reisner and J. Reisner, her husband, transferred and conveyed said property to the plaintiff in this action.

It further appears that on or about the 28th day of September, 1923, the sheriff of the county of Yuba made, executed, and delivered to the defendant T. J. Tyrrell a sheriff's deed to the property hereinbefore described, purporting to convey the same to the said defendant T. J. Tyrrell. This action is prosecuted for the cancellation of said deed as a cloud upon the plaintiff's title, and for a decree of the court finding and declaring the sale of said property under said decree in the foreclosure action null and void. It is also a part of the prayer of the complaint that the decree of foreclosure and sale made and entered in said foreclosure be also declared null and void.

The complaint in the action also alleges that said property consists of two known lots and parcels, and should have been sold separately instead of en masse; that, if sold separately, a much higher price would have been obtained therefor; that said property was sold for the sum of $5,582.72; that the south half of said lot 6 was of the market value of $4,500, and the north quarter of lot 7 was of the market value of $4,000. The court found that the market value of the property was not in excess of the sum paid therefor by the defendant. It further appears that the amount bid by the defendant for said property was the amount due upon the mortgage assigned by the defendant in the foreclosure proceedings for the purposes of collection. The court further found that the plaintiff in this case has no title to the premises referred to, and at no time has had any such title. This finding is based apparently upon the conclusion of the court that the foreclosure sale conveyed an absolute and indefeasible title to the defendant in this case.

[1] There is but one question to be determined upon this appeal. Has the plaintiff, as the possessor of the right, title, and interest of the mortgagors in and to the property in question, a right to have the deed referred to canceled and the sale set aside, for the reason that the sale was made by a sheriff, the principal, to his deputy? Section 694, Code of Civil Procedure, among other things specifies as follows:

"Neither the officer holding the execution nor his deputy can become a purchaser, or be interested in any purchase, at such sale."

The same section also provides that, when a sale is made of real property consisting of several known lots or parcels, they must be sold separately. Section 726, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that there can be only one action for the enforcement of any right secured by a mortgage, directs that the property may be sold by the sheriff, or by a commissioner or by an elisor. In relation to the power given to the commissioner, that section reads:

"If the court appoints a commissioner for the sale of the property, he must sell it in the manner provided by law for the sale of like property by the sheriff upon execution; and the provisions of chapter one, title nine, part two, of this Code are hereby made applicable to a sale made by such commissioner, and the powers therein given and the duties therein imposed on sheriffs are extended to such commissioner."

It has been held in this state that sections 684 and 694 of the Code of Civil Procedure are applicable to foreclosure proceedings. Ontario Land, etc., Co. v. Bedford, 27 P. 39, 90 Cal. 185. The court there said on this subject:

"The process under which the judgment in this class of cases is enforced if [is] provided for in section 684 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the subsequent section, 694, which is a part of the same chapter, dealing with the general subject of the execution of judgments, is applicable to sales of real property under judgments of foreclosure; and when, as in this case, the judgment is silent as to the manner or order in which the separate parcels shall be sold, the judgment debtor has the right to require that separate lots or parcels shall be sold separately, and may also direct the order in which they shall be sold."

The applicability of section 694 of the Code of Civil Procedure to foreclosure proceedings was before the Supreme Court in the case of Marston v. White, 27 P. 588, 91 Cal. 37. The court there followed and reaffirmed the ruling had in the Ontario Land, etc., Co. Case. Section 684, Code of Civil Procedure, referred to as applicable in the foregoing cases, reads, with regard to the sale of real property:

"When the judgment requires the sale of property, the same may be enforced by a writ reciting such judgment, or the material parts thereof, and directing the proper officer to execute the judgment, by making the sale and applying the proceeds in conformity therewith," etc.

It thus appears to be settled that the words "neither the officer holding the execution nor his deputy can become a purchaser at such sale," found in section 694, Code of Civil Procedure, are applicable to the case at bar. The fact that the mortgaged property in question was sold by the sheriff to his deputy is admitted, but the applicability of the prohibitory section just referred to, found in section 694, supra, is denied by the respondent. This claim is based upon the decision in Jackson v. Collins, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 89, where it was held that, where a deputy sheriff was the plaintiff in the writ, or otherwise was so interested in the property to be sold that excluding him from the right to purchase might result in the sacrifice of his interest, the sheriff or deputy would not be regarded as disqualified even under the statute forbidding a sheriff, or any of his deputies, from bidding at a sale. The case of Cowles v. Hardin, 7 S. E. 896, 101 N. C. 388, 9 Am. St. Rep. 36, is referred to in one of the cases cited by respondent supporting this rule. An examination of this latter case, however, reveals the fact that the court held that a sale by the sheriff to his deputy did not render the sale absolutely void, and that, where the property had been conveyed to an innocent purchaser, the purchaser's title would be held good. Thus the decision rested upon the doctrine of innocent purchasers intervening.

In none of the cases called to our attention has a violation of the prohibitory provision referred to, contained in section 694, Code of Civil Procedure, been held a mere irregularity. The only question seems to be whether such a sale is voidable at the instance of an interested party, or absolutely void. Some of the states have statutes reading that such sales shall be regarded as fraudulent and void. Following the rule laid down having to do with transactions by debtors, where the statute provides that certain transfers as to creditors are void, it would seem to us that the addition of the words "fraudulent and void" add nothing to our statute in legal effect, as such sales would only be declared void at the instance of some interested party possessing an interest in the property. Thus, whether the statute reads void or voidable would make no material difference in its application to the facts of such prohibited sale. The words of our Code are prohibitory. They say that a deputy cannot become a purchaser or be interested in any purchase at such sale, which actually means that any one interested in the property sufficient to give him a right of action can have such sale set aside as to him, on the ground of its being by the statute made a legal fraud.

"In many of the states statutes have been enacted forbidding the officer executing the writ, and all of his deputies, from purchasing at or being interested in the sale; and declaring that any sale in which he or they shall be interested shall be regarded as fraudulent and void. These statutes but give expression to the policy which was everywhere respected long anterior to their passage. It was always understood that the officer holding an execution should be removed from all temptations to the fraudulent exercise of his authority. To accomplish this object, it has ever been held that he should, under no circumstances, be interested in the sale. Hence, when, in a proceeding instituted to vacate a sale, it is shown that the officer purchased in his own name, or that some other person made the purchase for the officer's benefit, the vacation must be made; and this result cannot be avoided by showing that the transaction was fair, the bidding spirited, and the price paid was the full value of the property. Mills v. Goodsell, 5 Conn. 475, 13 Am. Dec. 90; Mapps v. Sharpe, 32 Ill. 13; Mark v. Lawrence, 5 Har. & J. (Md.) 64; Robinson v. Clark, 52 N. C. 562, 78 Am. Dec. 265; Johnson v. Pryor, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 243; Scott v. Mann, 36 Tex. 157; Dempster v. West, 6 Chic. L. N. 335; McConnell v. Gibson, 12 Ill. 128; Downing v. Lyford, 57 Vt. 507."

To the same effect is the case of Miller et al. v. Winslow, 126 P. 906, 70 Wash. 401, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 833, and note appended to the case as last cited, where a number of cases are collected supporting the rule holding such sales voidable at the election of interested parties. See, also, 11 Cal. Jur. § 30, p. 74; 11 Cal. Jur. § 7, p. 307; 23 C. J. § 554, p. 617; 23 C. J. § 604, p. 643. See, also, note to Credle v. Baugham, 136 Am. St. Rep. 790 et seq.

The reasoning in the few cases upholding the right of a deputy to purchase at a sale made by his principal is entirely wanting in this state, where provision is made for the appointment of a commissioner or an elisor to make the sale, and this provision further extends the right to have such appointment made at any time after the decree of foreclosure is entered.

A somewhat similar case was before this court in the case of Henderson v. Fisher, 176 P. 63, 38 Cal. App. 270, involving the validity of a sale under a chattel mortgage. After referring to the prohibitory provision we are considering set forth in section 694 of Code of Civil Procedure, the court there said:

"Since it appears, both from the pleadings and the evidence, that the mortgagee, through his agent, conducted the sale and became a purchaser of the mortgaged property at such sale the position of appellant was analogous to the sheriff in conducting an execution sale, and, hence, the effect as to appellant of said sale would be the same as if the sheriff had bid at an execution sale. But, in the latter instance, under the decisions, there can be no doubt that the sale would be, at least, voidable, if not void"—citing cases.

[2] As laid down in Freeman on Executions, as shown by the paragraph quoted, the fact that the transaction was otherwise fair, that the bidding was spirited, and the price paid was the full market value of the property, cannot be relied upon to sustain such a sale; it being a prohibited sale and purchase, and not a mere irregularity. It is further set forth in Freeman on Executions that, where there is no statute on the subject, such sales are held void as against public policy, and may be avoided on that ground by the mortgagor, or his successors in interest. As to the question as to the sale en masse, this state has held that failure to comply with such provision of the statute is an irregularity, and that, where a judgment so provides, a sale will not be set aside upon that ground alone. Hopkins v. Wiard, 13 P. 687, 72 Cal. 259. The judgment in the foreclosure proceeding under consideration directed the sale of the property to be made in one parcel, and, not having been appealed from, that judgment had become final in that respect cannot be interfered with in this case.

The Winslow Case, to which we have referred, is identical with the case at bar, in that it was an action to set aside a deed and vacate the sale. It also included the right to redeem from certain delinquent street assessments. The court held the deed void at the instance of the plaintiffs, interested parties, and remanded the cause for further hearing to ascertain the amount due the defendants, and to fix a time within which the same should be paid.

No other issues were presented to the trial court for determination than those which we have considered herein, and the cause has been submitted to us upon the one question set forth in this opinion. Upon the case made as set forth in the transcript and presented to us, we think the plaintiff should have had judgment canceling the deed executed by the sheriff to his deputy, and, also, vacating and setting aside the sale made by the sheriff to his deputy. There appears no reason why any further relief prayed for in the plaintiff's complaint should be granted. The right of the defendant to proceed under his decree of foreclosure and have the premises resold according to law appears to be well founded.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the lower court be, and the same is hereby, reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

MILES v. MILES et al. (Civ. 4650.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 20, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1008(1)—Findings not claimed to be unsupported are accepted as conclusive of facts on appeal.

Where appellants do not contend that evidence is insufficient to support findings, they must be accepted as conclusive of the facts on appeal.

2. Contracts $\S$ 354—Contention that contract was breached by party not performing his part thereto could not be sustained, in view of finding of full performance by such party.

In action for breach of contract to pay money for use of plaintiff on receipt of telegram from plaintiff's divorced husband at certain city, contention that husband breached agreement by going to city only for purpose of sending telegram could not be sustained, in view of finding that he fully performed his part of agreement.

3. Contracts $\S$ 258—Unsuccessful attempt by son to defraud parents, obligated under agreement with son to pay money to use of son's divorced wife, does not justify parents in denying wife her rights under contract by rescinding contract after she parted with valuable consideration.

Unsuccessful attempt by son to defraud parents by not carrying out his part of agreement with parents, obligated to pay money for benefit of son's divorced wife, does not justify parents in denying wife her rights under the contract by rescinding contract after she had parted with valuable consideration for benefits to accrue to her.

4. Contracts $\S$ 187(3)—Plaintiff may maintain action on contract to pay money for her benefit made in consideration of expatriation of her husband on discharge of debt to her.

Action may be maintained under agreement by defendants to pay money for use of plaintiff made to benefit plaintiff by expatriation of her divorced husband in consideration of discharge of indebtedness by husband to plaintiff.

5. Contracts $\S$ 187(1)—To enforce benefit derivable from agreement by others, contract need not be made exclusively for benefit of person seeking to establish such right.

That one may be entitled to enforce benefit under an agreement entered into by others it is not necessary that contract be made exclusively for benefit of person seeking to establish such right; it being sufficient if among benefits arising from performance of agreement there exists right sought to be established.

6. Contracts $\S$ 28(3)—Evidence held sufficient to warrant finding that mother entered into agreement to pay money for use of her son's divorced wife.

Evidence held to sustain finding that mother entered into agreement to pay money for use of her son's divorced wife in consideration of son's going away and discharge of debt by son to wife.

7. Trusts $\S$ 234—Trustee holding funds for use of plaintiff under agreement with plaintiff is liable therefor on breach of trust.

Under agreement whereby trustee was selected to hold funds to be paid for use of plaintiff under memorandum between plaintiff and trustee, plaintiff is presumed to have relied on representations of trustee in memorandum, and, trustee returning money to defendant in violation of his agreement, is liable for amount of trust funds.

8. Damages $\S$ 120(1)—Defendants breaching contract to pay money for use of plaintiff cannot limit liability to sums payable to plaintiff personally.

Defendants breaching contract to pay sums for use and benefit of plaintiff cannot limit their liability to amounts payable to plaintiff personally and avoid liability for amounts to be paid in discharge of plaintiff's debts.

9. Appeal and error $\S$ 1073(1)—On establishment of cause of action for breach of contract, second count for money had and received is immaterial.

Where cause of action for breach of contract was adequately sustained, question whether second count for money had and received is maintainable becomes immaterial.

10. New trial $\S$ 99—Granting new trial is within sound discretion of trial court, where affidavits showing newly discovered evidence on which motion is based are contradicted.

Where defendants' affidavits setting forth newly discovered evidence as basis for new trial were contradicted by counter affidavits by plaintiff, the granting or denying of new trial was within sound discretion of trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Naomi Schultz Miles against Sue Miles, James E. Kelby, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants named appeal. Affirmed.

Schweitzer & Hutton and H. S. Clewett, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Joseph H. Call and Asa V. Call, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff against the defendants Sue Miles and James E. Kelby for the sum of $2,500.

The action originally included Joseph Harvey Miles as one of the defendants. Judgment was rendered in his favor, and no appeal has been prosecuted therefrom. The de-defendants Sue Miles and Joseph Harvey Miles are husband and wife, and plaintiff is the divorced wife of Warren Miles, who is the son of Sue Miles and Joseph Harvey Miles. The complaint is in two counts, by the first of which a judgment is sought for damages for breach of contract alleged to have been made by the three defendants with Warren Miles for the benefit of plaintiff; and the second count of the complaint states a cause of action on account of money had and received by the three defendants for the use of plaintiff. The findings of fact by the trial court, although somewhat lengthy, nevertheless tell the whole story. They are in part as follows:

"That on or about March 21, 1921, defendant Sue Miles entered into an agreement with Warren C. Miles, the son of defendant Sue Miles and Joseph Harvey Miles, for the use and benefit of plaintiff, Naomi Schultz Miles; and that on or about said date Sue Miles entered into an agreement with Naomi Schultz Miles directly, both of which agreements are in substance as follows: That Sue Miles would pay to Naomi Schultz Miles the sum of $2,500, which sum was to be in full satisfaction of a certain $3,000 obligation then owing from Warren C. Miles to Naomi Schultz Miles upon the happenings in the manner and at the times following:

"Warren C. Miles was to proceed to Falls City, Neb., and upon his arrival there, $750 was to be expended from said sum of $2,500 to redeem a diamond ring of Naomi Schultz Miles, then in pawn for that amount; a sum not exceeding $150 was to be expended from said total sum of $2,500 to pay interest on an aggregate principal amount of $1,750, the repayment of which sum of $1,750 was secured by the pledge of five other diamond rings of Naomi Schultz Miles; the sum of $600 in cash was to be paid from said total sum of $2,500 to Naomi Schultz Miles, and Naomi Schultz Miles agreed that, upon the receipt of this money, she would pay to Ross Schultz, her brother, at Omaha, Neb., the sum of $150 and a like amount to one Silvernail, who was a druggist doing business in Ocean Park, Cal.; and that in addition to the foregoing payments, which were to be made upon the arrival of Warren C. Miles at Falls City, Neb., the following sums were to be paid in cash to Naomi Schultz Miles at the times specified: $250, 30 days after March 21, 1921; $250, 60 days after March 21, 1921; $250, 90 days after March 21, 1921; $250, 120 days after March 21, 1921.

"That said sum of $2,500 was to be placed beyond the control of Sue Miles, and in the hands of some third person to be approved by Naomi Schultz Miles, for the purpose of paying it to her upon the happenings at the times and in the manner above specified.

"That Naomi Schultz Miles and Sue Miles did agree that Sue Miles should deliver the sum of $2,500 to one James E. Kelby for the purpose of paying it to Naomi Schultz Miles upon the happenings at the times and in the manner herein set forth, and the said Kelby did accept the said trust, and consented to act as trustee, and to perform the terms of said trust for the use and benefit of plaintiff; and that, in pursuance of the provisions of said agreements, as hereinabove set forth, the said Sue Miles did deposit with said Kelby the sum of $2,500, upon the terms hereinabove set forth, for the use and benefit of the plaintiff. That said Kelby did accept said sum of $2,500 for the purpose of paying the same to the plaintiff herein, in the manner hereinabove set forth. That said Kelby, to show his good faith toward plaintiff in said matter, and to provide her with a written memorandum of the aforesaid agreements, and to set forth the terms of his trust and obligation to her, made, executed, and delivered to plaintiff a certain declaration of his said trust in writing, which is in words and figures as follows:

"To Mrs. Naomi Schultz Miles:

"March 21, 1921.

"This memo witnesseth that I, the undersigned, hold and am payee of checks of Mrs. J. H. Miles aggregating $2,500 for the purposes specified as follows, and to be paid by me upon the following conditions:

"(1) $750 to redeem a diamond ring from pawn, which ring I am to hold until I receive a telegram from Warren C. Miles from and announcing his arrival at Falls City, Neb., at which time I am to deliver said ring to Mrs. Naomi Schultz Miles, at Los Angeles, Cal.

"(2) To pay interest, not exceeding $150 on five (5) other diamond rings in pawn for an aggregate principal amount of $1,750, payable upon the same condition as "(1)" hereof.

"(3) $600 cash to Mrs. Naomi Schultz Miles, upon receipt by me of said telegram; it being understood that Mrs. Miles shall pay out of this $150 to her brother at Omaha, Neb., and the like amount to one Silvernail.

"(4) In addition to the foregoing payments, made as above provided for, I agree to pay to said Mrs. Miles, in person at my office, W. P. Story Building, Los Angeles, Cal., the following amounts at the following dates respectively, viz.: $250, 30 days after date; $250, 60 days after date; $250, 90 days after date; and $250 120 days after date.

"[Signed] James E. Kelby."

"That said Naomi Schultz Miles did repose special confidence in said James E. Kelby, and did agree to his acting for her in the manner hereinabove specified because she refused to trust or rely upon Sue Miles. That said moneys were delivered to James E. Kelby, in the manner and for the purposes aforesaid, because Naomi Schultz Miles did not trust Sue Miles or have confidence in her, and by reason of the special confidence reposed by her in said James E. Kelby. That in agreeing to the delivery of said moneys to James E. Kelby, as aforesaid, Naomi Schultz Miles did rely upon the following statements and representations that this court finds James E. Kelby did make to her, for the purpose of inducing her to enter into said agreement: That he, James E. Kelby, was a trustworthy person, in whom Naomi Schultz Miles could place her confidence; that he was a reputable practicing attorney at law; that he represented a number of large corporations that required a man of special integrity, and in whom was reposed unusual confidence, and that when he placed his signature to a document he could not, by reason of his position in his profession and the community, fail to perform it, and that he would in all respects protect her.

"That the following facts were, at the time of the making of said agreement, well known to the defendants Sue Miles and James E. Kelby. That at the time of the execution of said agreement Warren C. Miles was the son of defendant Sue Miles, and was residing in the city of Los Angeles, Cal. That it was the desire of Sue Miles to have Warren C. Miles proceed to Falls City, Neb., and associate himself with an agricultural enterprise near that town. At said times Warren C. Miles refused to leave the city of Los Angeles until he had paid, or caused to be paid, certain obligations then owing from him to Naomi Schultz Miles, the plaintiff herein. That said obligations consisted of $3,000, evidenced by a promissory note dated December 30, 1920, executed by Warren C. Miles in favor of Naomi Schultz Miles, for the principal amount of $3,000, bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per month, payable 90 days from its date. That said $3,000 obligations represented cash loaned from Naomi Schultz Miles to Warren C. Miles to the extent of at least $3,000, and that a part of which loan were moneys borrowed by Naomi Schultz Miles for the use and benefit of and given to Warren C. Miles, and secured by the pledge of jewelry and other personal property of Naomi Schultz Miles. That at said times Naomi Schultz Miles was unwilling to agree to Warren C. Miles leaving the state of California until his obligation to her had been satisfied.

"That at the time of the making of said agreement Naomi Schultz Miles distrusted and expressed to Sue Miles, Joseph Harvey Miles, and James E. Kelby, and each of them, her distrust of Sue Miles and Joseph Harvey Miles, and refused to make or perform any agreement, and in particular refused to agree to permit Warren C. Miles leaving the state of California and canceling her obligation due from him until said Joseph Harvey Miles and Sue Miles should perform and complete the agreement of Sue Miles to pay the sum of $2,500 to her as above specified, at least, to the extent of placing the payment of the moneys specified beyond their control or power in any manner to interfere therewith. That said sum of $2,500 was, on or about March 21, 1921, delivered by Sue Miles to James E. Kelby for the purposes herein set forth.

"That Naomi Schultz Miles did, on or about March 22, 1921, cancel and deliver up to Warren C. Miles her said promissory note for $3,000, and did satisfy the obligation represented thereby. That Warren C. Miles did, on or about March 21, 1921, leave the city of Los Angeles and state of California, and did, on or before May 1, 1921, which this court finds to be a reasonable time under all the circumstances, proceed to Falls City, Neb., and did associate himself with said agricultural enterprise known as the Miles Ranch. That Warren C. Miles did communicate by telegram with James E. Kelby, Sue Miles, and Naomi Schultz Miles, upon his arrival, and announced his arrival at Falls City, Neb.; and, further, that said Warren C. Miles was in the company of, and did live with, Joseph Harvey Miles, defendant herein, and father of said Warren C. Miles, upon said Miles Ranch near Falls City, Neb., within 30 days from March 21, 1921.

"That Sue Miles and James E. Kelby, and each of them, have frequently been requested by plaintiff, Naomi Schultz Miles, to perform the said agreements as hereinabove specified, and in particular to pay said sum of $2,500 to her in the manner, upon the happenings and at the times as hereinabove specified. That Sue Miles and James E. Kelby, and each of them, have failed and refused, and still fail and refuse, to pay to plaintiff, Naomi Schultz Miles, the said sum of $2,500 or any part thereof upon the happenings, at the times, in the manner, and subject to the conditions, hereinabove set forth, or at all, and that no part thereof has been paid to or on behalf of the plaintiff in any manner whatsoever.

"That after the performance of all the acts and things hereinabove set forth, and, in particular, after Warren C. Miles had proceeded to and arrived at Falls City, Neb., and after said $3,000 note had been delivered up and canceled, and the obligation represented thereby satisfied, defendant Sue Miles did notify James E. Kelby that said sum of $2,500 should be returned to her, and that no part thereof should in any manner be paid to the plaintiff. That James E. Kelby, prior to the commencement of this action, did deliver said sum of $2,500 to Sue Miles. That plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $2,500.

"That on or about the 21st day of March, 1921, the defendant Sue Miles and the defendant James E. Kelby, and each of them, became indebted to the plaintiff for and on account of money had and received to and for the use and benefit of the plaintiff in the sum of $2,500, and that said sum of $2,500 is now due from the said defendants and each of them to said plaintiff; that plaintiff has repeatedly demanded the payment of said sum of $2,500, but that defendants and each of them have refused, and still refuse, to pay the same or any part thereof. That the same is now due and owing from the defendants to plaintiff."

[1] It is not contended by appellants that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. They must, therefore, be accepted as conclusive as to the facts.

[2] Appellants suggest that no recovery may be had by plaintiff because the contract "was never carried out." It is claimed that Warren Miles breached the agreement entered into for the benefit of plaintiff, in that when Warren Miles left the city of Los Angeles, instead of going directly to the ranch in Nebraska, he went to Kansas City, where he remained for several days, and then proceeded to the ranch for the purpose only of sending a telegram to defendant Kelby in accordance with the terms of the memorandum given by defendant Kelby to plaintiff, and that immediately thereafter the said Warren Miles returned to Kansas City. But the findings of fact are that within 30 days from the date of the agreement the son and the father were living upon the ranch, and that the son "did associate himself with said agricultural enterprise," which the trial court further found was "a reasonable time under all the circumstances." Appellants' point, therefore, cannot be sustained.

[3] It is next urged that defendants Sue Miles and Joseph Harvey Miles rescinded the contract because Warren Miles had attempted to defraud them by not carrying out the terms of the agreement, and consequently that plaintiff may not recover. But the mere fact (assuming it to be such) that Warren Miles made an unsuccessful attempt to commit a fraud upon his parents by not performing in good faith the acts which he was obligated to perform would not be sufficient to justify the parents in taking advantage of that fact to the extent of denying to plaintiff the rights to which she was entitled in accordance with the terms of the agreement. Plaintiff was as much concerned in the matter as was any one of the other parties. She gave a valuable consideration for the benefits which were to accrue to her, and her rights in the premises were just as much entitled to protection as were the rights of either of the other parties to the transaction. Besides, whatever may have been the secret intention of Warren Miles with reference to the commission by him of any fraud upon his parents, the findings by the trial court are to the effect that no fraud was actually committed, for the reason that by the strict letter of the agreement, and within a reasonable time after the contract had been entered into, Warren Miles fully performed the acts which he was obligated to perform.

[4, 5] The appellants advance the point that the action was not maintainable for the reason that the contract among the parties was not made expressly for the benefit of plaintiff. It is clear, however, that the facts as found by the trial court do not sustain appellants' contention. The evidence shows that Warren Miles negotiated with his parents concerning the subject-matter of the contract solely on the basis that plaintiff should benefit by the expatriation of Warren Miles, and that plaintiff consented to the banishment of Warren Miles solely on the condition that the indebtedness which he owed to plaintiff, and which was evidenced by a promissory note which plaintiff surrendered to Warren Miles, should be satisfied and discharged by and through the funds which the defendants were obligated to make available to plaintiff. There were no other visible "benefits" in the transaction, unless the fact that Warren Miles was to go from California to the Nebraska ranch, and there to "associate himself with an agricultural enterprise," may be so considered; and, if so, that "benefit" was realized and accomplished. In order that a person may be entitled to enforce a benefit derivable from an agreement entered into by other persons, it is not necessary that such contract be made exclusively for the benefit of the person seeking to establish such right. It is sufficient if among the benefits arising from the performance of the agreement there exists the right sought to be established. Riverside Land Co. v. Jarvis, 163 P. 54, 174 Cal. 316.

[6] That defendant Sue Miles was not in any way a party to the contract upon which the action was based is also suggested by appellants as a reason why the judgment should be reversed. Among other things, Sue Miles testified that she had "put up the money"; that she did the greater part of the talking; and that her "whole heart was set" on getting her "boy" away. Considering other evidence introduced at the trial of the action, it is clear that all the acts performed by Joseph Harvey Miles and defendant Kelby in the matter were at the instigation and request of defendant Sue Miles; and the finding by the court that she entered into the agreement to which reference has just been had is amply sustained by the evidence.

Appellants present the further point that defendant Kelby was not a party to the contract, but that he was acting only as an attorney and agent for the disbursement of the moneys in question, and, consequently, that he incurred no liability.

[7] From the findings heretofore herein set forth, it appears that by agreement of all the parties to the contract defendant Kelby was selected as a trustee of the funds which were to be placed in his keeping for the purpose of paying them to plaintiff upon the happening of the contingencies specified in the memorandum which defendant Kelby executed and delivered to plaintiff. It must, therefore, be presumed that it was partly because of the representations made to plaintiff by defendant Kelby as to his own trustworthiness, and that he was acting for plaintiff, that plaintiff was induced to agree to the arrangement by which defendant Kelby was to handle the monetary part of the transaction. She had placed absolute confidence in him—he was her agent, as well as the agent of the other parties. The conditions of the contract on the part of plaintiff having been performed by her, in that she surrendered the promissory note which evidenced the indebtedness of Warren Miles to her, Mr. Kelby was in no position to return to defendant Sue Miles the money which theretofore she had intrusted to him to be paid to plaintiff in accordance with the terms of the agreement among the parties. It was a violation of the trust reposed in defendant Kelby for him not to retain in his possession the funds which were to become the property of plaintiff upon the performance of the conditions of the contract which were to be performed by plaintiff and Warren Miles. Having in effect thus breached the contract, his liability therefor follows as a matter of course.

[8] Appellants claim that because the entire sum of $2,500 mentioned in the agreement was not to be paid directly to plaintiff, but that certain sums of money included in the total consideration of $2,500 were to be paid on account of debts owing by her, the recovery, if any, should be limited to the amount of money which would be paid to plaintiff personally. It can be of no consequence to the defendants to what use the money was to be put. Upon the compliance with the conditions of the contract by plaintiff and Warren Miles, the money was to become the property of plaintiff, subject, in part, to be paid out in accordance with her directions. Manifestly the intention of the parties was that $2,500 was to be paid for the use and benefit of plaintiff. The defendants breached and repudiated the agreement, and it would be inequitable by reason of defendants' wrong to permit them to make a profit by paying to plaintiff only the net amount which she would have received had the original arrangement been carried out by all the parties. If by plaintiff's direction, or with her consent, a part of the fund was to be used in discharging certain of her obligations, that fact cannot militate against the direct obligation of the defendants to pay to plaintiff the amount of money which was agreed to be paid to her or for her benefit.

[9] It is further urged by appellants that the judgment on the second count of the complaint for money had and received cannot be sustained. But conceding (without deciding) the point to be well taken, it could not help appellants' position. The first cause of action is unquestioned as to its sufficiency. It having been proven on the trial of the action and sustained by the judgment of this court, whether the second count, affecting the same transaction, is maintainable becomes immaterial.

[10] The appellants finally contend that the trial court erred to the prejudice of the defendants in refusing to grant their motion for a new trial. The motion was based on the theory that, if a new trial were granted, "newly discovered evidence" would result in a judgment for the defendants. The substance of such "newly discovered evidence" is contained within certain affidavits which were filed by the defendants in support of their motion for a new trial. A counter affidavit by plaintiff contradicted practically each material fact set forth in the affidavits presented by the defendants. In such circumstances the granting or the denying of the motion for a new trial rested within the sound discretion of the trial court.

In the case of People v. Oxnam, 149 P. 165, 167, 170 Cal. 211, 215, it is said:

"It is the established rule in this state that a new trial should be granted on this ground only where the newly discovered evidence is such as to render a different result probable, and it has been said that the question as to the effect upon the case of newly discovered evidence is from its nature peculiarly one that is addressed to the discretion of the trial court. 'Unless the appellate court can plainly see that this discretion has been abused, that the showing made was of such a character as to make it manifest that the case would or should result differently on a new trial in view of the newly discovered evidence, the order of the trial court refusing a new trial will not be disturbed.' People v. Sing Yow, 78 P. 235, 145 Cal. 1."

To the same effect see Fresno Estate Co. v. Fiske, 157 P. 1127, 172 Cal. 583; People v. Taminago, 169 P. 696, 35 Cal. App. 238; Spotiswood v. Weir, 22 P. 289, 80 Cal. 448.

So far as this court is able to determine, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant the motion for a new trial.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record, it is ordered that the judgment be, and the same is, affirmed.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for issuing fictitious check.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Allen Alexander was convicted of issuing a fictitious check, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Holland and Jos. R. Marquette, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Edwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. Appellant was charged by information and convicted of having issued and delivered to one Frank Prott a check for the sum of $100, and to a Mrs. Ada I. Bailey a check for $212.50, without having money, funds, or credit at the bank with which to meet them. A motion for new trial was presented, and overruled and this is an appeal from the ruling upon such motion, and from the judgment.

It appeared from the testimony of the prosecuting witnesses that each of them had advertised an automobile for sale, and that appellant negotiated for the purchase, and obtained possession, of both machines, in each instance displaying a passbook of the First National Bank of Long Beach, where he claimed to have an account. An officer of the bank was sworn and testified that appellant had some months previously opened an account with said bank, but that he withdrew all but 50 cents on the next day, and that he made no further deposits, and had no account with the bank at the time of giving the checks in question.

Prott testified that the transaction occurred on a Saturday afternoon, and that he hesitated about accepting a check, but that appellant assured him that he was a member of the Automobile Club of Southern California, and at the same time signed and delivered to Prott a check for $500 on the California Bank, which was postdated. Mrs. Bailey and her son each testified that appellant told them that he was a member of said club, and exhibited one of its membership cards. He also gave her a postdated check for $500, drawn on the Long Beach bank. On one check which he gave to Prott appellant wrote his address as the Torrey Pine Apartments and on the $500 check to Mrs. Bailey he gave his residence as 1103 Thirty-Seventh place, Los Angeles. An officer of the California Bank testified that appellant had no account with that institution. An attorney for the Automobile Club swore that appellant had ceased to be a member of the club some six months previously to giving the checks, and a police officer testified upon investigation he found that appellant did not reside at either of the addresses which he gave. Each of the prosecuting witnesses detailed the circumstances of their respective sales, and the checks were introduced in evidence. An officer also stated that the defendant admitted when arrested that the check for $212.50 was not good, but asserted that he had the money with which to take it up. It appeared that appellant borrowed about $320 from a loan company on the Bailey car, for which he had paid with the worthless checks, and this he admitted upon the trial, but denied that he had shown a bank book or membership card of the Automobile Club, or that he had claimed to be a member thereof.

[1] It is first contended that the trial court erred in permitting the evidence as to postdated checks to be introduced, and in receiving the checks themselves in evidence. However, it clearly appears that the respective $500 checks were component parts of the transactions in which they were given, and that they were offered for the purpose of showing intent. Such evidence was properly admitted in accordance with the provisions of sections 1850 and 1954 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as declarations and writings embraced within the same transaction, and as tending to throw light on the question before the court and jury.

[2] In cross-examining one of the complaining witnesses, Mrs. Bailey, appellant's counsel, asked if the defendant did not in fact telephone her to hold the check for $212.50 and state that he would pay her in cash, to which she replied in the affirmative. It developed, however, that such conversation occurred on the day following the issuance of the spurious paper, after the defendant had procured a loan on Mrs. Bailey's car, and after she had discovered that the check was worthless and had called the officers. The testimony was therefore stricken out on motion of the district attorney, and appellant assigns this ruling as prejudicial error. It is urged in his brief that a case could be imagined where one who had issued a worthless check and fled might telephone back: "Hold the check. It is not good. I will bring you the money." It is asserted that, while under such conditions the ruling would be proper, appellant should have been allowed to show an honest intent to pay the amount of the check, that he actually had the money, and that, when he appeared at the Bailey residence, he was arrested. We are unable to substantially distinguish the cases. Having obtained possession of an automobile on the strength of two fraudulent checks and upon false representations, and having pledged the car elsewhere upon other false representations, and thus being enabled to raise funds with which to cover up the previous crime, the offer to use such funds so obtained for that purpose is no evidence of honest intentions at the time appellant issued the check in question. The ruling of the trial court was proper.

[3] The next point urged for reversal is that the defendant was precluded from cross-examining Mrs. Bailey regarding an alleged conversation between herself and the defendant on the next day after the check was given. There was some colloquy between the court and counsel as to whether or not the witness had testified upon direct examination as to such conversation, wherein it developed that she had not, and objections to the defendant's questions were thereupon sustained. However, he later cross-examined her upon the subject, and it then appeared that the only conversation on that day consisted of a telephone message that Alexander was going to Long Beach for some money, that he would accompany his wife to a doctor's office, and that he would see the witness in the afternoon and pay her the $212.50, to which she replied, "All right." Appellant testified in his own behalf that when he gave the check to Mrs. Bailey he asked her to hold it, but this she unqualifiedly denied. The result was that appellant was not limited in his cross-examination of the witness, and the only question presented was one of fact for the jury, upon conflicting testimony, as to the sincerity of his intentions. We see no error in the ruling below.

[4] It is insisted that the court also committed prejudicial error in sustaining objections of the district attorney to appellant's cross-examination of Mrs. Bailey's son, when he was asked: "When you returned at 9:30 on that morning, did your mother tell you he had telephoned?" "What did she say relative to that?" and "Had your mother told you that he was coming out to the house with the money that afternoon?" The witness replied that his mother did inform him of the telephone call, but was not permitted to answer the questions following such answer, and it is urged that the purpose of them was to impeach her testimony. But she did not testify that she had not so stated; no inconsistent or contradictory statements of Mrs. Bailey are cited, nor was any foundation laid for such impeaching evidence. The objections were therefore properly sustained. People v. Ronsse, 146 P. 65, 26 Cal. App. 100.

[5] Again, appellant contends that the cross-examination of L. R. Bailey, the son, was erroneously and prejudicially limited, and that the trial court usurped the functions of the jury. The witness at first stated that his mother presented the $212.50 check and the $500 check at the bank on the same day, but not at the same time, but later corrected himself when asked, "What do you mean by 'the same day'?" He answered, "Perhaps she did present both checks at that time." Asked which was right, he replied, "She presented them both." "Q. Then you were mistaken a moment ago? A. I was. Q. When you were so positive? A. I am." The court then interposed, saying: "I would not argue that. It is apparent he is mistaken. You don't need to take time further."

Counsel did not object nor assign the remarks of the court as prejudicial, but, had he done so, it is a familiar rule that counsel are not permitted to argue with a witness, and the only other statement of the court to which exception is taken consisted of a repetition of the witness' own admission that he was mistaken. This was also doubtless apparent to the jury from other evidence in the case, and we do not coincide with appellant's assertion that a "glaring discrepancy was glossed off as an apparent mistake" of a "lying witness." If constrained to hold that the remarks of the court added weight to the statement of the witness in this trivial respect, the jury were instructed to disregard the remarks of both counsel and the court, and we must assume that such instruction was observed.

[6] Appellant's only remaining point consists of the assertion that he was charged "with having given to one Frank J. Prott a check for $600 in payment for a secondhand car." And it is urged that there is no evidence to support a conviction upon count II of the information, involving such charge. It appears upon the face of the record that he was charged with having given Prott a check for $100, and the evidence shows that he gave one for $500 at the same time, which he asked Prott to hold. We have heretofore briefly set forth a summary of the facts, gathered from a careful perusal of the evidence. Appellant was not charged with having given a $600 check, nor do we find any mention of such a document. There was an abundance of evidence tending to show that the defendant issued and delivered the check for $100 as alleged, and that he had no money in the bank at the time to meet it. This constituted ample ground upon which to base the verdict and judgment, and is supported by other evidence of the defendant's false representations and manipulations in the realms of "high finance," from all of which we think the jury wholly justified in convicting him.

The judgment and order denying the motion for new trial are affirmed.

HESLIN v. LAPHAM. (Civ. 5030.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 18, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 704(2)—Appellate court will not determine that trial court erred in construing contract, where intent of parties is not clear, and evidence of circumstances is not before it (Civ. Code, § 1647; Code Civ. Proc. § 1860).

Appellate court will not determine that trial court erred in construing contract to construct addition to building, where intent of parties is not clear from language of writing, and evidence of circumstances, admissible under Civ. Code, § 1647, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1860, is not before it.

2. Limitation of actions $\hookrightarrow$ 24(2)—Defendant's "general conditions and specifications" for constructing sun porch held to create binding obligation on both parties which was founded on such writing as to defendant (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1).

Instrument entitled "General conditions and specifications for construction of sun porch for garage," followed by detailed description of work and materials and statement of price, held to create binding obligation on both parties, which as to defendant who signed it was founded on such writing within Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, as to limitation of actions so founded, as "general conditions" referred to conditions under which he would perform, and "specifications" to detailed statement.

3. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 694(1)—Where evidence was not brought up on appeal, its sufficiency to support finding against defense that action was barred by two-year statute of limitations cannot be questioned (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, and section 339, subd. 1).

Where defendant appealed on judgment roll, and evidence was not brought up, its sufficiency to support finding against defense that action was barred by two-year statute of limitation (Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1) cannot be questioned, since it cannot be said that there was no evidence to justify finding that four-year statute (section 337, subd. 1) applied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by L. Heslin against R. E. Lapham. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Marvin C. Hix, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Grover O'Connor, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An action for damages upon a contract for the construction of additions to a building. Judgment was entered for plaintiff, from which defendant has appealed upon the judgment roll, his grounds for reversal being that the action was not one upon a contract, obligation, or liability founded upon an instrument in writing, as found by the trial court, and was therefore barred under subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It was found, in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, that a contract in writing was entered into between the parties, by which appellant agreed to construct certain additions to a garage owned by respondent; that the latter paid a portion of the consideration for performance; that appellant partially performed, but failed of full performance, to the damage of respondent in the sum of $300. It was further found that the writing hereinafter considered was executed by appellant alone, and was the only writing between the parties. The evidence taken at the trial was not brought up on appeal.

[1] It is contended by appellant that the language of the writing is not sufficient to express the terms of a contract or create an obligation or liability within the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The material portions of the writing are brief. Following the initial paragraph, which read, "General conditions and specifications for construction of sun porch for garage," was set forth a detailed description of the work to be done and the materials to be used, concluding with the following: "Price complete, $685." "Double French doors in rear of house, $78"—the writing being subscribed by appellant. The trial court construed this writing to express a promise to perform the work described in consideration of that of respondent to pay upon completion of the work the sum therefor stated therein. The intention not being clear from the language of the writing, for its proper construction the circumstances under which it was written might properly have been considered by that court. Civ. Code, § 1647; Code Civ. Proc. § 1860. As said in Eulless v. Westphal (Cal. App.) 235 P. 742, it is the function of the trial court to determine the meaning and effect of an alleged contract in the light of all the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence; and when its meaning is doubtful it cannot be said on appeal that the conclusion of the trial court was incorrect when none of the evidence is before the appellate court.

[2] Aside from any facts and circumstances which may have been considered by the trial court in that connection, it appears to us as a fair conclusion that by the use of the words "general conditions" was meant the conditions under which appellant was willing to perform, namely, an acceptance by respondent and the payment of the price fixed therefor, and that the word "specifications"—the meaning of which is well settled in connection with building contracts—referred to the detailed statement of the materials to be used and the manner of performing the work. Nave v. McGrane, 113 P. 82, 85, 19 Idaho, 111;

Fowler v. Bushby, 125 N. Y. S. 890, 69 Misc. Rep. 341. While the cause of action is not founded upon an instrument in writing within the meaning of subdivision 1 of section 337, Code of Civil Procedure, unless the writing contains the promise for the nonperformance of which the action is brought (Scrivner v. Woodward, 73 P. 863, 139 Cal. 314), in O'Brien v. King, 164 P. 631, 174 Cal. 769, it was held that, where the promise might be inferred from the language of the writing, the action was brought within the section. In this case was cited and quoted with approval that part of the decision in Reyburn v. Casey, 29 Mo. 129, which reads as follows:

"The broad and comprehensive language of the statute evidently embraces all kinds of written instruments, without regard to their mere form or phraseology, which imply a promise or agreement to pay money, and is not restricted to such as have the requisites of promissory notes or to such instruments as contain an express promise * * * on their face to pay,"

—the court in its decision stating the rule that in determining whether a promise or obligation is shown by a writing all promises or obligations must be regarded as contained therein which the words necessarily import, therein distinguishing those merely implied by law (i. e., quasi contracts), as held in Scrivner v. Woodward, supra.

The language of the writing in the present case fairly supports the conclusion that an offer was thereby intended to be expressed, which offer, as impliedly found, was accepted by respondent and was acted on by both parties. These facts created an obligation which, as to appellant, was expressed by and founded upon the writing (Bloom v. Hazzard, 37 P. 1037, 104 Cal. 310), and likewise created an obligation which was binding upon respondent (Heffernan v. Davis, 140 P. 716, 24 Cal. App. 295; Gallagher v. Equitable Gas Light Co., 75 P. 329, 141 Cal. 699, 706).

[3] The defense that the action was barred under the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure was pleaded by the answer, upon which plea the court found against appellant. It is contended by the latter that the court, having expressly found that the contract was in writing, and that the only writing executed by either party was that signed by appellant, it follows that the finding on the plea mentioned was based solely upon the conclusion of the court that the writing was an instrument within the meaning of subdivision 1 of section 337, Code of Civil Procedure. We cannot say, however, the evidence not being before us, that this finding was not otherwise supported by evidence adduced at the trial. That a contract for the work described at the price mentioned was entered into by the parties is admitted by the pleadings, one of appellant's defenses to the action being that the contract was oral, and therefore barred by the statute. As said in Murphy v. Stelling, 97 P. 672, 8 Cal. App. 702, 706 (an appeal upon the judgment roll), the evidence not being before the court, a finding against a plea of the statute would be supported by evidence that the defendant was absent from the state for a sufficient time to prevent the running of the statute; and in the instant case, for the same reason, it cannot be said that the writing, if determined not to be sufficient within the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 337, Code of Civil Procedure, was the only evidence upon which the court based its finding against the plea. As held in Archer v. Harvey, 128 P. 410, 164 Cal. 274, 276, where the evidence is not brought up on appeal, its sufficiency to support a finding against the bar of the statute cannot be questioned.

The judgment is affirmed.

AUSTIN v. BULLION. (Civ. 5543.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 24, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 19, 1926.)

Frauds, statute of § 118(5) — Exclusion of written agreement to lease for indefiniteness of description held erroneous, in view of offer to prove contemporaneous execution of definite plat agreed to.

In action for damages for refusal to execute lease, exclusion from evidence for indefiniteness of description of written agreement to lease held erroneous, in view of offer to prove by competent witnesses that, contemporaneously with execution of agreement, definite plat was drawn showing outline and boundaries of property to be leased, and that parties agreed thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Leo Austin against A. H. Bullion for damages for refusal to execute a lease. From a judgment of dismissal on granting motion for nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; WASTE, C. J., and SHENK, J., dissenting.

Albert I. Loeb, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter E. Dorn, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment against him in an action for damages for refusal to execute a lease to a certain store in San Francisco, Cal. The contract forming the basis of the action is as follows:

"Received of Leo Austin the sum of four hundred ($400.00) dollars, being a deposit of the first month's rent to secure a lease of the center store at No. 220 Post street, for a term of ten (10) years at a monthly rental of four hundred ($400) dollars.

"Said store is to have a frontage of 8 feet running back 22 feet and then widening out to 10 feet for the balance of the depth which extends to rear street. Delivery of premises to be made any time when ready, but in no event to be later than September 1st, 1921. Said premises to be used as a linen, silk, and lace shop.

"Owner to install modern front and put the premises in good condition. Tenant agrees to deposit the sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars with the owner to secure the lease; interest at the rate of four (4) per cent. per annum to be allowed the tenant on said money.

"This deposit is accepted subject to the owner's approval, and if this proposition is not accepted by him, said deposit is to be returned and accepted by said Leo Austin when tendered.

"Harrigan-Weidenmuller Co.,

"By L. A. Weidenmuller."

"The above proposition is accepted by me subject to the understanding that the lease is to contain all provisions protecting lessor's rights and interests as are customary in leases generally drawn by owners.

"[Signed] A. H. Bullion."

When plaintiff sought to introduce in evidence the foregoing instrument, it was objected to because of the indefiniteness of the description, the objection was sustained, and, later, defendant's motion for nonsuit was granted.

The only point involved upon the appeal is as to the sufficiency of the contract between the parties. The trial court based its conclusion upon the case of Rohan v. Proctor, 214 P. 986, 61 Cal. App. 447. In that case the uncertainty had reference to the beginning of the term of the lease. As stated in the opinion, this uncertainty arose primarily out of the fact that alterations and improvements were to be made by the landlord before the tenant could enter into the occupation and beneficial use of the premises, and that the writing did not contain a definite description of what said improvements were to consist of, nor did it contain a fixed date when such improvements were to be completed. The court stated that, the landlord having agreed to make alterations and improvements in the premises for the tenant's uses, without specifying in the writing what those alterations and improvements were to consist of, the uncertainty in that respect was one which might have been removed by oral evidence as to the kind and character of the alterations and improvements which were within the contemplation and understanding of the parties to the written agreement at the time it was made. The case was decided against the plaintiff upon the point that his pleading disclosed that there was no understanding and agreement between the parties upon this matter at the time the contract was entered into, but that such oral understanding and agreement was reached subsequently and was not a part of the original agreement.

The instant case is free the objection pointed out in the case of Rohan v. Proctor, supra, for we find that, at the time of offering the written instrument in evidence, the plaintiff also offered to prove, by competent witnesses, that, contemporaneously with the execution of the agreement, a definite plat was drawn showing the outline and boundaries of the property to be leased, and that the parties then agreed upon those boundaries and fixed them with absolute certainty. This offer, assuredly, takes the case out of the operation of the rule applied in the case last cited, and brings it clearly within the general rule announced therein.

Consequently, the refusal to receive the evidence of the written contract and the contemporaneous oral agreement clarifying the description of the property was error, as was the granting of the motion for a nonsuit and the judgment that followed.

The judgment is reversed.

MITCHELL v. FLEMING et al. (Civ. 4144.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 22, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 17, 1926.)

1. Account stated $\S$ 18(1)—Complaint in action on account stated, alleging that account was stated between parties, and that it was agreed that certain sum should be due and unpaid to plaintiff when specified amount should have been collected by defendants, held to sufficiently plead an "account stated."

Complaint in action on account stated, alleging that on certain date an account was stated between plaintiff and defendants, and that it was then ascertained and agreed that there would be owing and unpaid to plaintiff from defendants a certain sum when a specified amount should have been collected by defendants, held to sufficiently plead an "account stated" as against defendants' contention that it was based on a contingency; an "account stated" being an agreed balance of accounts, an account which has been examined and accepted by the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Account Stated.]

2. Account stated $\S$ 4.

An account stated need not ordinarily be in writing to be valid as such.

3. Account stated 14—An account stated cannot be enforced at once, where promise to pay is conditioned for future performance.

An account stated cannot be enforced at once, where promise to pay is conditioned for future performance, but creditor must await arrival of time at which performance is promised.

4. Frauds, Statute of 44(1)—Account stated, in which time of payment is postponed for more than a year, is within statute, and must be in writing.

An account stated, under which payment is not made within a year, is within that part of the statute, which requires a promise to be in writing when it is not to be performed within a year.

5. Judgment 527—Finding in former action held not res judicata, where it went beyond judgment rendered (Code Civ. Proc. § 1911).

Recital in finding that a certain sum will be due and payable to defendants on happening of certain event held not, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1911, res judicata in subsequent action on account stated by defendants against same plaintiff, based on such sum, where such finding went beyond the judgment, which merely held that plaintiff was not indebted to defendants, and that amount claimed by defendants was not due when action was commenced.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action on an account stated by R. C. Mitchell against C. S. Fleming and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

G. C. DeGarmo and H. B. Cornell, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

William Hazlett and Merton A. Albee, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Plaintiff instituted suit against defendants for the recovery of the sum of $400. The complaint consisted of three counts; each attempting to state, in a different form from the other two, a cause of action to recover a single judgment for the amount. Plaintiff had judgment as prayed, and defendants appeal.

[1] The first cause of action attempted to be set forth in the complaint was demurred to on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the demurrer was overruled. It is now contended that the ruling was error. The first count alleges facts showing that one Parker was bound to pay to appellants, who were assignees of one McFarland, as rental under a certain sublease, the sum of $300 per month for a term of years, commencing on August 1, 1918. Then follow allegations tending to show that prior to June 25, 1918, appellants were obligated to pay to respondent the sum of $400. There is next this averment, in which is embodied the gist of the count:

"That on or about the 25th day of June, 1918, an account was stated between plaintiff and said defendants, and it was then ascertained and agreed that there would be due, owing, and unpaid to plaintiff from said defendants the sum of $400, when the sum of $5,500 should have been collected by defendants on said sublease by McFarland and to Parker, and defendants then agreed to pay said plaintiff said sum of $400 in the event and at the time as hereinbefore set forth."

Appellants contend that the first count of the complaint is insufficient, for the reason that an account stated cannot arise from an agreement which is based upon a contingency, and rely upon 1 C. J. 700; Tuggle v. Minor, 18 P. 131, 76 Cal. 96, and Baird v. Crank, 33 P. 63, 98 Cal. 293. Respondent, on the other hand, insists that these California cases show that the first count of the complaint states a cause of action. It therefore becomes necessary to determine what the two cases decide—for there are apparently no later ones in this jurisdiction on the exact point here under examination—and then to measure the effect of the questioned count by them. So far as the two cases are relied upon by appellants they announce the rule stated in the language in Corpus Juris, which appellants also cite, that is: "An account cannot be stated with regard to a debt payable on a contingency." Respondent relies upon both the cases as upholding the doctrine that, where an account is attempted to be stated in such manner as to make the agreed amount payable at a future date, it is not payable upon a contingency. He takes the position that the paragraph of the first count which states the gist of the cause of action there pleaded in effect makes the amount here in question payable at a future time, and nothing more. The rule for which respondent contends has been stated thus: "The promise, if express, need not be to pay at once; but, where the promise is to pay at a future time, a recovery cannot be had on the stated account until the expiration of such time." 1 C. J. 698. In Tuggle v. Minor, supra, the Supreme Court decided that an account stated is not rendered ineffective, where the promise is to pay "on my return from New York." In Baird v. Crank, supra, plaintiff sued to recover the sum of $500 upon an account stated, and had judgment. Upon appeal it was contended that "the evidence did not justify the finding that an account was stated between the parties, because, according to the testimony for the plaintiff, defendant was to pay the five thousand dollars upon his return to Los Angeles, and upon making a settlement there with a Mr. Jewett," who was the agent of defendant at that place. In passing upon this contention, the court said:

"The claim of plaintiff was not a debt payable on a contingency, but was clearly such a one as might be agreed upon and stated by the parties; and the facts proved by plaintiff, if true, clearly show that the transaction constituted a full and complete statement of the account. It is true that the money was to be paid when defendant should settle with Jewett, but that did not affect the statement. If two parties, having accounts between them, examine the accounts and a balance is then struck and agreed upon, and admitted to be due from one to the other, the statement is complete, though the debtor reserves the right to pay the balance at some future day."

We can perceive no difference between the present cause and Baird v. Crank, viewing the phase of the latter upon which respondent pins his faith. In that case the Supreme Court evidently regarded the agreement as to the settlement with Jewett as doing nothing more than fixing a future time at which the plaintiff's promise to pay would be fulfilled. That agreement, in our opinion, is in no wise different from the promise in the present case to pay when the collection was made from Parker. It is true that the first count of the complaint, now before us, is somewhat unusually couched, and of that fact appellants take full advantage. They point out that in the paragraph containing the reference to the account stated it is alleged that the amount sued for "would be due, owing, and unpaid," when the money due under the sublease "should have been collected," and that "defendants then agreed to pay said plaintiff" the amount. When the entire count is examined, although the pleading is not as plain as it might have been made, it exhibits clearly enough an attempt on the part of the pleader to show a present account stated; the time of payment being postponed. In support of this view it is to be observed that an allegation immediately preceding the paragraph to which we have alluded as containing the gist of the count is to the effect that appellants at the time the account is alleged to have been stated, were obligated to pay to respondent the amount for which judgment is prayed, and that the paragraph itself opens with the allegation that on a specified date "an account was stated, * * * and it was then ascertained and agreed," this language being followed by the clauses above quoted. An account stated is "an agreed balance of accounts; an account which has been examined and accepted by the parties." Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Carmichael, 173 P. 999, 178 Cal. 446. We are of the opinion that the first count of the complaint sufficiently pleads such an account.

[2-4] The second count of the complaint is based also upon an account stated, pleaded in a form somewhat different from that alleged in the first count. The evidence under the allegations concerning each of the two accounts stated was to the effect that the promise to pay was not in writing, and it is now insisted that the promise was invalid under the statute of frauds, for it appears from the record that the payments to be collected by appellants from Parker could not have been realized within a year from the alleged statement of the account. The payment of the amount contemplated by each of the alleged accounts stated was postponed, under both pleadings and evidence, until the collection from Parker should be made. It is undoubtedly the law that an account stated need not ordinarily be in writing to be valid as such (Converse v. Scott, 70 P. 13, 137 Cal. 239; Bennett v. Potter, 183 P. 156, 180 Cal. 736), but appellant contends that the promise arising from the statement of such an account, if it is not to be performed within a year, is within the statute of frauds like any other promise the performance of which, according to its tenor, is postponed for a time longer than that named. While in some states it is perhaps the law that an account stated may be enforced at once, even if the promise to pay is conditioned for future performance as the promise was in this instance (see Mattingly v. Shortell, 85 S. W. 215, 120 Ky. 52, 8 Ann. Cas. 1134), that is not the law in California. Here the creditor must await the arrival of the time at which performance is promised. Baird v. Crank, supra. We are unable to see why such a promise is not within the statute of frauds. "An account stated is a mere unperformed promise by one party to pay a stated sum to another, and it is therefore an executory contract." Bennett v. Potter, supra. "The account stated is a new and independent contract, and the whole action is based upon that contract." Converse v. Scott, supra. "There can be no doubt that a promise to pay money, as much as a promise to do any other act, after the expiration of a year, is within the statute [of frauds]." Swift v. Swift, 46 Cal. 266. It is the rule in other jurisdictions that an account stated is within that portion of the statute of frauds which requires that the promise of one to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another shall be in writing. Chace v. Trafford, 116 Mass. 529, 17 Am. Rep. 171; Martyn v. Arnold, 18 So. 791, 36 Fla. 446. We think the accounts stated here in question are within that part of the statute which requires a promise to be in writing when it is not to be performed within a year.

[5] Appellants make the point that the trial court erred in admitting certain evidence over their objection. The claim which is being pressed in the present action was the subject of litigation in a former action between the parties. Appellants and defendants here were the plaintiffs in that action, and respondent and plaintiff here was the defendant there. The claim here in suit was presented by cross-complaint or counterclaim in the former action. It appeared that the claim was being prematurely urged, and the court thereupon rendered judgment:

"That defendant R. C. Mitchell do not recover anything from plaintiffs or from either of them in this action under his counterclaim or cross-complaint herein, and that said counterclaim and cross-complaint be and the same hereby are dismissed, but without prejudice to the bringing of an action at the proper time by defendant R. C. Mitchell against plaintiffs."

The matter here set forth includes everything embraced in the judgment in the former action which refers to the claim sued on in the present action, but in its findings of fact in the earlier action the court included the following:

"The plaintiffs are not indebted to defendant R. C. Mitchell in the sum of $400, and that said sum was not due or payable at the time this action was commenced, nor at the time when said defendant filed his cross-complaint herein, but will be due and payable from plaintiffs to said defendant at the time when plaintiffs shall have collected the sum of $5,500 at the rate of $300 per month, commencing on the first day of August, 1918, as the rental payable under that certain sublease made by Charles McFarland as lessor and C. C. Parker as lessee for a part of the Copp Building in the city of Los Angeles, Cal."

It was the judgment roll in the former action, including the finding which we have just stated, that was admitted in evidence in the present action over the objection of appellants. We do not see how the ruling admitting the evidence can be upheld. Respondent insists that the recital of the finding that "the sum of $400 * * * will be due and payable * * * when plaintiffs shall have collected the sum of $5,500" from Parker is res judicata. But observe what an anomaly arises from such a contention. In the former action the court decided, in effect, that respondent here take nothing, while he insists that something of which he may now avail himself was adjudged in his favor. The court rendered judgment against respondent. He now says that a judgment was rendered against appellants. The argument is not convincing.

Respondent would support his contention under the well-known rule of law, carried into the Code of this state, that by a judgment that is adjudged which appears upon its face to have been adjudged, "or which was actually and necessarily included therein or necessary thereto." Code Civ. Proc. § 1911. But the matter in the finding which respondent would have us declare so potent had nothing whatever to do with what appears on the face of the judgment. The only portion of the finding which supports the judgment is that to the effect that the plaintiffs in the former action were not indebted to the defendant therein, and that the amount claimed was not due when the action was commenced, nor when the cross-complaint was filed. There the finding should have stopped. There, in contemplation of law, it did stop, for the remainder of it was both gratuitous and useless. The contention that the recital in the finding is res judicata is without merit.

Other points are urged upon us by appellants, but it is not necessary that they be decided. In truth, some of them are in effect determined by what has already been said.

Judgment reversed.

McOMIE v. BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF VETERANS' HOME OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3040.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 22, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨553(1)—Appellant may proceed under alternative method even where there was no reporter present at hearing (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Appellant may proceed under alternative method set out in Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, even where there was no office for reporter to perform at hearing, and consequently there was no reporter present.

2. Appeal and error ⇨612(2)—Appeal from order denying motion to set aside default will be dismissed, where record was authenticated by clerk and not by trial judge (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, from order denying motion to set aside default will be dismissed, where record was authenticated by clerk, and there was no certificate of trial judge authenticating notice, affidavit, and order, which were intended to constitute record; function of clerk bring limited to authentication of judgment roll and notice of appeal.

Action by Henry McOmie against the Board of Directors of the Veterans' Home of California and another. A default judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and defendants' motion to set aside such default was denied. On motion to dismiss defendants' appeals from the order denying motion to set aside default, and from the judgment. Granted as to the order denying motion to set aside default; denied as to appeal from judgment.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guereña and R. L. Chamberlain, Deputy Attys. Gen., for appellants.

E. L. Webber, of Napa, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $794.38 which the complaint alleges was held by the defendants in trust for one Henry McOmie, father of the plaintiff here, who, at the time said money was deposited with said defendants and at the time of his death, was an inmate of the Veterans' Home of California. The complaint alleges that the said defendants, as by the law required, are holding said sum of money until the same shall be "claimed by any heirs at law of said Henry McOmie, deceased," and that the plaintiff herein "is the only person entitled to share in any estate of said Henry McOmie, deceased, and as such is entitled to all of the moneys now held by said defendants in trust for the heirs at law of said Henry McOmie, deceased." The date of the filing of the complaint is not made to appear. The summons, however, was served on the defendants on the 9th day of March, 1925, and on the 19th day of said month of March the defendants, through the Attorney General, interposed a general demurrer to the complaint. On May 22, 1925, the court made an order overruling the demurrer, and gave the defendants ten days from the date of said order within which to answer the complaint. The defendants failed to file an answer within the time allowed by the court, and on the 9th day of June, 1925, upon the application of the plaintiff, the default of the defendants was entered and judgment entered accordingly for the sum of $794.38, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of the entry of said judgment. On the 22d day of June, 1925, the defendants gave notice of a motion to set aside said default and the judgment thereupon entered, "upon the ground that the notice of overruling the demurrer of defendants was served by mail, and that defendants' time to plead had not elapsed when said default was taken." The notice stated that it would be based "on this notice and the affidavit of R. L. Chamberlain and the records and files of the action." Certain affidavits were filed, setting forth the facts upon which the motion to set aside the default was founded, and upon the hearing of said motion the court denied the same. Thereafter the Attorney General filed a notice of motion to set aside the order denying the motion to set aside the default and in said notice stated that the same would be supported by certain affidavits and the records of the case. Said motion was subsequently heard and denied. The defendants have taken an appeal from the order denying their motion to set aside the default, and also from the judgment rendered and entered in said action upon said default. The present proceeding is a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that there is no reviewable record before the court.

[1, 2] As to the appeal from the order denying the motion of defendants to set aside the default of the defendants and the judgment thereupon entered the point is well taken. The appeal from the order was attempted to be taken under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is now by our decisions settled that even where, as here, there "is no office for the reporter (phonographic) to perform at the hearing of a motion or other proceeding, and consequently there is no reporter present, nevertheless, the appellant may proceed under the alternative method," and so prepare his record on appeal. Lake et al. v. Harris, etc. (Cal. Sup.) 243 P. 417; Pierce v. Works, 154 P. 852, 171 Cal. 684. But to authorize a review by an appellate court of a record so made up, the same must be authenticated by the trial judge and not by the clerk of the court, whose function as to records on appeal is limited to the authentication of the judgment roll and the notice of appeal. Cases above cited, and also, Muzzy v. McEwen Lumber Co., 98 P. 1062, 154 Cal. 685. The transcript in the present case, aside from the judgment roll, contains a notice of motion to set aside the default, an affidavit of a Deputy Attorney General filed in support of the motion, and the order denying the motion, but there is no certificate of the trial judge authenticating these latter papers, etc., which were intended to constitute the record on the motion to set aside the default, or (in other words) to the effect that the affidavit and other files, records, and papers, which the notice of the motion stated would be relied upon as in support of the motion, were used on the hearing and consideration thereof. In fact, though a matter of no importance here, even the clerk has not certified to the authenticity of the record on the motion or that the affidavit and other papers relied upon to support the motion were used at the hearing thereof. It follows, of course, as has been before stated, and as counsel for respondent contends, that there is no record presented to us here on the motion to set aside the default which enables this court to review the action of the court in denying the motion. Therefore the motion to dismiss the appeal from the order refusing to set aside the default and the judgment thereupon entered must be allowed. This leaves no reviewable matter before us but the judgment on the judgment roll alone, the same being authenticated by the clerk of the court.

In conformity with the requirements of the situation as above disclosed, the motion to dismiss the appeal from the order denying the motion of defendants to set aside the default entered against defendants for their failure to answer the complaint within the time allowed by the court and the judgment thereupon entered is granted, and the motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment is denied.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 22, 1926.)

Motion to dismiss appeals by defendants from an order denying motion to set aside default judgment and from the judgment of the Superior Court of Napa County, Percy S. King, Judge, in an action by heirs to recover money alleged to have been deposited. Granted as to order, and denied as to judgment.

E. L. Webber, of Napa, for respondents.

HART, J. The appeal is from an order denying a motion of defendants to set aside a default judgment and from the judgment. The plaintiffs have moved to dismiss the appeal.

The action is by a number of alleged heirs of one Sanford Search, who died on the 13th day of March, 1922, while an inmate of the State Veterans' Home, located in Napa county, to recover the sum of $868.90, which, the complaint alleges, had been deposited by deceased, while such inmate, with the defendants, and which sum, so it is alleged, "said defendants are holding until the said sum is claimed by any heirs at law of said Sanford Search, deceased." The defendants interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, the same was overruled by the court, and defendants granted ten days from the date of the order overruling the demurrer within which to file an answer. The defendants failed to file an answer within the time so allowed, and thereupon the plaintiffs applied for and took judgment by default. Subsequently, the defendants moved to set aside the default and the judgment thereupon entered, supporting the motion by the papers, records and files in the case and the affidavit of a Deputy Attorney General. The motion was denied. The defendants attempt to support the appeal from the order by a record purporting to be prepared under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appeal from the order is abortive, for the reason that there is no certificate of the trial judge authenticating the record upon the motion to open up the default and to set aside the judgment thereupon entered, or certifying that the papers, affidavit, etc., filed in support of the motion were used upon the hearing thereof. In brief, the situation here with respect to the record on appeal from the order is precisely the same as that with respect to the record on appeal from the order in McOmie v. Board of Directors of Veterans' Home et al. (Civ. No. 3040) 246 P. 155, an opinion in which was filed this day, and upon the authority of that case and the cases therein cited, the appeal from the order must be dismissed.

The judgment roll in the instant case is properly authenticated by the clerk of the court; hence the motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment must be denied. Accordingly, the motion to dismiss the appeal from the order is granted, and the motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment is denied.

PEOPLE v. DECKERT. (Cr. 1233.)

1. Witnesses $\Leftrightarrow$ 255(2)—Phonographic reporter may refresh his memory from his shorthand notes, and therefrom give testimony as to statements made by witnesses in former trial.

While generally notes or memoranda made by witness are not admissible on direct examination, it is well established that a phonographic reporter may refresh his memory from his shorthand notes, and therefrom give testimony as to statements made by witnesses in former trial.

2. Criminal law $\Leftrightarrow$ 547(2)—Shorthand reporter may read to jury his phonographic notes of testimony of witnesses taken on former trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 2047).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2047, a shorthand reporter, under appropriate circumstances, may read to jury his phonographic notes of testimony of witnesses taken on a former trial of the cause.

3. Witnesses $\Leftrightarrow$ 255(2)—Witness testifying as to statements made by defendant held properly permitted to refresh his memory by reading to jury transcribed notes of shorthand reporter, made at his direction and request at time statements were made (Code Civ. Proc. § 2047).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2047, witness testifying in murder trial as to statements made by defendant was properly permitted to refresh his memory by reading to the jury from transcribed notes of the shorthand reporter, where it appeared from preliminary testimony that defendant's statement was taken by stenographer at witness' request; that stenographic notes were written within a few hours after made; and that witness immediately read transcript, and knew it was correct.

4. Criminal law $\Leftrightarrow$ 1169(2)—Permitting witness to read into evidence transcribed notes of shorthand reporter of defendant's statement, if error, held harmless, where there was further evidence that on later hour on same day defendant repeated statement to other persons.

In prosecution for murder, permitting witness to read into testimony transcribed notes made by shorthand reporter as to defendant's statement, if error, held harmless, where it further appeared in evidence that at a later hour on same day defendant repeated statement in substance to others.

5. Witnesses $\S$ 380(5) — Where district attorney was surprised and misled by failure of witnesses to testify in accordance with former statements to him, he could impeach testimony and refresh witnesses' memories by reading to jury certain statements theretofore made by them (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2049).

Where district attorney was surprised and misled by testimony of state's witnesses given in variance with previous statements made by them to district attorney, district attorney, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2049, could impeach the testimony by such witnesses and refresh their memories by reading to the jury certain statements made theretofore by each of such witnesses respectively.

6. Witnesses $\S$ 386—Difference between testimony of state witness and his former statement regarding ownership of gun by defendant, and as to whether it was loaded, held damaging to prosecution, authorizing impeachment of witness.

In murder prosecution, difference between testimony of state's witness and his former statement regarding the ownership of a gun by defendant, and as to whether it was loaded, held damaging to prosecution authorizing impeachment of witness, in view of defendant's testimony denying ownership of gun or that he had any cartridges.

7. Witnesses $\S$ 386—Discrepancy in testimony of state's witnesses as to hour at which they had seen defendant with former statement held damaging to prosecution, where defense was alibi, authorizing their impeachment.

In murder prosecution, discrepancy in testimony of state's witnesses as to time they had seen defendant with statement formerly made to district attorney held damaging to prosecution, in view of fact that defense was alibi, and authorized their impeachment by showing discrepancy of testimony with former statements.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 1170½(1)—No harm held to have resulted to defendant by reason of attempted impeachment of state witness by state's attorney, where testimony was materially same as statement made to district attorney.

In murder prosecution, where state's witness testified that in telephone conversation with defendant defendant had inquired, "Any one there?" and he had replied, "Yes, the cops," held that such testimony was substantially similar to former statement made to prosecuting attorney that defendant had asked, "Is any one else there?" to which he replied, "Yes, the cops," and hence attempted impeachment of witness by prosecuting attorney did not result in any harm to defendant.

9. Witnesses $\S$ 386—Discrepancy between testimony of state's witness as to defendant's appearance shortly after murder with former statement to prosecuting attorney held damaging, and to authorize his impeachment.

In murder prosecution, testimony of state's witness that shortly after murder defendant's manner was ordinarily as it always had been held damaging to prosecution, where, in former statement to prosecuting attorney, he had stated that defendant "appeared slightly nervous" at that time, and impeachment of witness by state's attorney was authorized.

10. Witnesses $\S$ 386—Where witness simply fails to testify to all that party calling him expects but has not given testimony against him, it is not permissible to prove witness had previously made statements which would tend to make out his case.

Where witness, called by a party, simply fails to testify to all that party expects or desires, but has not given testimony against him, it is not permissible for party calling him to prove witness had previously made statements which, if sworn to at trial, would tend to make out his case.

11. Witnesses $\S$ 255(9)—Where witness testified he did not recall conversation between him and defendant, district attorney did not commit error in eliciting such conversation by permitting witness to read transcript of his former statement to refresh memory and questioning him with respect thereto.

In murder prosecution, where state's witness testified he did not recall a certain conversation between him and defendant as to defendant's wanting to stay with witness on a particular night, and being tired, held, there was no error committed by prosecuting attorney in eliciting such conversation by permitting witness to read transcript of statement he formerly made for purpose of refreshing his memory, and then questioning him relative to such statements.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 1186(4)—Alleged error by district attorney in manner of eliciting from his own witness statements made by defendant to him as to wanting to stay with witness, and being tired, held immaterial, where there was direct evidence received that defendant did stay with witness on night in question (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

In murder prosecution, where there was direct evidence received that up to the time of his arrest defendant did remain with state's witness on a particular night, held that any error committed by district attorney in eliciting information from state's witness as to his conversation with defendant as to wanting to stay all night with witness, or whether defendant was tired, was immaterial, and not reversible error, in view of Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½.

13. Criminal law $\S$ 1178—Specification of error in permitting witness to testify as to time and distance it took him to travel over route taken by defendant, which was neither supported by argument nor authority, deemed abandoned.

In murder prosecution, specification of error that trial court erred in permitting witness to testify as to time and distance it took him to travel over route taken by defendant deemed abandoned, where neither supported by argument nor authority other than mere statement that such evidence was an attempt to prove an experiment, and was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Matthew Deckert was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry C. Huntington, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of murder, and sentenced to life imprisonment. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Because of the fact that no claim is made by appellant that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, it becomes unnecessary to make a statement of what was shown by the evidence produced by the prosecution other than so much thereof as may be pertinent to illustrate such points as are raised by appellant as grounds for a reversal of the judgment.

Appellant's first specification of prejudicial error, alleged by him to have been committed by the trial court, is that, over the objection of defendant, the district attorney was permitted to refresh the memory of a certain witness introduced by the prosecution as to conversation had in his presence with defendant by reading into the record from a transcript of stenographic notes which were taken by a stenographer who was present at the time such statements were made.

Section 2047 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a witness may be "allowed to refresh his memory respecting a fact, by anything written by himself, or under his direction, at the time when the fact occurred, or immediately thereafter, or at any other time when the fact was fresh in his memory, and he knew that the same was correctly stated in the writing. * * *

It appears that on the morning following the day on which the crime was committed defendant made a statement covering some 35 or 40 pages of the record on appeal, which statement was elicited by means of questions which were propounded to him by two police officers and a deputy district attorney, and which questions and the answers thereto were "taken down in shorthand," and within a few hours thereafter transcribed on a typewriter.

The witness who gave testimony with reference to such statement by defendant, in response to the question as to whether the statement was taken under the direction of the witness, testified that it was done at his request; that on the same day, and "after the statement was taken down in shorthand and written in typewriting," he had read it, and found that it was "a true transcription of the statement that was given"; and that at the time he gave his testimony, in order to refresh his memory as to what the defendant had said, it would be necessary for the witness to read such statement. The witness then proceeded to read the statement to the jury—the situation, as expressed by the court, being that "the witness is reading from this statement his recollection of what occurred."

[1] While as a general rule notes or memoranda made by a witness are not admissible on direct examination, it would seem to be well established that a phonographic reporter may refresh his memory from his shorthand notes, and therefrom give testimony as to statements made by witnesses in former trials. People v. Ammerman, 50 P. 15, 118 Cal. 23; People v. Sexton, 64 P. 107, 132 Cal. 37; People v. Vogel, 171 P. 978, 36 Cal. App. 216; Benton v. Benton, 63 P. 775, 131 Cal. 472.

And it has been held that the shorthand reporter may read his notes by questions and answers. In the case of Watrous v. Cunningham, 11 P. 811, 71 Cal. 30, error was predicated upon the fact that the stenographic reporter was permitted to read by question and answer the testimony of a witness taken in a former trial of the cause. In ruling that no error was thus committed, the court said:

"That was not allowing the testimony of Campbell in shorthand to be read as a deposition, but was permitting Hood, who could recollect the testimony given on a former trial of the same cause, to state from such recollection, refreshed by the reading of his shorthand notes, what Campbell (who at the time of the present trial was without the jurisdiction of the court) had formerly sworn to in the reporter's hearing. And such action of the court was proper."

In Burbank v. Dennis, 35 P. 444, 449, 101 Cal. 90, 104, where a similar situation was presented, the court used the following language:

"But the question here presented is whether the reporter, not having a definite and well-defined recollection of the statements so made after he had refreshed his recollection as far as possible from the writing, will be allowed to read the contents of the memoranda to the court. There appears to be some difference of opinion among courts and law writers as to the proper practice at common law. But under our statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 2047) the course here adopted is expressly allowed. In the case of People v. Lem You [32 P. 11] 97 Cal. 224, the practice was approved as justified by the foregoing provision of the Code. And in the case of People v. Gardner [32 P. 880] 98 Cal. 127, the identical question was presented, and this court said: 'The remaining objection to the admission of the evidence of the witness, Briar, does not seem to be well founded, in view of the last provision of section 2047 of the Code of Civil Procedure.' Appellant's contention that the reporter's original notes are the basis from which he should have been required to refresh his recollection will not be considered, as such objection was not brought to the attention of the trial court. However, we do not intimate there is any merit in the point."

In the case of People v. Lem You, 32 P. 11, 97 Cal. 224, it was expressly held that it was proper to permit a phonographic reporter to read testimony to the jury from his shorthand notes.

In the case of People v. Sexton, 64 P. 107, 132 Cal. 37, the instant point was considered, and it was said:

"The stenographer had the right to read from her notes of his evidence taken at the time, if she was so inclined. The statute contemplates that she may thus refresh her recollection."

[2] It would thus appear to be settled that, at least so far as a shorthand reporter is concerned, in appropriate circumstances, no valid objection can be raised to the reading by him to the jury of his phonographic notes of testimony of witnesses taken on a former trial of the cause. The situation here presented goes but one step farther. The statute (section 2047, Code Civ. Proc.) under which the basic authority is found for permitting a shorthand reporter to read his stenographic notes to the jury provides, in substance, that a witness may refresh his memory by anything written by himself, or under his direction, etc. The witness who read the transcription of the stenographic notes here under consideration testified preliminarily that the statement made by the defendant was taken by the stenographer at the request of the witness; that the stenographic notes were typewritten within a few hours after they were made; that the witness immediately read such transcription, and knew that it was correct, and that on the trial of the action, in order to refresh his memory, it would be necessary for the witness to read from such transcribed notes. The witness, therefore, occupied a position similar in all respects to that which would have been presented had the shorthand reporter read from the transcript—the only difference being that the shorthand reporter would have been the person who made the stenographic notes—and that condition is covered by the circumstance, as provided by the statute, in that the writing was prepared under the direction or request of the witness.

In the case of People v. Brown, 84 P. 670, 3 Cal. App. 178, it was held:

"There was no error in permitting a witness to refresh his memory from a memorandum written under his direction at a time when the facts were fresh in his memory and he knew that the same were correctly stated in the writing."

In Estate of Moore, 182 P. 285, 291, 180 Cal. 570, 584, a witness was shown a transcript of a bill of exceptions setting forth what purported to be the testimony theretofore given by another person in another trial. The witness (Mr. Olney) testified that he recognized the bill of exceptions as containing a correct statement of what transpired in court at the time stated in the document; and that the witness had himself prepared the bill of exceptions while its contents were fresh in his memory, "using the court reporter's notes to check it." In the course of the opinion, among other things, the court said:

"The court refused to allow the witness, testifying from the document, to state what Mr. Moore testified to while on the witness stand on the occasion indicated and also denied the offer of defendant to put parts of the transcript in evidence to show the date and nature of the proceeding and Mr. Moore's testimony. Mr. Olney's testimony was clearly admissible. Code Civ. Proc. § 2047. Respondents' counsel concede that perhaps the reporter who made and transcribed the notes of Mr. Moore's testimony would be permitted to read from his transcript, but deny that anyone else might do so. They also call attention to the fact that the transcript did not purport to contain all the testimony of the witness. Both contentions are without force."

[3, 4] In reason and in the light of the authorities heretofore cited herein, the contention of counsel that error was committed by the trial court in thus permitting defendant's statement to be read to the jury (in connection with and as a part of the testimony of the witness) cannot be sustained. But, even though the practice of permitting a witness, circumstanced as was the witness as to whose testimony complaint is here made, to read into evidence the transcribed notes made by a shorthand reporter might be open to question, if further appears in evidence in the instant case, without contradiction, that at a later hour on the same day the defendant repeated the statement in substance to other persons. It is therefore apparent that in any event defendant was in nowise harmed by the reading of defendant's first statement by the witness to whom reference has been had.

It is next urged by appellant that the trial court erred in permitting the prosecution, over the objection of defendant, to cross-examine and to impeach certain witnesses called on behalf of the prosecution, and (for the purpose of refreshing the memories of such witnesses as well as to impeach them) to read to the jury certain statements theretofore made by each of such witnesses respectively.

Considering the point as to the testimony given by each of the several witnesses, it may be noted that as to the first witness he had testified that at a time approximately ten days before the murder occurred a certain "gun" belonging to defendant was either loaded, or that cartridges for it were produced at that time. Whereupon the deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution directed the attention of the witness to the fact that on a former occasion he had stated that the "gun" "was loaded—all but one chamber." Thereupon the witness stated that:

"A. My best recollection is that there were loads for the revolver. They were probably in the chambers, but I would not want to say with certainty at this time, because my memory is not entirely clear."

As to the second and third witnesses, each of whom was similarly impeached, it appears that he had testified to having seen defendant at a given place at a certain named hour; whereas in the statement theretofore made by the witness to the district attorney he had placed the occurrence as having happened at a different hour.

Regarding the testimony of the fourth witness, it appears that in narrating an alleged telephonic conversation had between him and defendant the witness stated that in the course of such conversation defendant had inquired, "Any one there?" and that he had replied, "Yes, the cops." The former statement made by the witness was that defendant had asked, "Is there anyone else there?" to which question the witness had replied, "Yes, the cops."

The difference between the testimony given by the fifth witness and the statement which theretofore he had made to the district attorney consisted in that, in regard to the manner of defendant shortly after the time when the murder was committed, the witness testified that "his manner was ordinarily as it always was at that time"; while in the statement made to the district attorney the witness had stated, "Well, he appeared slightly nervous."

On a separate occasion, the same witness had testified that he did not recall a certain conversation between him and defendant; whereupon the deputy district attorney, after inquiring of him if he had not just refreshed his recollection, asked whether defendant had said anything to the witness "about wanting to stay there all night," and "whether or not he was tired," to which questions the witness replied that—

"Oh, yes; he said he was going to stay there; wanted to stay there that night. * * * He said he was tired; he had done a lot of walking, or had a long walk."

Section 2049 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that—

"The party producing a witness * * * may contradict him by other evidence, and may also show that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony. * * *"

In the case of Zipperlen v. Southern Pacific Co., 93 P. 1049, 1054, 7 Cal. App. 206, 216, the rule is laid down that, in order to thus impeach one's own witness, it must appear that the witness has given testimony damaging to the party producing him, and that such party "has been misled and taken by surprise, and that he had reason to believe that the witness would give testimony favorable to his side." See, also, Rystinki v. California Traction Co., 165 P. 952, 175 Cal. 336; People v. Mallicoat, 149 P. 1000, 27 Cal. App. 355.

[5] As reflecting upon the testimony given by each of the several witnesses to which attention has been directed, it will at once appear that, because of the fact that in each instance the witness admitted having made the former statement to the district attorney, that official was justified in believing that on the trial of the action the witness would testify to the same effect as he had formerly declared to the district attorney, were the facts within his knowledge, and, consequently, that the failure of the witness to so testify had both misled and surprised the district attorney. In such circumstances the right of the prosecution to impeach the testimony of the witness is fully sustained by the cases of People v. Ross, 46 P. 1059, 115 Cal. 233, and People v. Bushton, 22 P. 127, 549, 80 Cal. 160. The propriety of the procedure adopted by the district attorney in the instant case is illustrated in the case of People v. Durrant, 48 P. 75, 84, 116 Cal. 179, 214, where it is said:

"When a witness called by a party fails to testify to matters previously within his recollection, or gives evidence in apparent variance with that formerly given, it is not incumbent upon the party producing the witness to wait for the assaults of the cross-examination to expose seeming inconsistencies and discrepancies. While he may not impeach his witness (saving under certain exceptional circumstances), he may with propriety refresh his recollection, to the end that the witness and his present evidence may both be put fairly and in their proper light before the jury."

[6] Considering, then, the point as to whether the several witnesses had given testimony which was damaging to the prosecution: In the statement made by defendant, he had denied that he owned a "gun," or that he had any cartridges. The damage to the prosecution resulting from the difference in the testimony of the witness and his former statement regarding the ownership of a "gun" by defendant, and as to whether it was loaded, would be that, if the witness had testified in accordance with the statement made by him to the district attorney, as a matter of fact defendant would have been shown to have been the owner of a "gun" within a short time next preceding the date when the murder was committed. In addition thereto, it would thus appear that defendant had made false statements with reference to the ownership by him of a weapon capable of producing the injury which resulted in the death of the person who was murdered, and by reason thereof the credibility to be attached to the testimony given by defendant would be seriously affected.

[7] The defense relied upon by defendant consisted of an alibi. It was of importance to such defense that his presence at a given place and at a certain fixed time of day be established. In order that evidence of that nature might be successfully rebutted, the prosecution relied upon the testimony of certain witnesses, including those whose testimony was sought to be impeached, by showing a state of facts differing from the evidence given by defendant with relation to his alibi. If such witnesses produced by the prosecution failed to testify in accordance with their respective former statements made by them to the district attorney, and by such failure in a measure corroborated the evidence offered by defendant, the damage to the prosecution would be apparent. It was, therefore, advisable, if not necessary, that the attention of the witnesses be called to the discrepancy existing in their several statements, to the end that their memories might possibly be refreshed, and, failing therein, that the position assumed by the district attorney in introducing such witnesses might be placed in a proper light before the jury.

[8] Regarding the fourth witness for the prosecution, whose testimony was sought to be impeached, there is no material difference between the statement which the witness made to the district attorney and the testimony given by the witness on the trial of the action. It is clear that no harm could have resulted to defendant by reason of the attempted impeachment of the witness.

[9] The matter to which the attention of the fifth witness for the prosecution was directed related to the manner of the witness shortly after the murder had occurred. If, as the witness had stated to the district attorney, defendant "appeared slightly nervous" at the time in question, such nervousness might be taken as an indication of a guilty conscience. On the other hand, if, as the witness testified, "his manner was ordinarily as it always was at that time," a clear conscience on the part of defendant might be indicated. The resultant damage to the prosecution by reason of the alteration in the declaration of the witness becomes at once apparent.

[10, 11] As to the specification of error resulting from impeachment of the same witness because of his lack of memory of the facts to which his attention was directed, it is unquestionable that the law as expressed in the authorities sustains appellant's position that—

"Where a witness called by a party has simply failed to testify to all that party expected or desired, but has not given testimony against him, it is not permissible for the party calling him to prove that such witness had previously made statements which, if sworn to at the trial, would tend to make out his case." People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 529, 532, 75 P. 101, 102.

See, also, Estate of DeLaveaga, 133 P. 307, 165 Cal. 607, 631.

The circumstances surrounding the matter to which appellant refers, however, were not such as to indicate that the rule announced in People v. Creeks, supra, is applicable. The transcript of the court reporter's notes taken on the trial of the case shows that on the direct examination of the witness he was asked to relate a conversation had between him and defendant, and for the purpose of refreshing the memory of the witness he was permitted to read to himself, and not to the jury, a transcription of the statement which he had formerly made to the district attorney, after which the following questions and answers appear in the record:

"Q. What was the conversation? A. I don't know what the conversation was now.

"Q. Well, didn't you just refresh your recollection? A. Yes, but I don't understand that. I can't—

"Q. Well, did Mr. Deckert say to you anything about wanting to stay there all night? A. Oh, yes; he said he was going to stay there; wanted to stay there that night.

"Q. Did he say anything to you about whether or not he was tired? A. Yes; he said he was tired, he done a lot of walking, or had a long walk."

[12] It thus appears that, after the witness had properly refreshed his recollection, and likewise had had his attention called to a particular part of the conversation, he made the statement to which the criticism of appellant is directed. No attempt on the part of the district attorney was made to prove that the witness had "previously made statements which, if sworn to at the trial, would tend to make out his case." People v. Creeks, 75 P. 101, 102, 141 Cal. 529, 531. There was nothing improper in the course pursued by the district attorney in eliciting from the witness the statement here under consideration. Moreover, we are not prepared to reach the conclusion that a miscarriage of justice resulted, even though it might be assumed that the jury could properly receive evidence that defendant wished to "stay there (with the witness) that night," and that defendant said "he was tired; he had done a lot of walking, or had a long walk." Direct evidence was received that up to the time of his arrest defendant did remain with the witness on that night. That feature of the evidence having been otherwise admitted without objection, any question of its introduction on the occasion referred to in appellant's specifications becomes immaterial. With reference to the testimony that defendant said "he was tired; he had done a lot of walking, or had a long walk," while it may have had a bearing upon the question of defendant's guilt, it was not of so great importance as that its omission from the evidence could have produced any change in the verdict, and consequently did not result in a miscarriage of justice. In accordance, therefore, with the constitutional provision, section 4½, article 6, affecting errors of the nature of that here presented, the judgment cannot be set aside, nor a new trial granted because of such assumed error.

[13] Appellant's final assault upon the judgment herein consists in a specification of error on the part of the trial court in permitting a witness "to testify over defendant's objection to time and distance it took him to travel over the route taken by defendant, according to the defendant's statement to the district attorney." In support of his contention, neither argument nor authority is presented by appellant other than the mere statement that such evidence "was an attempt to prove an experiment, and was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial," in view of which it must be assumed that appellant has abandoned the point.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record, it is ordered that the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial be and the same are affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff, as assignee, sued for commissions alleged to have been earned by his assignor in negotiating the sale of a hotel. The defendant filed an answer in which he denied the allegations of the complaint, and he also filed a cross-complaint. The cross-complaint was answered, and on the issues so made a trial was had in the lower court before the court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings of fact in favor of the defendant, and from a judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The appeal involves the question as to whether the sale fell through by reason of the act of the vendor or by reason of the act of the vendee. The property involved consisted of the business and the furnishings of the Glencairn Inn, located at 815 Bush street. Prior to December 28, 1923, the defendant was the lessee of the building and the owner of the business and furnishings, and the property was mortgaged to Alta M. Bates by and under the terms of a mortgage executed on the 23d day of May, 1923, to secure the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $2,500. On the 28th day of December, 1923, the vendor by a written authorization employed plaintiff's assignor to negotiate a sale of his interest. Later the agent caused the parties to sign an executory agreement as follows:

"San Francisco, Cal., Dec. 28, 1923.

"I, a purchaser, ready, willing and able to perform this agreement, hereby deposit with Paramount Realty Co. the sum of five hundred ($500.00) dollars as part payment of the purchase price of the Glen Carin Inn, consisting of all furniture furnishings, stock, equipment pertaining thereto as per inventory to be attached to agreement of sale together with leasehold interest thereof. Lease has about three years and nine months to run. Located at 815 Bush street in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, owned by W. J. Smith and listed by said owner thereof with Paramount Realty Co. as the agent for the sale thereof under a contract dated December 28, 1923, and hereby agree to buy said property upon the following terms and conditions, to wit: The full purchase price of said property to be $6,400.00 the sum of $3,100.00 consisting of $600.00 in cash and mortgage for the amount of $2,500.00 described below, cash to be paid on or before January 2, 1924, and agreement of sale to be executed and delivered by said owner upon the following conditions: Free and clear of incumbrances excepting chattel mortgage on personal property, to secure the lease of the Glen Carin Inn. Balance of thirty three hundred ($3,300.00) dollars due on said purchase price the undersigned purchaser agrees to pay at the rate of one hundred ($100.00) dollars a month graduating to one hundred and twenty-five ($125.00) six months thereafter and one hundred fifty ($150.00) dollars a month twelve months thereafter, first payment to commence thirty days after taking possession of said hotel. Interest on all deferred payments at the rate of six per cent. (6%) per annum. The purchaser agrees to assign all of her right, title and interest of that certain mortgage hereto attached, to the amount of $2,500.00 to W. J. Smith (the seller). Said mortgage executed on the 23d day of May, 1923, by and between Frank and Ruby Cummings to Alta M. Bates and recorded on June 9, 1923, at recorder's office, San Luis Obispo, Cal. No. 2365. It is expressly understood that this agreement contains all conditions upon which I am to purchase said property and no representations or conditions are to be considered at any time, for any purpose, which are not set forth.

"In the event I fail to complete the purchase as hereinafter stated, the said sum of $500.00 deposited as aforesaid shall be retained by said agent for the owner of said property, and is hereby fixed as the amount of damage sustained by my breach hereof, as it is impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the actual amount, it being expressly understood, however, in consideration hereof, that the owner of said property shall forbear the bringing of any action against me by reason of my breach of this agreement.

"Time is the essence of this agreement.

"[Signed] Alta M. Bates.

"Witness: [Name undecipherable.]

"Approved and ratified by W. J. Smith."

[1] When the paper was signed by the parties the vendee delivered to plaintiff's assignor for the account of the vendor $500 and the mortgage. The agent delivered to the vendor for examination the mortgage, but without the note, the payment of which the mortgage was executed to secure. About the same date the vendee attended at the hotel to take an inventory. While the inventory was being taken the vendor commenced to examine the validity of the mortgage, and, on learning that the mortgage note had not been tendered, he stopped the taking of the inventory. Later the vendee produced the note, and the vendor testified that thereupon he notified the vendee to proceed with the taking of the inventory. As stated by the trial court: "He (the vendor) did not refuse it (the mortgage); he simply investigated it, as he had the right to do. * * *" In re Pearsons, 33 P. 451, 98 Cal. 603, 613. In accordance with that ruling the trial court made its findings. The most that can be said in behalf of the appellant is that there were some conflicts in the testimony, but those conflicts were addressed to the trial court for solution. Under the record as made we may not disturb its ruling thereon.

[2, 3] The appellant calls attention to the fact that the parties executed the written instrument which we have quoted above. Thereupon the appellant makes the contention that the act of the vendor in executing that writing constituted an acceptance of the vendee as a purchaser, and that the vendor is estopped from questioning the fact that the vendee was able, ready, and willing to purchase. Freeman v. Creelman, 212 P. 56, 60 Cal. App. 14, 24, and cases there cited. The appellant never presented grounds for this contention in his pleading nor in any other form in the trial court, and presents the point in this court for the first time. In the trial court the appellant assumed that it rested with him to prove that the vendee was ready, able, and willing, and proceeded to introduce evidence on those issues. Later the respondent, without objection by the appellant, introduced his evidence in reply. Furthermore the doctrine of the case last cited never applies in the presence of fraud, and it cannot be said that the appellant's assignor was wholly clear of the charge of fraud. It was the agent of the vendor. As such agent it received $500 for respondent's account. It was authorized to sell the vendor's property for a consideration including a mortgage for $2,500. In execution of that authorization it attempted to turn over to the vendor the mortgage without the note—a hollow performance. When the respondent demanded the note and stopped the proceedings in taking the inventory until the note was produced, then the note was brought forward; but the vendee at the same time refused to proceed further, and the appellant's assignor returned the deposit which it held. We cannot say this conduct was free of fraud.

[4, 5] Moreover the record in this case has certain features that differentiate in from the cases that have been cited by the appellant. The appellant's assignor was at all times the agent of the vendor. When it brought the vendor and the vendee together it received from the vendee a deposit of $500, which, under the terms of the contract, was a part payment on the purchase price, and in the event the vendee should fail to complete the purchase said deposit was to be held for the vendor. However, the agent did not so retain the deposit and pay it to the vendor, but repaid it to the vendee. In doing so it acted in violation of its contract with the vendor. Having breached the contract it could not have recovered from the respondent. Its assignee has no greater rights.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIRPO v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO
et al. (Civ. 5601.)

1. Justices of the peace ⇨84(4)—Defendant, moving to quash service of summons and dismiss action, as not brought in township wherein he resided, property was found, or obligation was incurred or to be performed, held not to submit to court's jurisdiction and waive right to quash service, and court might dismiss.

While motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction of subject-matter is in legal effect a demurrer to complaint on that ground, defendant, moving to dismiss action of claim and delivery in justice court, as not brought in township in which he resided, subject-matter was found or obligation was incurred or contracted to be performed, did not submit to court's jurisdiction and waive right to quash service of summons, and court did not exceed jurisdiction in entering judgment of dismissal, though notice of motion also stated that defendant did not waive objection or consent to jurisdiction.

2. Justices of the peace ⇨72—Replevin by seller, after demand, on buyer's default, held not based on contract to be performed in city and county of venue, where seller retained title (Code Civ. Proc. § 832, subd. 7).

Where title was retained by seller, stipulation for retaking possession on default in payment of purchase-money installment did not create right to repossess on default, which existed independently of such provision, so that action of claim and delivery after default was not on contractual obligation to be performed in city and county wherein suit was brought, within Code Civ. Proc. § 832, subd. 7; gist of action being wrongful detention after demand for possession, notwithstanding stipulation for payment of expenses of repossessing property, which would constitute elements of damage incidental to detention.

3. Justices of the peace ⇨72—Defendant's residence in judicial township in which sued is jurisdictional requirement, in absence of showing that he is within any statutory exception.

Action in justice's court must be commenced in township or city in which defendant resides, and, in absence of showing that he is within any statutory exception, his residence in judicial township in which sued is jurisdictional requirement.

4. Justices of the peace ⇨84(4)—Where defendant specially appeared to move for dismissal of seller's action of claim and delivery, on default in payment of purchase-money installment, on ground that suit was not brought in township of defendant's residence, justice did not exceed jurisdiction in entering judgment of dismissal (Code Civ. Proc. § 890, subd. 4, as amended in 1905).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 890, subd. 4, as amended in 1905, where defendant appeared specially to make motion to dismiss seller's action of claim and delivery, after default in payment of purchase-money installment, on ground that suit was not brought in township of defendant's residence, justice did not exceed jurisdiction in entering judgment of dismissal; action not being within statutory exception to rule of venue nor objection to jurisdiction waived.

Certiorari by E. Firpo to review a judgment of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge, affirming a judgment dismissing petitioner's action of claim and delivery. Writ denied.

Raymond Perry, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Sans & Hudson, of Watsonville, and Thos. W. Firby, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. Certiorari to review a judgment of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco.

An action was commenced by petitioner in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco to recover possession of an automobile or its value, with damages and attorney's fees. The complaint alleged that the defendant in the action came into its possession in Monterey county; that his right thereto had since terminated, a demand therefor, and prayed as part of the relief sought that it might be taken from his possession by any constable of that county. It was shown by the affidavit of defendant filed in connection with the motion hereinafter considered—and which affidavit was not denied—and by a contract in writing hereinafter referred to and considered by the court on such motion, that defendant at all the times mentioned in the complaint had been a resident of Monterey county; that his possession followed the execution therein by petitioner's predecessor in interest of a contract for the sale of the car to defendant; and that the car remained thereafter in the township and county of defendant's residence, and was there found and taken.

The contract provided for the payment by defendant of installments of the purchase price, with interest thereon, to the seller in San Francisco, and that the title should remain in the latter until such payment should be made in full; that the seller might at his option retake possession upon default in payment, and in that event defendant would pay all expenses thus incurred, including attorney's fees in a sum of not less than $100. Summons was served upon the defendant in Monterey county, whereupon he served and filed a notice that he would move the court to quash the service of summons and dismiss upon the ground that the action was not brought in the township or county of his residence or in which the property, the subject of the action, was found or taken; that his residence at all the times mentioned in the complaint had been and the property situated in that county; that the latter was there found and taken; and that the action was not upon an obligation incurred or contracted to be performed in the township where brought. The notice further stated that defendant appeared specially for the purpose of making the motion without consenting to the jurisdiction of the court over his person or the subject of the action.

The motion having been presented, the court found the facts as follows: That defendant was a bona fide resident of Alisal judicial township in Monterey county; that the property mentioned was there situated and was there found and taken, and thereupon entered a judgment of dismissal without prejudice. This judgment having been affirmed upon appeal to respondent superior court, petitioner filed the instant proceeding to review the judgment of the latter court.

[1] Petitioner contends that the defendant mentioned, in moving for a dismissal of the action, thereby submitted to the jurisdiction of the justice's court, and thereby waived his right, if any, to quash the service of summons; that jurisdiction having been acquired of his person, and the action being upon an obligation in writing to be performed in the city and county of San Francisco within the provisions of subdivision 7 of section 832 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the court, in entering a judgment of dismissal, exceeded its jurisdiction.

We do not construe the language of the notice as stating as the grounds of the motion that the court was without jurisdiction over the property which was the subject of the action, but that the action was not brought within the proper township or city. While it is the rule that a motion for dismissal on the ground that the court is without jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action is in legal effect a demurrer to the complaint on that ground (Roberts v. Sup. Ct., 159 P. 465, 30 Cal. App. 714, and cases therein cited), and in the instant case the notice contained the statement that defendant did not waive objection or consent to jurisdiction in this respect, the grounds of the motion, clearly stated therein, were that the action was not one within any of the exceptions to the general rule that an action in the justice's court must be brought in the township in which the defendant resides. The intention being thus clearly shown, the scope and extent of the motion was not enlarged by the statement mentioned.

[2] It is urged by petitioner that the action was based upon an obligation created by the contract, which, as to the payments provided, was to be performed in the city of San Francisco, and that an action for the recovery of the property therein described was one within the provisions of subdivision

7 of the section mentioned. As stated, this contract provided for the retaking of possession by the seller upon default in payment, and that defendant should pay the expenses thus incurred, including an attorney's fee. The title having been retained by the seller, the effect of the stipulation mentioned above was not to create the right to repossess upon default, as such right existed under well-settled principles of law independent of such provision (Richardson Drug Co. v. Teasdale, 72 N. W. 1028, 52 Neb. 698; Wiggins v. Snow, 50 N. W. 991, 89 Mich. 476; Bradshaw v. Warner, 54 Ind. 58; Blanchard v. Cooke, 11 N. E. 83, 144 Mass. 207). The gist of the action was the wrongful detention of property which came rightfully into the possession of defendant. The right to a continuance of such possession was conditioned and dependent upon the payment of the installments of the purchase price, in default of which the seller might at his option terminate the right, but, until the intention to exercise such option was manifested by a demand for possession, an action for its recovery could not be maintained. Adams v. Wood, 16 N. W. 788, 51 Mich. 411. Defendant not having by his contract agreed to return the property upon default in payment, no contractual obligation was violated by its retention; the wrong for which relief was sought being its detention after demand. The gravamen of the action being the wrongful detention and not the violation of the terms of the contract, the action, as far as it involved the right to the possession of the property, its value, or damages for its detention, was not one upon an obligation within the meaning of subdivision 7 of section 832 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The action not being for the recovery of expense incurred prior to the wrongful detention alleged, expenditures made or obligations incurred thereafter in the pursuit of the property would constitute elements of damage incidental to such detention, and the stipulation in the contract for payment thereof by defendant would not change the character of the action.

[3] The rule is general that actions in justice's courts must be commenced in the township or city in which the defendant resides; and, where it is not shown that the defendant is within any of the exceptions specified in the statute, his residence in the judicial township in which he is sued is a jurisdictional requirement. 15 Cal. Jur., Justices of the Peace, § 18; Bogmuda v. Young, 207 P. 915, 58 Cal. App. 19, 21; Code Civ. Proc. § 832.

[4] Prior to the amendment to subdivision 4 of section 890, Code of Civil Procedure, adopted in 1905, a defendant, sued in a township other than that of his residence, could raise the objection by answer; and, if unsuccessful, urge the objection on appeal. Bogmuda v. Young, supra. The section as amended reads:

"Judgment that the action may be dismissed without prejudice to a new action may be entered with costs in the following cases * * * (subd. 4); when the action is brought in the wrong county, township or city."

And it has been held that objections to the jurisdiction of the justice's court must be made by special appearance for that purpose; otherwise, it is waived. Vance v. Sup. Ct., 191 P. 945, 48 Cal. App. 327.

In the instant case, it appearing that the action was not one within any of the exceptions to the rule requiring the suit to be brought in the township in which defendant resided, and that the objection to the jurisdiction was not waived, it is our conclusion that the motion to dismiss was properly granted, and that, in making and entering its order and judgment therefor, the court did not exceed its jurisdiction.

The petition is denied.

DAUBERMAN v. GRANT. (L. A. 7911.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 3, 1926.)

1. Nuisance ⌘34 — Finding that offensive smelling, thick, black smoke is emitted from smokestack held sufficient finding that smoke was saturated with soot, as against contention that mere smoke will not constitute nuisance.

In a suit to enjoin a nuisance, finding that great volumes of offensive smelling, thick, black smoke is emitted from defendant's smokestack and conveyed by wind into plaintiff's dwelling in such quantities as to be of considerable annoyance held in effect finding that smoke was saturated with soot, refuting contention that mere smoke will not constitute a nuisance.

2. Nuisance ⌘3(3).

Smoke and soot may constitute nuisance.

3. Nuisance ⌘7.

Business may be nuisance either by reason of location or by reason of improper or negligent manner in which it is conducted.

4. Nuisance ⌘7—Maintenance of smokestack at height permitting pollution of air and interfering with comfortable enjoyment of property constitutes nuisance, when increasing height of stack would obviate annoyance.

Maintenance of smokestack at such low height as to permit pollution of air of plaintiff's premises and interfere with enjoyment of same constitutes nuisance, when increasing height of stack would obviate annoyance.

5. Nuisance ⌘4—Actual damage to property held not necessary to warrant recovery of damages for smoke and soot causing personal discomfort.

It was not necessary for plaintiff to prove actual damage to her property to recover damages caused by smoke and soot nuisance, but she was entitled to recover for personal discomfort and annoyance.

6. Waters and water courses ⌘121—Failure to use reasonable means to prevent precipitation of rainwater from buildings upon neighbor's property creates situation constituting nuisance.

Owner of land must use reasonable and ordinary means to prevent use of his property from interfering with the use and enjoyment of his neighbor's property, and the absence of effort to prevent precipitation of rainwater from his building upon neighboring property constitutes nuisance.

7. Waters and water courses ⚡126(2)—Refusal to permit defendant to prove location of boundary line of premises receiving rainwater held error.

In suit to enjoin defendant from maintaining his building in such a way that rainwater was cast from it to plaintiff's property, refusing to permit defendant to show that a fence separating his property from plaintiff's was not the true boundary line held error, where had this evidence been admitted it might have shown that water cast from defendant's premises fell entirely upon his own premises, and would have been a complete defense.

8. Waters and water courses ⚡126(2)—Excluding evidence on theory of agreed boundary line was error, where record was devoid of evidence of agreement or of uncertainty as to line between premises receiving rainwater.

In suit to enjoin defendant from keeping his premises in a condition so as to precipitate rainwater on plaintiff's property, refusal to receive evidence as to true location of boundary line on ground that line had been established by mutual agreement was error, where record was devoid of any evidence of uncertainty or of such agreement.

9. Boundaries ⚡48(6).

Where acquiescence in existence and location of fence does not amount to agreement that it is on accepted boundary line.

10. Waters and water courses ⚡126(2) — Finding that rainwater from defendant's shed fell on plaintiff's land held unsupported by evidence.

In suit to enjoin nuisance, finding that storm and rainwater falling upon roof of defendant's shed fell and flowed on plaintiff's land was unsupported by evidence.

11. Pleading ⚡19—Complaint alleging three distinct matters as constituting nuisance held subject to demurrer as ambiguous, in that it could not be determined which portion of damage was attributable to each matter alleged.

Complaint alleging three distinct matters as constituting a nuisance held subject to demurrer as ambiguous in the particular that it could not be determined therefrom which portion of the damage was attributable to each matter alleged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; R. H. Valentine, Judge.

Suit by Barbara Dauberman against John Grant to enjoin a nuisance. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Julius V. Patrosso and C. C. Mishler, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

T. J. K. MacGowen, of Los Angeles, Oscar E. Winburn, of Watts, and Ray Howard, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This appeal is from a judgment enjoining defendant from maintaining a chimney or smokestack on the premises adjoining those of the plaintiff in such a manner that smoke therefrom shall be conveyed into the plaintiff's dwelling house and also enjoining the defendant from maintaining his building or shop on lands adjoining the property of plaintiff in such a way that the storm or rainwater shall flow upon the premises of the plaintiff, and for damages in the sum of $500. Plaintiff also sought to have the defendant enjoined from maintaining and operating a steam hammer upon his premises, alleging that the foundation, walls, and ceilings of her dwelling house had been cracked by reason of the vibration attendant upon the use and operation of said steam hammer, and seeking damages for such injury in the sum of $6,000. The case was tried without a jury. Upon the phase of the case last mentioned, the trial court found in favor of the defendant to the effect that the neighborhood was an industrial neighborhood, and that the operation of the steam hammer was not a nuisance, and that the vibrations caused by the said steam hammer had not damaged the dwelling house of the plaintiff in any amount. The trial court, however, did find that the maintenance and operation of the smokestack and the precipitation of the rainwater upon the lands of the plaintiff constituted a nuisance.

The defendant, as ground for a reversal, insists that the evidence does not support the finding as to the existence of a nuisance in the particulars last stated. In this behalf it is argued that the mere maintenance of a chimney or smokestack in connection with the operation of an industrial plant in an industrial neighborhood cannot be decreed to be a nuisance in the absence of a finding that, in addition to the emanation of smoke from the smokestack, soot and sparks were caused to be conveyed to and deposited upon the property of the plaintiff as the result of the operation of defendant's plant.

Responding to defendant's contention that "mere smoke" will not constitute a nuisance, it will be noted that there is evidence in the record that not only smoke but soot as well issued from defendant's smokestack and permeated the air and penetrated plaintiff's premises, to her annoyance and inconvenience.

[1-4] The finding of the court upon this particular phase of the case was that "great volumes of offensive smelling, thick, black smoke is emitted from a chimney or smokestack in the rear of defendant's said building, the top of which is only a few feet above the roof thereof; and that said smoke, by reason of its denseness and the further fact that it is emitted so close to the ground and at a point so near the plaintiff's dwelling house, has been and is conveyed by the wind into said dwelling house in such quantities as to be of considerable annoyance to plaintiff and plaintiff's family." It may be fairly said, we think, that this finding was in effect a finding that the "offensive smelling, thick, black smoke" which emanated from the defendant's smokestack was saturated with soot. Smoke and soot may constitute a nuisance. Tuebner v. Cal. St. R. R. Co., 66 Cal. 171, 4 P. 1162; Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 248, 13 P. 653, 1 Am. St. Rep. 51; McMenomy v. Baud, 87 Cal. 134, 26 P. 795; Judson v. Los Angeles Suburban Gas Co., etc., 157 Cal. 168, 106 P. 581, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 21 Ann. Cas. 1247. A business may be a nuisance either by reason of its location or by reason of the improper or negligent manner in which it is conducted. McMenomy v. Baud, supra. True, the record shows that the neighborhood in the instant case is devoted to some extent to industry, but that fact did not authorize the defendant to conduct his business in such a manner as to interfere with the right of the plaintiff to the clean comfort of her residence. The record shows that the smoke and soot from industries operated by persons other than the defendant in the same neighborhood caused no inconvenience, because the smokestacks of such other industries are of such a height that the smoke is carried over the roofs of the houses. The smokestack of the defendant, however, is so low that the smoke is carried into the adjacent dwelling house of the plaintiff. The maintenance of a smokestack at such a low height as to permit the pollution of the air of the plaintiff's premises and thereby interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of the same, when such pollution and interference could be avoided and obviated by the simple expedient of increasing the height of the smokestack, was sufficient to constitute a nuisance, and the trial court was correct in so finding.

[5] It was not necessary to the recovery of damages caused by the nuisance of smoke and soot to prove actual damage to plaintiff's property. She was entitled to recover for the personal discomfort and annoyance to which she had been subjected, and it was a question for the trial court to determine the amount of the compensation which she should receive. Judson v. Los Angeles Suburban Gas Co., supra.

[6] Defendant does not deny, as the evidence shows and as the trial court found, that rainwater from the roof of his shed was precipitated upon the land beneath, thereby rendering the same excessively soggy and muddy during the rainy season of the year, but insists that the discharge of water from the roof is a mere incident to urban life, and he cannot, therefore be held responsible for the maintenance of a nuisance in this particular. Although the owner of a building may not be charged with the duty of keeping, at all events and under all circumstances, the rainwater falling upon and flowing from his building from flowing on to adjacent land, he is under a duty to use at least ordinary and reasonable means to prevent the use of his property from interfering with the use and enjoyment of his neighbor's property; and the absence of any effort on his part to obviate the annoyance and discomfort caused by the precipitation of rainwater from his building upon the neighboring property creates a situation which constitutes a nuisance. 1 Wood on Nuisance (3d Ed.) § 110; Harms et al. v. Kuchta et ux., 141 Md. 610, 119 A. 454; Dallas Land & Loan Co. v. Garrett (Tex. Civ. App.) 276 S. W. 471; Melin v. Richman, 96 Conn. 686, 115 A. 426.

[7-9] Defendant, however, complains that the trial court committed error in refusing to permit him to introduce evidence to prove that the fence to which the rear wall of his shed was attached was not located upon the true boundary line separating his property from the plaintiff's property, but was located entirely upon his premises and that, as a matter of fact, the water precipitated from his shed fell upon his own ground. This complaint is, we think, justified. Had the evidence been admitted it might have shown that no part of the water cast from the roof of the defendant's building found its way to the plaintiff's premises but fell entirely upon the premises of the defendant. This would have been a complete defense. The trial court evidently proceeded upon the theory, as expressed in its finding, "that said fence has been mutually accepted and regarded by the owners of said respective pieces of real estate as the dividing line between said properties at all times since its erection." The lower court was in error in attempting to apply the principle governing the cases of agreed boundary line to the case at bar. The record is devoid of any evidence that any uncertainty existed as to the boundary line, or that they ever reached any agreement that the location of the fence should mark and measure the boundary line between their properties. Mere acquiescence in the existence of the fence and the occupancy of the land on either side of it would not amount to an agreement that it was on the accepted boundary line. Staniford v. Trombly, 181 Cal. 372, 186 P. 599; Hill v. Schumacher, 45 Cal. App. 362, 187 P. 437; Janke v. McMahon, 21 Cal. App. 781, 133 P. 21.

[10] Not only was it error on the part of the lower court to refuse to permit the defendant to show the true boundary line between the plaintiff's and defendant's property, but the finding that the storm and rainwater falling upon the roof of the defendant's shed fell and flowed upon the plaintiff's land was unsupported by the evidence. This will necessitate a reversal of the judgment.

[11] The defendant demurred to the plaintiff's complaint upon the ground that it was ambiguous, among other things, in the particular that it could not be determined therefrom what portion of the damage alleged to have suffered by the plaintiff was attributable to each of the three things which the plaintiff's complaint alleged constituted a nuisance. The demurrer was apparently well taken. The evidence adduced at the trial did not tend to clear up the ambiguity. Doubtless, upon the going back of the case, the ambiguity in the pleadings will be corrected by a proper amendment.

Judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Attempt by lessee of land under navigable water to show that title to leased premises was in state in proof of lessor's breach of warranty held not collateral attack on "McEnerney" decree, which was part of lessor's chain of title, but which did not adjudicate question of state's interest.

2. Landlord and tenant ☞48(1)—Lessee may show title to leased property to be in state subsequent to a decree which was part of lessor's chain of title, as proof of lessor's breach of warranty (McEnerney Act, § 11 [St. Ex. Sess. 1906, p. 81]).

McEnerney Act, § 11, providing that judgments thereunder are conclusive as to every person claiming interest in property at time of action and as to persons claiming under them, held not to preclude lessee from showing that title to leased property was in state subsequent to McEnerney decree, which was part of lessor's chain of title as proof of lessor's breach of warranty.

3. Landlord and tenant ☞62(1).

Tenant, induced by false and fraudulent representations to enter lease, held not estopped to deny landlord's title.

4. Judgment ☞702—McEnerney decree, in suit in which city and county were defendants, held not binding on state (Pol. Code, § 2524).

McEnerney decree held not binding on state, though city and county were defendants in the suit, in absence of showing that city and county had interest in property as trustees for state or public, since Pol. Code, § 2524, is inapplicable.

5. Evidence ☞358—Official maps offered as supplemental to red line map, which was required by statute to show property leased by state, held admissible to show that property in controversy in lessor's action for rent was excluded from state's lease (St. 1851, p. 307; St. 1851, p. 311).

Where lessor, in action for rent in which lessee attempted to show title in state, denied state's title to leased property on ground that by St. 1851, p. 311, state relinquished reversionary interest therein after having leased it to city by St. 1851, p. 307, which provided for red line map showing property leased thereby, and such map did not include property in controversy, later official maps, offered as supplemental to red line map to show that property in controversy was not included, held admissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by the Kearney Investment Company against the Golden Gate Ferry Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph E. Bien and Werner Olds, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dudley D. Sales, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. On January 14, 1921, the Kearney Investment Company, as lessor, entered into a written lease with the Golden Gate Ferry Company, as lessee, which written lease covered certain properties fronting on the bay of San Francisco, and which admittedly is submerged land.

On August 3, 1921, the Golden Gate Ferry Company served notice in writing on the Kearney Investment Company that the lease entered into on January 14, 1921, was rescinded.

On October 5, 1921, the Kearney Investment Company commenced this action to enforce the payment of rent due under the lease for September and October, 1921, and for attorney's fees as in the lease provided. The Golden Gate Ferry Company filed an answer and cross-complaint, denying that it ever took possession of the premises let, and claiming that the Kearney Investment Company had no right, title, or interest in the property leased, and alleging that certain covenants in the lease were false, and had been fraudulently made for the purpose of inducing the Golden Gate Ferry Company to enter into the lease. The cross-complaint prayed that the lease be adjudged canceled and rescinded.

The covenants alleged to be false are as follows:

"The lessor covenants with the lessee that it is now seized in fee simple of the real property herein described and designated as parcels 1 and 3, and that it holds the real estate here-in described as parcel 2 under a valid lease, which said lease does not expire until the 25th day of March, 1950."

The court below found that the Golden Gate Ferry Company had never taken possession of the premises; that no sum of money had ever become due under the lease; that the Kearney Investment Company did not at any time own the parcels described as 1 and 3 in fee, and that it did not ever have a valid 99-year lease to the parcel known as parcel 2; that the Golden Gate Ferry Company had entered into the lease believing that the Kearney Investment Company had the title it represented itself to have in the property, and that the lease had been rescinded.

Judgment was rendered for the Golden Gate Ferry Company for costs, and the lease was declared rescinded, null, and void. This appeal by the Kearney Investment Company is from that judgment.

The findings and judgment of the lower court are based, apparently, upon the theory that a McEnerney decree, dated September 5, 1915, introduced in evidence in the court below as part of appellant's chain of title, did not establish title in the appellant. It was respondent's contention in the court below, and it is its contention here, that title to the property in question is "in the state of California, the property being submerged land under the flow and ebb of the tide" and that the McEnerney decree did not adjudicate this title.

Over the objection of the appellant, the court below admitted evidence offered by the respondent to prove that the title to the land in controversy was in the state of California.

The grounds of reversal urged by appellant are two. The first is that the setting up of title in the state by the respondent is a collateral attack upon the McEnerney decree. The second is that the court below committed error in admitting evidence that despite the McEnerney decree title to the land in controversy was in the state of California.

Respondent takes the position that the attempt to prove that the title to the property in question was in the state of California was not a collateral attack upon the McEnerney decree; that the McEnerney decree was not binding upon the respondent to the extent that it precluded the respondent from proving the title to be in the state of California; that the McEnerney decree was not binding upon the state of California, although the city and county of San Francisco had been made a defendant in the McEnerney suit.

[1] It does not appear to us that the attempt of the respondent to prove in the lower court that the title to the property in question was in the state of California was a collateral attack on the McEnerney decree. Giving the McEnerney decree its full force and effect, it cannot be said to extend to any interest which the state of California might have in the property. Berton v. All Persons, 176 Cal. 610, 170 P. 151. The purpose of a collateral attack upon a judgment is generally to avoid the legal effect of the judgment by overthrowing it. In the instant case the McEnerney decree did not adjudicate the question of the state's interest in the property, and a claim that title to the property is in the state is not, therefore, an attempt to avoid the legal effect of the decree. No claim is made that title to the property was in a particular person. The McEnerney decree, in the instant case, is totally irrelevant as to the state's title, and the claim that title is in the state is not, therefore, an attack upon the McEnerney decree.

[2] Section 11 of the McEnerney Act provides:

That the judgments thereunder are binding and conclusive upon "every person who, at the time of the commencement of the action, had or claimed any estate, right, title, or interest in or to said property, or any part thereof, and upon every person claiming under him by title subsequent to the commencement of the action." Stats. 1906 (Ex. Sess.) p. 78; Stats. 1909, p. 163; Stats. 1911, p. 6; Stats. 1913, p. 135.

[3] Although the respondent under this section would be precluded from claiming any right, title, or interest in the property, it is not precluded by said section from showing that title to the property is in the state of California. Neither is the defendant precluded from setting up such title by the general rule that a tenant is estopped to deny his landlord's title. There is a well-recognized exception to the general rule, namely, where the lessee was induced by the false and fraudulent representations of the lessor to enter into the lease such fraud and misrepresentations relieve the lessee of the estoppel to dispute the lessor's title. This is so because the relation of landlord and tenant arises out of contract, and this, like other contracts, may be avoided by fraud. Tewksbury v. Magraff, 33 Cal. 237, 245. See, also, Gray v. Whitla, 70 Okl. 288, 174 P. 239, 2 A. L. R. 356, and note.

[4] The fact that the city and county of San Francisco was a defendant in the McEnerney suit does not make the decree therein binding upon the state of California, in the absence of any evidence showing or attempting to show that the city and county of San Francisco ever had any interest in the property in question as trustee for the state or the public. There is no act of the Legislature of this state by which any interest in the property in question is conveyed by the state to the city and county of San Francisco as trustee. Section 2524 of the Political Code transfers the possession and control of certain state property, of which the property in question is a part, to the board of harbor commissioners.

[5] From this conclusion it must be concluded further that the lower court did not commit error in admitting evidence as against the McEnerney decree that title was in the state of California. Appellant, in addition to objecting to all evidence as tending to impeach the McEnerney decree, objected to the introduction of certain official maps upon the ground that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. These official maps, offered in evidence by the respondent, were not inadmissible upon the grounds stated. It was appellant's contention that a lease for 99 years to certain water front lots, which include the lots in controversy, had been granted by the state of California to the city of San Francisco by an act of the Legislature passed March 26, 1851 (St. 1851, p. 307); that, by a subsequent act of the Legislature of May 1, 1851 (St. 1851, p. 311), the reversionary interest in these same lots had been relinquished to the city of San Francisco; and that, therefore, title to the lots in controversy was not in the state of California. Appellant claims title to the land in controversy by virtue of an execution sale arising out of an action against the city of San Francisco. The act of 1851, which granted the leasehold interest to the city of San Francisco, required the city to deposit with the secretary of state and the surveyor general a map of the correct boundary line as set forth in said act, distinctly and properly delineated by a red line. Apparently it is conceded that the "Eddy Red Line Map," a copy of which was offered in evidence, was the official map so required. This map was introduced in evidence by the respondent to prove that the lots in controversy were not included in this grant by the state to the city of San Francisco. The Eddy red line map does not show the blocks and lots west of Larkin street in the city of San Francisco, although the red line indicating the boundary of the grant to the city is delineated thereon. When the Eddy red line map is considered in conjunction with other and later official maps offered and received in evidence, the land in controversy is shown to be excluded from the land granted by the state by the act of 1851 to the city of San Francisco. The property in controversy is described in the lease to be property bounded by certain streets which appear in the later maps above referred to and, as previously indicated, do not appear in the Eddy red line map. The later maps were offered in evidence as supplemental to and in aid of the Eddy red line map and for that purpose, we think, they were admissible.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that (1) the McEnerney decree introduced into evidence in this case does not affect any title which the state of California may have had in the property in question; (2) proof of a breach of the warranty of the lease did not involve a collateral attack upon the McEnerney decree because the McEnerney decree did not adjudicate the state's title; and (3) there was no error committed by the lower court in admitting evidence showing title to the property in question to be in the state of California.

Judgment affirmed.

193 Cal. 490

In re BAIRD'S ESTATE. (S. F. 11585.)

1. New trial ⇨105.

Newly discovered evidence, which merely impeaches witness, is not sufficient to justify granting motion for new trial.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1099(7), 1195(1)—Determination of Supreme Court as to legal effect of evidence established law of case, and was binding on it and on trial court.

Determination by Supreme Court on former appeal as to legal effect of evidence before court established law of case, and was binding on trial court and Supreme Court.

3. New trial ⇨150(3)—Alleged newly discovered evidence and evidence at trial held insufficient to establish father's adoption of illegitimate child (Civ. Code, § 230).

Alleged newly discovered evidence and evidence developed at trial held insufficient to show that father received illegitimate child into his family and treated it as his legitimate child, so as to establish his adoption of child, under Civ. Code, § 230.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1202—Trial court's granting of new trial for insufficiency of evidence held abuse of discretion, where judgment for defendants was entered pursuant to order of Supreme Court directing judgment of nonsuit (Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 5).

Where Supreme Court, in reversing judgment for petitioner, determined that trial court erred in denying defendant's motion for nonsuit, held that trial court's judgment, entered pursuant to order of Supreme Court, was judgment of nonsuit, and since, under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 5, such a motion is granted because of failure to prove sufficient case for jury, trial court abused its discretion in granting petitioner's motion for new trial for insufficiency of evidence.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1176(2)—Supreme Court has power to direct trial court to enter judgment of nonsuit (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 53, 629).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 53, where Supreme Court decides that trial court erred in denying defendant's motion for nonsuit, it has power to direct judgment of nonsuit under its general appellate powers, irrespective of validity of section 629.

6. Appeal and error 1122(2).

Supreme Court cannot make findings of fact and base judgment thereon.

7. Trial 388(3).

No findings of fact are necessary, nor have they any place where judgment of nonsuit is rendered.

8. Jury 34(2)—Granting nonsuit when evidence is insufficient to support judgment for plaintiff is not violation of constitutional right to jury trial.

Granting of nonsuit, whether by trial court itself or pursuant to direction of Supreme Court, when plaintiff's evidence is insufficient to support judgment in his favor, does not violate constitutional right to jury trial.

9. Appeal and error 927(2)—Error in granting motion for nonsuit will be corrected on appeal just as readily as if motion had been overruled.

Though trial court has broad discretionary powers respecting determination of motions for nonsuit, such powers are not unlimited, and error in granting such a motion will be corrected on appeal, just as readily as if motion had been overruled.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of David Jennings Baird, deceased. Petition by David Jennings Baird for a partial distribution of the estate. From an order granting petitioner a new trial after entry of adverse judgment pursuant to direction of the Supreme Court (193 Cal. 225, 290, 223 P. 974, 1001), Veronica C. Baird and others appeal. Reversed.

See, also, 231 P. 744.

K. C. Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellants.

C. M. Fickert, E. A. Cunha, and R. P. Henshall, all of San Francisco (Robert R. Moody, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This appeal was taken from an order of the court granting two motions for a new trial. The original petition herein was filed by David J. Baird, a minor, by his guardian, Lydia M. Valencia. Thereafter an amended petition was filed by said minor through his said guardian, praying for partial distribution of the estate of David J. Baird, deceased, to said petitioner as the adopted son and heir of said deceased. There have been three trials of the issues involved in this proceeding, from the judgment in each of which an appeal was taken to this court. The opinions rendered therein are reported in 173 Cal. 617, 160 P. 1078, 182 Cal. 338, 188 P. 43, and 193 Cal. 225, 223 P. 974, respectively. The facts out of which this controversy arose are in the main set forth in the former opinions of this court, and accordingly it will not be necessary to repeat them here.

The judgment rendered at the first trial of the issues involved herein was reversed on the ground that the trial court erred in refusing the demand of petitioner, the respondent herein, for a jury trial. On the second trial, the verdict of the jury was in favor of petitioner. This court reversed the judgment therein on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to show that the decedent had adopted petitioner as his child within the meaning of section 230 of the Civil Code. The case in due time came on for trial for the third time. It was tried before a jury, and, like the second trial, resulted in special verdicts in favor of petitioner. The court adopted the special verdicts, made findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered its decree of partial distribution in petitioner's favor. From this decree or judgment the executors of the last will and testament of said deceased and those claiming interest in said estate adverse to petitioner appealed. On this appeal this court again reversed the judgment of the trial court, and, in doing so, it held that the former decision of this court had established the law of the case, but further held:

"That, apart from the doctrine of the law of the case, the evidence received on the last trial is insufficient to sustain the special verdicts, or to support the findings, and that a case of adoption has not been established." Estate of Baird, 193 Cal. 225, 290, 223 P. 974, 1001.

The court further held:

"That the court erred in denying the motion for nonsuit, in denying the motion for an instructed verdict, and in failing to enter judgment for appellants."

It further made the following order:

"The decree of partial distribution is reversed, and the trial court is ordered and directed to set aside the special verdicts and findings and to enter judgment for appellants, denying the petition for partial distribution upon the ground that respondent is not the adopted son or heir of the deceased."

After the filing of the remittitur in the lower court, petitioner, on the 15th day of April, 1924, filed his notice of intention to move for a new trial and "that the former verdict and the purported decision and judgment herein rendered against him upon his petition and amended petition for partial distribution be vacated, and that a new trial be granted." The grounds set forth in said notice upon which said motion would be based were all those designated in section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thereafter, and on the 22d day of April, 1924, the trial court, pursuant to said remittitur, "and not otherwise," made its order vacating and setting aside said special verdicts and findings and denying said petitioner's petition for distribution. Thereafter, and on the 2d day of May, 1924, petitioner served and filed a second notice of intention to move for a new trial, "and that the former verdict and purported decision and judgment, dated April 22, 1924, herein rendered on and filed on April 23, 1924, and entered in Judgment Book 606, at page 463, against him, upon his petition and amended petition for partial distribution, be vacated, and that a new trial be granted." The grounds upon which this second motion was based, as stated therein, were the same as those set forth in petitioner's first notice of intention to move for a new trial, and were all the grounds designated in section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The motions for a new trial were argued on the 4th day of June, 1924, at which time six affidavits in support of the ground of newly discovered evidence were presented by petitioner. He also, probably as a matter of extra precaution, offered at this time, and there was received in evidence, the entire testimony taken at the former or third trial of said cause, together with all depositions and exhibits in the case and also the charge of the court upon the trial of said cause, "together with certain instructions requested by appellants herein." Counter affidavits were also presented and filed by and on behalf of the said Veronica C. Baird and others contesting respondent's petition, as was also the deposition of Miles T. Baird, taken previously and filed in said court on the 26th day of February, 1921. Thereupon, and in addition to the foregoing, the respondent herein offered, and there was received in evidence, a document denominated and called "demurrer, objections, and resistance." Said document was assigned by the attorneys for petitioner, and had been theretofore filed in said cause on the 16th day of April, 1924. Upon these affidavits, testimony, the former deposition of Miles T. Baird, and the document last referred to, the two motions of petitioner were submitted, and thereafter by the court granted. The order granting the said motions, following certain formal recitals, was as follows:

"And the court being fully advised in the premises, it is now here ordered that the said motions for a new trial be, and each of said motions for a new trial is hereby, granted upon all the grounds specified in said notices of intention, and as argued and presented upon said motions, except upon the grounds specified in subdivisions 1, 2, 3, and 5 of section 657, C. C. P. And in this regard the court, in accordance with said section 657, C. C. P., doth further grant said motion for a new trial in addition upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify and sustain the verdict and the decision, and in this regard the court doth specify that in its opinion and decision herein certain testimony of certain witnesses who testified on behalf of the respondent to the petition herein is not true, and that said testimony is not believed by the court to be credible and true, and therefore that the decision herein is not sustained by the evidence."

From this order the said Veronica C. Baird, Benjamin H. Baird, and Thomas R. Baird have appealed. The appeal is brought before this court upon a bill of exceptions.

It will be noted that the order granting a new trial was granted on all the grounds enumerated in section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure except those specified in subdivisions 1, 2, 3, and 5. The motions were therefore granted upon the grounds set forth in subdivisions 4, 6, and 7, which are as follows:

"4. Newly discovered evidence, material for the party making the application, which he could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced at the trial; * * *

"6. Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, or that it is against law;

"7. Error in law, occurring at the trial and excepted to by the party making the application."

We might mention at this time that the respondent thereafter moved to dismiss said appeal, but said motion was denied by this court. Estate of Baird, 231 P. 744. It is the contention of appellants that the trial court was not justified in granting said motions for a new trial, or either of them, on any of the grounds set forth in said order or upon any grounds whatever. We will discuss the several grounds upon which said motions were granted in the order in which they are above enumerated.

[1] 1. Newly discovered evidence. Of the affidavits presented by respondent in support of his motions for a new trial are those of Lydia M. Valencia and Mary Westerfeld. In these affidavits the affiants therein refer to certain statements made to them by Miles T. Baird since the last trial of this cause. A counter affidavit was filed by the said Miles T. Baird, in which he stated that he had not seen either said Lydia M. Valencia nor the said Mary Westerfeld since the year 1914, and that the statements made by them respectively in their affidavits were false and untrue. The only argument advanced by respondent to sustain the order of the trial court granting the motions for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is that, as the conclusion of the trial court upon conflicting affidavits is conclusive, it evidently believed Miss Valencia and Miss Westerfeld, and therefore believed that Miles T. Baird had committed perjury, and, "if Miles T. Baird had committed perjury on so important a matter as detailed in the affidavit of Miss Valencia, the propriety of a new trial hardly seems to be an open question." In other words, it is claimed that the newly discovered evidence on the part of respondent would impeach the witness Miles

T. Baird, who testified to material and important matters involved in this controversy. It has been repeatedly held that evidence, impeaching in its character, is not sufficient to justify the granting of a motion for a new trial. Waer v. Waer, 189 Cal. 178, 207 P. 891. In this case the court said (page 180, 207 P. 892):

"In so far as the affidavit immediately under consideration purported to narrate a statement of the plaintiff which in effect was contradictory of something he had testified to at the trial it was impeaching in its character and, therefore, insufficient on appeal as the basis of review of a motion for a new trial, for it is the rule in this state that 'newly discovered evidence which is merely * * * designed to contradict a witness is not of a character to warrant a new trial'"—citing authorities.

Notwithstanding our opinion that the purported newly discovered evidence on behalf of petitioner would be inadmissible upon a subsequent trial of this cause, if one were granted, for the reason just stated, we will nevertheless discuss it in its relation to the issue involved herein, even though this can only be done at considerable length. The four affidavits of Lydia M. Valencia, Mary E. Westerfeld, Mary A. Reed, and Robert Jackson we understand contain all the newly discovered evidence upon which the respondent relies to sustain the order of the court granting his motions on that ground. The other two affidavits presented by respondent and used at said hearing were by his attorneys. They did not purport to set forth any newly discovered evidence, but simply set forth facts showing due diligence on their part in the procurement of the newly discovered evidence. The document before referred to as a "demurrer, objection, and resistance" was not sworn to, and we do not understand that respondent in any way claims that it contained any statement of facts which could be legally used on said hearing. We will therefore confine our discussion to respondent's four affidavits above referred to.

The affidavit of Lydia M. Valencia is as follows:

"That on two separate occasions since the last trial of the above-entitled cause, and while the same was pending on appeal, Benjamin H. Baird, a half-brother of the deceased, and one of the parties to the above-entitled matter, called upon affiant and the petitioner at his own request. He stated that the object of his visit was for the purpose of settling the case out of court, and he wanted to know just what amount affiant would take to settle the claim of her son, David Jennings Baird, to the estate of his father. Said Benjamin H. Baird further stated that he was going to see to it that affiant would take good care of his brother's child, and that he would force affiant to accept his terms of settlement, as he had the power and the influence. He further stated, on one of these occasions, that he and his mother knew all about the existence of the child prior to the death of his brother, David Jennings

Baird; that the deceased had told his mother, Veronica C. Baird, that petitioner was his son, and that they had many conversations and arguments concerning the petitioner; that, notwithstanding the objections of his mother, the deceased insisted upon keeping in his room, at the Fairmont Hotel, pictures of the petitioner; that in doing so the deceased had caused his mother a good deal of grief. Said Benjamin H. Baird further stated that both he and his mother believed that affiant was married to his brother David until affiant informed him to the contrary at the time he called at 230 I street, San Francisco, immediately after the death of his brother.

"Affiant further deposes and says that on numerous occasions since the last trial of said cause, Miles T. Baird, a full brother of the deceased, called upon affiant and the petitioner. On one of these occasions, he said: 'I was extremely sorry for my mother's hostile attitude toward David, but my mother believed she was justified in doing anything, whether it was right or wrong, to defeat the child's rights and, in doing so, I guess she is no different from most women under such circumstances.' He further stated that both he and his sister, Marie Sproule, had endeavored to get their mother to do what was right by the child, but so far they had failed, as his mother was being influenced against the child by his half-brother, Benjamin H. Baird. Said Miles T. Baird further stated that he and his half-brother, Benjamin H. Baird, had actually come to blows over the fact that said Benjamin H. Baird had induced his mother to give false testimony in her deposition concerning her knowledge of the petitioner. Said Miles T. Baird further stated to affiant that both he and his mother had full knowledge of the existence of the petitioner long prior to the death of David Jennings Baird, and he stated that his mother, the deceased, and himself had many arguments concerning the petitioner, and that the deceased had informed his mother that he was the father of the petitioner, and that he was going to do what he thought was right, regardless of her objections; that said Miles T. Baird further stated that he and his mother were in Europe at the time they received news of the death of his brother David; that before coming to America they had talked over the possibilities of a contest over his brother's estate, and whether or not deceased had left a will providing for the child, and whether the deceased was married to affiant. Said Miles T. Baird further stated that, if the case were again tried, he would gladly appear as a witness for the petitioner and tell the whole truth. On some of his visits, he took the petitioner out riding in his automobile."

The affidavit of Mary E. Westerfeld refers to certain conversations had with Miles T. Baird subsequent to the former trial, in which she relates that he made statements to her similar to many of the statements set out in the above affidavit of Lydia M. Valencia. The principal matters contained in her affidavit and not found in that of Lydia M. Valencia were that Miles T. Baird had a number of small snapshots of respondent taken when he was a child, and that Miles told her that these were sent to him by the deceased while he and his mother were in Europe, and that he had kept them ever since, and had exhibited them to his mother before the death of David J. Baird, and furthermore that he had seen the child, and that the resemblance between him and the deceased was very striking. She further stated in her affidavit that on this occasion Miles T. Baird had told her that he had received letters from the deceased during his absence in Europe in which he mentioned the child as his own.

The affidavit of Mary A. Reed sets forth that she was not acquainted with the petitioner or his mother, Lydia M. Valencia, but that she had been acquainted with John Rush Baird during his lifetime, and that he had stated to her that his brother David had told him that he had been secretly married to Miss Valencia, and that said David Jennings Baird was apparently embittered towards his two stepbrothers, who were then quite young. She further set forth in her affidavit that she was well acquainted with Veronica C. Baird, met her in Paris, and had frequent conversations with her concerning the relationship that existed between her son David and Miss Valencia and concerning the existence and paternity of respondent, in which conversations Mrs. Baird said that under no circumstances would she recognize or acknowledge the child, and that Mrs. Baird was very embittered towards Miss Valencia, and that she had left San Francisco and gone to Paris to live on account of the notoriety her son had brought upon her through his association with Miss Valencia.

The affidavit of Robert Jackson set forth that he was in the employ of David Jennings Baird during the year 1907, and that in the year 1908, while Mrs. Baird was staying at the Fairmont, she and her son David had an argument concerning this child, and that David told him that his mother took him to task about his association with the child and its mother, and tried to persuade him not to go near them, but that he told his mother that he knew his own business and was his own boss, and that, no matter what she said, he was going to look after the child, meaning the respondent; that on this occasion, after the altercation, he took David from the Fairmont Hotel to 230 I street, where respondent and his mother were then living. He further referred to Mrs. Baird having detectives employed to follow her son David. He also stated that he had frequently met Miles T. Baird during the lifetime of his brother David, and had several conversations with him concerning the child, in which Miles told him the child looked exactly like his brother Dave, and that he felt extremely sorry for the child and would like to help him, but was unable to do so on account of the opposition of his sister and mother to the child. He further related a conversation that he had had with John Floyd, who for a number of years was in the employ of the Baird family.

These conversations related to Mrs. Baird's knowledge of the child, and that she wanted that fact kept quiet, and that Mrs. Baird had purchased from him the house in which he was then living on Eighth avenue.

In order to properly consider these affidavits and their bearing upon the issues involved in this proceeding, it will be necessary to ascertain the prior determinations of this court as to the issues before the court and the evidence produced in support thereof on the former hearings. Upon the second appeal of this matter this court held that four things are essential to the adoption of an illegitimate child by its father: (1) He shall be its natural father; (2) he shall have publicly acknowledged himself to be its father; (3) he shall have received the child into his family; (4) he shall have otherwise treated it as his legitimate child. Estate of Baird, 182 Cal. 338, 347, 188 P. 43. It was assumed, for the purpose of the decision rendered upon the second appeal, that the first two of these essential elements of adoption had been proven, but the court held that there was an absence of evidence to prove either that the deceased, David Jennings Baird, had received respondent into his family, or that he had treated respondent as his legitimate child. The court accordingly reversed the judgment rendered on the second trial of this cause upon the ground that there was not sufficient evidence to support the verdict and findings that respondent had been adopted by said deceased. Following this reversal, the matter came on for trial the third time, and the issues of adoption were again tried by a jury, with the result that the jury again found in respondent's favor. The evidence produced on the third trial was, in a large measure, a repetition of that before the court and jury on the second trial. In some respects, however, it differed from the former testimony, and respondent contended both at said trial and on appeal from the judgment that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict and the finding rendered on the third trial. This court, however, held that there was no substantial or material difference in the testimony taken at the two trials, and accordingly that respondent had failed to prove his adoption by legal and competent evidence. The conclusion of this court was expressed as follows:

"It may finally be declared that the evidence as to public acknowledgment of paternity, receipt into family, and otherwise treating the child as legitimate, does not, in any true sense, conform to the conception of adoption under section 230. The father of a legitimate child would not allow it to live in a clandestine family or to be known by an assumed name, or to be the object of concealment and dissimulation. The father of an illegitimate child would not hold himself out to the world as having a residence into which he did not receive it. He would especially provide for the future of the child. Decedent's will, already referred to, was dated July 30, 1903. He gave half of his property to his mother and the other half to his half-brothers. In 1907 executor Brown called his attention to the will, but he made no change therein."

[2] The determination by this court as to the legal effect of the evidence then before the court has established the law of the case, and was binding upon the trial court as well as upon this court. Estate of Baird, 193 Cal. 225, 289, 223 P. 974.

[3] Taking up now the affidavits on behalf of respondent in support of his motions for a new trial, the question for decision is, Would the matters set forth therein, if proven at a subsequent trial, be sufficient to establish those facts which this court has held were necessary for the respondent to establish in order to prove his adoption and which he failed to establish at the former trial? In other words, would the purported newly discovered evidence, together with the evidence before the court upon the third trial, establish the three essential elements of adoption which this court held on the last appeal were not proven at the former trial of this matter? For, unless the newly discovered evidence, with the evidence then in the record and already before the court, would at least tend to establish all three of said essentials, it would be insufficient to warrant the court in granting a new trial on said ground. We will discuss said newly discovered evidence only as it relates to two of said elements of adoption—receipt into the family, and treatment as the legitimate child of said deceased. This court on the former hearing (Estate of Baird, 193 Cal. 225, 279, 223 P. 974, 998), held that:

"The father, in order to comply with section 230, must have a home or habitation into which he shall receive his illegitimate child as his own, and that the place where he lives must be his settled or fixed habitation of which he is the head."

The decision then goes on at some length (pages 278-288) to discuss the character of the home or habitation in which petitioner was maintained by the deceased during the lifetime of the latter as shown by the evidence then before the court, and, after a most exhaustive review of this evidence, this court held that it was not such a home or habitation as was contemplated by section 230 of the Civil Code, and that the receipt by the deceased of the petitioner in such a home was not receiving the child into his family. There is nothing in any of the affidavits submitted by respondent in support of his motion for a new trial that would tend in the least to show that the place or habitation where respondent lived during the lifetime of the deceased and where he and his mother were maintained and supported by the deceased was of any different character from that shown by the evidence in the former trial. There was nothing, therefore, in these affidavits that would show that the deceased received respondent into his family within the meaning of said section 230, Civil Code. The same may be said regarding the showing made in said affidavits as to the treatment of respondent by deceased as his legitimate child. We find nothing in said affidavits which would in any way tend to show a different character of treatment accorded respondent by the deceased than that shown by the evidence before the court at the former trial. At the previous hearing it was held (page 289), after reviewing the evidence upon this phase of the case, that:

"Such treatment is contrary to the sense in which section 230 of the Civil Code uses the phrase 'otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child.'"

It is apparent, therefore, that the showing made by respondent in support of his motions for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence was insufficient, and that the trial court was not justified in granting said motions for a new trial on said ground.

[4] 2. Insufficiency of the evidence. The order granting respondent's motions for a new trial, as we have already seen, in addition to specifying in effect that it was granted upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, contained the following:

"And in this regard the court in accordance with said section 657, C. C. P., doth further grant said motion for a new trial in addition upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify and sustain the verdict and the decision, and in this regard the court doth specify that in its opinion and decision herein certain testimony of certain witnesses who testified on behalf of the respondent to the petition herein is not true, and that said testimony is not believed by the court to be credible and true, and therefore that the decision herein is not sustained by the evidence."

While this order is not entirely free from ambiguity, we understand its purport to be that the trial court specified, as one of the grounds for granting the motion for a new trial, the insufficiency of the evidence to support the decision or judgment entered by said court in pursuance of the order of this court, and further specified that the court did not believe the testimony of certain witnesses who had testified on behalf of the appellants herein (in the order they are designated as "certain witnesses who testified on behalf of the respondent to the petition herein"), and, for the reason that the court did not believe said witnesses, that the said decision and judgment was not sustained by the evidence. The order of this court directing the entry by the trial court of said judgment was made after consideration of all the evidence in respondent's behalf produced before the court at the third trial of this cause. After such consideration, this court not only held that "the evidence received on the last trial is insufficient to sustain the special verdicts, or to support the findings, and that a case of adoption has not been established," but the opinion also declared that:

"We further hold that the court erred in denying the motion for nonsuit, in denying the motion for an instructed verdict, and in failing to enter judgment for appellants." Estate of Baird, 193 Cal. 290, 223 P. 1001.

It follows, therefore, that the judgment which was entered by the trial court in pursuance of the order of this court was in reality a judgment of nonsuit, and therefore it did not rest for its validity or depend for its support upon any evidence produced on behalf of the appellants herein. Being a judgment of nonsuit, it was made imperative by reason of the lack of evidence introduced by the respondent herein to prove the allegations of his petition and not as a consequence of any evidence on behalf of appellants. It was manifestly improper, therefore, for the trial court to set aside such a judgment on account of the insufficiency of the evidence of the appellants, or for the reason that appellants' witnesses were unworthy of belief, for the simple reason that it was not based upon and did not depend for its validity upon any evidence offered by appellants. This is made more apparent, and in our opinion absolutely conclusive, when we examine the record in this case and find that at the time the appellants herein made their motion for a nonsuit they had not introduced any evidence whatever. When a motion for a nonsuit is granted by the court upon the motion of the defendant, it is because of the failure of the plaintiff to prove a sufficient cause for the jury. Subdivision 5, § 581, Code Civ. Proc. It would certainly be illogical, and absolutely illegal, for the court to thereafter grant a new trial to plaintiff on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support said judgment of nonsuit. It is obvious, therefore, that it was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court for it to grant a new trial herein on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence.

[5] 3. The decision is against law. Under this heading the respondent contends that the Supreme Court upon the last appeal of this case (193 Cal. 225, 223 P. 974) was without power to direct the trial court to enter judgment in favor of appellants and denying respondent's petition for partial distribution. From what we have already said it appears that this court, after a thorough consideration of the question, decided that it had such power, and made its order accordingly. A petition for a rehearing was filed by the respondent, and the question was again presented to this court. The court denied such petition, and its action thereon must be taken as a ruling adverse to the contention now being made by respondent. On this appeal being taken, the respondent moved for a dismissal thereof, and one of the grounds upon which respondent based his said motion of dismissal was that the Supreme Court exceeded its authority in directing the trial court to enter said judgment. This motion to dismiss was denied. Estate of Baird, 231 P. 744. It will thus be seen that this court on three separate and distinct occasions has ruled upon this very identical question, and that its rulings have been consistently against respondent's contention. By these decisions this court has established the law of the case, and it is bound by the same. But, independent of the law of the case as established by the foregoing rulings of this court, the contention of respondent is in our opinion without merit. On the second appeal of this case, as we have before indicated, it was held that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings of adoption, and the case was reversed and a new trial was had. At that trial practically the same evidence was introduced upon the issue of adoption as was before the court on the former trial. At the close of petitioner's evidence the appellants, evidently relying upon the former decision of this court, moved the trial court for a nonsuit, which was denied. On appeal, this court held that there was no material difference between the evidence before the court upon the second and third trials and again held that such evidence was insufficient to prove that petitioner had been adopted, that the trial court erred in denying appellants' motion for a nonsuit, and reversed the judgment, and directed the trial court to enter judgment in favor of appellants. This order was based upon the conclusion of this court that there was no evidence to show adoption, and a nonsuit should have been granted. It was in effect an order to enter judgment of nonsuit in appellants' favor. Undoubtedly the court had the power to direct such a judgment under its general appellate powers as defined by section 53 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Without such power this court might go on reversing judgments of the trial court ad infinitum, with the latter court making findings contrary thereto. The result would be a contest of endurance between the two tribunals, which would not be conducive to the proper administration of the law, nor to any substantial benefit to the litigants concerned. As to the power of the appellate court to make such an order, the Supreme Court of Montana, under a Code provision in all respects similar to section 53 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state, has held:

"We conclude, therefore, that no general rule may be laid down to determine when this court will, upon deciding that a plaintiff should have been nonsuited, order his action to be dismissed. This court undoubtedly has the power, in all proper cases, to make such an order." State v. Second Judicial District, 40 Mont. 206, 105 P. 721.

The section of the New York Code upon the powers of appellate courts upon appeal is very similar to our own, and it has been repeatedly held by the courts of this state that the appellate courts have under the provisions of said section authority to direct the trial court to enter a judgment of nonsuit. Meginn v. Ramsdell, 163 App. Div. 232, 148 N. Y. S. 415; Peterson v. Ocean Electric R. Co., 161 App. Div. 720, 146 N. Y. S. 604; Norton v. Erie R. Co., 163 App. Div. 466, 148 N. Y. S. 769. This rule appears to be adopted practically without any dissent in substantially all jurisdictions. 4 Cor. Jur. p. 1190.

[6, 7] It is further contended by the respondent that the Supreme Court cannot make findings of fact and base a judgment thereon. With this proposition of law we agree. We think it quite evident, however, that the Supreme Court in this case did not attempt to make any findings of fact. What it did do was to hold that the trial court erred in denying the motion of appellants for a nonsuit, and reversed the case for that reason, and made its order directing said court to grant said motion and to enter judgment accordingly. It made no finding of fact whatever, but it found as a matter of law that respondent had not produced evidence sufficient to establish the allegations of his petition, and therefore that he had not made out a case for the jury. No findings of fact are necessary, nor have they any place, in an action where a judgment of nonsuit is rendered.

Respondent has presented an argument at some length upon the validity of section 629, Code of Civil Procedure, passed by the Legislature between the last trial of this matter and the date of the decision of this court reversing the judgment therein. Respondent claims that, if said order reversing said judgment was made pursuant to the authority of this section of the Code, it was erroneous and illegal, for the reason that the provisions of this Code section have no retroactive effect, and, even if they have such effect, the section itself is unconstitutional. We deem it unnecessary to consider the argument presented by respondent as to the validity of this section of the Code for the reason that in our opinion the court had power to make said order of reversal independent of and aside from any authority which said section attempts to confer upon appellate courts. It nowhere appears that this court on the former appeal assumed to act under the provisions of this section, and we do not understand that the respondent directly asserts that the action of this court taken therein was made by it by virtue of any authority conferred by said section. The validity of this section, therefore, is not material in this present proceeding.

[8] Neither are we impressed with the argument of respondent that by the order of this court directing the trial court to enter a judgment of nonsuit he was deprived of a jury trial. He was no more deprived of a jury trial by the action of this court ordering such a judgment than he would have been had the trial court itself granted the motion for a nonsuit at the trial of said action. The granting of a nonsuit when the evidence of plaintiff is insufficient to support a judgment in his favor is not a violation of the constitutional right to a jury trial. Bohn v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 5 Cal. App. 622, 91 P. 115.

4. Errors of law. The only error of law relied upon by respondent to justify the trial court in granting his motions for a new trial is based upon the action of the trial court in admitting testimony over the objection of the respondent covering the past history of respondent's mother prior to the time when her relations with the deceased, David J. Baird, commenced. This same question was before the court upon the last appeal, and it was there held (on page 280) that such evidence should not have been excluded.

[9] For the foregoing reasons there was not in our opinion any legal showing made by respondent to justify the trial court in granting his motions for a new trial. In arriving at this conclusion we are not unmindful of the well-established and salutary rule, which clothes the trial court with broad discretionary powers in the consideration and determination of motions of this character. While these powers are broad and extensive, they are not unlimited, and their exercise is controlled by other rules of procedure, equally well settled and beneficial in their application. One of these last-mentioned rules is that, where the trial court errs in the application of the legal principles applicable to a cause in granting a motion for a new trial thereof, such action will be corrected on appeal just as readily as if the motion had been overruled. Schramm v. Southern Pacific Co., 87 Cal. 425, 25 P. 481; Flood v. Petry, 165 Cal. 309, 132 P. 256, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 861; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 461, 168 P. 1037.

In our opinion the trial court, in granting the respondent's motions for a new trial, misapplied the legal principles applicable to this cause, and for that reason we think said order should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

MAY HOSIERY MILLS v. G. C. HALL & SON
et al. (Civ. 5040.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 30, 1926. Rehearing Denied April 29, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 27, 1926.)

1. Sales ⇨23(4)—Hosiery buyers, who signed and returned seller's "confirmation" copy of order, terms of which differed from their proposal, held bound thereby (Civ. Code §§ 1585, 1586).

Hosiery buyers, by signing and returning seller's "confirmation" copy of order, terms of which differed from buyers' proposal, accepted it, and were bound by its terms, since it constituted new proposal, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1585, 1586.

2. Sales ⇨58—Bracketed printed conditions in corner of hosiery seller's order sheet, which were not specifically referred to or called to attention of buyers, held no part of order written thereon and signed by buyers.

Bracketed printed conditions in upper left corner of hosiery seller's order sheet, on which confirmation copy of certain order was written, limiting time within which complaint as to quality could be made, which were not specially referred to or called to attention of buyers, held no part of contract, though such confirmation copy was signed by buyers, where accepted instrument had all elements of completed contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the May Hosiery Mills against G. C. Hall and another, doing business under the firm name and style of G. C. Hall & Son, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified.

Joseph G. De Forest, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Lucius L. Solomons, of San Francisco, and Fred C. Peterson, of Oakland, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action for goods sold and delivered. Plaintiff recovered judgment for the sum of $2,167.93 and costs, and defendant appeals.

The facts relating to the transaction show that about November, 1919, defendants purchased from plaintiff, through an agent, a certain quantity of hosiery. This particular purchase was made by sample, and no written order for the goods was signed by the defendants. On February 10, 1920, before delivery was made, defendants wrote directly to plaintiff at its mills in Nashville, Tenn., inclosing an additional order for 1,500 dozen hose. This order designated the number, kind, size, etc., of the hosiery desired. Plaintiff in a written communication acknowledged receipt of the same and inclosed two copies of what is designated in its letter "confirmation copies" to cover the proposed purchase. The letter requested that one of them be signed and returned. The confirmation order, so called, contained a recital of the defendants' order as to kind, number, and size of the hosiery ordered. These recitals were type-written upon an order sheet bearing the name and insignia of plaintiff's mills. The letter and confirmation orders differed somewhat from defendants' proposal as to terms. The letter contained a postscript reading, "our terms are net 30 days." The confirmation copies likewise differed in this respect, for they expressly provided, "Terms, net 30 days, f. o. b. mills." In addition thereto, and as part of the body thereof, they provided: "No expressage allowed on sample. This order is not subject to cancellation except per terms mentioned. * * *" In the upper left-hand corner, inclosed in brackets, there was printed, among other conditions, a statement to the effect that any claim that the quality of the goods was not in accordance with the terms of the contract would not constitute cause for cancellation, and that the complaint as to quality should be made within 15 days from the time of the delivery of the goods. This instrument was signed by defendants, and plaintiff made deliveries in accordance with its terms. The first installment was received by defendants on July 13, 1920, and the remainder between that date and August 19, 1920.

Defendants are commission merchants, and the goods as received by them when sold were supplied to the trade in the original boxes. On September 15, 1920, defendants advised plaintiff that certain of the merchandise delivered did not comply with the sample and that portions of the goods sold had been returned to them by their customers as being inferior in quality. Considerable correspondence was had between the parties concerning the matter. Finally plaintiff advised defendants that the hosiery delivered measured up to the sample in every particular, and it referred defendants to the printed clause in the contract existing between them, which provided that complaints, to be valid, must have been made 15 days after shipments were received. It also called attention to a further printed condition giving plaintiff the right to replace any defective merchandise, and it advised them that the company was ready to abide by the contract and replace any quantity of the merchandise that was not right. Certain samples were forwarded by defendants to plaintiff for its inspection, but plaintiff informed defendants that these measured up to the sample. The parties being unable to reach a settlement concerning their differences, defendants on the 12th day of October, 1920, inclosed plaintiff a check for the sum of $350.06 in payment of the portion of the merchandise they had kept or disposed of, and they also reshipped to it the balance of the hosiery which they claimed to be defective. The goods so returned were, after notice to defendants, sold by plaintiff at public auction and the proceeds credited to defendants' account, and this action was brought for the balance of the purchase price claimed to be due. After trial, the court found, among other facts, that the hose shipped did not conform in quality, texture, or fineness to the sample, but that the articles were what was known as "seconds." It further found, however, that notice was not made within 15 days after the receipt of shipments as provided for under the printed conditions contained on the face of the contract, and that in consequence plaintiff was under no legal obligation to make any offer to replace such portions of the merchandise as did not comply with the sample, and judgment was accordingly rendered in favor of plaintiff for the amount hereinabove mentioned. It is appellants' claim that the order given by them was accepted by plaintiff, and that the printing contained on the order blank formed no part of the contract, and that defendants were therefore not limited to the time therein provided in which they might make objection to the quality of the goods.

[1, 2] There can be no question but that the real contract between the parties is found in plaintiff's letter and the instrument designated by it as the "confirmation" copy. The offer of defendants was made on February 10, 1920. This offer was not accepted by plaintiff, but, on the contrary, it made a counter offer by its letter and the confirmation order, which contained terms, aside from the printed matter, quite different, as above indicated, to those proposed. The act of plaintiff in proposing terms at variance with defendants' offer amounted to a rejection by it of defendants' proposal and constituted a new proposal. Civ. Code, § 1585.

A proposal imposes no obligation unless accepted as made, and may be revoked at any time before its acceptance is communicated to the proposer. Civ. Code, § 1586.

Defendants having signed and returned the qualified offer based upon terms varying from those proposed, accepted it, and were bound by the terms thereof. Wristen v. Bowles, 22 P. 1136, 82 Cal. 84. This being so, it only remains to be considered whether the printed conditions appearing in the upper left-hand corner of the order, one of which refers to the time within which objection is to be made to the quality of the goods, formed a part of the contract. If they were, the judgment should be affirmed, notwithstanding the finding that the goods did not conform to the sample. If not, the judgment must be reversed. The rule seems to be firmly established that printed conditions on letter or billheads, or order blanks of the proposer not specially referred to or called to the attention of the other party to the contract, will not be regarded as a part thereof. 35 Cyc. 97; 13 Corp. Jur. p. 278, § 78.

In accordance with this principle it has been held, where an order was placed with the seller and the acceptance was by letter wherein the letter head contained the printed words, to wit, "All sales subject to strikes and accidents," that these words were not part of the contract, even though they were in the very letter of acceptance. Summers v. Hibbard, 50 Ill. App. 381; 38 N. E. 899, 153 Ill. 102, 46 Am. St. Rep. 872. To the same effect is Rosenbaum Hardware Co. v. Paxton Lumber Co., 97 S. E. 784, 124 Va. 346. In this case a letter head accepting an order contained the following printed matter:

"All agreements are contingent upon car supply, strikes, and accidents, or other delay from causes beyond our control. No allowance from invoices will be made without certificate of National Hardware Lumber Association—Quotations subject to change without notice. Acceptance of order subject to prior sale."

It was held that the effect of such printed matter did not qualify the absolute contract of purchase arising from the offer and the acceptance thereof in the absence of some specific reference thereto.

Again, in Menz Lumber Co. v. McNeeley, 108 P. 621, 58 Wash. 223, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1007, it appeared that the parties entered into a contract of purchase and sale as evidenced by an order upon the stationery of one of the parties upon which was printed, "Quotations subject to change without notice. Contracts made at home office only and contingent upon exigencies of transportation and accidents beyond our control," and it was held that, as the printed matter was not specially referred to in the proposal or acceptance, it formed no part of the contract. See, also, Sturm v. Boker, 14 S. Ct. 99, 150 U. S. 312, 37 L. Ed. 1093.

The same doctrine was applied in Cohen v. Walworth, 158 N. Y. S. 1081, 95 Misc. Rep. 479. In this case a sale of goods was made under a statement or order containing the buyer's name and address, the terms of credit and the salesman's name, all in typewriting. It was received and confirmed by the seller. Conditions, as here, were printed in small letters at the top of the order and above the description of the merchandise, to the effect that, if the goods were not in accordance with the conditions agreed upon, they should be returned within ten days, and it was held that the printed matter formed no part of the contract, there being no showing that it was called to the attention of the party by the correspondence. Again, in Weeks v. Johnson Co., 92 N. W. 794, 116 Wis. 105, an order appeared upon a blank filled up with writing containing certain terms of the contract. At the top and above the dates appeared in printing, "Terms net 30 days; goods shipped at buyer's risk," and on the side, "All claims for deficiency must be made within 15 days after receipt of the goods." It was held that the printed matter did not destroy, alter, or change the terms and conditions written in the order. See, also, Doddato v. Gatti-McQuade Co. (Sup.) 97 N. Y. S. 972.

In Patch v. Smith, 94 N. Y. S. 692, 105 App. Div. 208, the memoranda of an order was written upon the face of a printed blank, used by the seller when his customers purchased lumber from him. The order was complete in itself, but contained at the bottom, over the purchaser's name, printed matter reading, "This order is subject to acceptance at the main office." It was held that the printed condition constituted no part of the contract evidenced by such memoranda. We do not deem a further review of the authorities necessary. The offer as accepted contained all the elements and terms of a completed contract and lacked only the assent thereto of the defendants to whom it was addressed to make it such a contract. The mere presence of the printed conditions upon the order, without special reference thereto, became no part of the offer, and they cannot be read into the consummated agreement. The contention of respondent in support of the judgment that it was the duty of defendants to have read their contract, and, having read and signed it, they were bound thereby, is answered by what we have already said.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to discuss other points raised by appellant. It is admitted that plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum of $350.06, the amount of the check returned to defendants which had been forwarded to it to cover the cost of goods retained by them.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment rendered herein be modified by substituting this amount for the judgment rendered.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, appeal lies from final order by judge of superior court sitting in probate dismissing citation to testamentary trustee under section 1699 to show cause for not filing account, and hence certiorari will not lie under section 1068, order constituting basis of final determination, if petition be considered as special proceeding within sections 20-23.

The record herein shows in substance that the respondent superior court had jurisdiction in a certain probate proceeding before it wherein final distribution of an estate was ordered, which, in accordance with the terms of the will therein involved, included distribution to W. B. Scarborough Company, a corporation, as trustee in possession of certain real and personal property; that said W. B. Scarborough Company was not legally qualified to act as such trustee; that, although since such distribution a period of more than six months had elapsed, in violation of the provisions of the statute, said trustee had failed to file in said superior court an inventory of the properties received by it under such order of distribution, and had likewise failed to file any report or account as such trustee; that thereupon petitioner herein had filed a petition in said superior court by virtue of which a "citation" was caused to issue to said trustee, commanding it to show cause why it should not be required to file an account, and "why said corporation accepted such trust, to receive, manage and control the property of said estate"; that said corporation duly filed its answer to the said petition; that thereafter said matter came on regularly for hearing before said superior court, and, over the objections of petitioner, the following final order was entered, to wit: "Respondent having appeared and answered citation, the same is dismissed." The oral reason given for such order by the judge of the superior court at the time the order of dismissal was made was that—

"This court, sitting in probate, has no jurisdiction in the premises; the remedy of the petitioner, if any, is by bill in equity for an accounting brought in another department of this court."

On the part of the respondent herein it is urged, among other things, that, if, as contended by petitioner, the order of dismissal be construed as one finally dismissing and disposing of the proceedings, it is appealable, and consequently that certiorari will not lie.

[1] There would seem to be no question but that a probate court, as originally constituted, and as separated and distinguished from the now existing superior court, had no jurisdiction in a matter of the nature of that involved in the controversy which is the foundation for the present proceeding before this court. The real business of the probate court is the settlement of estates of deceased persons. When the order of final distribution and discharge of the executor under the will or the administrator of the estate has been entered, the work of the probate court with reference to the estate is ordinarily ended. As distinguished from the settlement of the estate, whatever additional legal business connected with the administration of the affairs of the estate may require judicial attention must ordinarily be administered in another forum. It is only when authorized by some express statute that the probate court, sitting as such, and disassociated from the superior court, may entertain matters of a nature distinct from the settlement of estates of deceased persons. In the proceeding presented to the probate court by the petition to require the filing of an account by the trustee acting under the trust created by the will, the probate court derived its authority from the provisions of section 1699 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which conferred complete jurisdiction in such matters. Were it not for such special statute, the probate court, as such, would be lacking in power to determine the question thus presented to it, and the petitioner would be relegated to the equity arm of the superior court for the relief, if any, to which he might be entitled.

In the case of Estate of Davis, 136 Cal. 590, 597, 69 P. 412, 414, in treating the subject of jurisdiction of probate courts, the following language is used:

"It may be said that at the present time in this state there is no probate court in the sense that the term has been used in the earlier volumes of the California reports. Under the fundamental law there is a probate jurisdiction vested in the superior court. It may be said that the probate court is gone, but that the probate jurisdiction remains. And that jurisdiction is now vested in the same court that exercises jurisdiction in cases of law and equity. Yet the probate jurisdiction of the superior court is different from its law and equity jurisdiction in this—it is essentially a jurisdiction under the control of the state Legislature.

That law-making power may enlarge it or may restrict it. The character and extent of the jurisdiction is not only a matter under legislative control alone, but the procedure by which that jurisdiction may be invoked and rights thereunder adjudicated is expressly laid down by statute; and that procedure must be followed, or relief under that jurisdiction cannot be secured. While the superior court in this state exercises both equity and probate jurisdiction, still the procedure to be followed in seeking relief within those two jurisdictions is widely varied. And if the probate procedure laid down by the Code is followed, then only relief under probate jurisdiction can be granted. In such a case general equity relief cannot be secured."

In the case of More v. More, 133 Cal. 489, 65 P. 1044, 66 P. 76, which was a suit to establish the fact that certain deeds to real property had been procured by fraud and undue influence, and, as a consequence, to compel a reconveyance of such property, or for general relief, one of the defenses was that the plaintiffs were estopped by a judgment rendered in the matter of an estate under the provisions of section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorized the institution of a proceeding in the course of administration of an estate for the purpose of determining heirship. In ruling against the contention of defendants therein, the court took occasion to lay down certain principles affecting the jurisdiction of probate courts, and reached a conclusion similar to that expressed in the case heretofore cited herein.

The case of Morffew v. San Francisco & San Rafael R. R. Co., 107 Cal. 587, 40 P. 810, was one in which a testator devised all his property to his wife in trust for his children. In the course of the administration, the lands belonging to the estate having been distributed in accordance with the provisions of the will, it was held (107 Cal. p. 594, 40 P. 810) that, in the absence of sections 1699 to 1703 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the probate court thereupon had no further control of the trust.

A case which in its declaration of the law goes somewhat beyond that which is stated in either of the foregoing cases is that entitled King v. Chase, 159 Cal. 420, 115 P. 207. It is there held that, since the enactment of section 1639 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which empowers the probate court to compel a personal representative of a deceased executor or administrator to render an account of the distribution of the estate of his testator or intestate, an action in equity will not lie for the same purpose, for the reason that the jurisdiction formerly existing in courts of equity "was based solely on the lack of any statutory method of accomplishing the same end by proceeding in probate."

From a consideration of the foregoing authorities it becomes clear that the proceeding initiated by petitioner in the probate court was entirely independent of any administration upon the estate in which the proceeding was entitled; that, in the absence of the statute (section 1699, Code Civ. Proc.), the only way by which petitioner successfully could have hoped for the relief which he sought was by bringing a suit in equity wholly disconnected from the administration of the estate in the probate court. It follows that, except in its entitlement, which was "In the Matter of the Estate of Calvin E. Parker, Deceased," the petition presented to the probate court a new proceeding, as distinguished from the proceedings necessarily incident to the settlement of the estate.

[2] According to the statutory provisions, judicial remedies are such as are administered by courts of justice, and are divided into two classes: (1) Actions; and (2) special proceedings. Sections 20, 21, Code Civ. Proc. An action is defined as "an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense," and "every other remedy is a special proceeding." Sections 22, 23, Code Civ. Proc.

It is apparent that, if the petition be considered as a special proceeding, the order by the judge sitting in probate dismissing the citation constituted the basis of the final determination thereof. In order to dispose of the question presented for decision, we shall assume, further, that the order is in effect a final order, though not formally entered as such. Section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an appeal may be taken from the superior court "(1) from a final judgment entered in an action, or special proceeding. * * *"

The case of McAdoo v. Sayre, 145 Cal. 344, 78 P. 874, would seem conclusive as to the ultimate question here presented, in that it is there ruled that an appeal lies from any order made by the probate court in a proceeding of the nature of that involved herein. In that case, as in the instant case, a proceeding was brought under section 1699, Code of Civil Procedure, but therein for the purpose of terminating a trust and directing the trustees "to pay over, convey, and deliver the property" of the trust estate to the person who claimed to be entitled thereto. According to the statement contained in the opinion rendered by the Supreme Court, there was "thus presented the question whether or not section 1699 of the Code of Civil Procedure confers upon the superior court, in the settlement of a trustee's account in the proceeding there established for that purpose, jurisdiction to ascertain and determine who are the persons entitled to the trust property, and, upon the final account, to direct the trustee to deliver the property to such persons in settlement of the trust, or to approve and confirm such delivery if already made by the trustee, * * *" and whether "the court has a general power, upon final settlement at the termination of the trust, to dispose of the entire matter of the trust by determining who, by the terms of the trust, is entitled to the property, and directing the trustees to turn over the same to such person. The decision of this question depends on the effect to be given to the language of section 1699 of the Code of Civil Procedure." After deciding that under said section 1699, Code of Civil Procedure, the superior court had jurisdiction of the question which was thus presented to it, the court denied the application for the writ of prohibition. In dealing with the appealability of a final order rendered in pursuance of the provisions of section 1699, Code of Civil Procedure, the court said:

"It is further provided in section 1699 of the Code of Civil Procedure that the report accompanying the account must give the names and post office addresses, if known, of the cestui que trust. This the report in question failed to give, and it is claimed that for that reason the proceeding is void, and that prohibition will lie to prevent further action therein. This, however, would not be sufficient cause for a writ of prohibition. An appeal lies from any order that may be made in the proceeding and it will furnish a sufficient remedy to any person aggrieved by the action of the court in attempting to proceed without jurisdiction."

Section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure lays down the conditions under which a writ of certiorari may be granted. Among them is the provision that the writ will lie only where it appears that "there is no appeal" from the action of the court which is sought to be reviewed.

From the case of McAdoo v. Sayre, supra, it clearly appearing that the order to which the consideration of the court is herein directed is appealable, it follows that, irrespective of the other questions which are submitted by the parties to this controversy, the writ should be discharged and the proceeding dismissed. It is so ordered.

7. Robbery ⇨17(1).

Information charging robbery need not allege facts showing degree of robbery charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Edward Egan was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Harry McKenzie, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. About midnight on October 28, 1924, P. I. Jacoby and wife, upon entering their home on Jackson street in San Francisco, were confronted by two masked men armed with a black automatic revolver, and robbed of jewelry valued at $12,000. The defendant, Edward Egan, was accused and convicted as being one of those committing the robbery. He has appealed from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] The first point urged for reversal is that the evidence is legally insufficient to sustain the verdict. The appellant Egan was charged jointly with one John H. Smith with the commission of the crime. They were tried separately, and each was convicted of robbery in the first degree. The evidence adduced by the prosecution in both cases was the same. Owing to the fact that the men perpetrating the crime were masked, the Jacobys were unable to recognize Smith or appellant as being either of the robbers, but their guilt was established by circumstantial evidence. Smith was tried and convicted first. He appealed, and one of the questions raised was the sufficiency of the evidence. The judgment of conviction was affirmed by Division Two, District One, of this court (People v. Smith, 241 P. 267), and afterwards a petition for a hearing before the Supreme Court was denied. All of the important circumstances connecting Smith and appellant with the commission of the crime and upon which their convictions were based are set forth in the opinion rendered on that appeal. The correctness of the statement of those circumstances is not challenged by appellant herein except as to one or two matters which we deem immaterial. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the decision in the Smith Case is controlling here upon the question of the sufficiency of the evidence. True, in the instant case, appellant endeavored to establish an alibi, but the question of the weight that should be attached to the testimony given in support of that defense was one for the jury to determine, and the fact that appellant was found guilty would seem to prove that the jury was not impressed with its truth.

[3] Appellant further contends that the trial court erred in receiving in evidence, over appellant's objection, a written accusatory statement made and signed by one Harry Wright, referred to also in the opinion in the Smith Case. The circumstances leading up to the making of said statement and its subsequent use by the prosecution were as follows: Three days after the robbery was committed, Wright, Smith, and appellant, the latter being known to Wright as Brown, were arrested in front of Wright's clothes-cleaning establishment on Gough street, San Francisco, while seated in a Ford sedan talking to a woman named Mamie Manning. They were taken into Wright's place of business, and, after a search was made, the stolen jewelry was found in Wright's pocket, and a black automatic revolver resembling the one used in the robbery was discovered in the pocket of a garment hanging in the room. Wright thereupon stated in the presence of Smith and appellant that he had obtained the jewelry from them; also that he had seen the revolver in appellant's possession that morning. To these accusatory statements Smith and appellant made no reply. Later, on the same day, Wright made and signed a written statement in which he related all of his dealings with appellant and Smith subsequent to the robbery, including the manner in which the latter two had brought the jewelry to his place of business and tried to dispose of it to other persons; also the fact that appellant had possession of the revolver. He likewise detailed a number of conversations had with them, which were accusatory in their nature, and directly connected them with the commission of the crime. On that same evening two police detectives read Wright's statement to appellant and Smith in Wright's presence, and they were asked if they had anything to say. There is a conflict in the evidence as to the nature of appellant's reply. The two officers testified that appellant's only reply was that he "had nothing to say." Mamie Manning and appellant testified that his reply was that he "had nothing to do with it"; that he was innocent. The trial court allowed the written statement to be received in evidence, stating at the time that at the request of appellant or upon the court's own motion the jury would be instructed as to how the statement should be regarded. The court afterwards gave to the jury the following instructions regarding it:

"It has become a well-settled rule that when a defendant, under conditions which fairly afford him an opportunity to reply, stands mute in the face of an accusation of crime, the circumstances of his silence may be taken against him as evidence indicating an admission of guilt. The reason for admitting the accusation in such cases is to explain the conduct of the accused. And in that connection, and with particular reference to the statement which has been read to you, I instruct you that you must first find that the defendant did stand mute, and, if there is a conflict of evidence on that point, you must find the fact beyond all reasonable doubt. If you have any reasonable doubt as to whether or not the defendant stood mute upon being confronted with this accusation, you must entirely disregard the statement. And the statement, by itself, means absolutely nothing, is proof of nothing, until such time as you connect up with it the conduct of the defendant upon this accusatory statement, if you find it to be an accusatory statement confronting him. Your theory and the manner in which you will proceed on that is: You will ignore the statement entirely; first take the defendant, then the statement being read to him; if you do not find beyond a reasonable doubt that he did stand mute, then disregard the statement entirely. If, however, you find beyond a reasonable doubt, that this defendant, under conditions which afforded him an opportunity to reply, stood mute in the face of accusation of crime, the circumstances of his silence may be taken against him as evidence indicating an admission of the facts in the statement contained."

[4] The rule is well settled that the acts and conduct of an accused person, when a statement of his guilty participation in the crime is made in his presence, may be presented to the jury as circumstances tending to show an implied admission of the truth of such statements. People v. Ong Mon Foo, 189 P. 690, 182 Cal. 697; People v. Shelest, 216 P. 389, 62 Cal. App. 213; People v. Bishop, 54 Cal. 129; People v. Amaya, 66 P. 794, 134 Cal. 531. The accusatory statement in the instant case was read to appellant in the presence of Wright, and appellant, being asked if he had anything to say, was fairly afforded an opportunity to make a reply. If, under those conditions, he made no reply to the accusatory statements, the circumstance of his silence was proper evidence to be considered by the jury as indicating an admission of guilt. People v. Ayhens, 117 P. 789, 16 Cal. App. 618. The court made it clear to the jury that the only purpose for which the statement was received in evidence was to show acquiescence or admission on the part of appellant in the face of the accusatory charges, and the jury was furthermore instructed that, unless they were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that appellant did stand mute when the accusatory statements were made, the matter should be entirely disregarded. We are of the opinion that in this state of the record no error has been shown.

[5, 6] Appellant urges also that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a conviction of first degree robbery because it did not appear that the revolver used in the perpetration of the crime was loaded. In support of this point appellant cites the case of People v. Sylva, 76 P. 814, 143 Cal. 62. That case is not in point, however, because it involved the construction of the term "deadly weapon" as used in the Code section defining the crime of assault with a deadly weapon (Pen. Code, § 245), which is a different term from the one employed in the Code section defining first degree robbery. The latter section declares that:

"All robbery * * * perpetrated * * * by a person being armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon is robbery in the first degree." Pen. Code, § 211a. (Italics ours.)

It is a matter of common knowledge that in committing robbery pistols are frequently used as bludgeons rather than as firearms. The fact, therefore, that a person perpetrating such crime is armed with a pistol is enough to justify the conclusion that the pistol used by him is a "dangerous" weapon within the meaning of said section 211a of the Penal Code, even though it be not loaded.

[7] The remaining point made by appellant is that the information was defective, in that it failed to allege facts showing the degree of the robbery charged. In cases of murder, arson, and burglary it has been held that allegations for such purpose are not essential (People v. Nichol, 34 Cal. 211; People v. Russell, 23 P. 418, 81 Cal. 616; People v. Smith, 68 P. 702, 136 Cal. 207; People v. Jefferson, 52 Cal. 452), and no valid reason appears why a different rule of pleading should be required in charging the crime of robbery. The point is therefore without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

DOODY v. DAVIE et al. (Civ. 5351.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 1, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 27, 1926.)

Municipal corporations — 200—Injury to foot while off duty, though resulting in no infection or general bodily illness, held "sickness" for which fireman might receive compensation under charter (Charter of Oakland, §§ 100, 100½).

Injury to city fireman's foot when stepping on nail while off duty, though resulting in no infection or general bodily illness, held to be "sickness" within Charter of Oakland, § 100, entitling him to payment of full salary during disability for first 60 days, in view of section 100½; "sickness" being any affection of body depriving it temporarily of power to fulfill usual functions, and including injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Sickness.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Arthur H. Doody against John L. Davie and others to compel payment of salary. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Markell C. Baer, Asst. City Atty., both of Oakland, for appellants.

Irving Magnes and Breed & Burpee, all of Oakland, for appellee.

LANGDON, P. J. Petitioner is a member of the Oakland fire department, and the defendants are members of the city council which passed a resolution refusing to pay petitioner's claim for salary during a period when he was incapacitated from performing his duties as a member of the fire department by reason of a sore foot, which condition was brought about by stepping on a nail while in the yard of his home on July 12, 1922, which was his "day off."

A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and defendants answered. Upon motion of petitioner, judgment was entered upon the pleadings, from which judgment defendants appeal. It appears from the pleadings that petitioner's foot was dressed by a physician every other day, and that for a period of nine days petitioner was unable to walk or put his weight upon the sore foot. Petitioner promptly reported to the fire department that he was "sick," and furnished the necessary doctor's certificate required by the department. The said department never asked for any other certificate, and on July 22, 1922, petitioner returned to his work, and furnished what is known in the department as a "well" certificate.

Thereafter petitioner endeavored to collect his monthly salary from the city of Oakland for the month of July, and received in lieu of his salary of $150, the sum of $106.45, being informed that the difference, or the amount of $43.55, was deducted from his salary by reason of his nine days' absence from his regular occupation. Thereafter petitioner duly demanded of the said city of Oakland the balance of $43.55, and the defendants, acting as the city council of the city of Oakland, by a resolution, regularly adopted, rejected the claim of petitioner, setting forth in the resolution of rejection the following:

"For the reason that the charter authorizes no compensation to firemen during periods of incapacity from duty arising solely from injuries not received in the performance of any duty."

The only question presented is one of construction of section 100 of the charter of the city of Oakland, the pertinent portion of which reads as follows:

"Section 100. * * * A member (of the fire department) becoming incapacitated for duty by reason of sickness shall be entitled to sixty days' sick leave without loss of pay. If such sickness shall continue, he shall be entitled to half-pay for an additional period of sixty days, and if such sickness shall continue further, he shall receive such pay, if any, as the council shall direct. A member on sick leave shall present such certificate of a reputable physician as the chief of the fire department may direct."

Was the petitioner "incapacitated for duty by reason of sickness" within the meaning of the charter provision just quoted? Appellants' position is based upon the fact that petitioner developed no infection in his foot and no nausea or general bodily illness, and it is argued that a distinction should be drawn between an injury received while "off duty" and an illness which had no traumatic cause. It is argued that this view is re-enforced by the provisions of section 100½ of said city charter, which provides that in cases of injury sustained while in the performance of duty, firemen shall receive medical aid, etc., in addition to the sick leave provided for, and that such injured firemen shall receive full pay during the continuance of such disability. Appellants maintain that, as payment of salary during disability caused by injuries received in the course of employment is treated in a section separate and apart from the one relating to "sickness," it is evident that there was no intention to provide for the payment of salary during disability caused by injuries received out of the course of the employment or it would have been included and not excluded by implication in section 100½.

We have given this argument due consideration, but it seems to us more logical to conclude that since, in the case of injuries occurring during the course of the employment, a fireman, in addition to his "sick leave" or payment of salary during disability, was allowed, by section 100½ of the charter, medical, surgical, and hospital treatment, including medicines, medical and surgical supplies, crutches and apparatus, including artificial members, this section created a difference between injuries in the course of performance of duty and those sustained at another time and that in the latter case, the fireman was merely entitled to the usual sick leave provided for in section 100 of the charter.

Appellants assert that the word "sickness" in section 100 does not include "injury." It certainly does in its popular significance and in the definitions found in such a standard work as Bouvier's Law Dictionary, wherein it is said:

"Sickness. By sickness is understood any affection of the body which deprives it temporarily of the power to fulfill its usual functions. It has been held to include insanity. L. R. 8 Q. B. 295. Sickness is either such as affects body generally, or only some part of it."

Appellants admit that if as a result of his injury the petitioner had developed a fever or nausea he would have been entitled to sick leave. The differentiation between such a case and the instant one is a very fine one, and one which seems to us incapable of practical application. If a fireman broke his leg or his wrist while off duty, the continuance of his salary would depend upon whether or not his constitution was strong enough to stand the shock and pain without some bodily reactions, such as fever, nausea, nervousness, etc. The inquiry into this question of fact would certainly be most unsatisfactory; its determination could not depend upon the degree of temperature developed, or the amount of nausea, faintness, dizziness or nervousness which would result. It is almost impossible to conceive of any injury severe enough to incapacitate a man which would not cause some general variation from normal in the functions of the body.

Appellants argue at some length the improvident and unusual result of paying men for services which they are unable to perform because of injuries suffered while about their own concerns on a day when they are relieved from duty. We can only suggest that, if this was not the intention of those responsible for the charter, it would be well to have it amended so as to remove the question from the realm of doubt. This court cannot do this, indirectly.

There are no authorities directly in point upon this question, but this court agrees with the trial court that the injury suffered by petitioner constitutes a "sickness" within the meaning of section 100 of the Oakland city charter.

The judgment is affirmed.

CUNIAL v. JUSTICE'S COURT OF CITY OF BERKELEY, ALAMEDA COUNTY, et al.
(Civ. 5010.)

1. Appearance ⇨20.

Appearance and contest of motion held to waive objection to sufficiency of notice thereof, notwithstanding attempt to preserve such objection.

2. Justices of the peace ⇨122(5)—Justice is not deprived of jurisdiction to set aside default because defendant, after contesting reversal of judgment in his favor, on remand stipulated amount of damages; the question whether defendant was estopped from seeking such relief being for the justice, and his determination, even if erroneous, not being void (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 859, 1010).

Where justice's court judgment for defendant was rendered after his default and he opposed reversal thereof, and on remand his attorney stipulated amount of damages to which plaintiff was entitled if any, justice was not deprived of jurisdiction to set aside default on motion under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 859 and 1010, the question whether defendant was estopped to seek such relief being for justice, and his action, though it might be erroneous, was not void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph M. Koford, Judge.

Application by Antonio Cunial for writ of certiorari against the Justice's Court of the City of Berkeley, County of Alameda, and another, Justice of the Peace in and for City of Berkeley. From a judgment of the superior court dismissing the application and affirming an order of the justice court, vacating the judgment rendered therein, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles A. Cogswell, of Berkeley, for appellant.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and W. Lindley Abbott, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. An appeal from a judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Alameda made on certiorari dismissing the petition and affirming an order of the justice's court of the city of Berkeley vacating a judgment therein rendered.

An action was brought by appellant in the latter court. Summons was served upon the defendant, on whose failure to appear default was entered. On the day of the entry of the default, but after its entry, defendant filed therein a demurrer to the complaint. Following the entry of the default mentioned, evidence was taken in support of the allegations of the complaint, whereupon the court entered judgment for defendant. Appellant appealed therefrom to the superior court upon questions of law. Following a hearing in that court, in which the attorney for the defendant participated, the judgment was reversed and the cause remanded. After the remand, but before further proceedings were had in the cause, defendant moved in the justice's court for an order setting aside his default, which motion was denied. Subsequently the cause was again heard in the latter court, the attorney for defendant being present; evidence was offered by appellant and a stipulation entered into between the attorneys for the parties as to the amount of damages suffered by appellant, whereupon judgment was entered against the defendant.

[1] On the fourth day thereafter defendant filed a written notice of motion and application for an order setting aside the default, vacating the judgment and permitting him to answer the complaint; the notice being accompanied by the affidavit of his attorney stating grounds for relief under the provisions of section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which motion was presented and granted within the time limited by the section named. It was alleged in the petition mentioned "that five days' notice for the time of hearing of said motion to set aside the default in the justice's court heard on the 13th day of December was never given," and "that the time of the hearing of said motion to set aside the default judgment heard on the 13th of December, 1923, was not given in the notice of motion." The notice mentioned, which was supported by an affidavit, was dated December 8, 1923, addressed to appellant and his attorney, and in all respects as to form complied with the requirements of section 1010 of the Code of Civil Procedure; it being therein stated that the motion would be made on November 13, 1923. The insertion of the latter date was evidently a clerical error, but one which did not mislead appellant, who appeared at the hearing on December 13, 1923. It was not alleged that the notice and affidavit were not served upon the latter, or that notice in fact of the hearing was not given; and while appellant appeared specially for the purpose of objecting to the placing of the motion on the calendar it appears from the petition that he thereafter presented argument in opposition to the granting of the motion. In the latter connection the petition states that counsel "did not waive the special appearance of himself on behalf of said plaintiff"; but the rule is well settled that having received notice in fact, he, by appearing and contesting the motion, waived objection to the sufficiency of the notice. Naylor v. Adams, 114 P. 997, 15 Cal. App. 353; Brown v. Sup. Ct., 223 P. 426, 65 Cal. App. 147, 151.

[2] It is contended by appellant that the defendant having opposed the reversal of the original judgment, and his attorney having stipulated to the amount of damages, following which the subsequent judgment was entered, and the motion to set aside the default made before the entry of the latter judgment having been denied, the court was without jurisdiction to grant relief under the provisions of section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure. None of the facts mentioned, whatever their effect in rendering erroneous the subsequent acts of the court, deprived it of jurisdiction. The question whether they were sufficient to estop the defendant from seeking relief under that section was one which the justice's court was empowered to determine; and such determination, if erroneous, was nevertheless made in the exercise of its jurisdiction. Granger v. Sup. Ct., 112 P. 854, 159 Cal. 1; Muir v. Sup. Ct., 58 Cal. 361; In the Matter of Hughes, 113 P. 684, 159 Cal. 360.

It appearing that the application for relief was filed, heard, and acted on within the time limited by the provisions of the section, and that appellant had notice of and appeared at the hearing, the order of the court was one made in the exercise of its jurisdiction and was not void. People v. Elkins, 40 Cal. 642, 647.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FATRIOUS. (Cr. 1297.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 26, 1926.)

Embezzlement ⚡44(1).Evidence held to support conviction of embezzlement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Gilbert Fatrious was convicted of embezzlement and other offenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Milton G. Gill, of Red Bluffs, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was found guilty of having committed offenses, as briefly charged in the information filed against him, as follows: Count 1, embezzlement; count 2, falsifying corporate records; count 3, embezzlement; count 4, alteration of corporate records; count 5, embezzlement; count 6, falsifying corporate records; counts 7, 8, 9, and 10, false entry by agent of bank; count 11, forgery. Sentence was passed on defendant as to counts 1, 3, and 11, and the passing of sentence was suspended as to all other counts of which defendant was found guilty. He has appealed from the judgment and from an order of court denying his motion for a new trial.

The only complaint made by appellant is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict as to embezzlement. Other than a general statement by appellant that "there is wholly a lack of evidence showing any receipt of any item of money by this defendant or any money received by him, nor is there any evidence of the defendant's fraudulent appropriation of any of the money or property of the bank to his own use," only the most incomplete and inadequate attempt is made to lead the way or in any manner to point out in what respect the evidence failed to support the verdict.

Defendant was employed in the exchange department of a bank. Without quoting the testimony given by the several witnesses introduced by the prosecution, or attempting to summarize the evidence adduced on the trial, it may be said that it clearly appears from such evidence that by a manipulation of accounts, drafts, and money of which defendant had charge, he was able to and did commit the crime of embezzlement as charged in each of counts 1 and 3 of the information, as well as the crime of forgery as charged in count 11 of the information. In view of the voluminous character of the evidence, it would seem a waste of time and energy for this court to demonstrate the correctness of the verdict. The claim of appellant that no cash came into his hands, and that there is no evidence of a shortage existing at any time in the cash delivered by him to the vault teller (as compared with the amount which should have been delivered), ignores evidence definitely supplying those facts. It suffices to say that the evidence is entirely satisfactory and convincing as to defendant's guilt.

The judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action to determine validity of election of directors of corporation and to restrain defendants from acting as such by Thomas Simpson and others against William Nielson and others. From an order granting a temporary restraining order, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. F. Riley, H. S. Young, and Bert F. Rabnowitz, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

John H. Riordan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. The plaintiffs, who constitute the majority in number and in ownership of stock of the stockholders of the Diamond Laundry Company, a corporation, commenced this action under the provisions of section 315, Civil Code, to determine the validity of an election of directors of the corporation held on March 5, 1924. The plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that three of their number were elected directors at said meeting, but that defendant Collopy, claiming to act under a written proxy from one of the plaintiffs, voted his stock at said meeting, and that three of the defendants thereby claimed to have been elected directors; that these three defendants had taken possession of all the property of the corporation to the injury of the plaintiffs. The complaint closed with a prayer that the defendants be restrained from acting as officers of the corporation and from possessing its books and properties, and that the election of the three plaintiffs—Simpson, Neibel and Mehegan—be declared valid, that the voting agreement, or proxy, be declared void, and for other equitable relief.

The trial court found all the allegations of the first cause of action to be true, and issued its temporary restraining order preventing the interference by defendants with the three plaintiffs named in their exercise of the functions of the offices to which they claimed to have been elected. From this order the defendants have appealed on typewritten transcripts.

[1-3] The first point raised is that the trial court was without jurisdiction to issue the order because of the code provisions denying the right to an injunction to prevent the exercise of a public or private office by the person in possession. Section 526, Code Civ. Proc. The section has no application to a case of this kind. This action is brought under section 315, Civil Code, which expressly provides a mode of procedure to determine the validity of elections to corporate offices. The proceeding is one in equity. Dulin v. Pacific Wood & Coal Co., 35 P. 1045, 37 P. 207, 103 Cal. 357, 364. Thus the court had the power to issue a temporary restraining order as auxiliary relief pending final determination of the controversy. See Foster v. Superior Court, 47 P. 58, 115 Cal. 279, 284; Title Ins., etc., Co. v. Cal. Development Co., 152 P. 542, 171 Cal. 173, 208. The fact that the complaint may not have pleaded all the circumstances required by the section of the Code authorizing the action does not affect the question of jurisdiction to issue the order. Brown v. Anderson-Cottonwood Irr. Dist., 190 P. 797, 183 Cal. 186, 187.

[4] The appellants rely upon a voting agreement executed June 16, 1922, wherein Neibel, one of the plaintiffs, agreed with certain of the defendants that the defendant Collopy should vote their stock at all meetings of the corporation in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the signers of the agreement. The term of the agreement was fixed at 12 years, and Collopy was named as proxy for a period of 5 years. The appellants rely upon Smith v. San Francisco & N. P. Ry. Co., 47 P. 582, 115 Cal. 584, 35 L. R. A. 309, 56 Am. St. Rep. 119, wherein a similar agreement, except as to the time of its duration, was held valid. After that decision, the Legislature enacted section 321b, Civil Code, which provides that no proxy for the voting of stock shall be valid unless it shall specify the length of its duration, which shall not exceed 7 years, and that all proxies for such purposes shall be revocable.

It is useless to discuss cases from other jurisdictions, when the question is plainly covered by our statutory law. There is no uncertainty or ambiguity in the section of the Code cited. A proxy given for a term in excess of 7 years is invalid, and one for any term is revocable at the pleasure of the stockholder. Cases involving voting trust agreements likewise have no application here. The parties entered into an agreement in violation of the express terms of the statute, and in July, 1923, nearly a year prior to the date of the stockholders' meeting, Neibel gave written notice of revocation of this agreement. The trial court merely followed the express terms of the statute in holding that he had a right to do this, and we see no need of citation of authority in support of his order.

Order affirmed.

SHAPIRO v. R. G. WHITLOCK CO.
(Civ. 4427.)(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 25, 1926.)Judgment $\S$ 683, 729—Judgment in action wherein trade acceptance was mentioned in counterclaim as having been offered in place of money held not bar to action on acceptance brought by assignee for value before maturity, who stated he intended suing on acceptance.

Where, in another action brought by present defendant, counterclaim was interposed for claim of damages due under contract, stating that trade acceptance was offered instead of actual money, judgment therein held not bar to present action on trade acceptance by assignee for value before maturity, who was attorney for defendant of former action, and who stated to court at that time that he intended to prosecute action on acceptance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by A. Shapiro against the R. G. Whitlock Company on a trade acceptance. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank G. Tyrrell and McComb & Hall, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Shapiro & Shapiro, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant in its answer averred that the trade acceptance for $398.50 herein sued upon was "pleaded in the answer" of plaintiff's assignor, Harvey, in an action of R. G. Whitlock Company against Harvey, the said Harvey (under the fictitious name Harvey Machine Company) being the payee named in the trade acceptance; "that the issues in this action were in said former action fully determined and adjudicated."

At the trial of the present action appellant offered in evidence the judgment roll in the former action, together with a paragraph of the instructions of the court to the jury in that action, and a part of the evidence received at the trial. To these offers the respondent objected. There does not appear to have been an immediate ruling on the objections. The matters thus offered are set out in the transcript. Immediately following this record of the evidence the court made a general ruling covering said preceding matters, giving its reasons therefor, and sustained the objections. The court held that the plea of res adjudicata failed because the subject-matter of the former action was not the same as the present action, and because the parties are not the same, and because the trade acceptance was not the property of either of the parties to the former action. By the evidence it was shown that the trade acceptance was transferred to respondent, Shapiro, for an actual and valuable consideration prior to maturity. It further appeared from said evidence that Shapiro was the attorney for Harvey in the former action, and that at the trial of said former action Shapiro informed the court that this present action was then pending, and that he still expected to try to obtain judgment thereon.

The principal ground of appeal by the defendant herein is that the court erred in refusing to admit the offered evidence to which we have referred. We are of the opinion that said evidence was properly excluded. In the former action the counterclaim of defendant Harvey set out certain demands for damages on account of alleged nonperformance by plaintiff of a contract for the purchase by plaintiff of certain materials which were to be manufactured and delivered by Harvey to the plaintiff. The only reference in the counterclaim to any trade acceptance consisted of a statement that, when defendant demanded a payment, which he claimed to be due on the contract, he "was offered a trade acceptance instead of actual money."

The evidence herein was clearly sufficient to sustain the court's finding that the trade acceptance was assigned before maturity and for value to Shapiro, and that he is the owner thereof. There is no evidence that he was not such purchaser, or that he had notice of any defenses thereto when he accepted the assignment of the acceptance to himself. The fact that he was the attorney for Harvey in the said action of R. G. Whitlock Company against Harvey (an action which was commenced after Shapiro had filed his complaint in the present action) has no tendency to prove that Shapiro was a party to that action, or that he had any personal interest therein.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DUGAT. (Cr. 1313.)(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 25, 1926.)

Criminal law $\S$ 1169(1)—In prosecution for manslaughter, erroneous admission of evidence tending to show threats, malice, and previous motive, which if true showed defendant despicable, and evidence that his wife was engaged in immoral business at time of trial, held prejudicial.

In manslaughter trial, where evidence was circumstantial only, erroneous admission of evidence of threats, malice, and previous motive, which, if true, showed defendant to be lowest and most despicable kind of man, who would be hated by all mankind, and was followed by evidence that his wife was engaged in immoral business at time of trial, though she was not called as witness, held so highly prejudicial as to require reversal of conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; L. D. Jennings, Judge.

Louis Dugat was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

YORK, J. The defendant was charged with the crime of manslaughter, and with no other offense. He was found guilty of this offense, and from that judgment, and the order denying his motion for a new trial, this appeal was taken.

During the course of the trial the district attorney insisted upon calling the charge against the defendant murder, and introduced as part of the state's main case, certain evidence which might tend to show threats, malice, and previous motive. The people attempt to excuse this order of proof on the theory that certain evidence was given by the defendant at a coroner's inquest, and the people claim they had a right to anticipate a possible defense in accordance with such testimony there given.

The trial court in its instructions correctly laid down the law as to manslaughter, and in clear and concise language instructed the jury as to what evidence they could consider, and laid down in such instructions a strict rule to the jury, directly instructing them at length that evidence tending to prove other offenses must not lead them to convict on that evidence, nor on less evidence than sufficient to warrant a conviction under the law of the offense charged, to wit, manslaughter and nothing else; and that he could only be convicted of the offense charged, and then only if proved to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that he was guilty thereof; and that he could not be convicted unless, under all of the instructions of the court, they believed beyond a reasonable doubt that he was guilty of the crime charged. One of the instructions also was that they should not be influenced by passion or prejudice.

This is not a mere matter of order of proof, nor is it a mere technical objection that is raised on behalf of the defendant, but is a matter which strikes at the very right of defense itself. The evidence so introduced, if true, showed the defendant to be one of the very lowest and most despicable kind of men, to be in fact such a man as would make him hated by all mankind, and was followed by evidence that the wife of the defendant was engaged, at the time of the trial, in an immoral business in a negro dive at Tia Juana, although the wife herself was not called as a witness by either party to the action. The erroneous admission of this evidence was very seriously prejudicial to the right of the defendant. People v. Clark, 203 P. 781, 55 Cal. App. 46, 47 and 48, and cases therein cited.

The case against the defendant was a circumstantial case only. If there had been any direct evidence, our ruling might be different than what it is, but after an examination of the entire case we hold that the erroneous admission of the evidence referred to caused a miscarriage of justice, and that the substantial rights of the defendant were thereby violated, because, by reason of the prejudice that such evidence may have caused in the minds of the jury, the defendant might have thereby been compelled to take the stand. If this evidence had been introduced as proper rebuttal evidence after the defendant had voluntarily taken the stand and testified, and after the defense had closed, we might have to pass upon several other questions, a consideration of which is made unnecessary by the foregoing ruling.

Said judgment is therefore reversed, and a new trial is ordered.

Action by B. M. Benson against Julius Olender and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

See, also, 240 P. 61.

Lewis H. Smith and Claude L. Rowe, both of Fresno, for appellants.

Glenn M. De Vore and B. M. Benson, both of Fresno, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. The defendants appeal from a judgment against them as sureties on a replevin bond. The following facts appear from the findings of the court:

On December 12, 1922, Sam Caplan and I. H. Caplan commenced an action in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Fresno, against one S. S. Smith. Said action was in replevin, the plaintiffs therein claiming to be entitled to the possession of certain personal property then in the possession of defendant. A writ of replevin issued and the goods were seized by the sheriff and delivered to the plaintiffs. The defendant Smith filed an answer in said action, demanding the return of the property or its value, alleged to be $4,000. The plaintiffs in said action filed a replevin bond signed by Olender and Samuels, defendants herein, which bond contained the following clause:

"Now therefore, we, the undersigned, residents of the said county, in consideration of the premises and of the delivery of the said property to the said plaintiffs do hereby undertake and acknowledge to the effect that we are jointly and severally bound in the sum of eight thousand dollars, being double the value of said property as stated in said affidavit, for the prosecution of the said action, for the return of the said property to the said defendant, if return thereof be adjudged, and for the payment to the said defendant of such sums as may from any cause be recovered against the said plaintiffs."

Thereafter, said replevin action came regularly on for trial on April 28, 1924, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant Smith and against the plaintiffs Sam Caplan and I. H. Caplan in the sum of $1,750, together with costs. Said judgment became final and a writ of execution issued thereon was returned unsatisfied. Demand was made upon the defendants herein as sureties on the bond to pay the amount of the judgment, and they refused to do so. Smith assigned the judgment in the replevin action to plaintiff, and the defendants, on November 6, 1924, paid $721.95 upon the same, leaving a balance due thereon of over $1,200.

Incidentally, in June, 1924, a certain action was filed in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Fresno, by the Caplan Finance Corporation against S. S. Smith, the defendant in the original replevin action, and his wife. In said action brought by the Caplan Finance Corporation a writ of attachment was issued and served upon Sam Caplan and I. H. Caplan, which attached all the money, goods, debts, etc., or other personal property belonging to said S. S. Smith in the possession or under the control of said Sam and I. H. Caplan. Prior to the trial of the present action, said writ of attachment in the case of Caplan, Finance Corporation v. Smith was dissolved by order of court.

[1,2] The first objection made upon the present appeal is that the defendants herein are not bound to pay the amount of the judgment rendered in the prior action of Caplan v. Smith for the reason that said judgment was not entered in the alternative for a return of the property, or if return could not be had, then for the value thereof. The verdict of the jury was in the alternative, but, as recited in the findings herein, the judgment entered was merely for the value of the property. The sureties claim to have been deprived of a substantial right, in that their principal may not satisfy the judgment by returning the property.

Respondent claims the instant case falls within the exception to the general rule, namely, that where it is established that the property cannot be returned, the judgment need not be in the alternative. We might indulge in the presumption of the regularity of the judgment and conclude that the evidence in the replevin suit indicated that the property could not be returned were it not for the fact that the verdict of the jury was in the alternative, and as the jury is the trier of the facts, we may not presume in the face of its verdict in the alternative that the evidence demonstrated the property could not be returned. And this brings us to another objection to this judgment in the replevin action, which is that it is in violation of section 664, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that a "judgment must be entered in conformity to the verdict." Said section declares that "in no case is a judgment effectual for any purpose until so entered."

In Nickerson v. Cal. Stage Co., 10 Cal. 520, it was said:

"The defendant objects that under our statute there should have been a finding of the value in the replevin suit, and an alternative judgment for the return of the property or the payment of its value. This would have been necessary to enable the plaintiff to recover against the sureties on the replevin bond but the failure to do so cannot affect his rights as to the defendants."

The case of Field v. Lumbard, 73 N. W. 703, 53 Neb. 397, considers the question involved upon this appeal, saying:

"* * * The sureties contract with a view to an alternative judgment if the plaintiff should be unsuccessful. They are discharged, pro tanto at least, by a return of the property if the judgment be regular. But, if the judgment be absolute, a return of the property would not satisfy it, and their liability would be thereby increased. Nor do we think that it is their duty to appear in the replevin suit, and see that the judgment is proper. It is rather the duty of the defendant therein to see that the judgment is such that it will protect him than for the sureties, who are not parties, to appear and see that it is of such a character that it will bind them."

In Gallarati v. Orser, 27 N. Y. 324, it was said:

"In this case there was a judgment for damages only, and not for a delivery to the plaintiff of the property of which replevin was sought. This was a departure from section 277 of the Code, which prescribes the terms of a judgment. It is required to be for the possession, or for the recovery of the possession, or for the value thereof in case a recovery cannot be had, and of damages for the detention. The plaintiff is not entitled to waive the claim to the possession, and to have an absolute judgment, in damages, to the value of the property. * * * But we are not to assume that the court would not, if the plaintiff had required it, have rendered a legal judgment which would have concluded not only the defendant, but his sureties and the sheriff. The consent of the plaintiff to take a judgment not appropriate to the action, or warranted by law, would, if the sureties and the sheriff were concluded, be changing their contract in a most material point. We cannot say but, if a proper judgment and an execution in conformity with it had been issued, the bail or the sheriff would have found the property and have caused it to be taken and delivered to the plaintiff, on the writ of retorno habendo. One of the most common principles in the law of principal and surety is that the latter cannot be charged beyond the fair import of his undertaking, nor where there has been any substantial change of the contract of the party for whose performance he has become responsible. To hold the defendant liable in this case would be a palpable denial of that principle."

The case of Thomas v. Irwin, 90 Ind. 557, is also in favor of the appellants upon the question raised, as are various other cases cited in their briefs which we shall not discuss herein.

There is also another objection made by appellants to the judgment in the instant case, which grows out of the contention that the action was prematurely brought because at the time it was commenced Sam and I. H. Caplan, the principals on the replevin bond, were restrained by a court order from paying the amount of the judgment in the replevin suit. This contention is based upon the facts with relation to the attachment in the suit of Caplan Finance Corporation v. Smith, mentioned heretofore. However, we need not discuss the legal situation created by this incident, because the matter previously considered is decisive of the appeal.

The judgment is reversed.

Judgment ¶256(6)—In action for services and materials, where there was no counterclaim or cross-complaint, finding that defendant promised to pay sum claimed held to require judgment in that amount.

In action for services rendered and materials furnished, where there was no counter-claim or cross-complaint questioning value of materials or whether all materials furnished were actually used, finding that defendant promised to pay sum claimed held to require judgment in that amount without reduction based on finding that all materials had not been used.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco Credit Clearing House against R. H. MacGowan for services rendered and materials furnished. From a judgment for only a portion of the sum claimed, plaintiff appeals. Reversed with directions.

Cross & Brandt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph J. Bullock, of Redwood City, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued in assumpsit for $307.20 for services rendered and materials furnished in the repair of a pump at the special instance and request of the defendant. The complaint stated two causes of action—one, an express promise to pay the amount sued for; and the other, that the said sum was the reasonable value of the services and materials. The answer denied both the promise to pay and that said sum was the reasonable value. An amendment to the answer set up the special defense that the plaintiff's assignor had been called on to repair the same pump on two previous occasions, but that the work had been done in an improper manner, necessitating the work for which the account in suit was rendered.

The trial court found that these allegations of the answer were untrue; that the defendant ordered from plaintiff's assignor the services and materials and promised to pay therefor the sum of $307.20; that, in pursuance of said order, the services were rendered and the materials were furnished as alleged in the complaint; and that the reasonable value thereof was the sum of $307.20. The Court found further that some of said materials were not used in the repair of the pump, but were left on defendant's premises, and that the reasonable value of such materials was $190. Judgment was then rendered for plaintiff in the sum of $117.20; the value of the unused materials having been deducted from the sum sued for. The plaintiff appeals on typewritten transcripts.

The single ground of appeal is that the appellant is entitled to judgment in the amount prayed, on the finding that the respondent promised to pay that sum. Of this there cannot be any doubt. The respondent did not plead a counterclaim or a cross-complaint for damages. He did not question the account which was rendered him long prior to the commencement of the action, and he did not return, or offer to return, the materials which he claimed had not been used. No issue was raised as to these materials, and this finding is wholly outside of the case.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for the appellant as prayed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 6, 1926.)

1. Criminal law 1024(4).

People cannot appeal under Pen. Code, § 1238, from order sustaining objection to pronouncing judgment and granting motion to dismiss following verdict not in compliance with section 1158; such order not being one in arrest of judgment, in view of section 1185.

2. Criminal law 1202(5).

Verdict, silent on question of former conviction, which was charged in information, held in effect a finding for defendant thereon.

3. Criminal law 972—Motion in “arrest of judgment” challenges sufficiency of information, and can be based only on defects appearing on its face.

Motion in “arrest of judgment” which is practically demurrer interposed to accusatory pleading after conviction, challenges sufficiency of information, and can be based only on defects appearing on its face.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Arrest of Judgment.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

P. Cordosco was charged with violation of the Wright Act. From an order sustaining defendant's objection to pronouncing judgment and dismissing proceedings and discharging defendant, the People appeal. On motion to dismiss. Appeal dismissed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Richardson & Scherrer, of Riverside, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action the information charged the defendant with the crime of violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), a misdemeanor, by willfully and unlawfully having in his possession intoxicating liquor. The information further charged prior commission of a like offense, for which it was alleged that he had been prosecuted, and had been convicted and sentenced. After a general plea of not guilty, this case was tried before a jury, which found the defendant guilty as charged. The verdict did not comply with the requirement of section 1158 of the Penal Code that in a case so presented the jury must find specifically upon the charge of previous conviction.

Thereafter, at the time fixed by the court for pronouncing judgment, the defendant objected as follows:

“Defendant, by his counsel, objects to any judgment being pronounced on the grounds that the court has no jurisdiction to pronounce judgment and moves the court to discharge the defendant on the grounds that the verdict is insufficient and that the court has no jurisdiction to pronounce judgment.”

After argument of the question thus presented, the court made the following order:

“Objection to pronouncing judgment sustained, motion to dismiss granted, information and all proceedings dismissed, defendant discharged and bail bond exonerated.”

Thereupon the district attorney gave notice of appeal, and in due course the transcript on appeal was filed.

[1] The defendant now moves to dismiss this appeal, upon the ground “that the order and judgment made by the court sustaining the defendant's and respondent's objections to the pronouncement of judgment, and dismissing the proceedings and discharging the defendant, on December 19, 1925, is not such an order and judgment coming within the provisions of section 1238 of the Penal Code, granting to the plaintiff and appellant the right of an appeal therefrom.”

The cases in which an appeal may be taken by the people are those set forth in section 1238 of the Penal Code. The appeal herein is not one of those in which the right of appeal by the people is allowed by said section, unless the order above mentioned was in effect “an order arresting judgment.” Section 1185 of the Penal Code, relating to motions in arrest of judgment, reads in part as follows:

“A motion in arrest of judgment is an application on the part of the defendant that no judgment be rendered on a plea or verdict of guilty, or on a verdict against the defendant, on a plea of a former conviction. It may be founded on any of the defects in the indictment or information mentioned in section ten hundred and four, unless the objection has been waived by a failure to demur, and must be made and determined before the judgment is pronounced.”

[2] The objection of defendant as made in the court below was not directed against the pronouncing of judgment “on a verdict against the defendant on a plea of a former conviction,” nor on a charge of former conviction. For since the verdict was silent on the subject of former conviction, it was in effect a finding in favor of defendant upon the question of prior conviction. People v. Dueber, 34 Cal. App. 686, 690, 163 P. 578, citing and quoting from People v. Eppinger, 109 Cal. 294, 41 P. 1037.

[3] Nevertheless, the objection of defendant in the court below was directed against the rendition of any judgment on the “verdict of guilty” referred to in section 1185 of the Penal Code, concerning motions in arrest of judgment. But it was not an objection or motion based upon any defect in the information. Being thus outside the scope of a motion in arrest of judgment as defined by the Penal Code, the objection was not a motion of that description, and the order sustaining the objection was not an order arresting judgment.

"A motion in arrest of judgment challenges the sufficiency of the indictment or information to state a public offense. The office of such a motion is neither more nor less than that of a demurrer. It is practically a demurrer interposed to an accusatory pleading after conviction." People v. Wilbur, 33 Cal. App. 511, 165 P. 729.

"As to the motion in arrest of judgment, that can be based only upon defects appearing upon the face of the indictment or information." People v. Cole, 127 Cal. 545, 549, 59 P. 984, 985.

The order in question here was, in legal effect, merely an order dismissing the action from which order there is no appeal.

The appeal is dismissed.

We concur: HOUSER, J.; YORK, J.

in provisions of section 1, subds. 1-13, providing that act applies to vagrant children, etc., and this regardless of actual effect on minor or whether penal under other statutes.

2. Intoxicating liquors ⚡215—Information charging that accused sold wine to minor, but not alleging that sale tended to cause minor to habitually visit place where intoxicating liquor was sold, not in company with parent, or otherwise violate law, held insufficient (Juvenile Court Law [St. 1925, pp. 1225, 1246] § 1, subds. 6, 7, 8, 11, 13, and section 21; Pen. Code, §§ 397b, 950-952, 954).

Information charging violation of Juvenile Court Law, § 21, by selling wine to a minor, tending to cause him to visit place where intoxicating liquor was sold and to possess intoxicating liquor, was insufficient under Pen. Code, §§ 950-952, 954, as, in view of section 397b, it did not charge that sale tended to cause minor to habitually visit place not in company with parent or guardian, or otherwise violate Juvenile Court Law, § 1, subds. 6, 7, 8, 11, 13, especially as minor's possession might be lawful.

3. Indictment and information ⚡71—Where facts necessary to complete description of offense are omitted from information, and do not follow as necessary conclusion from allegations, demurrer is properly sustained.

Where ultimate facts necessary to complete description of offense are omitted from information, and do not follow as a necessary conclusion from its allegations, demurrer is properly sustained, as defendant is entitled to a clear statement of offense with which he is charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Criminal prosecution under Juvenile Court Law, § 21, against Victor Lamanuzzi. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the information, the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., Geo. R. Lovejoy, Dist. Atty., and William A. White and C. M. Ozias, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of Fresno, for the People.

Lindsay & Gearhart, of Fresno, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An information was filed against respondent in the superior court in and for the county of Fresno, the pleading consisting of three counts identical in form, with the exception of the date on which the act charged was alleged to have been committed and the names of certain minors connected therewith. The minors mentioned were two boys both aged 17 years, and a girl of the age of 15 years. The charge in each count, as shown by the language of the first, which we quote, was as follows:

"Victor Lamanuzzi is accused * * * of the crime of misdemeanor, to wit, violation of section 21 of the Juvenile Court Laws committed as follows: The said Victor Lamanuzzi on

PEOPLE v. LAMANUZZI. (Cr. 1273.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 31, 1926.)

1. Infants ⚡16—Penal provisions apply to acts tending to bring minors within act, and without regard to effect on minor, or whether penal under other statutes (Juvenile Court Law [St. 1925, pp. 1225, 1246] § 1, subds. 1-13, and section 21).

Penal provisions of Juvenile Court Law, § 21, apply to acts tending to bring minors with-or about the 1st day of November, 1924, at and in the said county of Fresno and state of California, and prior to the filing of this information, did willfully, unlawfully, and knowingly commit certain acts, to wit, sell and furnish wine, said wine being then and there fit for use for beverage purposes, and then and there containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume, to Bud Stoffers, which caused and tended to cause the said Bud Stoffers, a minor child of the age of 17 years, to visit a place where intoxicating liquor was sold, bartered, exchanged, and given away, to have intoxicating liquor in his possession, which said intoxicating liquor was then and there fit for use for beverage purposes and then and there contained more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume. All of which is contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

Respondent demurred generally and specially to each count, alleging that the facts stated therein did not constitute a public offense, that the pleading did not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, and that more than one offense was charged therein and not charged in the manner provided in section 954 of the Penal Code, in that defendant was therein charged with causing and tending to cause the minor named to visit a place where intoxicating liquor was sold, bartered, exchanged, and given away, and also charged with having caused and tended to cause the minor to have intoxicating liquor in his possession; the offenses not being separately stated. The demurrer to each count was sustained upon all the grounds, and the people, having declined to amend, appeal from the order.

[1] The purpose of section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1246) is to prevent minors from being brought within any of the provisions of subdivisions 1 to 13, inclusive, of section 1 of the act; and the penal provisions thereof apply to acts or omissions which in a given case tend to that result without regard to their actual effect upon the minor. People v. DeLeon, 170 P. 173, 35 Cal. App. 467. These acts or omissions may or may not be penal offenses under the provisions of other statutes; their character for the purposes of the act being determined by their effect or tendency. People v. Baker, 175 P. 88, 38 Cal. App. 28. Where the gravamen of the offense under the section mentioned is the tendency of an act or omission, it is, according to the general rule applicable to criminal pleadings, essential to a complete description of the crime that it be alleged that the act or omission charged tended to have the effect designed to be prevented. People v. Salisbury, 175 P. 88, 59 Cal. App. 299, 300; Joyce on Indictments, § 375; People v. Dunlap, 45 P. 183, 113 Cal. 72, 73; People v. Robles, 49 P. 1042, 117 Cal. 681.

[2] In the instant case the information charged respondent with acts which were in violation of certain provisions of section 397b of the Penal Code, reading as follows: "Every person who sells, gives or delivers to any minor child, male or female, * * * intoxicating drink in any quantity whatsoever * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor"—it not being directly alleged therein that the acts tended to bring the minor within any of the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law, unless the allegations that the act caused or tended to cause the minor to have intoxicating liquor in his possession and to visit a place where intoxicating liquor was sold, bartered, exchanged, and given away, may be said to be equivalent thereto.

Following the general rule, the court, in People v. Robles, supra, held that, although, as a matter of evidence, inferences may be drawn by a jury from circumstances indicating the guilt of a defendant, yet no inferences of facts not alleged can be invoked to aid an indictment, which must charge the crime in words, and is demurrable if it fails to charge it in express terms. In conformity with this rule it was held, in People v. Salisbury, supra, that an information charging acts of sexual intercourse with a female under the age of twenty-one years not the wife of defendant was, in the absence of allegations that the acts charged tended to encourage the minor to become a person within the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law is insufficient. The one exception to the rule stated is the case wherein ultimate facts are alleged in an indictment or information from which but one conclusion can follow, and such conclusion necessarily follows from the facts alleged, in which case the pleading is sufficient, though the conclusion is not directly alleged. People v. Tinnen, 192 P. 557, 49 Cal. App. 18, 23. In the instant case it was not alleged that the possession by the minor following the sale and delivery was unlawful, or that the liquor was consumed by him. The language of section 397b of the Penal Code is sufficiently broad to include a sale or delivery of intoxicating liquor to a minor under the age of 18 years upon a physician's prescription, whether issued directly to the minor or to one not its parent or guardian, irrespective of the innocent character of the purpose for which the sale or delivery was made, or whether the minor was aware of the intoxicating nature of the liquor. Such possession, however, would not in every case be unlawful or inconsistent with an innocent and proper purpose; nor would the fact of an illegal sale or delivery followed by possession under all circumstances necessarily or manifestly tend to bring the minor within any of the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law. Whether such was the tendency of the act charged would be dependent upon the nature of the transaction (People v. Baker, supra); and, where, as here, such tendency as an ultimate fact does not follow as a necessary conclusion from the allegations, the information is not brought within the exception mentioned. The charge that the act caused the minor to visit a place where intoxicating liquor was sold, bartered, exchanged, and given away was not an allegation which, if proved, would bring the minor within the provisions of subdivision 7 of section 1 of the law, which requires the habitual visiting of such places not in company with the parent or guardian of the minor; nor would the visit alleged or the possession of liquor which, so far as alleged, was not unlawful, as a necessary conclusion, cause or tend to cause the minor to frequent the company of criminals or persons so reputed, to habitually use intoxicating liquor, to lead or be in danger of leading an idle dissolute, lewd, or immoral life, or to violate the law within the provisions of subdivisions 6, 8, 11, or 13 of the section last mentioned.

[3] A defendant is entitled under any statute to a clear statement of the offense with which he is charged (People v. Bergotini, 158 P. 198, 172 Cal. 717); and, where the ultimate facts necessary to a complete description of the offense have been omitted from the pleading, and such facts do not follow as a necessary conclusion from the allegations contained therein, a demurrer to the information is properly sustained.

The order is affirmed.

ANDERSON v. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA EDISON CO. (Civ. 5333.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 2, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 27, 1926.)

1. Easements ⚡1, 42—"Easement" is restriction on servient tenement owner's property rights, and grant may entirely exclude him from any enjoyment thereof.

"Easement" is restriction on servient tenement owner's property rights, and in case of grant may altogether exclude him from any rights in enjoyment thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Easement.]

2. Easements ⚡41, 42—Extent of servitude is determined by terms of grant or nature of enjoyment by which easement is acquired, and, where acquired by prescription or operation of law, character and extent are fixed by user under which gained (Civ. Code, § 806).

Extent of servitude is determined by terms of grant or nature of enjoyment by which easement was acquired, but where acquired by prescription or operation of law, character and extent are fixed by user under which gained (Civ.

Code, § 806); right so acquired being stricti juris.

3. Easements ⚡38—Easement includes "secondary easements," consisting of right to do things necessary for full enjoyment of easement, but right must be exercised so as not to increase injuriously burden on servient tenement.

Every easement includes "secondary easements," consisting of right to do things necessary for full enjoyment of easement, but such right is limited and must be exercised in such reasonable manner as not to increase injuriously the burden on servient tenement.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Secondary Easement.]

4. Electricity ⚡9(1)—Electric power company's easement of right of way did not abridge landowner's right to use of land not conflicting with company's rights.

Interest of electric power company in land under asserted easement of right of way for its lines did not abridge owner's right to such use of land for any purpose as did not conflict with or defeat company's rights in use of its lines, its interest not being exclusive.

5. Electricity ⚡9(1)—Right to maintain power line supported by poles does not affect landowner's right to use surface.

Right to maintain aerial power line, supported by poles resting in ground, does not affect landowner's right to surface use of land, except so far as surface is reasonably necessary for ingress, egress, maintenance, and repair.

6. Electricity ⚡15(1)—Landowner building on power company's right of way held not trespasser or mere licensee.

Where building did not restrict or limit power company's alleged easement of right of way for its lines, and it never objected to erection or maintenance of building, but arranged to use higher poles to remove danger from proximity of wires to roof, it could not complain of building's existence, so long as it did not interfere with company's alleged interest in land, and landowner and those deraining interest through him had right to enjoy full benefit of improvement and were not trespassers or mere licensees as to company in so doing.

7. Electricity ⚡13—Power company enjoying easement of right of way held under duty to so erect line as not to interfere with landowner's reasonable use of surface.

In enjoyment of power company's asserted interest in land under alleged easement of right of way for its lines, it was its duty to keep within limited interest, and so erect aerial right of way as not to interfere with reasonable use of surface, failing in which it became trespasser on rights of owner and those claiming under him.

8. Electricity ⚡14(1)—Power company must exercise high degree of care for safety of persons lawfully using property over which wires are strung.

It is duty of power company using dangerous force of electricity to exercise high degree of care for safety of persons lawfully using property over which wires are strung, such as painter's apprentice working on copper roof, by insulating or otherwise protecting wires at places where such persons may reasonably be expected to go in pursuit of their calling, or by placing wires beyond danger of contact with them.

9. Electricity ⇨14(2)—Failure to raise electric wires high enough above roof to prevent contact with persons is sufficient proof of negligence.

Failure of electric company to raise wires so high above roof that those having occasion to go there will not come in contact with them is sufficient proof of negligence.

10. Negligence ⇨68.

Person sui juris must use ordinary care for his own protection, degree thereof being commensurate with danger.

11. Electricity ⇨19(6, 12)—Negligence in maintaining wires too near roof, and workman's contributory negligence in forgetting about wires, held for jury.

Negligence of electric power company in maintaining wires in dangerous proximity to roof of building, on which injured painter's apprentice was working, and latter's contributory negligence in forgetting about wires which he had seen, held for jury.

12. Negligence ⇨136(26).

To forget about known danger is not negligence, unless it shows want of ordinary care, which is for jury.

13. Damages ⇨131(1)—$3,000 for second and third degree burns of back and heels, producing severe pains and nervousness for several days and incapacitating painter's apprentice to work for several weeks, held not so excessive as to suggest passion, prejudice, or corruption.

$3,000 for second degree burns of back and heels, producing severe pains and nervousness for several days and incapacitating painter's apprentice to work for several weeks, and one of which subsequently developed characteristics of third degree burn, held not so excessive as to suggest passion, prejudice, or corruption at first blush.

14. Appeal and error ⇨1004(3)—Appellate court has power over excessive damages only when facts suggest passion, prejudice, or corruption at first blush; question being for trial court in first instance.

Question of excessive damages is first addressed to trial court, which must bear whole responsibility, and appellate court may interfere only when facts at first blush suggest passion, prejudice, or corruption of jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Walter Anderson against the Southern California Edison Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Roy V. Reppey, E. W. Cunningham, and G. C. Larkin, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Swaffield, Swaffield & Pray, C. Douglass Smith, Frank P. Farrell, and Russell H. Pray, all of Long Beach, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to recover damages for injuries caused by contact with a high-voltage wire maintained by defendant company, a public service corporation, as a part of its electrical distributing system. Plaintiff claimed that the defendant company negligently maintained its wires in dangerous proximity to the roof of a certain building upon which he was working, in consequence of which he received the injuries complained of. The defendant denied any negligence on its part and alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. It also set up in its answer by way of separate defense that at the time of the accident plaintiff was a trespasser upon its property. At the conclusion of plaintiff's case, a motion for a nonsuit was made and denied. After trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $3,000. A motion for a new trial was made and denied. This is an appeal from the judgment and order.

As grounds for reversal, appellant claims that the evidence fails to prove negligence on the part of defendant company, or a duty of care owed from it to plaintiff, and the trial court therefore erred in denying a motion for a nonsuit and in refusing to instruct the jury to return a verdict for defendant; that the court likewise erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by defendant. It is also claimed that the damages are excessive and not justified by the evidence. These alleged errors are relied upon for a reversal of the judgment.

The facts are practically without conflict. Defendant corporation is engaged in the business of distributing electricity to customers in the county of Los Angeles. In the year 1910 it constructed a power line parallel to Cherry street, in the Signal Hill District, Los Angeles, through territory which was then and now is farming and agricultural in character. The wires used were three in number; they were small in diameter, consisting of No. 6 bare copper wire, insulated wires not being used. The poles supporting the line were installed upon private property 5 feet from the road. They were 40 feet high, and the wires at the lower point were about 30 feet from the ground. The line carried 11,000 volts of electricity. At the time of the accident there was a sag in the wires. There is testimony to show that this sag was normal. The place where the accident occurred was known as "farm lot No. 7." Defendant company had attempted to procure an easement of a right of way over this particular parcel of land from the owner, but was never able to acquire this interest. The R. H. Herron Company, affiliated with the Pittsburg Oil Company, had rented this particular property from the owner in the year 1921, and the following year it constructed a corrugated iron building thereon directly under the transmission wires above described. Upon the completion of the building, the wires passed directly over the peak of the roof, $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 feet from the front end thereof, with a clearance of about 3 feet. During the construction of the building, two men employed by the contractor had been injured by reason of the close proximity of the wires to the building. The company was notified by the contractor of this fact. Several of the employees of defendant company, including the superintendent, had noticed the dangerous condition of the wires, and they, too, had notified their company of this condition. No claim was ever made by the company that the improvement interfered with any easement claimed by it, but, on the contrary, prior to the happening of the accident in question, an order was placed with it by its officers for longer poles; but the company had none on hand at the time and they were not procured until some time in June, 1922. It was also claimed by defendant that at the time complaint was made the city of Long Beach had refused permission to cut the line because of the interruption of service which would result therefrom, and such permission was not granted until the day of the accident.

Other testimony is to the effect that the power transmitted by the wires was used for pumping water for use by the city. The officer in charge of the water department of the city of Long Beach testified that the current could have been shut off for a period of three or four hours, as the city had another source of supply that could be used. On July 26, 1922, the manager of the owner of the newly constructed building ordered the Harris Sign Company to paint a sign thereon. On this day plaintiff was employed by such company as a painter's apprentice and had been so employed for about a year and a half immediately prior thereto. He was ordered to accompany another employee to assist in the performance of the work. In order to accomplish their task, it was necessary to swing a stage across the front part of the building. The painter and plaintiff proceeded to the roof for the purpose of fastening wooden blocks thereon to properly secure the stage upon which they were to work. Plaintiff took the lead, carrying blocks, a hammer, and some tools. When he had reached the roof, he observed the wires, about 3 feet above the building and some 12 to 20 feet away. The wires were very small, being only one-sixteenth of an inch in diameter, according to the records of the company, and, as above stated, they were not insulated. For these reasons both plaintiff and his fellow servant were under the impression that they were telephone wires. There was nothing to indicate that they carried a high voltage of electricity. Plaintiff, carrying his tools, approached the wires, straddling the peak of the slanted corrugated iron roof, stooping at times and looking down. When he came to the first wire, he bent down to pass under it; his hands and feet touching the roof. When directly under the wire, he raised up, but, according to the testimony of his companion, no part of his body touched the wire; it being 3 or 4 inches therefrom. There was a flash, plaintiff was thrown in the air and rendered unconscious, and his body started to roll down the roof. His companion went to his assistance and prevented him from falling therefrom. Plaintiff received second degree burns on his back and upon the heels of both of his feet, and in consequence thereof was incapacitated from work for 26 days.

It is claimed by appellant company that the evidence as above recited shows plaintiff to have been a trespasser or mere licensee, to whom the company owed no duty of care except not to be actively or overtly negligent, and that under such circumstances there could be no negligence; there being no duty of care.

The conclusion of appellant that plaintiff was a trespasser is based upon its claim that it had acquired an easement of right of way over the lands in question, and that this being so, defendant owed no duty to plaintiff to keep its premises safe. Under its asserted easement appellant claims that it is not limited to the mere space actually occupied by the wires, but also to that space reasonably necessary for the use of the wires as high-voltage transmission lines. In asserting an easement in the land in question, defendant does not claim that it acquired such interest by express grant, and, indeed, it could not successfully do so, as the evidence shows conclusively that it failed in this attempt. The assertion of its title is based upon two alleged theories. It is first claimed that under the decision in Gurnsey v. Northern Cal. Power Co., 117 P. 906, 160 Cal. 699, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185, the company acquired the asserted interest. In that case it was held that where a public service corporation has entered upon land and erected poles and wires in connection with its business, though the entry was without right, and the owner fails to bring any action until public interest, by reason of the construction of the work, has intervened, the right of such owner to maintain ejectment against such public service corporation will be denied and the owner will be remitted solely to his action for damages as the measure of his compensation. It is there further declared that this exception, which forms the rule as to public service corporations, is not based upon any consideration of the rights pertaining to the public corporation itself, nor solely upon the doctrine of estoppel of the owner, but is based mainly upon the great principle of public policy under which the rights of the citizen may be abridged in the interest of the public welfare.

[1-4] The second theory advanced by appellant company for the support of its claimed easement rests upon a claim of title to the asserted right by adverse possession. We do not think we are here seriously concerned with the question of the respective rights of the owner of the land and the company in the easement in question. This is not an action between the parties to determine such rights. Assuming some interest in the land to exist in favor of the company or the public, to the unlimited and unrestricted right to have its wire pass over the lands, the question with which we are concerned is the duty of the company to exercise care in the use of the alleged easement. An "easement" is, of course, a restriction upon the rights of property of the owner of the servient tenement. In the case of a grant it may be of such a character as to altogether exclude the owner of the servient tenement from any rights in the enjoyment of his property. The extent of the servitude is determined by the terms of the grant or the nature of the enjoyment by which it was acquired. Where, however, the easement is acquired, as here, by prescription or operation of law, its character and extent are fixed and determined by the user under which it is gained. Civ. Code, § 806. A right so acquired is stricti juris and cannot extend beyond the user. Every easement, it is true, includes "secondary easements," consisting of the right to do such things as are necessary for the full enjoyment of the easement; but this right is limited, and must be exercised in such reasonable manner as not to increase injuriously the burden upon the servient tenement. North Fork Water Co. v. Edwards, 54 P. 69, 121 Cal. 662. Whatever interest defendant company may have in the land in question by reason of the asserted easement, the right of the owner thereof to its use of the land for any purpose was not abridged, provided only that such use did not conflict or defeat the rights of the company in the use of its lines. In other words, the interest of the company was not an exclusive one.

[5-7] Giving the evidence the full force contended for, it shows at most a right for maintenance of an aerial power line supported by poles resting in the ground, and does not affect the right of the owner to the surface use of the land except in so far as such surface is reasonably necessary for the purposes of ingress or egress and for maintenance and repair. There is no evidence in the record to show that the presence of the building in any manner restricted or limited defendant's alleged easement, or that the company ever objected to its erection or maintenance. On the contrary, they had arranged for the use of higher poles to remove the dangerous condition. So long, therefore, as the structure did not interfere with defendant's alleged interest, it could not complain of its existence, and the owner of the land and those derailing interest through him had the right to enjoy the full benefit of the improvement, and in thus enjoying it they could in no manner be considered trespassers or mere licensees as to the company. In the enjoyment of its asserted interest, it was the duty of the defendant to keep within its limited interest and to so erect its aerial right of way as not to interfere with the reasonable use of the surface of the soil to which the owner had made avail. In failing to do so, it became itself a trespasser on the rights of the owner and those claiming under him. Citizens' Telephone Co. v. Cincinnati Ry. Co., 233 S. W. 901, 192 Ky. 399, 18 A. L. R. 615.

[8] Defendant not having the exclusive and unlimited right to the surface of the soil, it was its duty in using the dangerous force of electricity to exercise great care to prevent injury to persons making lawful use of the property. Plaintiff herein had the right to be where he was. As a general rule, all wires conveying a dangerous current of electricity, attached to any part of a building to which persons may rightfully go, should be insulated or in some manner protected so as to remove, so far as it is possible, all chance of damage to such persons. From the very nature of its business, an electric company using highly charged wires owes a legal duty toward every person who, in the exercise of a lawful occupation in a place where he has a legal right to be and is liable to come in contact with the wires, to see that such wires are properly placed with reference to the safety of such persons. It is only in accord with reason and common sense that persons controlling so dangerous and subtle an agency as electricity should use a high degree of care. Either the wires must be insulated or at least placed beyond the danger line of contact with human beings. While the law does not require the wires to be insulated everywhere, where there is reason to apprehend that persons may come in contact with them in the pursuit of their calling or where they may be reasonably expected to go, they should in some manner be protected. Here no notice or protection of any kind or character was ever given or made.

[9] It has been held in this state that an electric company is required to use very great care to prevent injury to person or property, and it is sufficient proof of negligence for it not to raise its wires so high above a roof on which they are placed that those having occasion to go there will not come in contact with them. Giraudi v. Electric Imp. Co., 40 P. 108, 107 Cal. 120, 28 L. R. A. 596, 48 Am. St. Rep. 114.

We do not deem further discussion upon this subject necessary. Defendant knew through its officers that the wires as placed presented a very dangerous condition, and it was undertaking to remedy the evil when the accident happened. It made no claim of any unreasonable use on the part of the owner of the premises, or that it would subject the company to expense that it was under no duty to incur. No such question is here involved.

[10] The further point is urged that contributory negligence existed as a matter of law, and that the court should have granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit. An employee of defendant company interviewed plaintiff concerning the accident. He testified that he had admitted to him that he had seen the lines, but that in working he had forgotten about them and had "raised up and come in contact with the wires." It is chiefly upon this testimony that the claim is based that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. It is true that the law imposes upon a person sui juris the obligation to use ordinary care for his own protection, the degree of which is commensurate with the danger to be avoided.

[11, 12] The question of the company's negligence and also that of the plaintiff were questions for the jury to determine from all the facts and circumstances of the case. While it has been held in this state that one who is aware of a known danger, which should have put him on his guard, cannot rebut the presumption of contributory negligence by showing that he momentarily forgot it, it has also been held that this rule must have a reasonable construction. To forget is not negligence, unless it shows the want of ordinary care, and that is a question for the jury. Giraudi v. Electric Imp. Co., supra; 19 Cal. Jur., p. 586. There is evidence to show, as above indicated, that plaintiff thought the wires, by reason of their small diameter and the fact that they were not insulated, were telephone wires, and there was no other evidence to show that the existing danger was comprehended by plaintiff. There is therefore no merit in this claim.

[13] It is also contended that the damages are excessive and not justified by the evidence. The testimony upon this subject shows that plaintiff suffered second-degree burns of the back and both heels, which produced severe pains and nervousness which lasted for several days, and incapacitated him from work for several weeks. It further shows that while the burns were at first classified as second degree, it subsequently transpired that one developed the characteristics of a third degree burn as there was an actual charring of tissues which formed a crater.

[14] The question of excessive damages is one that is first addressed to the trial court. Practically that court must bear the whole responsibility in every case.

The power of appellate courts over excessive damages exists only when the facts are such as to suggest, at first blush, passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury. Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 205 P. 1073, 188 Cal. 468. No such facts here appear. And finally, complaint is made of the refusal of the trial court to give certain instructions to the jury requested by the defendant, and in giving certain instructions requested by plaintiff. This objection is controlled by the views we have herein expressed.

From what we have said, it follows that the judgment should be and it is hereby affirmed.

Suit by Harry G. Jenkins and another, as executors of the will of Anna Jenkins, deceased, and another, against I. Zimmerman. From an order dismissing an order to show cause, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

NOURSE, J. [1] Plaintiffs sued to restrain the erection of an apartment house by the defendant on the theory that the plans and specifications did not provide sufficient air space as contemplated by the State Housing Act (St. 1923, p. 781). Upon the hearing of plaintiffs' motion for a temporary injunction two affidavits were filed by the defendant. It does not appear whether any oral testimony was taken, but the record discloses an order of the trial judge dismissing the order to show cause after a hearing. From this order the appeal was taken and has been presented on a typewritten record, certified by the clerk, but not by the trial judge. Though the reporter was ordered to prepare a transcript, none has been filed. The record is plainly insufficient to warrant a review by this court. Code Civ. Proc. § 953a; Jeffords v. Young (Cal. Sup.) 239 P. 1054, and cases there cited.

[2] Furthermore, the notice of appeal states that it is taken from the order refusing to grant appellants an injunction, but the record does not contain a motion for the injunction or any information as to the grounds upon which the motion was made. It does appear that two affidavits were filed "in opposition to motion for injunction." Assuming that these affidavits were before the trial court on the hearing, they were sufficient to support the order denying an injunction, and, in the absence of any other showing, we cannot say on this record that error occurred.

Order affirmed.

Dozier, Kimball & Dozier, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to recover a commission amounting to the sum of $337.50 upon an alleged express agreement for the sale of a certain evaporator or grape juice concentrator.

Defendant was the manufacturer of the machine and plaintiff claimed to be its agent in consummating the sale in question. The trial court so found and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff in the sum prayed for, together with costs. The main ground relied upon for a reversal is that the evidence shows conclusively that plaintiff was acting as the agent of the buyer, for which reason he could not also be the agent of the seller.

The facts are substantially as follows: In the year 1922 the National Fruit Products Company of Lodi, Cal., was manufacturing and selling grape juice. Plaintiff was engaged under a written contract with the company to dispose of the product upon a commission basis. The exact nature of the agreement does not appear from the record, as the contract between the parties was not offered in evidence. Plaintiff was permitted, however, over objection, to testify concerning his business arrangement.

The company was desirous of purchasing an apparatus for the manufacture of its concoction and as plaintiff was about to go East to procure orders for the mixture the officers of the company told him to locate and select the necessary machinery. While in New York City he heard that one was made by defendant at Buffalo, N. Y., which he thought might be suitable for the purpose. He visited the latter city and called at the office of defendant company with his son. He presented to certain of its officers a card reading as follows: "M. Rezos, Concentrated Grapes. With National Fruit Products Co. Manufacturers of Grape Products, Lodi, California." Plaintiff stated to them that he had come East to buy an evaporating apparatus for the manufacture of grape juice. There was a general conversation concerning the construction and operation of defendant's machine. Plaintiff was familiar with the manufacture of grape juice. He was taken to defendant's factory and shown the machine, and he expressed his belief that it was just what he wanted and he advised the officers of the company that he would try his best to have the National Fruit Products Company purchase the same. He spoke of being paid a commission of 5 per cent. on the sale if he succeeded in inducing his company to make the purchase, and asked the price of the machine.

The evidence is conflicting as to whether or not the officers agreed to pay him the commission sought. Plaintiff was the sole witness on his own behalf. His son was present at the conversation, but did not testify. The officers of the corporation, while admitting that plaintiff had asked for a commission, denied that they had agreed to pay one, and they testified by deposition that the price agreed upon was $6,500, and that plaintiff had been informed that it was impossible to pay any commission, as the machine was being sold practically at cost. A written offer or proposal was thereupon drawn up, dated June 1, 1922, under the terms of which defendant proposed to furnish to the National Fruit Products Company the concentrator apparatus for the sum named f. o. b. Buffalo, N. Y. Plaintiff thereafter returned home and presented the proposal of defendant to the National Fruit Products Company and advised its acceptance. The company subsequently accepted the offer and the machine was thereafter, on August 20, 1922, delivered to it at Lodi, Cal. It was installed under plaintiff's supervision and proved satisfactory. The machine was paid for the following September. The same year plaintiff wrote a letter to defendant in which he asked the defendant for a "gift" for making the sale. In explaining what he meant by a "gift" he testified that an officer of defendant company had previously told him to use this word rather than the word "commission," as he would like to have the transaction appear regular between the two companies. In reply to this letter plaintiff was informed by the treasurer of defendant company that he was distinctly told that it would be impossible for the company to pay any commission, as the machine was being practically sold at cost.

[1-4] Plaintiff, according to his own testimony, had never informed the National Fruit Products Company that he had asked for or expected to receive a commission for effecting the sale until after the bill was paid. Assuming, as we must, that the promise of a commission was made, it clearly appears that plaintiff was employed by the National Fruit Products Company under a written agreement to sell its products, and was commissioned by that company to find for it a suitable machine for the manufacture of the same. He represented his employer in the transaction. It is true that he testified he was the agent for defendant company, but his conclusion in this matter amounts to no evidence in the face of his own statements concerning the transaction, which speak for themselves. Whether an agency has been created is to be determined by the relation of the parties as they in fact exist under their agreements or acts. 1 Cal. Jur. 695; 21 R. C. L., p. 819. Being an agent of the purchaser, he was in no position to enter into a secret agreement with defendant company for a commission as a reward for his service in inducing his company to make the purchase. We have very ancient authority upon the subject. "No man can serve two masters." Matt. vi:24. This principle is universally recognized in the law, and it is one which permits of no exception. An agent may not, as such, make a secret profit out of a transaction wherein he represents his principal; he is not allowed to place himself in antagonism to his principal in the business of his agency. The underlying thought is that the agent should not unite his personal and representative character in the same transaction. 1 Cal. Jur. p. 792. Humanity is so constituted that where conflicting interests arise the temptation is at times too great to be overcome, and duty is sacrificed to interest. Pacific Vinegar Works v. Smith, 78 P. 550, 145 Cal. 352, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42. And it matters not that the principal was in no manner injured, or that the agent intended no wrong. Gordon v. Beck (Cal. Sup.) 239 P. 311.

Public policy demands that an agent shall not represent interests adverse to his principal in order that all temptation to neglect his principal's interests may be removed from the agent. Such arrangements create a relation so conducive to bad faith and double dealing that they are condemned by the law. It is to the interest of a vendor to obtain the highest possible price for his goods, and for the purchaser to pay the least. Under such circumstances it is manifest that an agent cannot represent both parties. Here plaintiff admitted that he did not inform his principal that he was to receive a commission. The law is inflexible against such acts.

[5] Nor does the fact that the record fails to show that plaintiff was to be paid for his services by his company alter or change the situation. Assuming him to have been a mere gratuitous agent of his company in negotiating the sale, the same principles we have discussed apply. He was bound to exercise good faith toward his principal. One who is intrusted with the interest of others cannot be allowed to make the business an object of interest to himself. Such transactions are against the policy of the law. Wilson v. Southern Pacific Land Co., 46 Cal. App. 738, 189 P. 1040.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the finding that plaintiff acted as the agent for defendant company finds no support in the evidence. The mere fact that he so testified amounts to no evidence in face of his testimony concerning the true facts. In any event, the relation existing between plaintiff and this company is such as to preclude a recovery on his part of the claimed commission.

This conclusion renders unnecessary a discussion of other points urged for a reversal.

The judgment is reversed.

DUGAN v. PHILLIPS. (Civ. 3074.)(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 25, 1926.)

1. Auctions and auctioneers ⚡8—Vendor at auction held bound, on entry of auctioneer's memorandum of sale, by warranty in catalogue of animals sold (Civ. Code, §§ 1793, 1794, 1798).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1793, 1794, 1798, in absence of agreement to the contrary, vendor of cattle at auction was bound, on entry of auctioneer's memorandum of sale, by warranty that every animal is guaranteed to be a breeder, contained in catalogue, on terms of which all animals were sold.

2. Arbitration and award ⚡3—In action to enforce arbitration award, question before trial court was whether controversy existed between parties relating to matters submitted to arbitration.

In action to enforce arbitration award, based on dispute whether bull purchased by plaintiff was warranted to be breeder, question before trial court was not whether defendant had made such warranty, but whether there existed a controversy between parties relating to matters submitted to arbitration.

3. Contracts ⚡127(2)—Executory provision for arbitration in contract of sale at auction was unenforceable as ousting courts of jurisdiction, but on submission of controversy to arbitration award was binding, in absence of fraud or mistake.

Condition of auction sale as stated in catalogue, subject to which all sales were made, that controversy between buyer and seller should be adjusted by arbitration while executory only was not enforceable because ousting courts of jurisdiction, but, on voluntary submission of controversy to arbitration in accordance with contract, parties were bound by award, in absence of fraud or mistake.

4. Arbitration and award ⚡85(3)—Evidence held sufficient to support finding of agreement by defendant to submit controversy to arbitration.

Evidence that seller knew of buyer's claim of breach of warranty; that bull purchased was a breeder; and that seller appeared before arbitrators willing to be bound by their decision, held sufficient to support finding that defendant agreed to submit controversy to arbitration.

5. Arbitration and award ⚡82(1).

Where defendant agreed to submit controversy to arbitration, he cannot thereafter refuse to be bound by an adverse award.

6. Contracts ⚡254—Written agreement may be abrogated by oral contract; provision relating to alteration of written contract not being applicable (Civ. Code, § 1698).

Written agreement may be abrogated by an oral contract, in which case Civ. Code, § 1698, providing for alteration of written contract only in writing or by executed oral agreement, has no application.

7. Contracts ⚡274.

On mutual rescission of contract, each party must restore whatever he has received under it.

8. Arbitration and award ⚡7.

Agreement to submit to arbitration becomes executed on making of award.

9. Arbitration and award ⚡57—Finding by arbitrators that bull guaranteed to be a breeder was a nonbreeder and ordering rescission of contract held not to go beyond matters in controversy.

Where buyer claimed breach of guaranty that bull purchased at auction was a breeder, award of arbitrators finding bull to be a nonbreeder and ordering rescission of contract held not to go beyond matters in controversy.

10. Arbitration and award ⚡12, 48.

Technical precision is not required either in submission of controversy to arbitration or in the award.

11. Arbitration and award ⚡18, 80.

Submission of controversy to arbitration and the award will be construed with reference to all surrounding facts and circumstances.

12. Arbitration and award ⚡66.

Every reasonable presumption is in favor of award of arbitrators.

13. Arbitration and award ⚡85(3)—Evidence relating to auction sale at which bull purchased was warranted a breeder, and making of lease note containing no warranty, held properly admitted to show that real controversy was submitted to arbitration.

In action to enforce arbitration award, evidence relating to auction sale at which bull warranted to be a breeder was purchased, and making of lease note containing no such warranty, held properly admitted to show that there was a real controversy between parties, submitted to arbitration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by J. E. Dugan against J. P. Phillips. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for appellant.

Lewis H. Smith, Ames Peterson, and Frank H. Marvin, all of Fresno, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This action was brought to enforce an award in favor of plaintiff in a common-law arbitration. The plaintiff was given judgment in accordance with the award, and the defendant has appealed.

Prior to the transactions involved in this case the defendant was the owner of a herd of registered cattle and for the last two years of that time the plaintiff was in full charge of the herd. The defendant employed the California Breeders' Sales & Pedigree Company to sell the cattle at public auction. The company printed and distributed a catalogue of the animals to be sold, giving their description and pedigree, and stating the time and place and terms of the sale. The catalogue contained the following:

"The terms of this sale are cash. Responsible parties may arrange for time with owner, but such arrangements must be made before sale. * * * It is a condition of this sale that the buyer agrees to make any and all complaints in writing to the president of California Breeders' Sales & Pedigree Company, California, within 30 (thirty) days of the sale; that the president will appoint a committee of three to investigate and adjust the complaint; and that the decision and adjustment by this committee shall be final with both buyer and seller. * * * The owners guarantee every animal sold to be exactly as represented. Every animal in this sale is guaranteed to be a breeder. * * * The sale will start promptly at 10 o'clock on Thursday, September 23, 1920."

The sale was held at the time stated. At the opening of the sale the sales manager of the company announced:

"That every animal in this sale was sold according to the terms and conditions printed in the front of the catalogue."

Being desirous of purchasing a certain bull, Sir Pieterje Korndyke Ormsby, described in the catalogue, the plaintiff arranged with defendant, prior to the sale, that if the former became the purchaser of the animal his promissory note was to be accepted in part payment of the purchase price thereof. Plaintiff made the highest bid for the bull and it was declared sold to him, by the auctioneer, for the sum of $3,200. Thereafter, on the same day, the plaintiff paid the defendant the sum of $1,500 and signed an instrument, referred to in the findings as a lease note, in form an agreement by the defendant to sell and by the plaintiff to buy the bull for $3,200, the sum of $1,500 to be paid in cash and the remainder of the purchase price to be paid in quarterly installments of $425 each, title to remain in the defendant until final payment. The contract contained the following clause:

"It is hereby agreed that the party of the first part neither makes nor is to make any warranty in regard to said property except to title."

The instrument was not signed by defendant, but was delivered to him by the plaintiff. The instrument contains about 10 folios. The plaintiff testified:

"I saw it in Mr. Phillips' house in Dixon when I signed it, but I didn't have time to read it over. Mr. Phillips was in a hurry to leave and I didn't have time to read it over. He said it was just a matter of form and it wouldn't be necessary."

May 11, 1921, the plaintiff wrote the defendant to the effect that the bull was not a breeder, and stated:

"This looks very much to me like there should be some adjustment made—according to the clause in your catalog which read, 'Every animal guaranteed to be a breeder.'"

May 25, 1921, plaintiff again wrote defendant, stating, among other things:

"I cannot well afford to have my money tied up in an animal that has proven worthless and shall have to take other steps if necessary."

June 2, 1921, the defendant wrote plaintiff, demanding payment of the installments then due, and stating:

"If there is any truth whatever in the representations which have been made to you, it is by reason of the way in which the animal has been kept and handled since you received him. At the time you took him you were thoroughly acquainted with him, and the fact is that at that time he was a breeder, and I feel certain he would have continued to be such, had he been properly kept and handled, and that he is such now if properly handled. I fail to understand why, under all the circumstances, you should think there should be any adjustment of this matter other than the making of the payments on your contract as called for therein. By the contract itself it is specified that there is no warranty made by me except as to title. * * * I would suggest that you investigate the matter and put the * * * animal in the keeping of parties who will give him proper care and attention."

June 20, 1921, the plaintiff wrote the defendant, saying:

"I am willing to give him (the bull) a chance in another herd and under another man's care to demonstrate whether he is a breeder or not. I surely hope that he does come out all right as it would be to my advantage, but under the present conditions I do not feel justified in continuing the payments until he proves to be a breeder."

The defendant replied:

"I do not concede that you are entitled to defer the payments, or that, under the circumstances, you are to be relieved from same, or any part thereof. I therefore request that you do not let these unpaid amounts accumulate, but that, without further delay, you send me your check for the amounts now due."

February 14, 1922, plaintiff wrote the president of the California Breeders' Sales & Pedigree Company as follows:

"In compliance with the conditions of the terms of sale of the Allana farm herd, dispersed in September, 1920, I wish to make complaint that the sire, Sir Pieterje Korndyke Ormsby, purchased by me from Mr. J. P. Phillips, owner of the Allana Farm herd, has proved to be a nonbreeder. * * * He was used in four different herds, and letters from the owners of these herds show that they were unable to get any cows with calf to the service of this sire. In view of the conditions as stated above and additional evidence I can furnish, I request that you, as president of the California Breeders' Sales & Pedigree Company, appoint a committee to investigate and adjust this matter in accordance with the conditions of sale."

The president of the company appointed "a committee of three to investigate and adjust the complaint" and the parties were duly notified of the time and place at which the committee would meet for that purpose. Both parties appeared at the time and place stated in the notice. The committee investigated and decided a controversy over a sale between other parties immediately before taking up that of the parties hereto. The defendant testified that the committee decided that controversy "adversely to the buyer." The plaintiff testified:

"While they were deciding on the first case I called Mr. Phillips to one side and asked him if he would care to make any proposition as to settlement before this went before the committee, as, if he were to continue in the pure breed business, it would probably be better for us not to have it to come before the committee, and he said he was perfectly willing to stand by the decision of the committee."

The defendant testified that he did not make such statement. Both parties appeared before the committee and presented evidence in support of their respective contentions. The committee then retired for deliberation and prepared and signed the following written award, addressed to the president of the company:

"We, the undersigned committee, appointed by you to decide the complaint of J. E. Dugan against J. P. Phillips that the registered Holstein bull, Sir Pieterje Korndyke Ormsby, 176945, was at time of sale an intermittent breeder and since that time a nonbreeder, report that we met at Tulare, Cal., on March 13, 1922, and after hearing the evidence of both J. E. Dugan, and J. P. Phillips do decide as follows: That the evidence submitted would tend to prove that the bull has been a nonbreeder since purchased by J. E. Dugan, and that J. E. Dugan return the bull, Sir Pieterje Korndyke Ormsby, 176945, H.F.H.B., to J. P. Phillips, who shall return to J. E. Dugan whatever amount of the original purchase price of $3,200 as said Dugan has already paid and shall also return to said J. E. Dugan the lease note given as balance of settlement. Said bull to be returned to J. P. Phillips by J. E. Dugan within thirty (30) days of this date."

The committee then returned to the room in which the hearing had been conducted and the decision was thereupon read in the presence of the committee and of both parties to the controversy. Within the time provided in the award the plaintiff returned the bull to defendant and the latter received it, with the understanding between the parties that defendant's rights should not be prejudiced by his acceptance of the animal. The defendant refused to comply with the terms of the award and thereafter this action was commenced.

The court found the facts relative to the sale of the animal in accordance with the foregoing statement thereof; "that on or about the 26th day of March, 1921, and continuously after said date, there existed a controversy between plaintiff and defendant," the former contending that the latter had warranted the bull to be a breeder and that the animal was not such, and the latter contending that he had not so warranted the animal, but that, in fact, it was a breeder at the time of the sale; that on the day the committee met to adjust the controversy "the plaintiff and defendant agreed with each other that the defendant had warranted and guaranteed the bull to be a breeder, and the plaintiff and defendant agreed with each other to submit to a committee of three arbitrators, composed of W. J. Higdon, F. L. Morris, and Alex Whaley, the determination of the question as to whether or not the said animal was a breeder as warranted and guaranteed by the defendant, as aforesaid, and to authorize the said committee to decide what disposition should be made of the said animal, and what disposition should be made of the said lease note, and what disposition should be made of the sum * * * paid by plaintiff to the defendant." The court found the facts relating to the arbitration proceeding and the award and the subsequent acts of the parties as herein stated. Plaintiff was given judgment in accordance with the terms of the award.

[1, 2] The finding that, on the day of the hearing before the arbitration committee, the defendant agreed that he had warranted the bull to be a breeder, is supported only by such inference as may arise from defendant's agreement to submit the controversy between him and the plaintiff to arbitration. Such agreement implies either that the defendant had made the warranty or that he intended to submit to the arbitrators the question of whether he had made it, otherwise there would have been nothing to arbitrate. The finding, however, is not necessary to the validity of the judgment. There was a substantial controversy between the parties, which they submitted to the arbitrators. By the fall of the auctioneer's hammer the sale of the bull to the plaintiff became complete. Civ. Code, §§ 1793 and 1794. The auctioneer's memorandum of the sale bound "both the parties in the same manner as if made by themselves." Civ. Code, § 1798. The terms of payment had been arranged between the parties prior to the sale. Whether in such arrangement any agreement was made as to warranty does not appear. Plaintiff testified that "any understanding" between them prior to the execution of the lease note was "merely verbal." He was asked by his counsel, "What verbal understanding before that was there?" Defendant's objection to the question was sustained. In the absence of any agreement or understanding to the contrary, the defendant became bound, upon the entry of the auctioneer's memorandum of the sale, by the warranty contained in the catalogue that "every animal in this sale is guaranteed to be a breeder." If the apparent release of defendant from such warranty by the terms of the lease note was given without consideration, it may be seriously doubted whether such terms are binding on plaintiff. Western Lith. Co. v. Vanomar Producers, 197 P. 103, 185 Cal. 366, 369. The question before the trial court was not whether the defendant had warranted the animal to be a breeder, but whether there existed a controversy between the parties relating to the matters submitted by them to arbitration. "It is sufficient if there is a bona fide difference of opinion as to the rights of the parties." 5 C. J. 27. The plaintiff testified that he did not read the lease note prior to its execution. He could have maintained an action for its reformation if the clause relating to warranty was inserted through fraud or mistake.

[3] The condition of the sale, as stated in the catalogue, that controversies between the buyer and the seller should be adjusted by a committee to be appointed by the president of the company, was not enforceable while it remained executory only. Blodgett Co. v. Bebe Co., 214 P. 38, 190 Cal. 665, 670, 26 A. L. R. 1070. But, if the parties to such an agreement voluntarily submit a controversy arising thereunder to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of the contract, they will be bound by the award, in the absence of fraud or mistake. In a recent case, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"An agreement for arbitration is valid, even if it provides for the determination of liability. * * * If executed—that is, if the award has been made—effect will be given to the award in any appropriate proceeding at law, or in equity." Red Cross Line v. Atlantic Fruit Co., 44 S. Ct. 274, 264 U. S. 109, 68 L. Ed. 582.

"It has been held that an agreement in an executory contract to refer all matters of dispute that may arise under the contract to arbitration will not oust the courts of jurisdiction, * * * and, when invoked for that purpose, will be held void; yet, if the parties have, before suit is instituted, proceeded with the arbitration under the contract, and an award, in the absence of fraud or mistake, has been made, suit must be on the award, and not on the contract." Florida Athletic Club v. Hope Lumber Co., 44 S. W. 10, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 161; Elliott on Contracts, § 2941.

[4, 5] There is sufficient evidence to support the finding that, on the day of the hearing before the arbitrators, the defendant agreed to submit the controversy to arbitration. The defendant then knew, from the correspondence between the parties, that the plaintiff claimed that the bull had been warranted to be a breeder; that it was not such; and that he was entitled to an adjustment of the matter. The defendant also knew that the plaintiff had made formal complaint to the president of the company; that the latter had appointed a committee of arbitrators to adjust the dispute; and that the members of the committee were there present to take evidence and make an award. Under such circumstances, when the plaintiff sought a compromise, the defendant, according to plaintiff's testimony, "said he was perfectly willing to stand by the decision of the committee." He appeared before the committee and presented his side of the controversy. Had the award been in his favor he doubtless would have insisted that the plaintiff was bound by it. A party cannot be allowed thus to speculate upon the action of the arbitrators and then refuse to be bound by an adverse award. "Participation in the arbitration proceedings is of itself evidence of the party's prior agreement to submit." 5 C. J. 23. "The form of the submission is immaterial. It is sufficient if it appears from the acts of the parties that they intended to arbitrate, and that the decision of the arbitrators should have the effect of an award." 5 C. J. 32. "It is not necessary that there should be an express agreement to abide by an award when made; * * * the law implies such an agreement from the very fact of the submission." 5 C. J. 33; Robinson v. Templar Lodge, I. O. O. F., 31 P. 609, 97 Cal. 62, 65.

Appellant contends that a verbal submission is invalid, citing 5 Corpus Juris, p. 34, where it is said:

"A verbal submission is valid at common law in all cases where the subject-matter is such that a verbal agreement directly between the parties, in the terms of the award, would prevail. But where, from the subject-matter of the arbitration, a writing is necessary to pass the right to the thing in demand, or to defeat or destroy the demand, the submission must be in writing."

Appellant also relies upon the provisions of section 1698 of the Civil Code, reading:

"A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise."

[6-8] An agreement between the parties in the terms of the award involved in this case would amount to an abandonment or rescission of the contract of sale. It has been held many times that a written agreement may be abrogated by an oral contract and that in such a case section 1698 has no application. McClure v. Alberti, 212 P. 204, 190 Cal. 348; Pearsall v. Henry, 95 P. 154, 159, 153 Cal. 314; Guidery v. Green, 30 P. 786, 95 Cal. 630; Producers' Fruit Co. v. Goddard (Cal. App.) 243 P. 686; Haberman v. Sawall (Cal. App.) 237 P. 776; Hooke v. Great Western Lumber Co., 202 P. 492, 54 Cal. App. 681; Arsenio v. Smith, 194 P. 756, 50 Cal. App. 173; Tompkins v. Davidow, 149 P. 788, 27 Cal. App. 327; Credit C. Bureau v. Hochbann, 144 P. 315, 25 Cal. App. 546; Sarnighausen v. Scannell, 106 P. 117, 11 Cal. App. 652; Proud v. Strain, 103 P. 949, 11 Cal. App. 74. Upon a mutual rescission of a contract the law requires each party to restore whatever he has received under it. Green v. Darling (Cal. App.) 239 P. 70; Hooke

v. Great Western Lumber Co., supra. The agreement to submit to arbitration became executed upon the making of the award. Red Cross Line v. Atlantic Fruit Co., supra.

[9-12] It is contended that the award covers matters not embraced in the contract of submission and is insufficient in form. The award does not go beyond the matters in controversy, and well understood by the parties to be in controversy. The defendant was a member of the California Breeders' Sales & Pedigree Company and it may be inferred that he was familiar with the scope of arbitration proceedings conducted under its direction. "Where there is doubt, the presumption is that all matters in dispute were intended to be decided." Elliott on Contracts, § 2949. Technical precision is not required either in the submission or the award. 5 C. J. 36. The submission and the award will be construed "with reference to, and in view of, all the surrounding facts and circumstances." 5 C. J. 124. Every reasonable presumption is in favor of the award. 5 C. J. 123. "Submissions are to be liberally construed so as to give effect to the intentions of the parties." 5 C. J. 40. "The arbitrators were not required to find facts nor to give reasons for their award." In re Connor, 60 P. 862, 128 Cal. 279. "Misrecitals of facts not required to be recited may be disregarded." 5 C. J. 117. Tested by the foregoing rules, appellant's contentions are not sustained.

[13] It is contended that the court erred in admitting evidence relating to the auction sale and the making of the lease note. Such evidence was properly admitted for the purpose of showing that there was a real controversy between the parties, which they submitted to arbitration. Appellant urges that there are many inconsistencies in the findings, but a careful examination and comparison thereof fails to disclose any inconsistency.

It is true that some of the findings are outside the issues, but such findings are unnecessary, because the other findings fully support the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

GENERAL ACCIDENT, FIRE & LIFE ASSUR. CORPORATION, LIMITED, OF PERTH, SCOTLAND, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5208.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 1, 1926.)

1. Master and servant $\S$ 385(11)—Question of permanency of disability held to involve determination as to whether surgical operation would relieve condition.

Question of permanency of disability, resulting from injury to knee, involves determination as to whether surgical operation would relieve condition.

2. Master and servant $\S$ 385(18)—Applicant for compensation for permanent disability is under no compulsion to undergo operation, in face of expert testimony that outcome would be problematical.

Where consensus of expert opinion, in proceeding for compensation for permanent disability arising from injury to knee, is that outcome of operation would be problematical, employee is under no compulsion to take risk of an operation.

3. Master and servant $\S$ 405(6)—Evidence held to sustain finding of permanent disability caused by injury to knee.

Evidence held to sustain finding of Industrial Accident Commission that injury to employee's knee resulted in permanent disability.

4. Master and servant $\S$ 419—"Permanent disability" is "new and further disability" within Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 841, § 11 [c]).

Under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 11 (c), providing that collection of compensation for "new and further disability" is not barred within six months, a "permanent disability" is a "new and further disability."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Permanent Disability.]

5. Master and servant $\S$ 419—Compensation proceeding for permanent disability may be instituted after second injury, if within 245 weeks after first injury, where employer voluntarily paid compensation for first injury (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act [St. 1917, p. 841], § 11 [a] [c]).

Under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 11 (c), proceeding for compensation for permanent disability, instituted after second injury to knee and within 245 weeks after first injury thereto, can be maintained, notwithstanding date when permanent disability was first ascertainable, where, after first injury, employer voluntarily paid compensation therefor; subdivision (a) being inapplicable.

Certiorari by General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, of Perth, Scotland, against the Industrial Accident Commission and another, to review an award under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act made to M. C. Robinson, claimant. Award affirmed.

Clarence B. Runkle and Joe Crider, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

HOUSER, J. This proceeding is brought for the purpose of reviewing an order made by the Industrial Accident Commission in the matter of an application to determine the amount of compensation, if any, payable by petitioner to M. C. Robinson because of an injury or injuries received by him in the course of his employment.

It appears that Robinson suffered two accidents, each of which having affected his right knee. The first accident occurred on August 25, 1921, and the second some three years and six months later, to wit, on February 26, 1925. No application or other proceeding was filed by Robinson with the Industrial Accident Commission for the purpose of having his rights determined with reference to the first accident until after the second accident had occurred. Compensation for the first accident and medical attention, however, were given to Robinson by his employer to the same extent as might have been awarded through appropriate action by the Industrial Accident Commission. It is further shown that after a period of some weeks following the first accident Robinson was discharged by his employer's physician as cured from the effects of the first injury, and thereupon that Robinson returned to work at a lighter form of employment; that his knee, however, continued weak and unstable, and at times "gave way," causing him considerable trouble and annoyance without necessitating a cessation from his work until the occasion when he suffered the second injury, at which time he was obliged to and did refrain from following his vocation for a period aggregating some three of four weeks.

In presenting his application of the Industrial Accident Commission for adjustment of the compensation due to him on account of his injury or injuries, Robinson joined as defendants each of the employers for whom he was working at the time the first and the second accident, respectively, occurred, together with the insurance carrier of each of them.

The findings by the commission included the following:

"Said employee was a truck driver, 38 years of age, and said injury caused permanent disability consisting of trauma of right knee joint, causing a chronic derangement of the joint and some pain on manipulation in extreme flexion, with a tendency of limb to give way under him at times.

"The percentage of said permanent disability is 14, entitling him to $20.83 a week for 56 weeks, amounting to $1,166.48. Payments thereon, $193.41; balance due, $973.07. Said benefit is based upon earnings in excess of the maximum allowed by law in computing compensation.

"Said permanent disability as hereinabove determined became permanent and reached a stage at which the extent of permanent disability could first be definitely ascertained within six months and said permanent disability therefore constitutes a new and further disability under the provisions of section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and this application was therefore filed within the proper time."

An award was made by the commission in favor of Robinson and against the General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation in the sum of $973.07 on account of the permanent disability which had resulted to Robinson from the first accident. The petitioner here being dissatisfied with such award, and having exhausted its remedies with the Industrial Accident Commission, has come to this court for a reviewal of the proceedings before the commission, and urges that that body acted without and in excess of its powers in the premises, and that the evidence adduced at the hearing before the referee of the commission did not justify or support the findings of fact or the award.

The first contention of petitioner is that there was no evidence to indicate that Robinson ever suffered any permanent disability as a result of the injuries of which he made complaint. Turning to the transcript of the evidence, it will be found that the report on the case by one of the physicians included the statement that the patient has "a chronic internal derangement of the right knee joint." The diagnosis of another physician was that a "mechanical derangement of the right knee joint" existed, for the relief of which he recommended a surgical operation, closing with the statement that "we cannot expect any improvement in his present condition by conservative methods." A third physician gave it as his opinion that "undoubtedly there is a chronic derangement of the right knee joint, and the condition has reached a permanent stage unless operative procedure is thought advisable."

[1-3] The question of permanency also involves a determination as to whether a surgical operation would relieve the condition of the right knee joint of the applicant. The consensus of opinion as expressed by the doctors who were called upon to give testimony regarding the advisability of performing an operation, was that it would be exploratory in its nature and consequently problematical as to its outcome. One of them said, "As you are undoubtedly aware, knee-joint surgery should only be done by a surgeon who is competent to do such work;" and another surgeon stated, in effect, that the operating surgeon would not know the condition of the knee to any certainty until after the knee joint was opened, and that, unless such surgeon were very skillful, the disability would probably be increased rather than diminished. In the face of such expert testimony, the patient was under no compulsion to take the risk of the operation with the attending possible, if not probable, result of a worse rather than a better knee. We think, therefore, that the finding by the commission that such injury caused permanent disability was fully justified.

It is also urged that there was no evidence upon which to base the finding that Robinson's permanent disability "reached a stage at which the extent of permanent disability could first be definitely ascertained within six months" next preceding the date of the award.

The evidence shows that Robinson was not advised by any physician prior to the date of the happening of the second accident that the disabled condition of his right knee joint was permanent. After the first injury, some improvement was noticeable in the condition of the knee for a period of approximately ten months or a year. Just when the permanency of the disability became determinable apparently was not an ascertainable fact. Even at the time the hearing was held some contrariety of opinion prevailed among the doctors as to whether the knee had yet reached that stage. In such circumstances, if the question were vital to the case, in the absence of an opinion by the surgeon as to the date when the permanency of the disabled condition of the knee joint became an established fact, it may be that the date of the hearing before the Industrial Accident Commission when the opinions of the doctors were accepted by the commission as to the permanency of the condition should be taken as the date when the "permanent disability could first be definitely ascertained." However, in view of the language of section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (Stats. of 1917, p. 831, as variously amended), it would appear that, if the injuries received in the first accident "caused new and further disability," the question of the date when the permanent disability of Robinson was first determined would be immaterial, so long as the proceedings to have his claim adjusted were instituted within 245 weeks after the date when the first injury was sustained.

It being established that the proceedings were commenced within the time limit of 245 weeks from the date of the first accident, the question remaining for consideration is whether "permanent disability" of the right knee joint was within the meaning of the phrase "new and further disability," contained within the provisions of the statute to which reference has just been had.

In the case of Kauffman v. Industrial Accident Commission, 174 P. 690, 37 Cal. App. 500, it is held that "further disability" is a disability "in addition to that for which proceedings were commenced * * * or that for which disability indemnity has been paid or agreed to be paid. If there have been no proceedings commenced within six months from the date of the injury, and if there has been no payment of disability indemnity or agreement therefor, the employee is not entitled to institute proceedings grounded upon 'further disability' after the expiration of six months from the date of the injury." That case, however, was directed to the question only of whether a claim might be filed for "new and further disability" in the absence of any award through the Industrial Accident Commission or compensation being voluntarily paid by the employer. It will be remembered that in the instant case the employer made full compensation to the employee based upon what was assumed to be his injuries received in the first accident.

[4, 5] The question has received the attention of the Supreme Court of this state on three separate occasions, in each of which it being inferentially determined that a "permanent disability" was a "new and further disability" within the meaning of the statute.

In the case of Imperial Ice & Development Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (L. A. 8334), which was before the Supreme Court on an application for a writ of review of an award by the Industrial Accident Commission, it appears that on February 18, 1922, a man by the name of Putnam sustained an injury to his right hand and thereafter received from the insurance carrier full temporary disability compensation and medical treatment until July 29, 1922, at which time, although there was still some contraction of the muscles in the hand, he returned to his employment. From time to time thereafter, until in the month of April, 1923, Putnam complained to the physician representing his employer that his condition was not improving, but on each occasion was assured by the physician that no permanent injury would result. However, on March 27, 1923, which was about eight months after any compensation had been paid to him, Putnam filed with the Industrial Accident Commission his application for adjustment of his claim for permanent disability, to which application the insurance carrier objected on the ground that the claim was barred by the provisions of the statute. The commission disallowed the plea of the insurance carrier and recognized the permanent disability of Putnam as a "new and further disability" of the applicant, which decision was carried to the Supreme Court by way of an application thereto for a writ of review. The application was denied without written opinion by the Supreme Court.

The next case is entitled Anaheim Co-operative Orange Ass'n v. Industrial Accident Commission. The facts of that case were similar to the essential facts in the case last cited herein, in that the employee suffered an injury to his hand for which he was fully compensated by the insurance carrier from the date of the accident by which he sustained the injury to the time when he was pronounced cured, and that thereupon he returned to his employment. More than one year and six months thereafter the employee filed with the Industrial Accident Commission an application for adjustment of his claim for permanent disability resulting from the injury for which he had received compensation. A plea of the statute of limitations was interposed by the insurance carrier, and, as was said by its counsel, the sole question involved in the proceeding was whether a permanent disability constituted a "new and further disability" within the meaning of the provisions of the statute. The commission ruled in favor of the applicant. A petition to the District Court of Appeal for a writ of review was denied on the ground, as expressed in its opinion (233 P. 1115) that on an identical question presented in the Putnam Case, supra, the Supreme Court had denied an application for a similar writ. A petition for hearing in the Supreme Court after decision by the District Court of Appeal was filed and extensively briefed on its merits. The Supreme Court denied the petition.

In the third case (Otis Elevator Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, S. F. 11819) a writ of review of an award by the Industrial Accident Commission was denied by the Supreme Court. Like each of the other cases, the question involved was whether a permanent disability constituted a "new and further disability" within the meaning of the provisions of section 11 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation Act. From the records, the matter seems to have been ably presented, and, although no opinion was rendered, it must be presumed that careful consideration was given to the question before the court. The application for a writ of review was denied; from which fact it would follow that the Supreme Court was in accord with the conclusion reached by the commission, to wit, that "new and further disability" was established by a permanent disability arising from the original injury.

It is suggested by petitioner that the application made by Robinson to the Industrial Accident Commission to have adjusted the matter of compensation for the injuries received by him was barred by the provisions of section 11, subd. (a), of chapter 586 of the Laws of 1917, and subsequent amendments thereto. But, if the views heretofore expressed herein are correct, the statute upon which petitioner relies has no application to the facts herein.

Being guided entirely by the indicated rulings by the Supreme Court, we are constrained to hold that the award of the Industrial Accident Commission should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

RICHARDS, J. This application is for the issuance of a writ of mandate requiring the respondent, as secretary of state of the state of California, to receive and file in his office a duly certified copy of the certificate of incorporation of the petitioner, a corporation organized in and under the laws of the state of Delaware, together with certain other required documents, and to accept the amount of the license fee tendered therewith, all of which the respondent as such secretary of state is alleged to have refused to do. The said documents and fees were tendered to the respondent for his acceptance and filing as a prerequisite to the qualification of the petitioner herein, a foreign corporation, to transact business as such within the state of California. The respondent's return to the alternative writ issued herein is in the form of a demurrer to the sufficiency of the petitioner's said application. The grounds upon which the respondent bases his refusal to receive and file the petitioner's aforesaid documents, or to accept its tendered fees, appear upon the face of its said application in the form of a letter to the petitioner wherein the reasons for his action are set forth. They are in substance that whereas it appears upon the face of the petitioner's application that it is a foreign corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Delaware, and whereas it appears from its articles of incorporation which are appended to its said application that its stock capitalization is represented by shares of different par values, that is to say, of 50,000 shares of preferred stock of the par value of $10 per share, of 50,000 shares of class A common stock of the par value of $10 per share, and of 500 shares of class B common stock without nominal or par value, it is not such a foreign corporation as can be permitted to qualify for the transaction of business in this state under the authority of Del Monte Light & Power Co. v. Jordan (Cal. Sup.) 238 P. 710. The respondent further states in his said letter that for the above reasons "it is impossible to subject the stockholders thereof to the liability to California creditors which is imposed by section 322 of the Civil Code, and therefore such foreign corporation, if admitted to the state, would be able to transact business therein on more favorable conditions than are prescribed by law to similar corporations organized under the laws of this state, in violation of section 15, article 12 of the California Constitution." The foregoing grounds of his aforesaid refusal as thus set forth present the two main questions before us in this proceeding. These relate, first, to the status of foreign corporations in respect to their right or privilege to engage in intrastate business in this state, and, second, to the interpretation to be placed upon section 15 of said article 12 of the state Constitution as affecting such right or privilege.

It is a conceded fact herein that the petitioner, a corporation organized in and under the laws of the state of Delaware, had in all respects in its said organization complied with the laws of Delaware, and hence that under the laws of that state corporations such as this could be legally organized with a capital stock structure having certain shares of stock of a fixed par value and certain other shares of stock of a nominal or no par value. It may also be conceded that such a corporation, if attempted to be organized in this state with a like stock structure, would not be entitled to receive from the secretary of state a certificate of incorporation under the rule laid down by this court in Film Producers' Co. v. Jordan, 171 Cal. 664, 154 P. 605, and Del Monte, etc., Co. v. Jordan (Cal. Sup.) 238 P. 710. The first question herein presented is as to whether the rule declared in the above-cited cases as applicable to California corporations is also to be given application to foreign corporations duly organized under the laws of the state of their creation.

[1-3] A foreign corporation, that is to say, a corporation organized under the laws of one or other of our American states, derives the right of doing business in other states than that of its creation through the application of the doctrine of comity between states. It is not necessary to go afield for authorities stating the origin of this doctrine or showing that it is deeply rooted in those fundamental principles of our nationality which found expression in our federal Constitution and in the interpretation thereof by the Supreme Court of the United States. See Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. (13 Pet.) 519-538, 10 L. Ed. 274. The doctrine has been fully recognized and clearly stated in the decisions in many states and has been well set forth in 14a Corpus Juris, p. 1217, as follows:

"Under principles of comity, and except as otherwise provided by constitutional or statutory provisions, a corporation created by any state or nation is permitted to enter other states, and there to exercise all legitimate powers conferred upon it and to carry on as a corporation any business not prohibited by the local laws or against local public policy. The rules of comity are subject to local modification by the lawmaking power. But until so modified they have the controlling force of legal obligation, and it is the duty of the courts to observe and enforce them until the sovereign otherwise directs. The comity involved is the comity of the state, not of the courts, and the judiciary must be guided by the principles and policy adopted by the Legislature.

* * * Statutes authorizing foreign corporations to do business within the state and prescribing the terms and conditions upon which they shall be permitted to do so have been almost universally adopted, and their construction and application forms a large part of the law of foreign corporations. Upon compliance with such statutes the foreign corporation may transact business within the state as if under a franchise from the state, and ordinarily in the same manner as if it were a domestic corporation."

The decision of the courts of this state have been in harmony with the doctrine of comity as thus applied to foreign corporations, as will be seen from an examination of the following cases: Anglo-Californian Bank v. Field, 146 Cal. 644, 80 P. 1080; American, etc., Wireless Co. v. Superior Court, 153 Cal. 533, 96 P. 15, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1117, 126 Am. St. Rep. 125; H. K. Mulford Co. v. Curry, 163 Cal. 276, 125 P. 236; People v. Alaska P. S. S. Co., 182 Cal. 202, 187 P. 742.

[4] In the case of American, etc., Wireless Co. v. Superior Court, supra, the application of the doctrine of comity to foreign corporations seeking to transact business in this state was so far extended as to hold that—

"A statute of this state which purports to curtail the privilege of foreign corporations to maintain or defend actions in this state, and to impose conditions upon compliance with which alone they may be permitted to do so, will not be construed to extend beyond the plain meaning of its terms considered in connection with its object and purposes. The sections above quoted do not purport to forbid a foreign corporation which has failed to comply with its provisions from defending an action brought against it in the courts of this state. They are only forbidden to maintain actions."

In so holding, that decision was in harmony with the statement of the similar rule of construction set forth in Murfree on Foreign Corporations, and is also expressed in Fletcher on Corporations in the following terms:

"Repugnancy to the public policy of the state will not be implied from the mere silence of the state. It must be expressed in some affirmative way. An intention to exclude a foreign corporation, or to prohibit it from doing business and making contracts in a state, or acquiring or holding real property within its limits, is not to be implied from the mere fact that the laws of the state do not provide for the formation of similar corporations, or from the fact that it permits corporations to be formed only under general laws." 8 Fletcher, Encyc. Corp. par. 5740.

It is a fact of which the court must take judicial notice that the laws of the various states which regulate and prescribe the method for the organization and the measure of the powers of private corporations differ widely, and it is because of these differences that so many cases have arisen and been decided involving the application of the doctrine of comity to corporations seeking to enter other states than those of their creation for the purpose of transacting business therein, and out of this very diversity has been evolved a rule which may almost be said to be a rule of necessity, that corporations which may have been organized in one state in accordance with statutory methods which do not obtain in other states, or have been given powers which corporations organized in other states do not possess, or which have different stock structures, or which have imposed different measures of liability or limitations of liability upon their stockholders, or which have invested such stockholders with divergent voting powers than those allowable in states other than that of their origin, may still be permitted to enter such other states and transact business therein under the doctrine of comity, in the absence of express constitutional or statutory inhibitions on the part of those states which such foreign corporations thus seek to enter.

The following are some of the applications of this rule:

In the case of Cowell v. Springs Co., 100 U. S. 55-59 (25 L. Ed. 547), the question arose over the attempt of a Pennsylvania corporation, organized under a special statute and invested thereby with extensive powers, to enter the territory of Colorado and transact forms of business therein at a time when Congress had provided that corporations could not be organized in territories except under general laws, and that territorial corporations thus created were not authorized to transact the kinds of business which the Pennsylvania corporation was empowered under its special charter to do. It was argued that if a domestic corporation could not be created with such powers, a foreign corporation could not for the like reason be permitted to exercise them in the territory. In passing upon this question, Mr. Justice Field said:

"The answer to this position is found in the general comity which, in the absence of positive direction to the contrary, obtains through the states and territories of the United States, by which corporations created in one state or territory are permitted to carry on any lawful business in another state and territory, and to acquire, hold and transfer property there equally as individuals. If the policy of the state or territory does not permit the business of the foreign corporation in its limits, or allow the corporation to acquire or hold real property, it must be expressed in some affirmative way; it cannot be inferred from the fact that its Legislature has made no provision for the formation of similar corporations, or allows corporations to be formed only by general law."

In the case of Saltmarsh v. Spaulding, 147 Mass. 224, 17 N. E. 316, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New Hampshire had become possessed of certain real property in the state of Massachusetts and undertook by an order of its board of directors to mortgage the property; the board of directors of said corporation having power under the laws of New Hampshire to adopt and carry into effect such order. Under the laws of the state of Massachusetts governing corporations created thereunder, it was provided that a corporation could not convey or mortgage its real estate unless authorized by a vote of the stockholders thereof at a meeting called for that purpose so to do. It was held, however, that the Massachusetts statute referred only to corporations organized thereunder and had not been made expressly applicable to foreign corporations, and that in the absence of an express inhibition the foreign corporation derived its authority to do the act in question by comity from the state of its creation. In the case of People ex rel., etc., v. Fidelity, etc., Co. of New York, 153 Ill. 25, 38 N. E. 752, 26 L. R. A. 295, it was held that the foreign corporation in question might do multiform insurance in Illinois under the rule of comity which prevails between states, in the absence of an express prohibition in the statutes of Illinois, although such statutes did not authorize the formation of corporations in that state for that purpose. In so holding, the Supreme Court of Illinois quoted with approval the language of Mr. Justice Field in the case of Cowell v. Springs, supra. In the case of U. S. Fidelity Co. v. Linehan, 73 N. H. 41-43, 58 A. 956, it was held on the authority of the Illinois case last above cited that, in the absence of an express prohibition in the statute against the business of multiform insurance, the comity that prevails between states permits a foreign corporation to do such insurance, although the statutes of the local state do not authorize the formation of corporations for that purpose. In the case of Clark v. Memphis Street Ry. Co., 123 Tenn. 232, 130 S. W. 751, it was decided that under the rule of comity between states a foreign corporation authorized so to do by the laws of the state of its creation might purchase and hold the stock of other corporations in Tennessee, although local corporations in that state had not been given the power so to do.

Approaching more immediately the question before us, we are referred to the case of State ex rel., etc., v. Sullivan, etc., 282 Mo. 261, 221 S. W. 728. This was a case wherein the relator, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Delaware for the purpose of engaging, selling, and dealing in railway equipment and appliances, and having a capital structure consisting of 130,000 shares, divided into 30,000 shares of preferred stock, of the par value of $100 a share, and 100,000 shares of common stock without par value, such stock structure being permissible under the laws of that state, undertook to engage in business in the state of Missouri, and applied to the secretary of state of Missouri for a license so to do. Its said application was refused upon the ground that the Constitution of Missouri contemplated corporations with a capital stock of par value shares only (Const. of Mo. § 21, art. 10); and that the statutes of Missouri provided only for the organization of corporations in that state having capital stock of a fixed par value. The relator sought a writ of mandate to compel the issuance to it of the required license, and thus the direct question presented to this court in the instant case came before the Supreme Court of that state for decision. That court, after a very exhaustive review of the decisions touching the application of the doctrine of comity between states in its relation to foreign corporations, and also after a very careful consideration of the Constitution and laws of Missouri, decided that while as to the latter they provided for the formation of domestic corporations with a capital stock composed of par value shares, and while there was no law in that state authorizing the formation of such corporations with a capital stock not thus divided, it was nowhere expressly provided therein that corporations organized in another state with a capital stock not in whole or part composed of par value shares should be denied admission into said state for the purpose of transacting business therein or should be refused a license so to do. In the absence of such express inhibition, it was held that the doctrine of comity between states was susceptible of being given full application to the facts of that case, and hence that the relator was entitled to its writ. In the case of North American Petroleum Co. v. Hopkins, 105 Kan. 161, 181 P. 625, the petitioner sought a writ of mandate to compel a consideration of the petitioner's application for permission to do business in that state. It appeared from said application that the petitioner was a foreign corporation having a capital stock divided into shares of no fixed or nominal par value, as was permissible in the state of its creation. It further appeared in the record that corporations organized for profit under the laws of the state of Kansas must set forth in their articles or charter the amount of their capital, the number of shares into which that capital was divided, and the number of shares held by each stockholder. The court, while holding that the petitioner as a foreign corporation was not such as to its framework as could be organized as a domestic corporation under the laws of Kansas, it was nevertheless entitled to admission to do business in that state.

[5, 6] When we examine the Constitution and statutes of the state of California in the light of the liberal application which, according to the consensus of the foregoing authorities, should be given to the doctrine of comity in its application to the admission of foreign corporations to transact their lawful business in states other than those of their creation, and when we do so with particular reference to the exhaustive consideration of the similar situation presented in the case of State ex rel. Standard, etc., Co. v. Sullivan, supra, we are constrained to hold that as to our statutory law upon the subject there is to be found therein no express inhibition against the admission of foreign corporations entering this state and engaging in business therein, even though it might be that as to their framework, and especially as to the duality of their stock structure, such corporations would not have been entitled to organize as domestic corporations or to receive certificates of incorporation as such under the laws of this state. Nor are we able to discover any such express inhibition in the provisions of the state Constitution having relation to the admission and functioning of foreign corporations in this state, unless it is to be found in the language, intent, and meaning of section 15 of article 12 of the said state Constitution. Said section reads as follows:

"No corporation organized outside the limits of this state shall be allowed to transact business within this state on more favorable conditions than are prescribed by law to similar corporations organized under the laws of this state."

It is the main contention of the respondent herein that the foregoing provision of the state Constitution furnishes full and sufficient ground for his refusal to receive the documents and fees tendered to him by the petitioner herein as the basis for the issuance to it of his official permission to engage in business in this state. We are not, however, satisfied that the respondent is justified in making this contention. The business which a foreign corporation transacts or seeks to transact in the state which it may desire to enter is the business which is contemplated in the expressed purposes of its creation as set forth in its articles of incorporation. This was clearly indicated by this court in its decision in the case of Miles v. Woodward, 115 Cal. 308-311, 46 P. 1076. That was a case wherein a stockholder of a corporation undertook to recover liquidated damages from a director thereof for an alleged violation of an act of the Legislature (Stats. 1880, p. 134) which imposed a liability upon directors of corporations for a failure on their part to make and post weekly reports in the manner required by the act. It was contended that the act was unconstitutional because it operated only upon domestic corporations and thus enabled foreign corporations to transact business in this state upon more favorable conditions than domestic corporations might under the requirements and penalties of said act; but this court held that the said act related merely to the internal affairs of corporations and not to its outside dealings or the conduct of the business it was organized to engage in. The subject was further clarified by the case of General Conference, etc., v. Berkey, 156 Cal. 466, 105 P. 411, wherein it was held that a corporation organized in another state solely for "religious, missionary, educational and charitable purposes," and having acquired a piece of real estate in California, and seeking to sell and dispose of the same, was not required to comply with sections 593 and 598 of the Civil Code applicable to the sale by domestic corporations of property of like character. This court held that the purposes for which said foreign corporations were organized being those above set forth, it was not to be held, by virtue of the doing of the single and incidental act referred to, to be engaged in the transaction of business in this state within the purview of section 15 of article 12 of the Constitution. The business which the petitioner herein was organized to transact, according to the declared purposes of its articles of incorporation, was primarily that of a corporation dealing in securities of all kinds and also of engaging in other lines of business germane to the main purpose of its organization.

[7-10] The respondent herein contends that a foreign corporation organized for the foregoing purposes may not, under the foregoing inhibition of the Constitution, be permitted to enter the state of California and transact business herein, for two reasons: First, that because of its dual stock structure its stockholders have not an equality of voting power; and, second, that for the same cause its stockholders are not subjected to an equality of liability. As to the first of these reasons, it would seem that the matter of the equality or inequality of voting power in its stockholders is one which concerns merely the internal organism of the corporation and has nothing whatever to do with the transaction of the business of the corporation as between itself and the outside world; and that this being so, the language of this court in the case of Miles v. Woodward, supra, with this section of the Constitution immediately in mind, may be aptly applied:

"The Constitution was not designed to limit the powers of the Legislature when dealing with the organization and government of corporations which are created by its own will and act. Over such corporations it has and may exercise full powers of control. Over the organization and internal government of foreign corporations it has no such powers. The laws of the state do not have extraterritorial force. It would be meaningless for this state to try to legislate upon the internal affairs of such foreign corporations, and it has not attempted to do so."

Applying these principles, we are of the opinion that the question as to whether the stockholders of this foreign corporation have or have not an equality of voting power in the management of its internal affairs is not involved in the present inquiry. With respect to the second proposition urged by the respondent, to the effect that this petitioner, if granted permission to enter California for the transaction of business therein, with its aforesaid dual stock structure, would be permitted to transact business herein upon more favorable conditions than domestic corporations can under the stock structure required by the present laws of the state, conceding, for the sake of argument, that the regulations which a corporation adopts as to the basis of liability of its stockholders has such a relation to the transaction of its business as declared in its articles of incorporation as to bring it within the terms of the foregoing section of our state Constitution, it does not follow therefrom that the permit of the petitioner should be denied. The authorities to which the respondent has cited us with relation to the liabilities of stockholders of foreign corporations hold that the stockholders of such corporations, regardless of the laws of the state wherein they were organized or of the exemptions or other conditions affecting such stockholders and their liabilities under said laws or under the terms of the charter of such foreign corporations, are subjected to the same liabilities as are the stockholders of domestic corporations when such foreign corporations see fit to enter California for the purpose of transacting business therein. It was so held in the case of Provident Gold Mining Co. v. Haynes, 173 Cal. 44, 159 P. 155, and in the earlier decisions of this court cited therein. Thomas v. Wentworth Hotel Co., 158 Cal. 275, 110 P. 942, 139 Am. St. Rep. 120; Peck v. Noee, 154 Cal. 351, 97 P. 865. See, also, Thomas v. Matthiessen, 232 U. S. 221, 34 S. Ct. 312, 58 L. Ed. 577; Pinney v. Nelson, 183 U. S. 144, 22 S. Ct. 52, 46 L. Ed. 125. The question of how this equalized liability of the stockholders of a foreign corporation is to be established and enforced is one which would be determinable by the courts when it arose in a proper case, but we do not think it is presentable upon the threshold of the proposed entry of such foreign corporation for the purpose of transacting business in this state, nor that it is involved in the present inquiry. We do not deem it necessary to determine whether or not section 15 of article 12 of the Constitution is self-executing, since we find no present reason for its application to the instant proceeding. Let the writ issue as prayed for.

PEOPLE v. SLOPER. (Cr. 2910.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 19, 1926.)

1. Criminal law §1193—When judgment of death is affirmed and remittitur spread on minutes of trial court, trial court must carry judgment into effect (Pen. Code, § 1265).

When judgment of death is affirmed and remittitur spread on minutes of trial court, trial court must make all orders necessary to carry the judgment into effect, under Pen. Code, § 1265.

2. Criminal law §1084.

Appeal to Supreme Court from judgment of death stays execution until determination of appeal, under Pen. Code, § 1243.

3. Criminal law §1023(12)—Order fixing date of execution under previous sentence of death is not appealable, notwithstanding statute allowing appeal from orders after judgment affecting substantial rights (Pen. Code, § 1227, as amended by St. 1905, p. 700, and section 1237, subd. 3).

By terms of Pen. Code, § 1227, as amended by St. 1905, p. 700, an order fixing the date of execution of a defendant under previous sentence of death is not appealable, notwithstanding Pen. Code, § 1237, subd. 3, making appealable any order after judgment affecting the substantial rights of defendant.

4. Criminal law §624—Where counsel argued that accused was insane, but did not ask stay of proceedings for trial of sanity by jury, contentions concerning sanity before judgment are concluded by verdict (Pen. Code, §§ 1367, 1368).

On trial for murder, where counsel argued that accused was insane, but did not ask stay of proceedings before judgment until sanity could be tried by jury, under Pen. Code, §§ 1367, 1368, verdict of guilty was final determination of sanity at time of murder, and contentions concerning sanity before judgment could not thereafter be considered.

5. Criminal law §1003.

Refixing time for executing sentence of death does not constitute pronouncement or rendition of judgment.

6. Constitutional law §272—Criminal law §1193.

Neither statutes nor due process of law require that, on affirmance of judgment of death, defendant be sentenced anew.

7. Criminal law §1084.

Judgment of death is not vacated by appeal from judgment, but its execution is stayed pending the appeal.

8. Criminal law §995(1)—Fixing of time of execution is no part of judgment of death, but is merely appointment of day for executing judgment and may be regulated by statute.

Fixing time and place of execution is no part of judgment of death, and is in effect only the appointment of a day for executing the judgment and may be regulated by statute.

9. Criminal law §1193—Jurisdiction of trial court after judgment of death is affirmed is limited to making orders to execute judgment (Pen. Code, §§ 1221-1224, and section 1227, as amended by St. 1905, p. 700).

On affirmance of judgment of death, trial court's jurisdiction is limited to making orders to execute the judgment, in view of Pen. Code, § 1227, as amended by St. 1905, p. 700, denying appeal from order fixing date of execution, and Pen. Code, §§ 1221-1224, providing that warden of prison may initiate proceedings to determine defendant's sanity.

10. Criminal law §1023(12)—After affirmance of judgment of death, no appeal lies from denial of motion that jury determine defendant's sanity, because no substantial right of defendant is affected (Pen. Code, §§ 1221 to 1224, inclusive; section 1237, subd. 3).

After affirmance of judgment of death, no appeal lies from order denying motion that date of execution be not refixed and that jury try defendant's sanity, as no substantial right of defendant, within meaning of Pen. Code, § 1237, subd. 3, is affected, in view of Pen. Code, §§ 1221 to 1224, inclusive, providing that the prison warden, if there is good reason to believe defendant insane, shall initiate proceedings to determine his sanity.

11. Criminal law §1001—After affirmance of judgment of death, no judge, court, or officer other than Governor can suspend execution, except that prison warden may do so to determine defendant's sanity (Pen. Code, §§ 1221 to 1224, inclusive).

After affirmance of judgment of death, no judge, court, or officer other than the Governor can suspend the execution, except that under Pen. Code, §§ 1221 to 1224, inclusive, warden of prison may do so in order to determine defendant's sanity.

In Bank.

Criminal prosecution by the People against Felix Sloper. Application by defendant for stay of execution of death sentence, and for writ of probable cause to have determined the sanity of petitioner following affirmance of conviction of murder in the first degree, with death penalty. Denied.

Wm. F. Herron and Harry A. McKenzie, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, C. J. [1] Application for a stay of execution of death sentence, and for a writ of probable cause. The defendant, Felix Sloper, was placed on trial for the murder of George W. Campbell, a police officer of the city and county of San Francisco. The jury returned a simple verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, and the defendant was sentenced to pay the extreme penalty. On appeal to this court the conviction was affirmed. People v. Sloper, 244 P. 362. During the pendency of the appeal Sloper was confined in the county jail of the city and county of San Francisco, and was there confined when the remittitur went down and was spread on the minutes of the superior court. It then became the duty of the court below to make all orders necessary to carry the judgment into effect. Pen. Code, § 1265; People v. Dick, 39 Cal. 102.

Section 1227 of the Penal Code provides that if, for any reason, a judgment of death has not been executed, and remains in force, the court in which the conviction was had shall, on application of the district attorney, or may, upon its own motion, make and cause to be entered an order appointing a day upon which the judgment shall be executed. Pursuant to the provisions of the section, Sloper was brought before the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for the purpose of having a day fixed for the execution of the judgment. His counsel thereupon interposed a motion that no proceedings relating to the refixing of the time for execution be taken against the defendant for the reason that, since the rendition of the original judgment in the cause, Sloper had become, and was at the time of making the motion, violently insane. Demand was also made by counsel that the sanity of the defendant be determined by a jury to be impaneled for that purpose. The motion and demand were supported by the affidavits of several persons, each of whom stated, in substance, that the affiant believed that Sloper was insane, and gave reasons for such belief. There was also offered the oral testimony of a number of witnesses who testified that they knew the defendant, had closely observed him, and that, in their opinion, he was insane and did not realize the nature of the proceedings against him nor of his impending fate. After these proceedings, which appear to have consumed several days, the court denied the motion and refused to submit the question of Sloper's sanity to a jury. The defendant, by his counsel, thereupon announced in open court that, pursuant to subdivision 3 of section 1237 of the Penal Code, he appealed to the Supreme Court from the order denying his motion. Over the objection of appellant's counsel that it had lost jurisdiction to proceed further, by reason of the fact that an appeal had been taken, the lower court appointed the 25th day of June, 1926, as the day upon which the judgment of death should be executed. Application subsequently made on behalf of the defendant to the court below for a certificate of probable cause for the appeal was denied, and a stay of proceedings pending the application to this court for such certificate was refused.

It is alleged that, unless a certificate of probable cause be granted, the defendant will be put to death by the warden of the penitentiary before an appeal from the order of the lower court refusing to permit the question of his sanity to be heard and determined by a jury can come on for hearing and determination here. The question presented by the application is that of the jurisdiction of the superior court to do anything in this case other than to appoint a day upon which the judgment of death shall be executed, and of the power of either the court below or of this court to stay the execution or grant a writ of probable cause under the circumstances herein appearing.

[2, 3] An appeal to the Supreme Court from a judgment of conviction stays execution in all capital cases until the determination of the appeal. Pen. Code, § 1243; Ex parte Edgar, 119 Cal. 123, 127, 51 P. 29. In this case the appeal from the final judgment of conviction and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial has been determined and the appeal from the judgment no longer acts as a stay. An appeal may also be taken by the defendant in a criminal cause from any order made after judgment affecting the substantial rights of the party. Pen. Code, § 1237, subd. 3. While it was formerly the rule, well supported by the decisions of this court, that an order fixing the date of execution of a prisoner under previous sentence of death was one made after final judgment, from which an appeal might be taken, such is not now the law. In 1905 the Legislature amended section 1227 of the Penal Code, relating to judgments of death remaining unexecuted, by adding thereto the provision that, from an order fixing the time for, and directing the execution of such judgments, there shall be no appeal. Stats. 1905, p. 700. It follows, therefore, that, unless the defendant, Sloper, has the right of appeal from the action of the court refusing to submit the question of his sanity to a jury, his application to this court for relief must be denied. It is most earnestly contended in his behalf that the order denying his motion very vitally affected his substantial rights, in that it might result in the execution of an insane person. For the reasons we shall advance, we do not share that contention.

[4] It is, of course, the law that a person cannot be tried, adjudged to punishment, or punished for a public offense while he is insane. Pen. Code, § 1367. If at any time during the pendency of the action against the defendant, Sloper, up to the time when he was arraigned for judgment after his conviction, a doubt had arisen as to his sanity, it would have been the duty of the trial court to submit that question to a jury, and to suspend the trial, or the pronouncement of judgment, until the question was determined by its verdict. Pen. Code, § 1368. Although it was argued to the jury in the trial court that Sloper should be relieved of the legal consequences of his act in causing the death of Campbell, for the reason that the defendant was afflicted with insanity, it does not appear that any effort was made to interrupt the trial or stay the proceedings until the question of his sanity could be tried by a jury. Consequently the verdict of the jury finding him guilty of the murder must be accepted as finally determining that Sloper was not insane when he fired the fatal shot, and any contention concerning his sanity before judgment in the court below cannot now be considered. Therefore the provision of the section, supra, that a person cannot be tried or adjudged to punishment while he is insane is not involved in this proceeding. But, on behalf of the defendant, it is contended that there still remains to support his application the provision that he may not be punished while he is insane, and that the court ought not appoint a day for his execution.

[5-8] The refixing of the time for the carrying out of the execution does not constitute the pronouncement or rendition of a judgment. Neither the statutes of California nor due process of law require that, upon the affirmance of a judgment of conviction, the accused shall be sentenced anew by the trial court to suffer punishment of death. An adjudication of punishment is not vacated by an appeal from the judgment; only its execution is stayed pending the proceedings in the Supreme Court. The fixing of time and place of execution is no part of the judgment of sentence of death, and may be regulated by statute. Schwab v. Berggren, 143 U. S. 442, 451, 12 S. Ct. 525, 36 L. Ed. 218; Costley v. Commonwealth, 118 Mass. 1, 35. The original judgment in this case became final and conclusive upon affirmance by the Supreme Court. The order fixing a day upon which the judgment shall be executed, made on the going down of the remittitur, amounts in effect to nothing more than appointing a day for carrying the judgment into execution. In re Spagnoli, 193 Cal. 472, 225 P. 274.

[9-11] Adequate statutory provision, as we have pointed out, is made for the determination of the question of the sanity of a defendant during the pendency of a trial, and when he is brought before the court for judgment on conviction. Equally adequate statutory provision is made for the complete protection of the rights of a defendant who may have become insane after his conviction and sentence. It is provided in section 1221 of the Penal Code that if, after his delivery to the warden of the state prison for execution, there is good reason to believe that a defendant under judgment of death has become insane, the warden must call such fact to the attention of the district attorney of the county in which the prison is situate, whose duty it is to immediately take the necessary steps that the question of the sanity of the defendant may be inquired into. If it be found that the defendant is insane, the court must direct that he be taken to one of the state hospitals for the insane and there kept in safe confinement until his reason is restored. When the defendant recovers his reason the superintendent of the hospital must certify that fact to the Governor, who must thereupon issue to the warden his warrant appointing a day for the execution of the judgment. Pen. Code, §§ 1222-1224. These sections of the Code were enacted at the same session at which it was provided there shall be no appeal from the order fixing the time for, and directing the execution of, judgments of death which remain in force but, for some reason, have not been executed. We must conclude, therefore, that it was the intention of the Legislature to limit the jurisdiction of the trial court in proceedings of this nature to the making of the orders necessary to carry the judgment into effect. We are of opinion, also, that, in view of the comprehensive and adequate provision made for the determination of the question of the sanity of a defendant who is alleged to have become insane after the rendition of a judgment of death, no substantial right of the defendant, Sloper, was affected by the action of the court below in denying his motion. For that reason no appeal lies to this court, and the facts do not present a proper case for the issuance of a certificate of probable cause. Neither can any judge, court, or officer, other than the Governor, suspend the execution of the judgment of death, except that the warden of the state prison, to whom the defendant is delivered for execution, may do so for the purpose of inquiring into the question of his sanity. Pen. Code, § 1221. If it be a fact in this case that the condemned man is insane, it must be assumed that the warden of the state prison will do his full duty to the end that the question of the prisoner's sanity may be judicially determined.

The application for a writ of probable cause, and for a stay of proceedings until a transcript of the proceedings in the court below can be prepared and transmitted to this court, must be denied. It is so ordered.

BELL v. McDERMOTH. (L. A. 8060.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1926.)

1. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 142—Year within which defendant not personally served may answer to merits commences to run from date of filing and signing decree, that being "date of rendition of judgment" (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing that, when summons in action has not been personally served, court may allow defendant or his legal representative, within one year from rendition of judgment, to answer to merits, the year begins to run from date of signing and filing of decree, since that is the date of rendition.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Date.]

2. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 525—Recourse may be had to affidavits in judgment roll to determine whether showing made for order of publication of summons was sufficient to confer jurisdiction on court (Code Civ. Proc. § 670, subd. 1).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 670, subd. 1, including in judgment roll affidavits for publication of summons, recourse may be had thereto on issue of validity of decree apparently valid on its face, based on substituted service, to determine whether showing made for order of publication was sufficient to confer jurisdiction on court to make the order.

3. Process $\hookrightarrow$ 96(4)—Showing that defendant cannot with due diligence be found within state, sufficient for order of publication, held embraced in showing he was absent from state.

A sufficient showing that defendant cannot with due diligence be found within state, to support order of publication of summons, is embraced within showing, if otherwise sufficient, that he was absent from state, notwithstanding absence of showing that summons had been placed in hands of a process server.

4. Process $\hookrightarrow$ 96(4)—Affidavit that defendant's wife informed affiant that defendant was in another state, and affidavit that letter apparently written elsewhere, though posted in state, was received from defendant, held sufficient showing for order of publication.

Showing, though slight, that defendant in action to quiet title was absent from state, predicated on affidavit that defendant's wife had informed affiant that defendant was in another state, and affidavit that plaintiff's attorney received letter from defendant, apparently written in another state, though posted within state, held sufficient basis for order of publication of summons.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. W. Guerin, Judge.

Action by Chester A. Bell against Joe Freeman Jack, wherein default judgment was rendered on publication of summons. Thereafter Rosabelle H. McDermoth, as special administratrix of the estate of said Jack, deceased, made motion to have the judgment set aside and to permit her to appeal and answer. Judgment for defendant on motion, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Everett Brown, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from an order of the trial court, made upon motion of the defendant, setting aside its judgment theretofore entered in an action to quiet title, and permitting the said defendant to appear and answer in said action. The original complaint was filed on April 5, 1922, and is in the usual form of an action to quiet title. The defendant named in said action was one J. F. Jack, who has since died, and of whose estate the present defendant is special administratrix. On July 26, 1922, the judge of the court in which said action was pending made an order for the publication of summons therein, which order was based upon certain affidavits presented by the plaintiff as a basis for his application for said order. Thereafter the said summons was published in accordance with the terms of said order, and thereafter, and upon a proper showing of the fact of said publication and mailing conformable to the terms of said order, and after the time had expired for the appearance of said defendant, a decree quieting title was signed and filed by the judge of the trial court. The date of the signing and filing of said decree was December 27, 1922. Said decree, however, was not entered by the clerk of said court until January 4, 1923. On December 31, 1923, the present defendant, having in the meantime been appointed special administratrix of the estate of J. F. Jack, deceased, filed her notice of motion to set aside said decree upon the several grounds set forth therein, and said motion coming on to be heard on January 10, 1924, was granted by the trial court, and the proffered answer of said defendant was permitted to be filed. The plaintiff appeals from said order, and upon said appeal sets forth certain reasons why the same should be reversed.

[1] The first contention made by the appellant is that, since the application of the defendant for said order appears to have been made upon a date more than one year after the rendition of said decree, the trial court had no longer jurisdiction to entertain the same under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The provisions of said Code relating to the time within which such an application must, under its terms, be made, reads as follows:

"When from any cause the summons in an action has not been personally served on the defendant, the court may allow, on such terms, as may be just, such defendant or his legal representative, at any time within one year after the rendition of any judgment in such action, to answer to the merits of the original action."

The decree in the instant case was signed by the trial judge and filed with the clerk of said court on December 27, 1922. That date, under the authorities, was the date of the rendition of said judgment. Gray v. Palmer, 28 Cal. 416; Peck v. Courtis, 31 Cal. 207; Genella v. Relyea, 32 Cal. 159; Wetherbee v. Dunn, 36 Cal. 249.

[2-4] The date of the filing of defendant's motion to set aside such decree being December 31, 1923, it was therefore presented more than one year after the rendition of said decree. Respondent, in answer to this objection, however, contends that her motion to set aside said decree was not made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but was made generally, upon the ground that said decree was void upon its face, and, being made upon said ground, was not required to be made within the period provided by said section of the Code of Civil Procedure. We are thus brought to a consideration of the question as to whether the decree in question was or was not void upon its face. An examination of the decree will serve to show that, strictly speaking, it was entirely regular upon its face, since its recitals showed that the original defendant, J. F. Jack, had been duly and regularly served with process, and had failed to appear and answer the complaint on file within the time required by law.

Prior to the year 1895, wherein subdivision 1 of section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended, so as to include within the judgment roll the affidavits and other documents upon which an order for the publication of summons was predicated, it could not be questioned that the decree herein, containing the foregoing recitals, was valid upon the face thereof. Since said amendment, however, it would seem to have been held that recourse may be had to the judgment roll and the contents thereof for the purpose of determining whether a decree, apparently valid upon the face thereof, but predicated upon a prior substituted service, is sufficiently supported by the showing made as a basis for the order of the court providing for the publication of the summons in such a proceeding. The decision in this case is thus made to turn, at the last analysis, on the question as to whether the trial court, making its order for the publication of summons, had acquired jurisdiction to make the same by virtue of the showing which the plaintiff presented as a basis for such order.

The respondent herein contends that such showing was entirely inadequate, and hence that the said order of the trial court directing the publication of summons as against the then living defendant was utterly void. We are unable to agree with that contention. The showing which the plaintiff presented upon his application for said order of publication was substantially as follows:

He presented the affidavit of a competent witness to the effect that the affiant, acting on behalf of the plaintiff, having ascertained that the residence of the defendant, J. F. Jack, was at No. 992 South Serrano avenue, in the city of Los Angeles, had called at said residence, seeking said defendant, impliedly for the purpose of making personal service of the summons in said action upon him, and had been then and there informed by the wife of said defendant that the latter was in Arizona, and that his address there was unknown to her, and that, if any one desired to transact business with said defendant, mail should be addressed to him at his said designated residence, and that she (his wife) would forward the same to him when she ascertained his address. There was also filed the affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney to the effect that, after receiving the report from the former affiant to the effect that the defendant was then in Arizona, he addressed a letter to him, directing the same to his Los Angeles residence, and about two weeks later received a response to said letter, in the form of a letter from said defendant, dated "Arizona, 5/10/22," which letter, however, appeared from the postmark thereon to have been posted at Los Angeles. The contents of said letter indicated that the said defendant was in Arizona. The plaintiff also filed an affidavit of merits, wherein he deposed that personal service of summons could not be made upon the said defendant for the reasons which appeared in the affidavit aforesaid.

The order for publication of summons was predicated upon the foregoing showing. It was recited in said order "that the defendant, J. F. Jack, cannot after due diligence be found within this state"; but it also contained the recital "that the said defendant is absent from the state of California, and that his address outside of the state cannot be ascertained." It was therefore ordered that said summons be published for the time required by law, and that a copy thereof be mailed to the defendant at his said place of residence in Los Angeles. It would thus appear that the trial court had as a basis for its said order some substantial showing that the defendant, Jack, was at the time said order was sought absent from the state of California, and hence beyond the jurisdiction of said court for the purpose of a personal service upon him of the summons in said action. It is true that said showing is slight, and it is also true that it is predicated in the main upon the information and belief of the affiant, who interviewed the wife of said defendant and was informed by her that the said defendant was absent from the state. This showing, however, is supported in some degree by the affidavit of plaintiff's attorney to the effect that he received from said defendant, shortly after the foregoing information was imparted to him, a letter which indicated that it had been written by the defendant in Arizona, though posted in Los Angeles, but by whom posted did not appear.

It is argued by the respondent that this showing should have been supported by a further showing that said summons had been placed with the sheriff or other process server for personal service upon the defendant in this state, and that said defendant could not, after due diligence, be found therein. But it is clear, that, if said defendant was in fact in Arizona, as shown by the foregoing inquiry as to his whereabouts, the placing of said summons with the sheriff or other process server would have been an idle and futile act, and that a sufficient showing that the defendant could not with due diligence be found within the state of California would be embraced within the showing, if otherwise sufficient, that the said defendant was absent from the state. We are, therefore, of the opinion that a sufficient predicate was laid by the plaintiff for the issuance by the court of its order for the publication of summons.

It is true that said order, in the earlier recitals thereof, recited as the basis for its issuance that it had been satisfactorily shown to the court that the defendant, Jack, "cannot after due diligence be found within this state," and that the said recital did not truly represent the basis upon which said order of publication was sought; but whatever defect there may have been in this recital was, we think, cured by the later recital in the same order to the effect that the said defendant was at the time of the issuance thereof "absent from the state of California." The sufficiency of the showing as to the proper publication of said summons, and as to the mailing thereof as required by law and by the terms of said order, was not questioned by the substituted defendant moving to set aside said order and the decree predicated thereon, and it follows that, unless we should treat the showing made as a predicate for said order of publication as being wholly inadequate, and said order for that reason as being wholly void, we must, under the authorities above cited, reverse the order of the trial court setting aside its said decree. It is to be noted that said defendant, in seeking to have set aside said decree, tendered no showing whatever that at the time of the making of the order for publication of summons, and at the time of the making of the showing upon which said order was based, the then existing defendant was not in fact, and at all said times, and up to the time of the rendition of the said decree, absent from the state of California, and beyond the reach of personal service of the process of said court.

The showing of the said respondent upon her motion to set aside said decree being thus wholly based upon her technical objection to the sufficiency of the showing made by the plaintiff as the basis for the issuance of the order of publication, we incline to the opinion that the said respondent did not present a sufficient showing to justify the trial court in making the order appealed from herein, and that the respondent's motion for said order, not having been made within one year after the rendition of said decree, and not being sufficiently supported by a showing that said decree was void upon the face thereof, should have been denied.

It follows that the said order of the trial court granting said motion should be and the same is hereby reversed.

WESTLAKE PARK INV. CO. v. JORDAN,
Secretary of State. (L. A. 9198.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 19, 1926.
Rehearing Denied June 17, 1926.)

1. Corporations ⇨28(1)—Investment company held de facto corporation after three years' existence under articles of incorporation providing for stock structure in violation of statute (Civ. Code, §§ 290, 290b; Const. art. 12, §§ 3, 12).

Investment company, whose articles of incorporation provided for preferred stock at $100 par value and common stock without par value, in violation of Civ. Code, § 290, and inconsistent with Const. art. 12, §§ 3, 12, but otherwise conforming with Civ. Code, § 290, and in which attempt was made to bring stock structure within section 290b, to which original certificate of incorporation was issued, and which functioned in good faith as corporation for three years, held de facto corporation.

2. Corporations ⇨62.

Corporations cannot be created, having as their stock structure capital stock of differing par values, in view of Civ. Code, § 290.

3. Corporations ⇨28(1)—Attempt to organize under charter or general law under which corporation might be lawfully organized and user of corporate franchise held to create de facto corporation.

Attempt to organize corporation under charter or general law, under which such corporation as it purports to be might be lawfully organized and actual user of corporate franchise, held to create de facto corporation.

4. Corporations ⇨29(2).

Validity of existence of de facto corporation ought not to be inquired into collaterally.

It is right and duty of secretary of state to determine whether corporate organization has been accomplished in conformity with statutory laws relating thereto, before he issues its charter or certificate of corporation.

6. Corporations $\Rightarrow$ 29(1)—De facto corporation, which had existed three years, held entitled to license to do business for current year.

De facto corporation, which had existed three years, held entitled to license to do business for current year, since license tax neither imports nor requires any other inquiry into original legality of corporate organization than that of determining whether on face of things it appears to be such organization as would be properly subject to such tax.

7. Corporations $\Rightarrow$ 29(1)—Secretary of state held neither bound nor authorized to determine whether corporation acting de facto as such is de jure corporation, when it applies for license to do business (Corporation License Act, § 3, as amended by St. 1917, p. 373).

Secretary of state held neither bound nor empowered to determine whether corporation acting de facto as such is de jure corporation, when in either capacity it offers to pay annual license tax and demands issuance of license permitting it to do business within state for current year, since Corporation License Act, § 3, as amended by St. 1917, p. 373, does not authorize such inquiry.

Legal existence of corporation de facto can only be inquired into in proceeding in nature of writ of quo warranto, instituted by state on relation of Attorney General, wherein right of corporation to exercise its franchise may be judicially inquired into and determined.

Application for writ of mandate by the Westlake Park Investment Company, prayed to be directed to Frank C. Jordan as Secretary of State. Writ granted.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robert W. Harrison, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lionel B. Browne, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein applies for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as secretary of state of the state of California, to accept from the petitioner its corporation license tax for the year 1926 and to thereupon issue a license in conformity with the Corporation License Act (St. 1915, p. 422, as amended), authorizing the transaction of business by it in this state for the current year. The petitioner appends to its said application a copy of its articles of incorporation, made, executed, and filed in the office of the said secretary of state during the month of October, 1923, whereupon, as the petitioner alleges, a certificate of incorporation was issued to it by the respondent as such secretary of state, and further alleges that, ever since the issuance thereof, the petitioner has been and now is a corporation engaged in the transaction of business in this state; that the petitioner during the years 1924 and 1925, respectively, paid to the respondent upon his demand the license tax required of said petitioner under the said Corporation License Act for each of said years, respectively, and received from said respondent a license authorizing the transaction by it of business in the state of California during each of said years. It is further alleged that the proffer of the similar license tax by the petitioner, and its request for a like license for the year 1926, have been refused by the respondent for the reasons which will hereinafter appear; wherefore its application for this writ. The respondent has presented his answer and return to the alternative writ issued herein in the form of a demurrer, and we are thus presented with the questions of law which arise upon the face of the petitioner's said application.

[1, 2] The first of these questions has reference to the status of the petitioner as a corporation organized and doing business in and under the laws of the state of California. The respondent herein contends that it is not such a corporation for the reason that in its attempted organization as such corporation it has omitted in a vitally essential respect to conform to the requirements of the state Constitution, in that it has provided in its articles of incorporation for a corporate stock structure which is in violation of such Constitution, and particularly of sections 3 and 12 of article 12 thereof, as these sections of said Constitution have been interpreted by this court in the cases of Film Producers Co. v. Jordan, 171 Cal. 664, 154 P. 605, and Del Monte L. & P. Co. v. Jordan (Cal. Sup.) 238 P. 710. The particular defect in the petitioner's original articles of incorporation to which the respondent thus directs our attention is this: That it is therein provided that the corporation thus attempted to be created was to have as its authorized capital stock "10,000 shares of preferred stock of the par value of $100 per share, amounting in the aggregate to $1,000,000, and 10,000 shares of common stock without nominal or par value." The preferences provided for in said articles of incorporation in favor of the preferred stock have reference to preferences in the profits and dividends of the corporation and in the division of its assets in the event of its liquidation or dissolution. It may not be questioned that the effect of the two decisions of this court above referred to is to forbid the initial creation of corporations having as their stock structure capital stock of differing par values. It must further be considered as settled by said decisions that, if the petitioner herein were now presenting to the secretary of state for filing, and for the issuance of a charter thereon, its said articles of incorporation showing its organization upon the aforesaid double basis as to the par values of its stock issues, the secretary of state might have been justified in refusing to file said original articles or to issue a certificate of incorporation thereon. It may be noted, however, as having some more or less important bearing upon the present inquiry, that the original articles of incorporation, which the petitioner herein presented for filing to the secretary of state during the year 1923, contained two particular provisions in addition to those above referred to, each having relation to its stock capitalization. In the first of these it was stipulated as follows:

"(c) No preference is hereby granted, nor shall any distinction be made between the classes of stock either as to voting power or as to the statutory or constitutional liability of the holders thereof to creditors of the corporation, and no distinction shall exist between the said classes of stock or the owners thereof except as to the preferences herein prescribed."

The other of the provisions of the petitioner's said original articles of incorporation was that set forth in article VIII thereof, which showed that the actual stock subscription of the said corporation at the time of the formation thereof and of the offer for filing of its said articles of incorporation was that of 5 shares of preferred stock of the par value of $100 per share. The effect of the foregoing provisions of the petitioner's said original articles of incorporation has not been emphasized before this court as to their bearing upon the immediate inquiry, but, even if it must be assumed in the light of the foregoing decisions of this court that the petitioner herein was not, strictly speaking, a corporation de jure at the time of its proffer for filing of its original articles of incorporation containing the foregoing provisions, we are nevertheless of the opinion that said corporation, by virtue of the above provisions of its said articles which, except in the one particular above set forth, were in exact conformity with the provisions of section 290 of the Civil Code, and also by virtue of the issuance to it of its original certificate of incorporation, and also by virtue of the fact that said corporation, upon the receipt and filing of its said articles and the issuance to it of its said certificate of incorporation, began and has since continued to function as a corporation and is a going concern in this state, became a de facto corporation, and that it was such de facto corporation at the time of its last proffer of its license tax and demand for the issuance to it of a license to continue to do business as a corporation during the year 1926. The authorities, we think, support us in this conclusion.

In the early case of Rondell v. Fay, 32 Cal. 354, 361, it was held that a corporation attempted to be organized by 5 persons and to exist for a period of 25 years under the terms of an act authorizing the formation of such corporations (Stats. 1861, p. 567), which provided that not less than 7 persons might so incorporate for a period of not longer than 5 years, was nevertheless a corporation de facto, when in fact and in good faith it had undertaken to perform the functions of such a corporation, and that its corporate existence could only be attacked at the suit of the state or on information by the Attorney General.

In the case of People v. Perrin, 56 Cal. 345, the corporation, the legal existence of which was therein brought into question by a quo warranto, had been organized under the act of the Legislature of 1853 (Stats. 1853, p. 87), which required the specification in the articles of the amount of capital stock and the number of shares into which the same was divided. The articles of the corporation in question omitted both of these requirements, but nevertheless received a certificate of incorporation and became a going concern. A later act of the Legislature undertook to validate corporations thus defectively organized. Thereafter the Attorney General instituted a quo warranto proceeding to test the legality of the existence of said corporation, and in that proceeding this court held that the certificate of said corporation, though thus defectively organized, was not void and that the corporation thus formed and transacting the business of a corporation was entitled to the benefits of the validating act.

[3, 4] In the case of Tulare Irrigation Dist. v. Shepard, 185 U. S. 1, 13, 22 S. Ct. 531, 536 (46 L. Ed. 773) Mr. Justice Peckham, after a quite full review of certain California and other decisions touching the question as to what would constitute a de facto corporation stated:

"From the authorities, some of which are above cited, it appears that the requisites to constitute a corporation de facto are three: (1) A charter or general law under which such a corporation as it purports to be might lawfully be organized; (2) an attempt to organize thereunder; and (3) actual user of the corporate franchise."

In the latest edition of Thompson on Corporations the foregoing statement is adopted as stating the consensus of authority upon the subject, and many cases are referred to as illustrating the application of the foregoing rule. Among these the California decisions above referred to are cited and other similar instances given, wherein, notwithstanding serious defects or omissions to comply with the laws governing the organization of corporations, there had been a colorable attempt to comply with the statutes authorizing the formation of such a corporation as the one under criticism, purported to be followed by an actual exercise of corporate functions in good faith. See 1 Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) c. 9, § 225 et seq. The philosophy upon which the courts of practically every state and of the United States have gone far toward upholding the existence de facto of corporations which have colorably attempted to organize under statutes permitting incorporation for the general purposes which the persons forming the same seek to incorporate, and which have thereafter in good faith proceeded to function as such corporations, is that the law encourages and shares in the universal desire for the stability of business transactions, and that, where such an organization has thus attempted to be created and has in fact organized and entered upon the transaction of business in good faith, the validity of its existence ought not to be inquired into collaterally. Id. § 248.

The foregoing citations and principles we think apply to the case in hand. Section 290 of the Civil Code is the section thereof which purports to provide for the organization of commercial corporations and to set forth the seven requisites of articles of incorporation of such organizations. It supplies the first condition above referred to, in that it is the general law under which corporations having the purposes of the corporation here under consideration may be formed. An examination of the articles of the instant corporation shows an almost meticulous effort to comply with the requirements of this section of the Code; and, while it is true that in designating the stock structure the organizers of this corporation have attempted to bring its said stock structure within the permissive provisions of another and later adopted section of said Code, viz. section 290b thereof, they have also and in their said articles of incorporation undertaken to provide in strict conformity with section 290 thereof that the voting power or constitutional liability of the holders of the stock thereof shall in no wise be affected thereby. Whether these provisions in said articles of incorporation would or would not be entirely effectual to accomplish the stated result may be debatable, but it cannot, we think, be said either that this corporation has sought to become organized under an unconstitutional statute or that its attempt so to do has not been colorable and done in good faith. Nor is the bona fides of its subsequent acts in its assumed corporate capacity questioned in this proceeding. The cases cited by the respondent, and especially the case of Brandenstein v. Hoke, 101 Cal. 131, 35 P. 562, holding that an attempted organization of a corporation under an unconstitutional law, there being no other law under which such a corporation could be organized at all, will not suffice to call into being a de facto corporation, has, we think, no application to the instant case; nor are the Washington cases cited by respondent applicable, since these refer to the filing of the original or amended articles of incorporation which were subject to the defects noted therein. The distinction between those cases and the instant case will be more fully considered presently. It is our conclusion upon the point now under consideration that the petitioner herein, at the time it proffered the amount of its license tax for the year 1926 and requested the issuance of a license permitting it to engage in the business for which it was organized and had theretofore been functioning prior to and during the year 1926, was a de facto corporation.

[5, 6] This brings us to the second question presented upon this application, and which concerns the right and power of the respondent as secretary of state to decline to receive the license tax and to refuse to issue a license to a de facto corporation, duly tendering such tax and requesting the issuance of such license permitting such corporation to continue to do business in this state during the current year. The secretary of state, with respect to those powers and duties which have been reposed in that office having to do with the issuance of original or amended certificates of incorporation, exercises a function which was originally reposed in the crown or sovereign under the English law. The issuance of a corporate charter by the king was a royal prerogative, and necessarily its exercise contemplated a determination of the due organization and legal right of the applicant for such a charter. Under our American inheritance of the English system of laws, the issuance of corporate charters was a like attribute of sovereignty, and was attended with a like duty to be exercised by the officials of the state. It is therefore the right and duty of the secretary of state to determine whether a corporate organization has been accomplished in conformity with the statutory laws relating to the same before he issues its charter or certificate of incorporation. But the secretary of state, in his capacity as a collector of licenses under the revenue laws of this state, is exercising no such royal function or prerogative. He is engaged in the performance of a strictly ministerial function—such a function as might have been reposed in the state treasurer or state controller or any other state official, or even in county officials in counties where the principal place of business of corporations seeking such licenses might be located. The tax imposed in this form upon corporations is a strictly revenue measure. It is merely a license fee or tax charged upon corporations for the privilege of continuing to carry on their business in this state during the current year. Kaiser Land & Fruit Co. v. Curry, 155 Cal. 638, 103 P. 341. Its charge or its collection or the issuance of the receipt, or so-called license, issued upon the payment of the impost, neither imports nor requires any other or further inquiry into the original legality of the corporate organization than that possibly of determining whether on the face of things it appears to be such an organization as would be properly subject to such a tax.

[7] For convenience in the making of this inquiry the tax is made collectible by the secretary of state, for the apparent reason that the official records of corporate organizations under the laws of this state are on file in his office. But it should be clear that the secretary of state, in the exercise of this purely ministerial function of a tax gatherer, has been neither charged with the duty nor cumbered by the burden of annually ransacking the files of his office when the time for the collection of this license tax arrives for the purpose of discovering whether the corporation purporting to be such and offering to pay the same has in law or in fact been legally organized. To essay such an inquiry would entail upon this official an undue and endless burden for which he might, in point of learning or experience, be entirely unfitted; and would measurably defeat the very object of the law, viz.: The collection of the largest possible revenue to the state from this resource of taxation. We find nowhere in the act relating to the collection of this corporate license tax any express investiture of the secretary of state with the powers he here seeks to exercise and the only language therein upon which the respondent relies as importing such power is that embraced in section 3 of said act, as amended by St. 1917, p. 373, which provides that "every corporation incorporated under the laws of this state" must procure the license provided for therein. This general phrase would, however, apply equally to de facto as to de jure corporations, since the former, however defectively organized, would still be incorporated under the laws of the state. Otherwise they could not, as we have seen, become de facto corporations at all. We therefore reach the conclusion that the respondent herein is neither bound to the duty nor invested with the power of determining whether a corporation, acting de facto as such, is or is not a de jure corporation when in either capacity it offers to pay its annual license tax and demands the issuance of a license permitting it to continue to do business in this state for the current year.

[8, 9] We do not need to consider the application or nonapplication of section 358 of the Civil Code to a proceeding of this nature, for the reason that, entirely independent of said Code section, it is a long-established principle of law that the legal existence of a corporation de facto can only be inquired into in a proceeding in the nature of a writ of quo warranto instituted by the state on the relation of its Attorney General, wherein the right of the corporation to exercise its franchise may be judicially inquired into and determined. Nor do we need to pass upon the petitioner's further contention as to its present right to file amended articles of incorporation, further than to say that our holding that it is a de facto corporation implies the existence of such right.

Let a writ issue directed to the secretary of state requiring him to receive the petitioner's license tax and issue to it the required license as prayed for in its petition herein.

PEOPLE v. BRANCH. (Cr. 1295.)

1. Rape $\hookrightarrow$ 38(1).

In prosecution for statutory rape, under Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1, permitting prosecutrix to testify that she knew what was meant by the expression "sexual intercourse" and to base her subsequent testimony on such assumed knowledge held not error.

2. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 371(9)—In prosecution for statutory rape, evidence that, on other occasions than charged, defendant had been guilty of similar acts, held properly admitted (Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1).

In prosecution for statutory rape, under Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1, evidence that, on other occasions than specified in the information, defendant had been guilty of acts similar to those for the commission of which he was on trial, held properly admitted.

3. Rape $\hookrightarrow$ 48(2).

In prosecution for rape, under Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1, prosecutrix may properly testify that she made complaint, but may not recite details.

4. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 1186(4).

In prosecution for statutory rape, under Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1, improperly permitting prosecutrix to recite details and particulars of complaint made by her held not reversible error, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

5. Criminal law $\hookrightarrow$ 730(11)—In prosecution for rape, improper argument that defendant had not denied traveling in automobile with prosecutrix and others held not prejudicial error. In view of Instructions (Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1).

In prosecution for statutory rape, under Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1, where there was evidence that defendant, prosecuting witness, his 13 year old daughter, and another traveled through several states in an automobile, improper argument that defendant had not denied such fact held not prejudicial error, in view of court's instructions.

6. Criminal law ⚡730(7).

In prosecution for rape, under Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1, argument of district attorney that one of the streets on which defendant drove his automobile on the night of the alleged assault was a very rough street, if not based on evidence, held not prejudicial, in view of court's instructions.

7. Indictment and information ⚡176.

In prosecution for statutory rape, under Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1, state is not required to prove that act was committed on certain date, but only that it was committed on or about date specified in information.

8. Criminal law ⚡829(1).

Refusal of requested instructions covered by other given instructions is not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

R. I. Branch was convicted of statutory rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Emmons & Aldrich and J. O. Reavis, all of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of rape as defined by subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code of the state of California. He also appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Appellant's first specification of prejudicial error is that, over defendant's objection, the prosecuting witness was permitted to state that she knew what was meant by the expression "sexual intercourse," and that her subsequent testimony with reference to the alleged acts of defendant was based upon such assumed knowledge. The reporter's transcript of the proceedings had on the trial of the action shows that on the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness she stated that the matron of the detention home had told her the meaning of the expression under consideration. Although thereafter defendant had ample opportunity otherwise to test the knowledge of the witness, no attempt of any sort was made to do so. It must therefore be presumed that defendant was satisfied with the source of information of the prosecuting witness and as a consequence that she had been correctly informed as to the significance of the words which she used. But aside therefrom, the evidence shows that the prosecuting witness was a girl of the age of 14 years and, judging from her testimony, was apparently of fair intelligence. The fact, as shown by the evidence, that on one occasion defendant, in company with the prosecuting witness and his 13 year old daughter and a youth of 16 years of age, drove an automobile at night to a secluded spot, and that on such occasion defendant fondled and caressed the prosecuting witness, and shortly thereafter defendant and the prosecuting witness left the automobile for 15 or 20 minutes, and that they took a blanket with them, together with the further fact that the evidence discloses that on numerous occasions at night defendant occupied the same bed with the prosecuting witness, would justify the inference that, judged by "the usual passions and propensities of men," the act of sexual intercourse took place between defendant and the prosecuting witness, and consequently, that the knowledge possessed by the prosecuting witness as to the meaning of the expression was accurate. In such circumstances, that appellant's contention be adopted would require an indulgence in a presumption of ignorance on the part of the prosecuting witness which would be wholly out of keeping with the ordinary observations of everyday life and its surroundings.

[2] Appellant complains of the ruling of the trial court in admitting in evidence, over defendant's objection, the testimony of each of several different witnesses, including that of the prosecuting witness, which tended to establish the fact that on several occasions other than that specified in the information defendant had been guilty of acts similar to those for the commission of which he was on trial. Appellant cites no authority to sustain his position. On the other hand, the authorities are numerous, if not universal, to the effect that in criminal cases of the nature of that here under consideration evidence of identical acts on the part of the defendant is admissible for the purpose of showing the libidinous proclivities of the defendant. In prosecutions of this character the lascivious disposition of the defendant, if proven, is a circumstance tending to establish the proneness of the defendant to commit the particular act of which he is charged. In the instant case the lecherous traits in the character of the defendant having been proven to exist at a time not remote from the time specified in the information as that at which the offense charged was committed, it is but a fair inference that in circumstances affording a favorable opportunity for the commission by defendant of a similar act he would indulge his adulterous passions in accordance with his characteristic propensity.

[3, 4] Appellant contends that prejudicial error was committed by the court in permitting the prosecuting witness to testify to certain self-serving declarations. It appears that on redirect examination the complaining witness was permitted to state that immediately after the act of which complaint is made had taken place she told her girl companion that she had had sexual intercourse with the defendant; also that on the trial of defendant such companion was allowed to testify on direct examination that shortly after the offense was alleged to have been committed the prosecuting witness had told her something, although the court sustained defendant's objection to a question as to what was actually told her at that time.

It seems to be conceded by appellant that evidence of the fact that the prosecuting witness complained of defendant's objectionable conduct immediately after its occurrence was admissible; but the point is made that it was error to permit the prosecuting witness to state of what the complaint consisted as well as to allow the girl companion to corroborate the prosecuting witness by testifying that she had told her an indefinite something.

The law appears to be well established that evidence may be received of the fact that complaint was made, by the victim of an assault of the nature of that charged herein, provided that such complaint be made within a reasonable time after the assault was committed. People v. Stewart, 32 P. S. 97 Cal. 238; People v. Baldwin, 49 P. 186, 117 Cal. 244; People v. Barney, 47 P. 41, 114 Cal. 554; People v. Wilmot, 72 P. 838, 139 Cal. 103. The rule, however, limits the evidence to the bald statement that a complaint was made and expressly forbids a recital of details or particularities.

A complaint by a prosecuting witness, to have been properly admissible in evidence as such, should at least have been pertinent to the issue. But the relevancy of the "complaint" can be tested only by the defendant on cross-examination of the witness. Had the prosecuting witness "complained" of the weather or of the roughness of the road over which the automobile was being driven on this particular occasion, without cross-examination to develop of what the complaint consisted (which could have been done only by defendant and at his own risk of having stated the very things from which the rule protects him on direct examination of the witness), the mere fact that a "complaint" had been made would have suggested the surmise, and probably would have been so interpreted by the jury, that the prosecuting witness had genuinely complained of some conduct on the part of the defendant which was relevant to the charge against him.

In the instant case the prosecuting witness was asked:

"Q. Now after you had the first act of sexual intercourse with Mr. Branch the Sunday that you and Mr. Branch and Mr. Louis Dwight and Sylvia Branch went in this Ford coupé did you tell anybody that you had sexual intercourse with Mr. Branch?"

The answer was: "Yes, sir; * * * Sylvia Branch."

In the case of People v. Wilmot, 72 P. 838, 139 Cal. 103, the facts were that several days after the assault was committed the prosecuting witness as a matter of "gossip" told several of her friends of the occurrence. Thereafter one of them was called as a witness, and asked the question, "Did she [the prosecuting witness] say whether or not this defendant had had sexual intercourse with her?"

* * * Did she say that he had?" to which question the witness replied: "She did say that he had on the 9th of May."

In ruling upon the admissibility of such evidence, the court said:

"That the testimony elicited was incompetent is very clear, and that it must have substantially affected defendant's cause is likewise clear. * * *

In People v. Prietz, 164 P. 13, 32 Cal. App. 727, the judgment was reversed and a new trial granted because of the error of the trial court in permitting a similar question to be answered. To like effect, see the following cases: People v. Lambert, 52 P. 307, 120 Cal. 170; People v. Tierney, 7 P. 37, 67 Cal. 54; People v. Mayes, 6 P. 691, 66 Cal. 597, 56 Am. Rep. 126; People v. Graham, 21 Cal. 261; People v. Fernandez, 87 P. 1112, 4 Cal. App. 314.

With one exception, each of the foregoing cases was decided prior to the adoption of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, which provides in substance that—

"No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of * * * the improper admission or rejection of evidence, * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

In the Prietz Case, supra, it does not appear that the constitutional provision to which reference has just been had was taken into consideration; but even though the attention of the court was directed to such provision, by the language of the opinion it is made clear that the reason why the error in admitting in evidence the statement made by the prosecuting witness was held so prejudicial to the case of the defendant as to require a reversal of the judgment was because the case was one "lying so close to the borderline of incredibility." In other words, the case made by the prosecution was so weak and unsatisfactory that it could not be stated with certainty that the admission of the objectionable evidence was not the determining factor in the verdict against the defendant. In the instant case no such situation is presented. The evidence of defendant's guilt, if not direct and positive, is at least convincing. The information charges that at a certain time and place defendant "did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously have and accomplish an act of sexual intercourse with and upon one (the prosecuting witness) then and there a female person under the age of 18 years." Assuming as true that which is shown by the evidence, that neither force nor violence of any sort was used to accomplish the act of which defendant is charged, any proper "complaint" made by the prosecuting witness would necessarily have included a statement, at least in effect, that the act itself had been committed. No other possible deduction could have been drawn by the jury. Consequently the testimony by the prosecuting witness that she had made a direct statement of the fact merely made certain in the minds of the jury that which otherwise would have been an inference. But, while the prosecuting witness stated to her friend that the defendant had committed the act of which he was charged, such fact added very little to the volume of the remaining evidence as to his guilt and in itself was comparatively unimportant. It was but one circumstance of many which pointed toward the correctness of the conclusion reached by the jury. Taking into consideration, as we must, "the entire cause, including the evidence," this court cannot say that "the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

Appellant contends that, by reason of certain comments made by the district attorney during his argument to the jury, defendant was precluded from having a fair trial.

[5] The evidence showed, among other things, that the defendant, the prosecuting witness, the 13 year old daughter of the defendant, and a youth of 16 years of age traveled together in an automobile through several of the western and southern states of the United States. During the argument the district attorney referred to the fact that the defendant did not deny the truth of such evidence, to which statement defendant objected and requested the trial court to instruct the jury to disregard such statement, to which request the court immediately acceded. The defendant was not called upon to deny that fact, and it was improper for the district attorney to refer to his failure to deny it. But, considering the instructions of the trial court on the subject, together with the insignificance of the fact as compared with the whole body of the evidence in the case, we are constrained to hold that the error worked no hardship on the defendant.

[6] Complaint is also made by appellant that the district attorney misconducted himself in his argument to the jury, in that he made the statement that one of the streets on which defendant drove his automobile on the night of the alleged assault upon the prosecuting witness was a very rough street. It is unquestionable that in the way of argument to the jury the district attorney is not justified in making statements as to facts not based upon the evidence. While the conduct of the district attorney perhaps was not entirely excusable, the natural assumption would be that, in view of the fact that the district attorney was not sworn as a witness, but was arguing the case to the jury, his remarks would be understood by the jury as argumentative rather than evidentiary in their nature. The evidence shows that the street used by the defendant at the time in question was the most direct route to the point of his destination, and that it was no "rougher than that other road"—which would seem to give color at least to the conclusion, as stated by the district attorney, that the street over which defendant traveled was somewhat rough. So considered, the damage, if any, to defendant's cause was very slight. Moreover, at the conclusion of the trial, the jury was instructed:

That it was "precluded from the consideration of any statements made by counsel, and you should disregard anything which has been said by them, except it may be conclusions which are legitimately deduced from the evidence. * * * The evidence which has been admitted should and must be your sole and only guide in the determination of this cause."

From the foregoing it would seem incontrovertible that the defendant suffered no injury by reason of the error (assuming it to be such) committed by the district attorney in making the statement to which reference has been had.

[7, 8] Appellant complains that the trial court erred in refusing to give to the jury certain instructions requested by defendant, being in substance that the prosecution was obliged to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the act of which defendant was charged was committed on the date specified in the information, and that at said time an actual sexual penetration was accomplished.

With reference to the first part of the requested instruction, in the case of People v. Wademan, 175 P. 791, 38 Cal. App. 116, it is held that the prosecution is not required to prove that the act was committed on a certain date, but only that it was committed on or about the date specified in the information. The latter part of the instruction, as well as each of the other of defendant's refused instructions, was fully covered by other instructions which the court gave to the jury.

While, as hereinbefore intimated, some errors were committed in the course of the trial, we are of the opinion that none of such errors, nor all of them combined, seriously or at all affected the verdict.

The judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WALLINGTON. (Cr. 1372.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 7, 1926.)

1. Criminal law — 1084.

Application under Pen. Code, § 1243, for stay of execution of judgment will be denied, where appeal from judgment was not taken in time under section 1239.

2. Indictment and information — 196(5).

Sufficiency of indictment cannot be questioned on motion made in lower court to set aside judgment after it has become final.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

F. Amy Wallington was convicted of an offense, and he appeals. On application for a stay of execution pending appeal. Application denied.

Max Schleimer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] It appears from the face of the application for a stay of execution of the judgment under section 1243 of the Penal Code that the appeal from the judgment is abortive and that the order made after judgment necessarily must be affirmed. The appeal from the judgment was not taken in time. Pen. Code, § 1239; Starr v. Superior Court, 139 P. 241, 23 Cal. App. 670. The sufficiency of the indictment could not be questioned on the motion made in the lower court to set aside the judgment after it had become final. People v. Mooney, 174 P. 325, 178 Cal. 525; People v. Reid (Cal. Sup.) 232 P. 457, 36 A. L. R. 1435.

The application for stay of execution is denied.

PEOPLE v. BRYANT. (Cr. 879.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 8, 1926.)

1. Assault and battery — 92—Evidence of severe cuts inflicted by defendant, and evidence supporting finding either way on issue of self-defense, held sufficient to support conviction for assault with deadly weapon.

Evidence that defendant severely cut prosecuting witness, and evidence sufficient to support finding either way on question whether defendant acted in necessary self-defense, held sufficient to support conviction for assault with deadly weapon.

2. Criminal law — 1120(3)—Whether exclusion of testimony of witness given at preliminary examination was prejudicial cannot be determined, where record does not set out proffered testimony (Pen. Code, § 686).

Where record does not set out testimony of absent witness given at preliminary examination sought to be introduced under Pen. Code, § 686, it cannot be determined whether exclusion of testimony prejudiced right of defendant.

3. Criminal law — 825(3)—Defendant believing that jury would misinterpret instruction on self-defense should request further instructions in accordance with statute (Pen. Code, § 197, subd. 3).

If defendant had reason to believe that jury would misinterpret instruction on self-defense by construing it as forfeiting right of party first in fault to thereafter defend himself, he should have proposed an instruction in accordance with Pen. Code, § 197, subd. 3, stating conditions under which defendant, though assailant, may resort to use of deadly weapon in self-defense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Lawrel Bryant was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Hale Day, of Los Angeles, and Donald McKisick, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was charged with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder. He was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

[1] There can be no possible doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and judgment. The defendant severely cut the prosecuting witness in several places, including "laceration of the face and left ear, * * * two large, long incisions on the abdomen, which took seventeen horsehair stitches, * * * many small lacerations on the left arm and the side, * * * some of them were very superficial and some of them deep enough to suture, * * * a laceration of the left hand, and it took six horsehair sutures to sew that up." The defendant claimed that he acted in necessary self-defense. There is sufficient evidence to support a finding either way upon that issue.

[2] Appellant contends that the court erred in excluding the testimony of a certain witness given at the preliminary examination. Evidence was introduced which tended in some degree to show that the witness could not "with due diligence be found within the state." Pen. Code, § 686. The trial court held that the evidence failed to show due diligence. While it appears that the court was justified in so holding, it is unnecessary to examine the evidence bearing upon that question, because the record does not show what the proffered testimony was, and, in the absence thereof, it is impossible to determine whether its exclusion prejudiced the rights of the defendant. People v. Brotherton, 47 Cal. 388, 404; People v. Bidleman, 38 P. 502, 104 Cal. 608, 615; People v. Singh, 188 P. 987, 182 Cal. 457, 482; People v. Balmain, 116 P. 303, 16 Cal. App. 28, 32; People v. Lowrie, 87 P. 253, 4 Cal. App. 137, 141.

[3] Complaint is made that the court erred in giving a certain instruction. The instruction is in the language of the third general rule of self-defense, stated by the Supreme Court in People v. Hecker, 42 P. 307, 109 Cal. 451, 462, 30 L. R. A. 403, and approved in People v. Glover, 74 P. 745, 141 Cal. 233, 241, and was followed by another instruction, setting forth that the defendant was entitled to act upon appearances and to defend himself against threatened danger, whether real or apparent only. Appellant says that, under this instruction, "the party first at fault forfeits any right to defend himself thereafter." The instruction cannot be so interpreted. If the defendant had any reason to believe that the jury would so understand it, he should have proposed an instruction in accordance with the provisions of section 197, subd. 3, of the Penal Code, which states the conditions upon which a defendant, even though the assailant, may resort to the use of a deadly weapon in self-defense. The defendant proposed no instructions whatever, and those given by the court contain a concise and fair statement of the law applicable to the case and are exceptionally free from error. If the defendant desired further instructions, he should have requested them.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

TODD v. PAYNE. (Civ. 5367.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 31, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 27, 1926.)

1. Corporations § 133—Transferee of corporate stock is "person aggrieved," entitled to recover penalty for refusal to issue certificate (Civ. Code, § 324).

Transferee of share of corporate stock is "person aggrieved," within Civ. Code, § 324, providing for recovery of penalty for refusal to issue certificate of stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Aggrieved.]

2. Corporations § 133—Transferee of corporate stock need not prove that he is bona fide stockholder, in action for statutory penalty for refusing to issue certificate, notwithstanding showing that inspection of books was one purpose of transfer (Civ. Code, §§ 324, 378).

In action under Civ. Code, § 324, to recover penalty for refusal to issue certificate of corporate stock, transferee held not required to prove that he was bona fide stockholder, notwithstanding it appeared that inspection of corporate books was one of purposes of transfer for which good faith is necessary under section 378.

3. Evidence § 70.

There is a presumption of good faith which attaches to written documents.

4. Evidence § 82.

There is a presumption in favor of judgment that findings of fact cover all issues presented at trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by James H. Todd against Howard M. Payne to recover penalty for refusal to issue certificate of stock. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Walter G. Bonta, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Lovett K. Fraser, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to recover the penalty provided by section 324 of the Civil Code for defendant's refusal to issue to him a certificate of stock in the Greater Berkeley Land Company, a corporation of which the defendant was secretary. The complaint was in the terms of the statute, and alleged that the original owner of the stock had indorsed, transferred, and delivered to the plaintiff; that he presented the indorsed certificate to defendant, and demanded the entry thereof on the corporation books in plaintiff's name and the issuance of a new certificate to him. The answer admitted the demand, and justified the refusal only on the ground that defendant was uncertain as to the validity of the indorsement. The trial court found all the facts true as alleged in the complaint, and also found that defendant had ample opportunity to satisfy himself as to the indorsement, but made no effort to do so. Judgment followed for plaintiff in the sum of $400, as provided in the Code section cited. Defendant has appealed on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The appeal is based upon the ground that the respondent failed to show that he was the "party aggrieved" to whom the Code gives the right of action, and that he failed to show that he was a "bona fide" owner of the stock.

[1] The first point is answered by the Code section cited, which provides that the shares of stock of a corporation of this nature are personal property which may be "transferred by indorsement by signature of the proprietor * * * and the delivery of the certificate." But such transfer is not valid, except for certain purposes, until entered upon the books of the corporation. By the same section a right of action for the stipulated penalty is given to the "person aggrieved" whenever a corporate officer shall refuse to make the entry, or to transfer the stock or to issue a certificate "to the transferee as provided by this and the next preceding section." The transferee mentioned in the same section is the one to whom a certificate of stock has been duly indorsed and delivered by the original owner. He is the "person aggrieved" to whom the right of action is given, and it is not necessary for him to show, in an action under the section that he has any other claim of right than that of such a transferee.

[2-4] The point that the respondent failed to show that he was a "bona fide" stockholder was not raised by the pleadings, and is wholly beyond the issues. The good faith of the stockholder is necessary in a demand for an inspection of the corporate books under section 378 of the Civil Code, and it appears from the evidence that this was one of the purposes for which the transfer to the respondent was made. This is not sufficient to overcome the presumption of good faith which attaches to the written document or the presumption in favor of the judgment that the findings of fact cover all the issues presented at the trial.

Judgment affirmed.

JENKINS et al. v. REARDON et al.
(Civ. 5345.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 5, 1926.)

1. Mandamus ☞3(4), 23(1) — Mandamus against board of public works held properly refused, in absence of proof that plaintiffs were parties beneficially interested in preventing violation of State Housing Act and had no other plain, speedy, or adequate remedy in ordinary course of law (St. 1923, p. 781; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1086, 1091).

Mandamus against board of public works held properly refused, in absence of proof that plaintiffs were parties beneficially interested in preventing violation of State Housing Act, denied in respondents' answer, and that plaintiffs had no other plain, speedy, or adequate remedy in ordinary course of law, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1086, 1091.

2. Mandamus ☞3(4)—Plaintiffs, seeking to mandamus board of public works to prevent erection of building claimed to violate State Housing Act, if parties with beneficial interest, had legal remedy by direct action (St. 1923, p. 781).

Plaintiffs, seeking to mandamus members of board of public works to take action to prevent completion of building claimed to violate State Housing Act, if parties beneficially interested, had legal remedy by direct action against those erecting building, and therefore mandamus was properly refused.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Mandamus by Harry G. Jenkins and another, individually and as executors of the will of Anna Jenkins, deceased, and Charles A. Rossier, as guardian ad litem of Bernice H. Jenkins, a minor, against Timothy A. Reardon and others, as members of the Board of Public Works of the City and County of San Francisco. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for appellants.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued the defendants as members of the board of public works of the city and county of San Francisco for a writ of mandate to compel them to take some action to prevent the completion of a building in process of construction by one Zimmerman. The basis of the action is that the building was being erected on a lot adjoining one owned by the ward of plaintiffs in accordance with plans and specifications approved by the defendants which called for less air space than that required by the State Housing Act (St. 1923, p. 781). The position of the defendants is that, inasmuch as the lot upon which the apartment house was being erected ran from a main street to a public alley, one-half of the width of the alley should be taken in the estimate of air space for the building, and that the plans accordingly met all the requirements of the statute.

On the hearing in the court below, the plaintiffs offered evidence showing that the plans had been approved by the defendants, and that the amount of air space provided (not including the public alley) was 366 square feet. Evidence was also offered by the plaintiffs to show that the members of the board of public works believed that the plans and specifications fully complied with the demand of the statute. No evidence was offered by the defendants, and the matter was submitted on the showing above noted. Judgment went for the defendants, from which the plaintiffs have appealed on type-written records.

[1, 2] The judgment must be sustained on the ground that the appellants failed to prove two of the essential elements in an application for the extraordinary relief of mandamus—that they were the parties beneficially interested, and that they had no other plain, speedy, or adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Code Civ. Proc. § 1086. The interest of the appellants was denied by the respondents in their answer, and this was not countervailed by proof, "either in direct denial or by way of avoidance." Code Civ. Proc. § 1091; 16 Cal. Jur. pp. 868, 869, § 66. If the appellants were parties beneficially interested, who claimed that the construction of the building involved some private right, it follows as of course that they had their legal remedy by direct action against those erecting the building.

Judgment affirmed.

That defendant, charged with driving while intoxicated, was a bootlegger did not tend to show that he drank concoctions which he vended.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 369(2)—Admission on cross-examination of evidence of illegal possession of liquor, and pleas of guilty, and remarks of district attorney that defendant was a bootlegger, held reversible error in prosecution for driving while intoxicated (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051).

In prosecution for driving while intoxicated, admission of evidence, on defendant's cross-examination, of illegal possession of liquor, and number of times he pleaded guilty, and remarks of district attorney in argument that defendant was a bootlegger, held reversible error, since illegal possession of liquor is only a misdemeanor, which cannot be shown for impeachment purposes under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051.

C. Alfonso was convicted of driving an automobile while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Reversed.

Frank C. Hale, of Merced, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The information charges that the defendant, on the 20th of July, 1925, "did willfully and unlawfully operate and drive an automobile along and upon the public highway of the state of California, while under the influence of intoxicating liquor." He was convicted, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

The defendant's automobile collided with, and seriously damaged, an automobile owned by one witness for the prosecution, and being driven, at the time of the collision, by another witness. Both of these witnesses testified that the defendant was drunk at the time. Several other witnesses, who were at the scene of the collision shortly after it occurred, testified that they saw no indication that the defendant was intoxicated. Two of these witnesses were in such immediate association with the defendant as to enable them to determine his condition as accurately as could the witnesses for the prosecution. The defendant testified that he was not under the influence of liquor; that he "did not have a drink that night at all"; and that he had not indulged in the use of intoxicating liquor for three years. Under the pretext of contradicting the defendant's statement that he had not used intoxicating liquor for three years, and over proper objections by his counsel, the defendant was cross-examined as follows:

"Q. On March 17, 1924, you were charged with possessing liquor in your place of business there. What was that for? * * * A. They never find nothing in the house; they find it in the yard. * * *

"Q. * * * Isn't it a fact that you were charged with the illegal possession of intoxicating liquor at the time and place referred to in the preceding question, before Judge J. T. Norman, * * * and pleaded guilty to that charge? * * * A. No. * * *

"Q. I will ask you if, on the 9th day of December, 1924, you did not have intoxicating liquor at your place of business? * * * A. Yes; I had a bottle then. * * *

"Q. On the 3d day of February, 1925, did you have it in your possession then? A. No.

"Q. I will ask you if on the 26th day of July, 1925, whether you had intoxicating liquor in your possession? A. No, sir.

"Q. I submit that comes as a surprise, and ask you if on the 28th day of July, 1925, you were not charged with having intoxicating liquor in your possession, before J. T. Norman, justice of the peace, * * * and pleaded guilty to that charge? * * * A. I pleaded guilty about the 22d or 23d.

"Q. Of what? A. July, I think so. * * *

"Q. I will ask you how many times since you have been living at Merced Falls have you pleaded guilty to the illegal possession of intoxicating liquor? * * * A. Four times."

During the closing argument of the district attorney, the following occurred:

"Mr. McCray (district attorney): * * * Are you going to believe the testimony of a bootlegger from Mariposa county—

"Mr. Hale (counsel for defendant): We object to that, if the court please. There is no evidence that this defendant was a bootlegger.

"Mr. McCray: No evidence! From his own lips he says he has been convicted four times. If that doesn't constitute bootlegging—

"Mr. Hale: We ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard the remarks of the district attorney and assign them as prejudicial error."

[1-3] The court did not instruct the jury as requested, or make any comment upon the remarks of the district attorney. It may be inferred from the argument of the district attorney that the real purpose of introducing proof of defendant's illegal possession of liquor was not to contradict his statement that he had not indulged in the use of liquor for three years, but to show that he was of such degraded character as to be unworthy of belief. The material issue in the case was whether the defendant was under the influence of liquor at the time of the collision. Whether he had or had not drunk liquor at other times during the preceding three years was immaterial to that issue, and a witness is not to be impeached upon an immaterial matter. Neither does proof that one is a bootlegger tend to show that he is foolish enough to drink the concoctions which he vends. Many errors in the trial of criminal cases would be avoided by observance of the plain provisions of section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure that a witness may not be impeached "by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown * * * that he had been convicted of a felony." Illegal possession of liquor is not a felony, but a misdemeanor only. The admission of the foregoing evidence and the comments of the district attorney thereon were clearly erroneous and highly prejudicial to the rights of the defendant. People v. Adams (Cal. App.) 244 P. 106, and cases there cited.

The judgment and the order are reversed.

PEOPLE, on Inf. of WEBB, Atty. Gen., v. HONEY LAKE VALLEY IRR. DIST. (AN-HEIM NAT. BANK et al., Interveners). (Civ. 3056.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 7, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 3, 1926.)

I. Limitation of actions § 48(2), 66(2).

Cause of action for money payable on demand accrues with inception of obligation and without necessity of demand.

2. Limitation of actions § 48(6)—Limitations held to run against warrants of irrigation district which recited that they were payable from specified funds from time they were due and payable and not from time fund was provided (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1; Irrigation Act, § 61 [as amended by St. 1915, p. 1369, § 6], section 39 [as amended by St. 1917, p. 765, § 27]).

Statute of limitations, Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, held to run against warrants of irrigation district reciting that they were payable from specified "funds" from time they were due and payable, and not from time fund was provided, since they were not payable out of special funds in view of Irrigation Act, § 61 (as amended by St. 1915, p. 1369, § 6), and holders of warrants could by mandamus compel levy of assessments to pay them after such date in view of section 39 (as amended by St. 1917, p. 765, § 27), or convert their claims to judgments.

3. Mandamus § 114—Holders of warrants of irrigation district having secured judgment in proceeding for dissolution of such district can enforce payment of their claims only by mandamus against board of supervisors to compel levy of assessments (St. 1919, p. 751).

Holders of warrants of irrigation district having secured judgment in proceeding under St. 1919, p. 751, for dissolution of such district, can enforce payment of their claims only by mandamus against board of supervisors to compel levy of assessments.

4. Limitation of actions § 118(1)—Presentation of petition to Attorney General by holders of irrigation district warrants, asking that proceedings for dissolution of district be commenced, held not to constitute commencement of action on warrants so as to stop running of statute of limitations (St. 1919, p. 751; Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, and sections 22, 350).

Presentation of petition to Attorney General by holders of irrigation district warrants, asking that proceeding under St. 1919, p. 751, for dissolution of district be commenced, held not to constitute commencement of action on such warrants so as to stop running of statute of limitations, Code of Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, in view of section 22, defining action, and section 350 stating when action is commenced.

5. Limitation of actions § 142—Resolution of directors of irrigation district ordering second assessment for payment of outstanding warrants held not acknowledgment or new promise that would stop running of statute of limitations against holders of warrants, no acknowledgment being made to them (Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, and section 360).

Resolution of board of directors of irrigation district ordering second assessment for payment of outstanding warrants held not to constitute such acknowledgment or new promise as to stop running of statute of limitations, Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, against claims of holders of warrants under section 360, since an acknowledgment must be made to creditor or some one duly authorized to act in his behalf.

6. Limitation of actions — 182(5)—Defendant held not to waive right to plead statute of limitations by failure to set it up as defense in answer or amended answer.

Defendant held not to waive right to plead statute of limitations by failure to set it up as defense in answer or amended answer to complaint, since such plea is to merits.

7. Appeal and error — 235.

Objection that attorneys who appeared for defendant irrigation district were not authorized by it to so appear should be urged in trial court by motion to strike answer from files.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; W. I. Redding, Judge.

Proceeding by the People, on the information of U. S. Webb, Attorney General, under St. 1919, p. 751, for the dissolution of the Honey Lake Valley Irrigation District, on the petition of the Anaheim National Bank and others, interveners. From a judgment denying the interveners any relief, they appeal. Affirmed.

Hoyt, Norcross, Thatcher, Woodburn & Henley and John D. Hoyt, all of Reno, Nev., Curler & Curler, of Susanville, and A. Moore, of Whittier, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for plaintiff.

J. A. Pardee and J. E. Pardee, both of Susanville, for defendant.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was organized under the Irrigation District Act of 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 254) and the amendments thereto. The organization was completed September 18, 1916. It embraced something over 30,000 acres of land and was governed by a board of three directors. The first assessment of the lands therein was levied September 10, 1917. Prior to that time, under the provisions of section 61 of the act, the board of directors had incurred indebtedness and had caused warrants therefor to be issued to the engineer of the district. These warrants recited that they were issued for "engineering" or "administration" expenses, in accordance with the provisions of section 61, and that they were "payable January 1, 1918, and bear interest from the date thereon." Some of them stated that they were payable "from the revolving fund"; others "from the warrant fund," and one "from the — fund." The Anaheim National Bank became the owner by assignment of fifteen of these warrants, of the face value of $7,425, and the City National Bank acquired six of them, of the face value of $2,600. September 10, 1917, the board of directors caused warrants to be issued to the engineer of the district in the total sum of $5,000, "for engineering expense, from the warrant fund." These warrants recited that they bore interest at 7 per cent. per annum, but did not specify any date of payment.

[1] As stated by counsel for appellant Plotts, they were payable on demand. "A cause of action for money payable on demand accrues with the inception of the obligation and without the necessity for any demand." Miguel v. Miguel, 193 P. 935, 936, 184 Cal. 311, 314. They were presented to the treasurer on the day of the issuance thereof and by him indorsed: "Funds not available for payment. This warrant bears 7% interest from date Sept. 10th, 1917." They were thereafter assigned to appellant Plotts. July 16, 1918, the board of directors adopted a resolution containing the following:

"It appearing to the board, and the board so finds, that it is necessary to raise the sum of $7,800, as follows, to wit: The sum of $6,300 to pay in full all unpaid warrants of the district issued in accordance with and which the board hereby finds to have been issued in accordance with the act of the Legislature of the State of California, under which the district is organized and existing: * * * It is ordered that for the purpose of raising said sums as aforesaid, an assessment be levied upon all the lands within the district and that the rate of assessment be and the same is hereby, fixed as follows, to wit: For the purpose of raising the amount sufficient to pay all unpaid warrants as aforesaid, the sum of 102.3 cents on each one hundred dollars of the valuation of the said real estate as it appears upon the assessment roll for the current year."

The sum of $2,037.04 only of this assessment was paid. The first assessment was levied at the rate of $2.80 on each $100 of assessed value and $7,684 was paid thereon.

The district never acquired any property and it constructed no irrigation works. In the latter part of the year 1920, the appellants separately petitioned the Attorney General to institute proceedings under the provisions of chapter 356 of the Statutes of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 751) for the dissolution of the district. February 23, 1922, the Attorney General commenced this action in accordance with the provisions of such statute, praying that the district be dissolved and the amount of its indebtedness determined. Section 3 of the statute provides:

"Upon final judgment of dissolution in such action, the district in question shall be deemed dissolved and annulled. The court shall determine the amount of indebtedness outstanding against said district, including the costs of the court action herein provided for, and thereafter the appropriate county officers shall act as ex officio officers of the district; the records and papers of every kind belonging to the district shall be turned over to the proper county officers. The county treasurer shall perform the duties of the district treasurer; the county tax collector shall perform the duties of the district tax collector; the county assessor shall perform the duties of the district assessor; the county clerk shall perform the duties of the secretary of the board of directors; the board of supervisors shall perform the duties of the board of directors; they shall proceed to levy and collect such additional taxes as may be necessary upon the lands embraced within such district in the same manner and with the same procedure for non-payment that county taxes are levied and collected for the purpose of paying such outstanding indebtedness not provided for by previous assessments."

May 17, 1922, pursuant to stipulation of all the parties, appellants filed, as their complaints in intervention, the aforesaid petitions which they had theretofore presented to the Attorney General. Thereafter the defendant answered such complaints in intervention, alleging, among other things, that the causes of action set up therein were barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court found in accordance with such plea of the statute of limitations and denied the interveners any relief. They have appealed from the judgment.

[2] All of the warrants were due and payable not later than January 1, 1918. If the statute of limitations commenced to run against them at that time, it is clear that any action thereon was barred at the time this suit was commenced. Appellants contend, however, that the warrants were made payable out of a special fund, and that in such a case the statute does not commence to run until such fund has been provided. The funds upon which the warrants were drawn were in no sense special funds, to be provided in a particular way, nor were they funds created by the statute under which the district was organized. In Carter v. Tilghman, 51 P. 34, 35, 119 Cal. 104, 106, in discussing a similar question relating to the funds of an irrigation district, it is said:

"As a matter of bookkeeping, the board may keep as many accounts or funds as deemed necessary or convenient, but such a system of bookkeeping in no way affects the rights of creditors."

Section 61 of the Irrigation Act, at the time the warrants in suit were issued, authorized the board of directors, "before the collection of the first assessment," to incur indebtedness in a sum not exceeding 50 cents an acre and to issue warrants therefor "payable not later than the first day of January after the first assessment shall be levied." Stats. 1915, p. 1369. The statute does not provide for a particular fund out of which to pay such warrants, but at all times since July 27, 1917, section 39 of the act has made it the duty of the board of directors, "within fifteen days after the close of its session as a board of equalization," to "levy an assessment upon the lands within the district in an amount * * * sufficient to pay in full the amount of all unpaid warrants of the district issued in accordance with this act." Stats. 1917, p. 765. At any time after January 1, 1918, appellants could have maintained actions to compel the board of directors to levy assessments sufficient in amounts to pay their warrants in full, and it must be held that the statute of limitations commenced to run against them on that day. S. F. Savings Union v. Reclamation Dist., 79 P. 374, 144 Cal. 639; Barnes v. Glide, 48 P. 804, 117 Cal. 1, 59 Am. St. Rep. 153.

[3] Had the appellants been given judgment in this action, such judgment could not be enforced by execution against the district, but only by a suit in mandamus against the board of supervisors to compel the levying of an assessment to raise money with which to pay their claims, a remedy which they had in the first instance against the directors of the district. S. F. Savings Union v. Reclamation Dist., supra. In addition to the remedy pointed out, the appellants could have avoided the bar of the statute by converting their claims into judgments. Farwell v. San Jacinto, etc., Irr. Dist., 192 P. 1034, 1036, 49 Cal. App. 167, 171, was a suit to recover the amount of certain bonds of the district owned by the plaintiff. The defendant alleged that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, and the trial court so held. The plaintiff contended on appeal that the statute of limitations was not available to the district for the reason that it had failed to provide a particular fund out of which the bonds could be paid. The appellate court said:

"Just because there was no fund in the treasury or because the directors of the district had failed to provide a fund out of which these general obligations could be paid, furnish no sufficient excuse to the holders of such bonds for not converting their claims into judgments against the corporation."

The question here presented is wholly unlike that considered in Sawyer v. Colgan, 36 P. 580, 834, 102 Cal. 283, relied on by appellants. The obligations there in question were payable out of a fund to be provided in a particular way, and the holder of the obligations could maintain no action of any character to compel the state or its officers to provide such fund. Neither could he convert the obligations into a judgment, because the state had not authorized a suit against itself. Under such circumstances, the plaintiff's cause of action did not accrue until a fund had been provided for the payment of the obligations.

[4] Appellants contend that they "moved with due diligence to cause the action to be instituted by the Attorney General," their petitions to that officer having been served upon defendant and presented to the Attorney General in the latter part of the year 1920. Presentation of such petitions to the Attorney General, however, did not constitute the commencement of an action on the warrants. "An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice." Code Civ. Proc. § 22. Section 350 of the Code of Civil Procedure, included in title 2 of part 2 thereof relating to the time within which civil actions must be commenced, provides: "An action is commenced, within the meaning of this title, when the complaint is filed."

[5] It is contended that the resolution adopted by the board of directors July 16, 1918, ordering the second assessment to raise funds for the payment of outstanding warrants, constituted such an acknowledgment or new promise as "to take the case out of the operation" of the statute under the provisions of section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The resolution was not an acknowledgment or promise made to the holders of the warrants.

"The rule in California, in accordance with the weight of authority, is that an acknowledgment must be made to the creditor, or some one duly authorized to act in his behalf." 16 Cal. Jur. 593; Searles v. Gonzalez, 216 P. 1003, 191 Cal. 426, 430, 28 A. L. R. 73; Clunin v. First Federal Trust Co., 207 P. 1009, 189 Cal. 248, 250.

[6] It is urged that the defendant waived the right to plead the statute by its failure to set it up as a defense, either in its answer or amended answer to the complaint filed by the Attorney General. The defendant subsequently pleaded the statute as a defense to the several causes of action alleged in the complaints in intervention. It did not waive such defense by its failure to plead the statute at the first opportunity, if it be conceded that there was an opportunity to plead the statute prior to the filing of the complaints in intervention. "A plea of the statute of limitations is to the merits, and a trial court has the same discretion to permit it to be pleaded by way of amendment as it has to allow the pleading of any other meritorious defense." 16 Cal. Jur. 619.

[7] It is contended that the attorneys who appeared for defendant were not authorized by defendant to so appear or to plead the statute of limitations. A deputy secretary of the district testified as follows:

"Q. You hired Mr. Pardee to defend these suits? A. I made arrangements with Mr. Pardee to represent the district. * * *

"Q. How long since the board have met in the district? A. June 9, 1919.

"Q. And there has been no action by the board calling for the defense of these claims? * * * A. Only in this way. Two members of the board signed an approval of the employment."

No motion was made in the trial court to strike out defendant's answer on the ground that it was unauthorized, and the record does not disclose that the objection here urged was made in the trial court.

"The proper mode of procedure, if the suit were not authorized, was for the defendant to move the court upon proper affidavits to dismiss the suit, upon the ground that it was not authorized by those in whose names it was brought. * * * But it is not admissible, upon a mere suggestion at the bar by the adverse party or his attorney, to deny the right of a party to appear by the attorney of record, or to deny that the attorney so appearing has full authority to prosecute the suit." Turner v. Caruthers, 17 Cal. 432, 433.

"That a motion to dismiss was the proper procedure to take when the authority of the attorney is challenged, there can be no doubt." Ventura County v. Clay, 51 P. 189, 190, 119 Cal. 213, 215.

For like reasons, appellants should have raised the objection here urged by motion in the trial court to strike defendant's answer from the files. Sullivan v. Dunne (Cal. Sup.) 244 P. 343.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KING. (Cr. 1293.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 14, 1926. Rehearing Denied May 11, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 9, 1926.)

1. Criminal law §1169(5)—Error, in introducing evidence of prior offense by defendant held cured, where court struck all such evidence from record and instructed jury to disregard it.

In prosecution for grand larceny from complaining witness whom defendant had married, error, if any, in the introduction of evidence that defendant had married another woman under similar circumstances and had absconded with money she had intrusted to his keeping was cured, where court, on ascertaining that prior offense was one of embezzlement, struck all evidence from record and instructed jury to disregard it.

2. Criminal law §1169(3)—Evidence of marriage relation between accused and complaining witness held not prejudicial, where admitted by accused while testifying.

In prosecution for grand larceny from complaining witness whom defendant had married, evidence of marriage relation of defendant and complaining witness was not prejudicial, where it was freely admitted by defendant while testifying.

3. Witnesses §270(1)—Court held to have properly exercised discretion in refusing to let lengthy cross-examination of complaining witness, who was defendant's wife, on irrelevant and trivial matters, to continue (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

In prosecution for grand larceny from complaining witness whom defendant had married, held that, irrespective of application of Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, where defendant subjected complaining witness to lengthy cross-examination on irrelevant and trivial matters, court properly exercised his discretion in refusing to let such method of examination continue.

4. Witnesses $\Rightarrow$ 337(5)—Compelling answer on cross-examination of accused that he had been convicted of felonies, elicited for purpose of impeachment, held within bounds of cross-examination.

Where accused took stand in his own behalf, compelling him to answer on cross-examination that he had been previously convicted of two separate felonies in another state, elicited for purpose of impeachment, held within bounds of cross-examination.

5. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 804(2)—Where accused requested certain instructions to be given in writing and waived all other written instructions, giving in writing such requested instructions as court deemed proper, held not ground for complaint (Pen. Code, § 1127).

Where accused requested certain instructions to be given in writing and waived written instructions as to all other matters, and trial judge gave such requested written instructions as he deemed proper, there was no violation of Pen. Code, § 1127.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Charles F. King was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Chas. A. Wetmore, Jr., Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was tried on an indictment charging him with the larceny of $700 from one Martha J. King. From the judgment which followed his conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, he has appealed upon a typewritten record.

The facts of the case are that the defendant married the complaining witness on March 28, 1925, having met her through a correspondence club of which he was a member, and that on the 2d day of April following he left the rooms which they were occupying in the city and county of San Francisco, taking with him the sum of $700 in currency which he had persuaded his wife to draw from her bank on that day upon the representation that he would invest the money in a grocery business which he proposed to conduct for their benefit. The defendant was found some time later in the city of San Diego, where his arrest was made.

[1] On this appeal he complains that he was prejudiced by the introduction of evidence showing that a few years before he had married a Mrs. McDonald under similar circumstances, and that a short time after his marriage he had separated from her and taken with him the sum of $1,750 of her funds which he had persuaded her to intrust to his keeping. This evidence was offered over the objection of appellant, but when it developed that the offense which was then committed was one of embezzlement rather than grand larceny, the trial judge struck all the evidence from the record and fully instructed the jury to disregard it. Though we do not pass on the question that the two offenses were so dissimilar as to require the elimination of this evidence, it is plain that if any error occurred it was cured by the rulings of the trial court.

[2] Appellant claims that the court erred in admitting evidence of the marriage relation of appellant and the complaining witness. This evidence was merely a part of the story of the case as presented by the prosecution. Furthermore, the marriage relation was freely admitted by the appellant when he took the stand in his own behalf, and no possible prejudice arose from the admission of the evidence in the prosecution's case.

[3] It is argued that the court erred in refusing to allow the appellant to call the complaining witness for cross-examination under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure. Without passing on the question of the applicability of this section to a situation of this kind, it is sufficient to say that the appellant subjected the complaining witness to a lengthy cross-examination on matters which were irrelevant and trivial, and that the trial judge properly exercised the discretion vested in him when he refused to let this method of examination continue.

[4] The next point is that the constitutional rights of the appellant were violated when he was compelled to answer on cross-examination that he had been previously convicted of two separate felonies in another state. The appellant had voluntarily offered himself as a witness in his own behalf, and these questions, which were for the purpose of impeachment, were plainly within the bounds of cross-examination on the part of the state.

[5] Complaint is made that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury by written instructions, as required by section 1127, Penal Code. The facts are that the appellant requested certain instructions to be given in writing, and expressly waived written instructions as to all other matters. Such of the instructions as the appellant requested in writing and which the trial judge deemed proper to give were given to the jury in writing as requested, and were filed in open court in full compliance with the Code section cited. Other points do not require consideration.

Judgment and order affirmed.

CALIFORNIA CREDIT & COLLECTION CORPORATION v. BERNARDINI.
(Civ. 5023.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 9, 1926.)

Corporations — 80(11)—Finding of failure to establish falsity of representations concerning value of corporate stock sustained.

In action on note given in payment for corporate stock, evidence held insufficient to establish falsity of representations made concerning value of such stock to an extent warranting appellate court in reversing a contrary finding of trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action by the California Credit & Collection Corporation against Gomes Bernardini. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for appellant.

J. R. Cunningham, of San Francisco, C. C. Baker, of Salinas, and Daly B. Robnett, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. The defendant, Gomes Bernardini, has taken this appeal from an adverse judgment in an action brought against him by the plaintiff California Credit & Collection Corporation upon an assigned promissory note dated May 4, 1920, for the principal sum of $750 given by him to plaintiff's assignor, Viriden Packing Company, as payment for the balance of the purchase price of corporate stock issued and sold to him by said Viriden Packing Company.

Appellant resisted payment of the note upon the ground that its execution had been obtained through fraudulent representations made to him by the representative of said packing company at the time the stock was purchased. Those representations, as they are set forth in the answer, were as follows: That "said Viriden Packing Company was doing a large and profitable business, and that the actual value and the market value of its capital stock was $100 per share, and it would soon thereafter be worth $125 per share and was paying big dividends." It was further alleged that said representations were false; that at the time the same were made neither the actual nor the market value of the capital stock of said packing company exceeded $65 a share; and that the prospective value did not exceed $40 a share. The trial court found that said representations were made to appellant, as claimed, but further found that the same were not made with the intent to cheat and defraud, and that the same were not false.

Much of the argument presented on the appeal has been devoted to the question of whether or not the representations, if false, are sufficient in law to relieve appellant from the payment of said note. Assuming appellant's contention with respect to that question to be supported by the authorities cited by him, he is still confronted with the finding of the trial court that said representations were not proved to be false.

In order that representations may warrant relief in any case they must, of course, be false. 12 Cal. Jur. 743, citing cases. The entire proof pertaining to this issue, as it is set forth in the bill of exceptions upon which the appeal has been taken, consists, first, of a stipulation reading as follows: "It was here stipulated by the parties that the only dividends declared upon the capital stock of the Viriden Packing Company from May 4, 1920, to the time of the trial, was a dividend of $2 per share declared on this stock in March, 1922, and a like dividend of $2 per share declared on January 25, 1923, and each credited on the defendant's note" (italics ours); secondly, the introduction in evidence by appellant over respondent's objections of three newspapers containing the San Francisco stock market reports. One of the newspapers introduced was of an issue of October 15, 1921, more than a year and a half subsequent to the sale of the stock; the other two were of later issues, dated, respectively, December 15 and December 17, 1923. It appeared therefrom that on the dates mentioned Viriden Packing Company stock was classed among the "unlisted securities" at buying and selling prices of $25 and $29 a share.

It will be observed that, while the representations regarding the financial condition of said company, namely, that said packing company was doing a large and profitable business, and that its stock was paying big dividends, obviously related to the company's affairs as they existed prior to and at the time said representations were made, the period of time covered by the proof adduced by appellant to prove their falseness was limited to the three years following the making of said representations. The evidence offered was, therefore, too remote in point of time to be effective for the purpose for which it was intended. In this connection it may be stated that appellant testified that the company's salesman promised "to give a big dividend in a short time"; but such representation, if not amounting to a matter of mere opinion, related to a dividend to be declared in the future, and was not one of those pleaded by him or upon which he claims to have relied in entering into the transaction for the purchase of the stock. In reference to the question of the falseness of the representations as to the value of the stock, appellant claims that the record shows that the stock was not being bought or sold or even quoted in the market at the time this transaction took place. We have been unable to find the evidence referred to, but, assuming that there was evidence introduced from which that fact was fairly deducible, it cannot be said that the terms "actual value" and "market value," as employed in said representations, meant necessarily that the stock was listed for sale at the prices mentioned or at all in the stock exchange. There was no evidence offered whatever to show the condition of the company's affairs or the value of said stock in the open market prior to or at the time of the making of such representations, or the actual value of said stock at any time. We are not prepared to say, therefore, that the evidence is legally sufficient to warrant this court in nullifying the finding of the trial court to the effect that appellant failed to prove the falseness of said representations. The recent case of California Credit & Collection Corporation v. Randall (Cal App.) 244 P. 958, to which appellant calls attention, is clearly distinguishable from the instant one. There the representation alleged and proved was "that said stock * * * was then paying twelve per cent. dividends" (italics ours), and the evidence offered by the defendant established the falsity of that representation. In the case before us there was no such representation alleged or proved.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

PACIFIC EMPLOYERS' INS. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5445.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. April 13, 1926.)

1. Master and servant — 404 — Testimony of compensation claimant as to condition of employment held admissible, though hearsay.

Testimony by employee that he had heard parties say that employees were required to take meals at cookhouse maintained by employer as condition of employment, though hearsay, was admissible in compensation case, and, where uncontradicted, supported conclusion that employees were required to obtain meals there.

2. Master and servant — 375(1) — Injury to employee before working hours on premises of employer while on way to cookhouse for meal held sustained in "course of employment."

Injury to employee, sustained a few minutes before working hours, while passing over working premises of employer to obtain breakfast at employer's cookhouse, where employees were required to take their meals, is sustained in course of and grows out of employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Ed. Terrell, employé, opposed by the Pacific Employers' Insurance Company, insurer, and Papageorge & Smario, employers. An order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the insurer brings certiorari. Affirmed.

H. C. Kelsey, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. Certiorari to review an award of compensation made by the Industrial Accident Commission of the state of California to Ed. Terrell.

It is contended by petitioner—which was the compensation insurance carrier for Papageorge & Smario, the employers of Terrell—that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, and that the commission in making the award exceeded its jurisdiction.

It was found by the commission—Terrell being the only witness examined so far as shown by the record—that the latter was employed by the insured as a truck driver in railroad construction work at a point about two miles from Valley Springs, Cal.; that a few minutes before his working hours commenced on the date of the accident, while passing over the working premises of the employers for the purpose of obtaining breakfast at the latter's cookhouse situated thereon, he fell suffering a fracture of the kneecap, and that the injury was sustained in the course of and grew out of the employment.

[1, 2] It appears from the testimony that Terrell lodged at a hotel situated a short distance from the working premises of the insured; that the latter provided meals for their employees at a cookhouse upon the premises mentioned for which the employees paid from their wages; that, while meals were at times served at the hotel and it was possible for the employee to have obtained them there, according to his testimony such meals were usually served "only if transient people went through"; and that the nearest place other than the hotel and cookhouse where meals could be procured was at Valley Springs. The witness further testified, in substance, in response to a question as to whether employees were required by the insured to take their meals at the cookhouse, that "he had heard parties say" that the employees were required to do so as a condition to employment, relating a specific instance in which an employee was so required. While the evidence on this point was hearsay in character, such evidence in this class of cases is admissible, and, if probatively sufficient in the judgment of the Commission, will sustain an award. Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 182 P. 35, 180 Cal. 389; Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 181 P. 788, 180 Cal. 497; State Compensation Insurance Fund v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (Cal. Sup.) 231 P. 996; Stats. 1917, p. 831. There being no evidence to the contrary, the testimony mentioned had probative weight sufficient to support the conclusion that the employees were expected and in effect required to procure their meals at the cookhouse. As said in Judson Mfg. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 184 P. 1, 181 Cal. 300, 302, "the right to compensation is by no means restricted to those cases where the injury occurs while the employee is actually * * * manipulating the tools of his calling"; and, where it appears, as here, that the injury occurred on the working premises of the employers, that the employee, while not actually performing the work for which he was employed, was thereon for a purpose contemplated, and, by fair inference from the testimony, required by them at a time, which, though not within his specified working hours, closely preceded their commencement, the situation is one in principle within the decision in State Compensation Insurance Fund v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 227 P. 168, 194 Cal. 28, and the injury was reasonably held to have been sustained in the course of and to have grown out of the employment.

The award is affirmed.

SWAN & CO. (S. F. 11966.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 28, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error ⚡798—Motion to dismiss appeal noticed to be made on certain day, "or as soon thereafter as counsel may be heard," will not be stricken because court was not in session, or scheduled to be, on designated day.

It is not ground for striking motion to dismiss appeal, where notice was that it would be made on a certain day, "or as soon thereafter as counsel may be heard," that the court was not in session, or scheduled to be in session on that day.

2. Appeal and error ⚡794.

Merits of motion to dismiss appeal will not be considered on motion to strike the motion.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by Aspegren & Co., Inc., against Sherwood Swan & Co. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appealed. Heard on motion to strike from files respondent's motion to dismiss appeal. Motion to strike denied.

Daniel N. Dougherty, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harrison S. Robinson and Harry L. Price, both of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On April 12, 1926, the respondent filed with the clerk of this court a notice that it would, on the 3d day of May, 1926, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m., "or as soon thereafter as counsel may be heard," at the courtroom of this court in the city and county of San Francisco, move to dismiss the appeal herein on the ground set forth in said notice. Thereafter, on April 20, 1926, the appellant filed a notice that it would, on the 4th day of May, 1926, at the courtroom of this court, in the city of Sacramento, move to strike from the files the respondent's motion to dismiss the said appeal on the grounds: (1) That "there will be no session of this court at the time and place specified in respondent's notice of motion to dismiss the appeal herein"; and (2) that there is no merit in the respondent's motion to dismiss the said appeal. The appellant's motion was presented on the call of the regular calendar at Sacramento on May 4th, and was submitted on the files of this court, and an additional certificate of the clerk of the trial court attached to the notice of motion setting forth certain proceedings taken in the trial court during the course of the litigation and pertaining to the merits of the respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal.

[1] As to the first ground of appellant's motion, it appears that this court was not in session, nor was it scheduled to be in session, on the 3d day of May, 1926, for the purpose of hearing motions made on notice. Since the plan of calling the regular San Francisco calendar at more frequent intervals was inaugurated some years since, it has been the practice to entertain motions made on notice on the first day of said calendar, notwithstanding subdivision 1 of rule XX of this court had not been amended to conform to the new plan. That rule has recently been amended so as to so conform, but the fact that it had not been so amended prior to the date for which respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal had been noticed undoubtedly accounts for the action of the respondent in noticing said motion for the first Monday in May in San Francisco. But the fact that the court was not in session at San Francisco on that date should not of itself defeat said motion nor deprive the respondent of the right to have it heard and determined. The form of the notice specifying the time when the motion would be made, "or as soon thereafter as counsel may be heard," would entitle the respondent to the right to present its motion on the first day of the next regular session of the court in San Francisco, especially in view of the fact that respondent's action was taken in reliance upon the rule of court in effect at the time the notice was served and filed.

[2] As to the second ground of appellant's motion, we deem it the better practice, and more conducive to orderly proceeding, not to entertain and pass upon the merits of a motion to dismiss an appeal on a motion to strike the motion to dismiss from the files. The appellant's motion to strike is therefore denied.

WIXOM v. DAVIS. (L. A. 8093.)

1. Chattel mortgages $\S$ 138(3)—Cotton raised pursuant to terms of lease held subject to chattel mortgage of lessee on future crop, notwithstanding agreement, after recording of mortgage, between lessee and lessor only, for title of cotton to be in lessor.

Cotton raised pursuant to terms of lease is subject to lien of chattel mortgage given by lessee, on cotton to be raised on leased premises, whether or not it was planted after agreement between lessor and lessee, made after recording of mortgage, and to which mortgagee was not party, that title to cotton should be in lessor.

2. Trial $\S$ 388(4)—Findings of fact are unnecessary, where agreed statement, with facts admitted in pleadings, contains all facts essential to support judgment.

Findings of fact are unnecessary, where agreed statement on which case was submitted, in connection with facts admitted in pleadings, contains all the facts essential to support judgment for plaintiff, which necessarily follows from them and the laws of the case as established on former appeal.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1071(5)—Making findings of facts where unnecessary in view of agreed statement held not prejudicial since they may be disregarded.

That findings of fact were made when unnecessary, in view of agreed statement, on which case was submitted, held not prejudicial, since they may be disregarded where unsupported by stipulated facts.

4. Judgment $\S$ 272—Entry in December of judgment then filed may be deemed entry of the judgment ordered in preceding January to be entered, and so not beyond jurisdiction of court.

Where, in January, there was minute order that judgment be entered for defendant, entry the following December of judgment for defendant then filed cannot be said to be beyond the court's jurisdiction, as it may be deemed entry of the judgment previously ordered.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 1176(3)—On reversal, cause will be remanded, with directions to enter judgment which conclusions to be drawn from undisputed facts require.

The conclusions to be drawn from the undisputed facts requiring judgment for plaintiff, cause will, on reversal of judgment for defendant, be remanded, with directions to enter required judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by Bertha E. Wixom against George Herrick Davis. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

H. E. Gleason, of Madera, for appellant.

Jas. F. Seymour, of El Centro, and Clarence B. Conlin and E. R. Simon, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. Conversion. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of the defendant. On a former trial of this action judgment also in favor of the defendant was reversed on the ground that, from the facts found, the conclusions of law and the judgment were unsupported. Wixom v. Davis, 57 Cal. App. 620, 207 P. 694. On the second trial the cause was determined on an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that the plaintiff is the owner and holder of a chattel mortgage which covered a one-third interest in 16 bales of cotton of the value of $1,442. In October and November, 1920, the defendant took possession of and sold said cotton to and for his own use, and refused to account to the plaintiff for her one-third interest therein. The chattel mortgage was recorded February 13, 1920. It was decided on the former appeal that, upon the maturity of the notes secured thereby, on May 1, 1920, the plaintiff became immediately entitled to the possession of the cotton for the purpose of the sale of her interest therein. The defendant is the owner of a tract of land in Imperial county suitable for the raising of cotton. December 16, 1919, he leased said land on shares for a period of one year to V. E., S. H., and A. L. Edge. In March, 1920, the lessees notified the defendant that they would be unable to finance themselves in the production of a cotton crop on said land and solicited the aid of the defendant in that behalf; whereupon the defendant orally agreed to advance money and finance his lessees, provided the title to the crop should be in him and he receive one-fourth the net profits. There were no profits; in fact the value of the crop was less than the amount of the defendant's advances. The oral agreement was reduced to writing on October 25, 1920.

[1] The defendant assumes to justify his right to retain the proceeds of the sale of said cotton on the theory that the plaintiff's chattel mortgage covered only such cotton as might thereafter be grown on the premises, that the cotton could not have been planted before the execution of said oral agreement, and that said oral agreement superseded the lease, and the plaintiff was thereby cut off. The plaintiff was not a party to the agreement between the defendant and his lessees, and it was immaterial whether the cotton was planted before or after the said oral agreement, for the reason that it was stipulated in the agreed statement "that all the cotton in question in the case at bar was that cotton raised under and pursuant to the terms of the lease dated December 16, 1919." Such being the fact, it is clear that the plaintiff's mortgage lien attached to the harvested crop sold by the defendant, and that her interest in the same, under the circumstances here shown, could not be set at naught by any agreement between the defendant and his lessees to which she was not a party.

After the submission of the cause on the agreed statement of facts, the court, on January 3, 1923, entered a minute order that judgment "be ordered for the defendant." Before the entry of the judgment so ordered, the plaintiff, on September 24, 1923, filed her notice of appeal. On December 17, 1923, the court settled a bill of exceptions to be used on said appeal. Three days thereafter the court signed and filed findings of fact and conclusions of law and a judgment in favor of the defendant. The court found, in addition to facts found in accordance with the agreed statement, that it was agreed between the defendant and his lessees that the oral agreement of March, 1920, subsequently reduced to writing, should supersede the said lease; that by said agreement title to the cotton crop had passed to the defendant; that no cotton had been planted prior to the oral agreement; that no interest in said cotton had become vested in the plaintiff by reason of her chattel mortgage; and that she was not entitled to the possession of the same or any part thereof. These findings are not supported by the stipulated and undisputed evidence, and no reasonable inferences may be drawn from that evidence which will support said findings.

[2-4] The plaintiff insists that the court had no authority to make findings when the case was submitted on an agreed statement of facts, citing Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 50, 36 P. 364, and Bailey v. Market St. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 320, 42 P. 914. The defendant does not question the rule laid down in those cases, but contends that, to render findings unnecessary, the agreed statement must contain the ultimate facts and not evidentiary facts, and it is urged that the facts contained in the agreed statement herein are evidentiary and not ultimate. To this we cannot accede. The agreed statement herein considered in connection with facts admitted in the pleadings contains all the facts essential to support a judgment for the plaintiff. From those facts and the law of the case as established on the former appeal, to the effect that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the cotton for the purpose of the satisfaction of her lien, it necessarily follows that the judgment should be so entered. Findings of fact were unnecessary, but the fact that they were made did not prejudice the plaintiff on this appeal for the reason that, wherein the same are in harmony with the stipulated facts, they are harmless, and, wherein they are unsupported by those facts as above noted, they may now be disregarded. The entry on December 24, 1923, of the judgment filed on December 20, cannot be said to have been beyond the jurisdiction of the court, for the reason that such entry may be deemed the entry of the judgment ordered to be entered on January 3, 1923.

[5] The judgment is therefore reversed. As the conclusions to be drawn from the undisputed facts require judgment to be entered for the plaintiff, the cause is remanded to the trial court, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the amount prayed for in the complaint. See Perkins v. Cowles, 157 Cal. 625, 108 P. 711, 137 Am. St. Rep. 158, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 283; 2 Cal. Jur. 991.

HENNESSEY et al. v. ROBINETT et al.

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1926.)

1. Trial $\S$ 396(3)—Finding that defendants maintained fence between their lot and plaintiffs' for over 20 years; that plaintiffs and their predecessors acquiesced in boundary line marked thereby and consented to erection of dwelling house by defendants on their land; and that such house was on land marked by fence, held not responsive to issues raised by complaint alleging, and answer denying, encroachment on plaintiffs' lot by addition to house flush with new fence erected thereon by plaintiffs.

Court's finding in ejectment that defendants maintained a fence between their lot and plaintiffs' for over 20 years last past; that plaintiffs and their predecessors acquiesced in boundary line marked by such fence for such time and made no objection to, but consented to defendants' erection of dwelling house on their land, and that such house was on land marked by such fence, held not responsive to issues raised by complaint alleging, and answer denying, encroachment on plaintiffs' lot by erecting addition to dwelling house flush with new fence erected by plaintiffs on their lot.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by Ellen Hennessey and another against Thomas Robinett and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Paul F. Fratessa and Fabius T. Finch, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

R. M. F. Soto and John R. Jones, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHENK, J. Ejectment. The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs are the owners of a parcel of land on the westerly side of Eighth avenue between Moraga and Noriega streets in San Francisco, having a frontage of 25 feet by a uniform depth of 120 feet, and that the defendants, who are the owners of the lot immediately to the south, encroach upon the southerly 2 inches of the plaintiffs' lot. The answer denies the encroachment. The court found that the plaintiffs are the owners and entitled to the immediate possession of the land described in the complaint, but found that it is not true that the defendants are encroaching upon the plaintiffs' land. The court further found:

"That the defendants own a certain lot of land 50x120 feet on the southerly boundary of the land owned by plaintiffs; that defendants have maintained a fence between the northerly boundary of defendants' land and the southerly boundary of plaintiffs' land for more than 20 years last past; and that, at all times in the complaint mentioned, plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest acquiesced in the boundary line marked by said fence, as said boundary line had been established for more than 20 years last past; that during the month of September, 1921, defendants erected a dwelling house upon the parcel of land so owned by them; that at all times during the construction of said dwelling house plaintiffs saw said dwelling house being constructed, made no objection thereto, but, on the contrary consented to the erection of said dwelling house, and had a complete knowledge thereof; that said dwelling house is upon the land marked by said fence as hereinbefore set forth for a period of more than 20 years last past and is upon the land owned and occupied by the defendants."

From a judgment in favor of the defendants, the plaintiffs appeal. The plaintiffs contend: (1) That the finding above quoted is not in accordance with any issue raised by the pleadings; (2) that the finding that defendants' house is built on the line of the old fence is contrary to the evidence; and (3) that the finding that the plaintiffs knew that the defendants' house was being built upon their lot and consented thereto is contrary to the evidence.

[1] Twenty years or more before this controversy arose, a fence was erected along what was then deemed to be the division line between said properties. The fence encroached upon the defendants' property from 6 to 8 inches at the front and upon the plaintiffs' property about 1¼ inches at the rear. The old fence became dilapidated, and the plaintiffs, in 1921, suggested that the same be removed and a new fence constructed at the joint expense of the parties. To this defendants refused to agree. Thereupon the plaintiffs, with the consent of the defendants, removed the old fence and erected a new one at their own expense, extending about 60 feet from the front property line. The true dividing line between the lots was located and the new fence was placed about 2 inches northerly of the plaintiffs' southerly line. The defendants, evidently believing that the new fence was on the true dividing line, erected an addition to their dwelling house flush with the fence and overlapping the plaintiffs' property by from 1½ to 1¾ inches. It appears, from the evidence, beyond question that the defendants are encroaching upon the plaintiffs' land to the extent of said overlap. The finding above quoted is not responsive to any issue raised by the pleadings. All question as to the location of the old fence on an agreed boundary line was eliminated, at least so far as the front 60 feet of said fence was concerned, by the construction of the new fence. The fact that the old fence encroached on the defendants' property and established an agreed boundary line by long acquiescence might have been available to the plaintiffs as a basis for the contention that the old fence line was the division line, but they are not so contending. The removal of the old fence and the construction of the new fence entirely on the plaintiffs' land removed all controversy as to the old fence line. No issue as to the estoppel of the plaintiffs by reason of consent to the construction of the defendants' building at its present location or by failure to object thereto was raised by the pleadings, nor does it appear that such an issue was raised by the evidence. There was also no evidence that the defendants' building conforms to the line marked by the old fence.

[2] The only point made by the defendants is that the appeal herein should be dismissed because there was not printed in the appellants' opening brief, nor in a supplement thereto, the portion of the record on which the appellants rely. The opening brief of the appellants contains the evidence upon which they rely and by leave of court they filed a supplement to said brief, incorporating therein the pleadings in the action upon which they also rely. Any defect in the record which theretofore existed was cured by the filing of the supplement.

The judgment is reversed.

BARBER v. PALO VERDE MUT. WATER CO. et al. (L. A. 9051.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 106, 870(2)—Statute authorizes appeals only from orders changing place of trial from one county to another, not from order changing place to another place in same county; but such order is reviewable on appeal from final judgment (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 142, 397, 963, subd. 2).

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 963, subd. 2, authorizes appeals only from orders changing place of trial from one county to another, under section 397, enacted at same time, not from order changing place to another place in same county, under section 142, as amended in 1919, though section 963 was re-enacted in 1923 by statute amending it in another particular; but such order may be reviewed on appeal from final judgment.

2. Statutes $\S$ 230.

Clause in statute will be given no different meaning after amendment than before, if amendment relates to other matters, and was obviously designed not to affect meaning.

3. Courts $\S$ 74—Judges of superior court may revoke order to hold court elsewhere than at county seat, and order change of place of trial to county seat, subject to review on appeal from final judgment (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 142, as amended in 1919).

Judges of superior court, being authorized by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 142, as amended in 1919, to direct that court be held or continued anywhere in county at least 120 miles from county seat, may revoke such order, and order change of place to county seat, court retaining jurisdiction of parties and subject-matter at all times, and parties not being entitled to demand that place of trial be changed from appointed place; but order changing place to county seat may be reviewed on appeal from final judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Allyn H. Barber against the Palo Verde Mutual Water Company and another. From an order changing the date and place of trial, the named defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

I. W. Stewart, Ward Chapman and Arvin B. Shaw, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Culver & Nourse, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

A. T. Stadler, pro se.

WASTE, C. J. Motion to dismiss an appeal from an order of the superior court of Riverside county purporting to change the place of trial of the action from the city of Blythe, in said county, to Riverside, the county seat. The action was brought for conversion of shares of stock of the defendant company. The answer denied conversion and set up specifically that plaintiff was not the real party in interest. When the cause was at issue it was stipulated between the parties that it might be set down for trial. It is the custom in Riverside county for the superior court, acting under the permission granted by section 142 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to hold a regular semiannual term of the court at Blythe, which is situated more than 200 miles from the county seat. This section, as amended in 1919, provides that, whenever the judge or judges of the superior court, authorized to hold or preside at a court appointed to be held in a particular place in a county, "deem it necessary or advisable," they may "direct that the court be held or continued at any other place in the city and county, county, city or town not less than one hundred twenty miles distant from the county seat." The court set the present action for trial during the term to be held in Blythe, beginning October 26, 1925. Subsequently the plaintiff moved for an order changing the date and place from the October term at Blythe to a date convenient to the calendar of the court at Riverside. The motion was supported by affidavits, and was made upon the ground that a fair and impartial trial could not be had at Blythe. The court granted the motion, and the defendant Palo Verde Mutual Water Company has appealed. The plaintiff and respondent now moves to dismiss on the ground that the order granting the motion is not appealable.

[1, 2] Appellant's contention in support of its appeal is that the order of the lower court directing that the cause be heard at Riverside instead of Blythe was, in effect, an order changing the place of trial, within the contemplation of section 963, subd. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, granting an appeal from such orders. We are not persuaded that that is so. The authority given the superior court to change the place of trial of actions is found in section 397 et seq. of the Code, which clearly, by language and intent, relate to changing the place of trial from one county to another. We are of the view that the language in section 963 of the Code, providing that an appeal may be taken from an order of the superior court "changing or refusing to change the place of trial," should not be construed to include an order changing or refusing to change the place of trial from one place in the county to another place in the same county. Section 397, providing in what cases the place of trial may be changed from county to county on motion, and the provision of section 963, permitting an appeal from an order changing or refusing to change the place of trial, were enacted at the same time (1872) as part of the Code of Civil Procedure. Until section 142 of the Code was amended, in 1919, to permit the holding or continuance of court at some place in the county not less than 120 miles distant from the county seat, there was no opportunity for the contention now advanced by appellant to be made. In 1923, section 963, relating to appeals, was amended in one particular not here pertinent. Appellant argues that, by the re-enactment of the section, including the provision giving the right of appeal from an order changing or refusing to change the place of trial, it must follow that the Legislature not only had in mind the provisions of section 397, but intended to allow an appeal from an order changing or refusing to change the place of trial in the same county. The rule is, however, that a clause in a statute will be given no different meaning after an amendment than it had before, if the amendment relates to other matters, and was obviously not designed to affect its meaning. 23 Cal. Jur. 778, par. 154. We are of opinion that the provision in section 963 that an appeal may be taken from an order changing or refusing to change the place of trial must be held to refer only to orders made under section 397, relating to changing the place of trial from one county to another.

[3] The provision of section 142, supra, permits the judges of the superior court, in their discretion and for the convenient dispatch of business, to direct that the court be held or continued at any place in the county not less than 120 miles distant from the county seat. As a corollary thereto there must exist like power to revoke any order made with that object in view. The court at all times retains jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter of the action. The section does not purport to authorize the parties to an action to demand that the place of trial be changed from the appointed place of holding the court to some other place in the county. The order here complained of, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, amounted to no more than an order that the cause be reset for trial at the regular place of holding the court, and at a time convenient for court and counsel. If the material rights of the defendant were prejudiced by the court's action, the order may be reviewed on appeal from the final judgment.

The appeal is dismissed.

DAVIS & McMILLAN et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
(S. F. 11567.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1926.)

1. Constitutional law ⚡107.

There is no vested right in running of statute of limitations, unless action is completely barred.

2. Constitutional law ⚡107.

Prior to time that statute of limitations has expired, Legislature may extend time before action will be outlawed.

3. Constitutional law ⚡191—Amendment of statute of limitations, enlarging period within which action can be brought as to pending causes, is not "retroactive" legislation as respects vested rights.

Amendment of statute of limitations enlarging period within which action can be brought as to pending causes is not "retroactive" legislation; retroactive or retrospective law being one that takes away or impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws, or creates new obligations, imposes new duty, or attaches new disability in respect to transactions already passed.

Where settlement for injury was made, and proceeding for compensation, brought later, would have been barred under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11, subd. In Banc.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Bob Pulliam, claimant, for injuries, opposed by Davis & McMillan, a co-partnership, employer, and the Columbia Casualty Company, insurer. From an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation, the employer and insurer bring certiorari. Award annulled without prejudice.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. [1, 2] This proceeding comes before this court at this time after the granting of the motion of respondents for a rehearing thereof. In the decision upon the former submission the award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of the employee, Pulliam, was annulled by this court on the ground that his claim for benefits, instituted against his employer and the insurance carrier, was barred by certain provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), and "that said subsection (e) of section 27 did not have the effect of extending the statute of limitations on Pulliam's claim against the petitioners; and, as a consequence, that it was outlawed at the time he instituted proceedings for the collection of his claim." At the time of the consideration of the petition for rehearing of said cause a serious doubt arose in the minds of the members of this court as to the correctness of this conclusion, and for this reason said petition for a rehearing was granted. After a further consideration of this question, we are now of the opinion that the effect of subsection (e) of section 27 of said act (as amended by St. 1923, p. 771) was to extend the statute of limitations in favor of Pulliam, and that, as extended, the statute was not a bar to the prosecution of his entire claim against the petitioners herein. To a large extent, however, the opinion of the court at the former hearing, written by Mr. Justice Houser, sitting as justice pro tem., contains a correct expression of our present views of the questions considered therein, and that portion of said opinion to which we now adhere and hereby adopt is as follows:

"On January 11, 1923, a man by the name of Pulliam, who prior to that time had been in the employ of petitioner, Davis & McMillan, was severely injured in an accident. It is admitted that the accident occurred within the scope of the employment, and that Pulliam was entitled to certain benefits accruing to him by virtue of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 831, as amended, Stats. 1919, p. 910, and Stats. 1923, pp. 165, 375, 438, 770 and 772).

"On February 15, 1923, which was a few days more than one month after the accident occurred, in consideration of the sum of $41.66 paid by petitioners to Pulliam on account of accrued compensation, and the further sum of $750 paid to Pulliam by petitioners, Pulliam executed a release to petitioners from 'all liability arising out of the injury.'

"On June 17, 1924, Pulliam instituted proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission for the collection of benefits under the provisions of said Workmen's Compensation Act, and which proceedings resulted in a finding by that body, among other things, that 'said injury caused temporary total disability continuing from the date thereof indefinitely, entitling the employee to $20.83 a week during said time, exclusive of the waiting period of seven days. The foregoing weekly benefit is based upon maximum wages. The employee is in need of further medical, surgical, and hospital treatment to cure and relieve him from the effects of said injury, and the insurance carrier is liable to furnish the same.'

"An award was thereupon made by the Industrial Accident Commission 'in favor of Bob Pulliam against Columbia Casualty Company, a corporation, of $20.83 a week beginning January 19, 1923, less all sums heretofore paid as compensation, and until termination of disability or the further order of this commission.'

"A petition for rehearing was denied by the commission, and by a writ of certiorari petitioners seek to have this court review the entire proceeding.

"Section 11 (b[1]) of the Statutes of 1917, page 831, as amended by a statute of 1919, page 910, places a limit upon the time within which a proceeding of this nature and character may be commenced for the collection of benefits to which an injured person may be entitled of six months from the date of the injury; but by section 11 (c) of said statute it is provided, in substance, that a payment of compensation, or any part thereof, or agreement therefor, shall have the effect of extending the period within which such proceedings may be commenced, six months from the expiration of the period covered by any such payment.

"Assuming that the amount of $750 plus the $41.66 paid by petitioners to appellant was a payment of compensation at the rate of $20.83 a week as provided by the findings of the commission, the six-month limitation would not commence to run until October 12, 1923, and therefore April 12, 1924, would be the last day upon which he would be entitled to institute proceedings for the collection of benefits. On August 17, 1923, however, which was prior to the time when the right to commence proceedings would have outlawed, a statute (Stats. 1923, p. 770) amending section 27 of the original statute of 1917, page 831, became effective. Among the various sections of the amended statute are the following provisions:

"(b) The compensation herein provided shall be the measure of the responsibility which the employer has assumed for injuries or death that may occur to employees in his employment when subject to the provisions of this act, and no release of liability or compromise agreement shall be valid unless it provide for the payment of full compensation in accordance with the provisions of this act or unless it shall be approved by the commission. * * *

"(e) Where a release or compromise is made for an amount less than the full compensation or benefit to which an employee, or his dependents, may be entitled under this act, the limitation of time provided by subsections

(b[1]) and (b[2]) of section 11 of this act in which such employee or his dependents may file proceedings for the collection of the benefits provided by subsection (a) of section 9 is hereby extended to two years from the date of the injury, unless said release or compromise agreement shall have been approved by the commission.'

"It is not denied by the parties hereto either that the release by Pulliam to petitioners was obtained for 'less than full compensation,' or that the release was not approved by the Industrial Accident Commission; and it is the contention of the respondents that by virtue of the terms of the statute (Stats. 1923, p. 770) the time allowed Pulliam for commencing proceedings against petitioners herein for the collection of benefits was thereby extended two years after January 11, 1923, the date of the injury.

"It will be noted that the statute extending the time to two years after the date of the injury in case a release was obtained for 'less than full compensation' or because such release was not approved by the commission, became effective prior to the time when Pulliam's right to commence the action would have outlawed under the other provisions of the statute. Section 11 (c), Stats. 1917, p. 831. The petitioners' contention that the Legislature had no power to thus extend the statute of limitations as to a claimed vested right to have the statute become operative on a certain date, is answered by the rule announced in principle in the case of Doehla v. Phillips, 151 Cal. 488, 91 P. 330, that prior to the time that the statute of limitations has expired on a right to maintain an action or proceeding on a claim of any kind, the Legislature has the power to extend the time before such action will be outlawed. To the same effect is Weldon v. Rogers, 151 Cal. 432, 90 P. 1062; and Swamp Land District v. Glide, 112 Cal. 85, 44 P. 451.

"But petitioners urge that because the language of the statute is that, 'where a release is made,' etc., the consequences flowing therefrom relate only to a release made after the act took effect, for the asserted reason that the words 'is made,' which indicate the present tense, 'would apply to releases and compromises made in the future.' It is also suggested by the petitioners that, if the Legislature had intended to have subdivision (e) of section 27 of the statute of 1923, page 770 (heretofore quoted herein) apply to releases which had been made before the act was to become effective, the Legislature would have used such an expression as 'where a release or compromise has been made.' It may be noticed, however, that further language of the statute (section 27 [e]) is that 'the limitation of time * * * is hereby extended to two years;' and it will may be argued therefrom that, if the intention of the Legislature was that the limitation was to affect releases made after the act became effective, instead of using the words 'is hereby extended,' it would have used the words 'shall be extended.'"

[3] It is clear from the decisions of the courts of this state as well as those of other jurisdictions that a person has no vested right in the running of a statute of limitations unless it has completely run and barred the action. Before the action is barred by the statute, the Legislature has absolute power to amend the statute and alter the period of limitations prescribed therein, subject only to the requirement that a reasonable time must be allowed for the prosecution of an action or proceedings after the passage of an amendment shortening the period. Doehla v. Phillips, 151 Cal. 488, 91 P. 330; Swamp Land District v. Glide, 112 Cal. 85, 90, 44 P. 451; Crothers v. Edison Electric Co. (C. C.) 149 F. 606, 609, 5 Cal. Jur. 755; Vance v. Vance, 108 U. S. 517, 2 S. Ct. 854, 27 L. Ed. 808; 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 167, 168, 171; 36 Cyclopedia of Law (Cyc.) 1201. It is equally well settled that an amendment to a statute of limitations enlarging the period of time within which an action can be brought as to pending causes of action is not retroactive legislation, and does not impair any vested right. Weldon v. Rogers, 151 Cal. 432, 90 P. 1062; Allen v. Allen, 95 Cal. 184, 30 P. 213, 16 L. R. A. 646; Kerckhoff-Cuzner Mill & Lumber Co. v. Olmstead, 85 Cal. 84, 24 P. 648. In Weldon v. Rogers, supra, page 433 (90 P. 1063) the court said:

"Now, appellant contends that this amendment is not applicable to the judgment involved in the case at bar, because to so apply it would be to hold it to be retroactive, and a statute is not to be construed as retroactive unless that meaning clearly appears upon its face. But, really, we do not see how any question arises here as to the retroactive operation of said amendment of April 9, 1895, to section 685. At the time of that amendment the said judgment in Weldon v. Rogers was an existing judgment not barred by the statute of limitations, and in full force and effect. The amendment was not in the nature of a revival of that judgment; it did not need revival. The applicability of the amendment to that judgment, as well as to all other live judgments existing at that time, is not, therefore, of retroactive applicability."

In 36 Cyclopedia of Law (Cyc.) p. 1201, the rule is laid down in the following language:

"A retroactive or retrospective law, in the legal sense, is one that takes away or impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, imposes a new duty or attaches a new disability in respect to transactions or considerations already past. Retrospective laws, in their general sense, include ex post facto laws, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts, but the term 'retrospective' is frequently used as applicable only to civil laws by way of distinguishing them from ex post facto laws. Retrospective statutes are usually considered to embrace only those which relate to substantial rights, as those which destroy or impair an existing right, or give a right which never before existed; and statutes which affect remedies only are not within the scope of the inhibition against retrospective laws, unless the remedy is entirely taken away, or is encumbered with conditions which render it impracticable."

Again, on page 1213 of the same volume, we find the following:

"The presumption against the retrospective construction of statutes is founded on the principle that they should not be given such a construction as will make them unconstitutional or unjust, and therefore as a general rule does not apply to statutes that relate merely to remedies and modes of procedure. The Legislature has full control over the mode, times, and manner of prosecuting suits; and whenever, upon consideration of an entire statute relating to these matters, it appears to have been the legislative intent to make it retroactive, it will be given this effect. A retroactive effect has accordingly been given statutes * * * relating to the limitation of actions. * * *"

As to the effect upon existing claims or causes of action of a general statute of limitation, Wood on Limitations lays down the rule as follows:

"If before the statute bar has become complete the statutory period is changed, and no mention is made of existing claims, it is generally held that the old law is not modified by the new so as to give to both statutes a proportional effect; but that the time past is effaced and the new law governs. The period provided by the new law must run on all existing claims in order to constitute a bar." 1 Wood on Limitations, § 12, p. 59.

The rule enunciated by this author is relied upon by the court in Crothers v. Edison Electric Co., supra. Judge Wolverton, in rendering the opinion in the last-named case, quoted with approval the following language from Sohn v. Waterson, 17 Wall. 596, 21 L. Ed. 737:

"When a statute declares generally that no action, or no action of a certain class, shall be brought, except within a certain limited time after it shall have accrued, the language of the statute would make it apply to past actions as well as to those arising in the future."

[4] From the foregoing authorities it appears to us that there can be no question but that subsection (e) of section 27 of the Workmen's Compensation Act extended the time within which proceedings could be instituted in the case of an ineffectual settlement like that made by the insurance carrier herein with Pulliam to two years after the receipt of the injury, and that such amendment applied, not only to claims that might arise in the future, but also to all existing claims not then barred by the statute of limitations. Pulliam was injured, as we have seen, January 11, 1923. He would, therefore, have had until January 11, 1925, within which to commence proceedings upon his claim. As this proceeding was commenced on June 17, 1924, it was in time, and the statute of limitations then in force was not a bar to the prosecution thereof.

[5] There is no merit, in our opinion, in the suggestion of petitioners that subsection (e) of section 27 is in the nature of a penalty, and should therefore be strictly construed as applicable to only such claims as might arise subsequent to its going into effect. Aside from the general provisions of said act (section 69, subd. [a]) requiring courts to liberally construe its terms, other good reasons occur to us why we should not place any strict and technical interpretation upon said subdivision (e) of section 27. This subsection only applies to a release or settlement made for an amount less than the full compensation or benefit to which an employee or his dependents may be entitled under said act. It must be obvious, therefore, that no employee would make a settlement for less than he was entitled to except through ignorance of his rights. If ignorant of his rights as to the amount of compensation to which he would be entitled, he may also be ignorant of any right on his part to institute a proceeding to recover compensation. Having made a purported settlement, he would be less liable after such settlement to seek advice and ascertain his rights under the statute than he would have been had no settlement been entered into by him. It is a wise and humane provision of the law to permit such a person under such circumstances additional time in which to act in order to protect his rights. This is particularly so when the only persons who can possibly object to such a construction are those who have taken advantage of his ignorance and imposed upon him an unjust settlement.

Were these the only questions to be considered, it would be our duty to enter an order denying the petition and affirming the award. It is conceded, however, by the parties hereto that the award in favor of Pulliam is excessive. By reference to several sections of the Workmen's Compensation Act, it will be readily seen that subsection (e) of section 27 extends the period of limitation two years for the collection only of medical benefits as provided by subsection (a) of section 9 of said act, and does not apply to disability payments provided by subsection (b) of said section 9. The commission found that the injury sustained by Pulliam caused temporary total disability, and made an award for compensation based thereon. It further found that "the employee is in need of further medical, surgical, and hospital treatment to cure and relieve him from the effects of said injury and the insurance carrier is liable to furnish the same." As the extension of the limitation contained in subsection (e) of section 27 did not apply to disability compensation provided for under subsection (b) of said section 9, Pulliam's claim therefore was barred at the time of the commencement of said proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission, and the award of the commission in his favor for this reason must be annulled. But, as Pulliam's claim for medical, surgical, and hospital treatment was not barred by any provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act, he still has the right under the terms of said act and the findings of the commission, as to his claim for further medical, surgical, and hospital treatment, to prosecute the same before said commission. It is therefore ordered that said award be, and the same is hereby, annulled, without prejudice, however, to the right of said Pulliam to further prosecute before said commission his claim against said insurance carrier for medical, surgical, and hospital treatment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action to recover money by W. E. Dean and others, as trustees of the estate of United States Aircraft Corporation (a corporation in bankruptcy), against Fred Shingle and E. S. Mulford. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant Fred Shingle appeals. Reversed.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto and Anthony S. Devoto, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Henry Ach and I. M. Golden, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. The plaintiffs, as trustees of the United States Aircraft Corporation, a bankrupt, brought this action to recover the sum of $2,500, alleged to have been "wholly lost" to the corporation through misappropriation of corporate funds by the defendant Mulford, a director, and the president and general manager of the corporation; the defendant Shingle having also been a director of the corporation at the time of the alleged misappropriation. The defendant Shingle alone appeared in the action, and demanded that the cause be tried by a jury. When the evidence was all in, the plaintiffs moved the court for a directed verdict. The motion was granted, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiffs and against the defendant Shingle for the full amount prayed for. The court "accepted" the verdict, and judgment thereon was entered without any formal findings being made. After motion for a new trial made and denied, the defendant Shingle appealed from the judgment.

The complaint is in two counts: The first count is based upon the liability created by section 3 of article 12 of the state Constitution, which provides that—

"The directors or trustees of corporations and joint-stock associations shall be jointly and severally liable to the creditors and stockholders for all moneys embezzled or misappropriated by the officers of such corporation or joint-stock association, during the term of office of such director or trustee."

The corporate nature of the United States Aircraft Corporation, its adjudication as a bankrupt, and the election and qualification of the plaintiffs as trustees, are sufficiently averred. Then follow allegations to the effect that, prior to the bankruptcy of the corporation, the defendant Shingle was elected, and continued to be, up to the time of the filing of the complaint, a director and secretary of the corporation. Coincident with the election of Shingle as director and secretary, defendant Mulford was also made a director, and was elected president and general manager of the corporation, and continued to act as such. It is then alleged that shortly after his election as president and general manager, and without any resolution, act, or other authority of the board of directors, Mulford sold to the corporation, for the sum of $2,500, an automobile owned by him, which was not reasonably worth more than the sum of $500. There are other averments sufficiently charging Mulford with acting in the dual capacity of seller and buyer in the transaction, and misappropriating the moneys of the corporation to the extent of the $2,500 which he "accepted" and "received" in payment for the automobile. Plaintiffs demanded repayment of the money paid by Mulford to himself in the transaction, and offered to restore and deliver the automobile to him. The money was not repaid, and the offer to restore the automobile was not accepted. The allegation follows that the "sum of $2,500 has been wholly lost to said United States Aircraft Corporation and to the said bankrupt estate."

[1-4] The allegations of the first cause of action of the complaint bring the case, as to Mulford, within the rule that, with certain exceptions, a trustee may not take part in any transaction concerning the trust in which he has an interest, present or contingent, adverse to that of his beneficiary. Civ. Code, § 2230. An agent authorized to act for a principal in a given negotiation cannot deal with himself. He cannot, when authorized to buy property for his principal, sell his own property to it, without communicating that fact to the principal. He cannot unite his personal and representative character in the same transaction. If he does, the transaction may be treated as voidable, at the election of the cestui que trust, without regard to whether it is fair and honest, or not. Graves v. Mono Lake H. M. Co., 81 Cal. 303, 320, 22 P. 665; Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 29, 28 P. 788; Sims v. Petaluma Gas Light Co., 131 Cal. 656, 659, 63 P. 1011. The doctrine applies to all persons who occupy fiduciary relations, but it is especially applicable to the officers of a corporation when acting for and on behalf of the company. They cannot use their official position to benefit themselves individually. Pacific Vinegar, etc., Works v. Smith, 145 Cal. 352, 361, 78 P. 550, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42. Yet, that is precisely what Mulford did in the instant case. His acts amounted to a willful and deliberate misappropriation of the funds of the aircraft corporation, and loss to the corporation was caused thereby. The transaction, according to appellant, amounted merely to a voidable transaction on which no liability on the part of appellant as a director could be predicated. We cannot agree with the contention. The allegations of the complaint and the supported facts clearly bring the case within the rule laid down in Fox v. Hale & Norcross Mining Co., 108 Cal. 369, 426, 41 P. 308. The transaction by Mulford amounted in effect to an embezzlement, and there was "a misappropriation of funds entrusted to an officer for a special purpose, by devoting them to some unauthorized purpose." Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 444, 64 P. 692, 69 P. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153. The conclusion is therefore inescapable that Mulford's acts rendered the directors of the aircraft corporation jointly and severally liable.

The second count, which purports to state a cause of action against the defendants for gross negligence of Shingle and fraud of Mulford, in connection with the sale of the automobile by Mulford to the corporation, may be disregarded. The question in the case is not one of negligence or fraud, but is: Are the facts alleged sufficient in an action upon the constitutional liability? Winchester v. Howard, supra, page 447 (64 P. 692, 69 P. 77).

[5-9] Appellant contends that, as the constitutional provision does not expressly give a right of action to the trustees of a bankrupt corporation to enforce the liability of directors to creditors and stockholders for money misappropriated by the officers of the corporation, plaintiffs here cannot maintain this suit. It does not appear that the corporation ever ratified the transaction by which Mulford sold the automobile to it. While the machine was used in its service, the fraud perpetrated upon it, or the means by which the automobile was acquired, were never brought home to the notice of the corporation or of any of its officers or directors other than Mulford. Therefore, the creditors could not be held to be estopped from maintaining the action. The trustees are here representing the creditors. Section 47 of the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States provides that—

"As to all property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, [the trustees] shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied." 36 U. S. Stats. at Large, 840 (U. S. Comp. St. § 9631).

After the appointment and qualification of the trustee, all actions for the recovery or protection of the assets of the estate of the bankrupt must be brought by, or in the name of, the trustee. 1 Remington on Bankruptcy, § 1718. Creditors' rights, which are enforceable under state laws, accrue to a trustee in bankruptcy. Schroeter v. Abbott, 185 Cal. 146, 149, 150, 196 P. 39. The action here is one, in effect, to recover assets of the corporation which constitute a fund to which all the creditors may look for satisfaction of their claims. Winchester v. Mabury, 122 Cal. 522, 524, 55 P. 393. The cases cited by appellant in support of his contention that the proper action has not been brought (Ellsworth v. Bradford, 186 Cal. 316, 199 P. 335; People v. Bank of Shasta, 172 Cal. 507, 157 P. 606; Williams v. Carver, 171 Cal. 658, 154 P. 472), are not in point. They merely hold that, under the law as it existed at the time they were decided, the liability of stockholders to the creditors of a bank constituted no part of its property or assets, and could not be enforced, or the amount of the liability collected, by the superintendent of banks in liquidating the affairs of an insolvent institution. The present action, we conclude, was properly brought by the trustees of the bankrupt corporation.

[10-12] Appellant now takes the position that the action brought by plaintiffs here was in its nature one at law, and correctly contends that the constitutional liability of directors for money misappropriated by officers of a corporation cannot be enforced in such an action, but only by a bill in equity in which all the creditors are parties, or are represented, and in which there can be an accounting and equities adjusted after all the facts have been ascertained. Winchester v. Mabury, 122 Cal. 522, 55 P. 393; Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 447, 64 P. 692, 69 P. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153. But legal and equitable relief are administered in this state in the same forum, and according to the same general plan. A party cannot be sent out of court merely because his facts do not entitle him to relief at law, or merely because he is not entitled to relief in equity, as the case may be. He can be sent out of court only when, upon his facts, he is entitled to no relief, either at law or in equity. Consequently, an action does not now, as formerly fail because a plaintiff has made a mistake as to the form of his remedy. If the case which he states entitles him to any remedy, either legal or equitable, his complaint is not to be dismissed because he has prayed for a judgment to which he is not entitled. If the facts stated are such as address themselves to the equity side of the court, the appropriate relief will be granted by the court sitting as a court of equity. 1 Cal. Jur., p. 312, par. 6.

In the case at bar, the facts pleaded by the plaintiffs clearly address themselves to the equity side of the court. The prayer of the complaint is for judgment for the specific sum alleged to have been lost to the corporation through the misappropriation of Mulford, "and for such other and further relief as may be meet and appropriate." The action was one, therefore, properly cognizable in the equity side of the court below.

[13-15] For another reason we are of opinion that the trustees in bankruptcy may maintain this action in its present form. The reasons advanced in the decisions why a bill in equity is proper, where the creditors institute an action to recover on the constitutional liability, are met and fully satisfied by the situation covered when the action is brought by the trustees of a bankrupt corporation. In such a case there are present all the essential elements of an action in equity. The trustees in bankruptcy represent all the creditors, and are acting in their behalf. The recovery, if any be had, constitutes a fund for the benefit of all the creditors. If, after satisfying their claims, any of the fund remains, it will belong to the stockholders. While the action is not brought primarily to enforce an accounting, which is required only for the purpose of the distribution of the fund which may be recovered for all the creditors, the bringing of the suit implies that such accounting will be ordered. In this case, the corporation is in liquidation, and any amount recovered will pass into the custody of the court having jurisdiction of the bankrupt's estate for distribution, precisely as it would have gone in a creditor's bill, or in some analogous proceeding. See Winchester v. Howard, supra, at page 446 (64 P. 692, 69 P. 77).

The contention of appellant that it does not appear that the trustees in bankruptcy represent only creditors of the aircraft corporation who were such at the time of the sale of the automobile, for which reason, it is argued, plaintiffs are not entitled to a judgment against him, is without merit. A creditor who became such after the misappropriation is entitled to share in any recovery had. Winchester v. Howard, supra.

[16] The vital question in this case is: To what extent were the directors of the aircraft corporation rendered liable to the creditors and stockholders by the misappropriation of corporate funds by Mulford? It is the contention of appellant that the liability of directors under the constitutional provision is remedial or contractual and that of sureties, rather than penal, and that in the absence of proof of loss or damage to the corporation neither the creditors nor stockholders can recover judgment against the directors, or any of them. From this premise, he argues that, as the aircraft corporation received from Mulford an automobile, admittedly of considerable value, and used it for many months in its business, no loss resulted from the use of the corporation's funds by Mulford, and, consequently, this action must fail. Respondents, on the other hand, contend that the liability of the directors is penal in its nature, primary and absolute, and by way of providing compensation to creditors, and not to cover loss to the corporation; that the directors must pay the full amount of the money misappropriated, and there can be no deduction because of any benefit the corporation may have received. Statutes making officers and directors of a corporation responsible to its creditors for losses growing out of the wrongful or fraudulent conduct of such officers or directors are regarded by most courts as of a penal nature, and as not arising out of contracts. Brown v. Major, 164 F. 673, 677, 90 C. C. A. 489. In this state, it is well settled that a statute which provides for making one liable for the debts of another, and prescribes how and under what circumstances he shall be held thus liable, is penal in its nature. Snell v. Bradbury, 139 Cal. 379, 382, 73 P. 150; Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 784, 155 P. 90; Miller v. White, 50 N. Y. 137, 142. But section 3 of article 12 of the Constitution has received a different construction in the previous decisions of this court, in which it has been held that the liability of directors of corporations to the creditors and stockholders for moneys embezzled or misappropriated by the officers of the corporation, during the term of office of such director, is one of suretyship, and therefore one of contract. Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 444, 64 P. 692, 69 P. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153. In that case, it was held that the Constitution did not change the nature of the liability of directors of corporations for loss resulting from misappropriations of trust property that always existed, "except that for its purpose it is limited to moneys misappropriated." The court said (page 444 [69 P. 80]):

"The Constitution merely makes the directors sureties for their fellow-directors and for the officers of the corporation for moneys, when so misappropriated as to make the officer misappropriating liable, and authorizing the creditors and stockholders to sue. * * * Nor do I [we] appreciate the importance of the question whether the law is penal or not. It is not penal in the technical sense, as it allows no recovery as a punishment, but only to compensate for a loss. But the liability created is that of suretyship, in which the innocent always suffers for the guilty, and therefore the surety may always stand upon the very letter of his bond."

This construction of the Constitution has been followed by the federal courts (Brown v. Major, supra), and by the District Courts of Appeal of this state (Hercules Oil Co. v. Hocknell, 5 Cal. App. 702, 705, 91 P. 341; Major v. Walker, 23 Cal. App. 465, 467, 138

P. 360), and was in effect, approved in Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 786, 155 P. 90. Respondents contend that the court took an erroneous view in Winchester v. Howard, supra, and that what was said in that case about the liability of directors being that of sureties is dictum and ought not to be followed. We deem it unnecessary to enter into a discussion of the contention. The rule there announced was foreshadowed in the earlier case, Fox v. Hale & Norcross Mining Co., supra, and has been followed and approved in the later cases. In the Fox Case, the court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Beatty, said that it "was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to make each director of a corporation severally liable, whether individually culpable or not, for certain kinds of losses to the corporation occurring during his term of office; that is to say, he is made liable for embezzlement or misappropriation of corporate funds by officers of the corporation." "The word 'misappropriation,'" said the Chief Justice, is to be construed to mean "the misapplication of funds intrusted to an officer for a particular purpose, by devoting them to some unauthorized purpose, and does not apply to the payment of an extravagant price for services or materials properly appertaining to the business of the corporation—which is this case." In Winchester v. Howard, supra, the court said (page 445 [69 P. 81]):

"* * * When an officer of a corporation knowingly appropriates funds intrusted to him, for unlawful and unauthorized purposes, and loss ensues to the corporation, the directors are liable under this clause of the Constitution."

[17-20] We are not unmindful of the purpose for which the particular clause of the Constitution was included among its provisions. In the debates of the constitutional convention it was said that its adoption would make trustees and directors more careful in the management of their business; make them sureties for the good conduct of those in whose custody they place the funds of the corporation; make them responsible for the discharge of their duties. 1 Debates and Proceedings of the Const. Convention, p. 396 et seq. The design plainly was to prevent speculation and misappropriation of corporate funds. The liability imposed by the provisions is that of surety, and when loss occurs the innocent surety suffers for another's fault. Directors take office knowing the responsibility they assume in so doing. In the eye of the law they do so as freely and voluntarily as they would do if they signed a bond agreeing to be responsible for the conduct of the corporate officers. Winchester v. Howard, supra, page 448 (64 P. 692, 69 P. 77). But before the directors can be held liable for moneys so misappropriated as to make the officer misappropriating liable, and authorizing the creditors and stockholders to sue, it must be established: First, that there has been a misappropriation; and second, that a loss to the corporation has resulted. The decisions, supra, declare that to be the proper construction to place upon the provision of the Constitution under which it is sought to hold the appellant liable in this case. The misappropriation of Mulford was clearly established; but the exact amount of the loss to the Aircraft Corporation has not been fixed. The transaction by which the president and general manager paid to himself the sum of $2,500 for the automobile worth much less than that sum, was an unlawful and unauthorized appropriation of the money of the corporation, but it is admitted that the automobile had some value—alleged in the complaint not to exceed $500. The loss to the corporation was therefore something less than the sum of money misappropriated. Under all the circumstances, it seems only reasonable and proper to hold that the corporation profited by the transaction to the extent of the actual value of the automobile when received and placed in its service. For that reason, the trial court was in error in entering judgment against appellant for the full amount of $2,500, alleged in the first count of the complaint, and proved to have been misappropriated by Mulford, and in refusing to ascertain and make an allowance for the value of the automobile at the time of its purported sale to the corporation.

[21] But we agree with the respondents that appellant was not entitled to prove the reasonable, or any, value of the use of the automobile during the time it was in the service of the corporation. The actual value of the automobile may be deducted from the amount of money of the corporation which was misappropriated; but the value of its use, which would no doubt be the same as that of any other automobile of like description rightfully purchased for the corporation, cannot be said to be a profit or benefit derived through the misappropriation of the money by Mulford.

[22] For the reason that the obligation of suretyship imposed by the Constitution does not extend to damages resulting from mere negligence in the management of the affairs of the corporation, not amounting to a misappropriation of funds, in the sense of that term as we have referred to it, plaintiffs cannot recover at all under the theory of the case relied on in the second count of the complaint.

The judgment is reversed.

OF AUTOMOBILE CLUB OF SOUTH-ERN CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 4120.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 6, 1926. Rehearing Denied May 5, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 3, 1926.)

1. Negligence ⇨62(1)—Negligent act is "proximate cause" of injury if without act injury would not have happened.

Though negligent act or omission be removed from injury by intermediate causes or effects, it is in law the proximate cause if, in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new efficient cause, it produces the injury, and if without it the injury would not have happened.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Proximate Cause.]

2. Insurance ⇨146(2).

Terms used in insurance policy should be given their plain, ordinary, and popular meaning.

3. Insurance ⇨512—Automobile insurer whose liability on "claims arising from one accident" was limited to certain amount held not liable in greater sum, where insured's car struck another and broke steering gear, by reason of which it ran into a third; "accident."

Automobile insurer whose liability on "claims arising from one accident" was limited to certain amount held not liable in greater sum, where insured's car struck another and broke steering gear, by reason of which it ran into a third, since where one negligent act is sole proximate cause of occurrence there is but one accident, even though there be several resultant injuries; "accident" being any unintended and unexpected occurrence which produces hurt or loss.

Craig, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by Grainger Hyer against the Inter-Insurance Exchange of the Automobile Club of Southern California. Judgment for plaintiff, when defendant elected to stand on its demurrer, which was overruled, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

David R. Faries, John R. Berryman, Jr., and J. Allen Davis, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to recover upon a liability insurance policy. Plaintiff is the assignee of the assured. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled. Defendant elected to stand upon its demurrer and declined to answer, whereupon a judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for $500 and costs. Defendant claims that the complaint does not state a cause of action and that its demurrer was improperly overruled. The sufficiency of the complaint turns upon the construction to be placed upon the word "accident," as employed in a clause of the policy which limits defendant's liability to $1,000 for claims arising from "one accident."

The facts alleged in the complaint are substantially these: On July 29, 1920, defendant executed and issued to the assured a policy which insured him for the term of one year against liability to other persons for injury to or destruction of their property resulting from the use of the assured's automobile, a Marmon touring car. Defendant is referred to in the policy as the "Exchange." The provisions of the instrument which are germane to the present inquiry read:

"In consideration of an additional deposit of $13.95 this policy also covers assured's legal liability to other persons for injury to or destruction of the property of such persons * * * resulting solely and directly from the ownership, maintenance and/or use of the automobile herein described, * * * subject, however, to the following limitations and exclusions: (1) the Exchange's liability for such injury or destruction is limited to the actual value of the property destroyed at the time of its destruction, * * * but in no case shall the Exchange be liable with respect to claims (including claims for loss of use) arising from one accident for more than one thousand dollars." (Italics ours.)

On March 27, 1921, the policy then being in full force and effect, the assured, by and through his chauffeur, was driving his Marmon car in a southerly direction upon a state highway in California. At the same time two other automobiles—one an Overland owned by a man of the name of Chance, and the other a Cadillac owned by the Keck Company, a corporation—were being driven in a northerly direction on the same highway; the Cadillac was traveling about 100 feet to the rear of the Overland; the Marmon car was so negligently operated by the assured's chauffeur that it collided with the Overland, damaging the latter vehicle in the sum of $500; the force of that collision broke the steering gear of the Marmon, causing it to become unmanageable, so that its path of travel could not be controlled, by reason whereof its course was so deflected toward the east side of the highway that it collided with the Cadillac, damaging it in the sum of $1,500 and causing the assured to incur a liability to pay that amount of money to the owner of that car; defendant already has paid $1,000 to the owner of the Cadillac; that sum is the total amount which has been paid by it on account of these collisions; the owner of the Overland has recovered a judgment against the assured in the sum of $500, which remains unpaid; defendant refuses to pay that judgment or any part of it, and disclaims all further liability under its policy of insurance. The action was brought to recover the amount for which the assured so became liable to the owner of the Overland.

Appellant claims that, though there were two "injuries," one to the Overland and the other to the Cadillac, there was but one "accident," within the meaning of the policy, and that therefore it complied with its obligations under its contract of insurance when it paid the sum of $1,000 to the owner of the Cadillac.

It is only from a liability which grows out of negligence on the part of the assured, his agents or servants that policies of this character are issued. Tinline v. White Cross Ins. Ass'n [1921] 3 K. B. 327, and notes to that case in 11 B. R. 265 et seq. The policy indemnified the assured against sums which he shall become legally liable to pay to any other person as compensation for injury to or destruction of the property of such other person. A man does not become liable to pay compensation for accidental injury to the property of another unless the accident is due to his wrongful act. As was said in Ford v. Stevens Motor Car Co., 220 S. W. 980, 203 Mo. App. 669:

"Such so-called liability policies on automobiles in general, protect the owner or his agent or servant operating the same, from liability for his own negligence, and unless he or his said agent or servant is found to be negligent there is no liability. That is the very purpose of such policies."

[1] Here the assured's liability to the owner of each of the two automobiles damaged in the collisions accrued from one act of negligence on the part of the assured's servant, namely, the negligent operation of the Marmon car, which caused it to collide first with the Overland and then with the Cadillac. This act of negligence, the one cause which set in motion all that followed, was the proximate cause of both collisions. That is to say, the chauffeur's negligence which caused the injury to the Overland was also the cause which, in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produced the injury to the Cadillac. Without the initial act of negligence the injury to the Cadillac would not have occurred. "Proximate cause" literally means the cause nearest to the effect produced; but in legal terminology it is not confined to its literal meaning. Though a negligent act or omission be removed from the injury by intermediate causes or effects, yet if, in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new efficient cause, it produces that injury, and if without it the injury would not have happened, it is in law the proximate cause of such injury, or the causa causans

of the schoolmen. Proximity in point of time or space is no part of the definition. That is of no importance except as it may afford evidence for or against proximity of causation. Dickson v. Omaha, etc., Ry. Co., 27 S. W. 476, 124 Mo. 140, 25 L. R. A. 320, 46 Am. St. Rep. 429, quoting 1 Shearman and Redfield on Negligence (4th Ed.) § 26.

Though there was in this case but one proximate cause of the unexpected and untoward occurrence in which the double injury happened, it does not for that reason alone necessarily follow that the injuries resulted from but "one accident," as that term is used in the policy. For, obviously, there is a clear distinction between the chauffeur's want of due care considered as the cause of the accident and the accident considered as the cause of the resulting injuries. Whether there were two accidents or only one accident presents a question, the solution whereof depends upon the meaning to be given to the word "accident" as used in this contract of insurance.

[2, 3] The terms used in an insurance policy should be given their plain, ordinary, and popular meaning. We should, however, be careful on the one hand not to be over liberal in our interpretation of the word "accident," and, on the other hand, not to be too technical. But whether we give to the word, as used in this policy, a strict interpretation or assign to it a liberal and popular meaning, we think it must be held that there was but one accident. The word "accident" probably has been discussed in adjudications as often as any other word in the English language. It is not a technical term, with a clearly defined meaning, and it has been used in more than one sense. In its most commonly accepted meaning it signifies an event which takes place without one's foresight or expectation. It was defined by Lord Macnaghten in Fenton v. Thorley, etc., Limited, [1903] A. C. 443, as an "unlooked for mishap or an untoward event which is not expected or designed." Its meaning is well stated in Corpus Juris (volume 1, pp. 394, 395), where it is said:

"Speaking generally, but with reference to legal liabilities, an accident means any unintended and unexpected occurrence which produces hurt or loss. But it is often used to denote any unintended and unexpected loss or hurt apart from its cause, and if the cause is not known the loss or hurt itself would certainly be called an accident. The word is also often used to denote both the cause and the effect, no attempt being made to discriminate between them."

This definition, originally given by Lord Robertson in Fenton v. Thorley, supra, is now generally accepted by the authorities. See Standard Oil Co. v. United States (C. C. A.) 264 F. 69, 12 A. L. R. 1407.

It will be noticed that in Lord Robertson's definition an accident is an "occurrence." It is an "occurrence which produces hurt or injury." It also will be noticed that under this quite generally approved definition the word, as used in some classes of cases, denotes the cause of the hurt or loss; in other classes of cases it denotes the event, i. e., the unintended and unexpected loss or hurt apart from its cause; and in still other instances it may denote both the cause and the event, no attempt being made to discriminate between them. The use of the word to denote the unexpected and unintended result—the loss or hurt—rather than the cause, is quite common in cases arising under Workmen's Compensation Acts, as, for instance, where a workman performing his usual task in his wonted way suffers, by reason of strain, an internal injury that is itself sudden, unusual, and unexpected. Brown's Case, 123 A. 421, 123 Me. 424; Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 171 P. 429, 177 Cal. 614, L. R. A. 1918F, 856. See, also Carroll v. Industrial Comm., 195 P. 1097, 69 Colo. 473, 19 A. L. R. 107. In 25 Harvard Law Review, 340, it is said:

"Since the case of Fenton v. Thorley, nothing more is required [in cases arising under Workmen's Compensation Acts] than that the harm that the plaintiff has sustained shall be unexpected."

This latitudinarian use of the word in that class of cases is justifiable for the reason that the phrase "injuries sustained by accident," as used in Workmen's Compensation Acts (St. 1913, p. 279, § 12), is to be given a broad interpretation in harmony with the evident purpose of such enactments and with the spirit of liberality in which they were conceived. Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra. But, as commonly used in liability insurance policies, the word "accident" is predicated on an occurrence which is the cause of the injury. That is to say, as used in liability insurance contracts the word is employed to denote the cause, rather than the effect. In automobile accidents, particularly in such as involve collisions, the injury and its cause may be practically inseparable. They may be, and often are, inseparable in time and space. And yet in such instances the accident is clearly and necessarily the cause from which the resultant injury flows as an incident. In Lewis v. Commercial Casualty Ins. Co., 121 A. 259, 142 Md. 472, 28 A. L. R. 1287, the court, having under consideration a liability insurance policy insuring an automobile owner, employed this language: "The meaning of the word 'loss,' as used in the clause under construction, is the injury or damage caused by the accident." (Italics ours.) In Tuttle v. Pacific Mutual L. Ins. Co., 190 P. 993, 58 Mont. 121, 16 A. L. R. 601, the court, having under consideration the meaning of the word "accident," as used in an accident insurance policy, says: "A result, though unexpected, is not an accident; the means or cause must be accidental." This language applies with equal force to such accidents as fall within the purview of liability insurance policies such as the one before us. Liability insurance is but a branch of accident and casualty insurance. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Merrill, 29 N. E. 529, 155 Mass. 404; Metropolitan Casualty Ins. Co. v. Basford, 139 N. W. 795, 31 S. D. 149.

Where, as here, one negligent act or omission is the sole proximate cause, or causa causans, there is, as a general rule, but one accident, even though there be several resultant injuries or losses. Let us suppose that in the instant case the owner of the Overland car had likewise been the owner of the Cadillac, and that the former vehicle had been towing the latter when the successive but causally connected collisions occurred—just as each car in a freight train pulls the car which is immediately behind it. Could it correctly be said in the case just supposed that there were two accidents, merely because two automobiles were damaged in sudden and unexpected crashes happening in continuous sequence as a connected chain of events, but springing from a single initial cause? Clearly not. It would no more be correct to say of such a case that there were two accidents than it would be to predicate two or more accidents on a general freight train wreck, merely because two or more cars in the train might have been demolished in the same catastrophe. If, in our supposititious case, there would be but one accident, though two automobiles belonging to the same person were injured, then how could that accident become two accidents merely because, under the facts of this case, the two injured vehicles were separately operated and owned? To ask the question is to answer it.

In Allen v. London Guarantee, etc., Co., 28 T. L. R. 254, the policy limited the liability of the insurance company to £300 for all claims arising out of "any accident or occurrence." Two persons were injured in an accident caused by a cart belonging to the assured. It was held that there was only one "occurrence" within the meaning of the policy, and that therefore the limitation of defendant's liability to £300 applied. It is true that in that case the learned justice who rendered the decision was constrained to the view that there were two "accidents," though only one "occurrence." He appears to have been guided to this seeming incongruity by the interpretation which he put upon the decision of the Court of Appeal in South Staffordshire Tramways Company, Limited, v. Sickness & Accident Assurance Association, Limited, [1891] 1 Q. B. 402—a case presently to be adverted to by us. For our present purpose, however, it suffices that the Allen Case holds that there was but one "occurrence," even though two persons were injured.

If it be proper to say that there is but one "occurrence" where two persons are injured in an automobile collision, then it is a mistake to say of such a case that there are two "accidents"; for in a general sense every automobile accident is an occurrence. In Chaplin v. Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, 147 N. W. 465, 96 Neb. 213, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 227, the court, speaking of an automobile indemnity insurance policy, says:

"As used in an indemnity policy such as this, we are of opinion that the word 'accident' means an undesigned and unforeseen occurrence of an afflictive or unfortunate character resulting in bodily injury to a person other than the insured." (Italics ours.)

If, as the Nebraska court says, the word "accident," as used in an automobile indemnity policy, means an undesigned and unforeseen "occurrence" resulting in loss or injury to a third person, it follows that if the facts shown in Allen v. London Guarantee, etc., Co., supra, presented the case of one "occurrence," as was held by the English court, then they also presented the case of but one "accident."

That part of the continuous sequence of events which embraces the second collision in this case, the collision of the Marmon car with the Cadillac, may well be described in the language of Bailhache, J., in Tinline v. White Cross Insurance Association, supra, as "the incident of the accident." In that case the White Cross Insurance Association insured the plaintiff against legal liability to pay to third persons compensation for "accidental personal injury" caused through the driving of plaintiff's motor car. While driving the car at an excessive rate of speed the assured knocked down three persons, injuring two of them and killing the third. The defendants contended that a recovery under the insurance contract would violate public policy, for the reason that the assured was guilty of a crime, he having pleaded guilty to manslaughter for the killing of one of the persons knocked down by his car. In ruling against this contention Judge Bailhache, before whom the action was tried, said:

"The fact that one of the three persons was killed is, as I have said, really immaterial for the purposes of this case; it was the incident of the accident, or the accident of the accident." (Italics ours.)

So here, the collision with the Cadillac, a part of the general catastrophe in which the three automobiles were involved, was but an "incident" of the accident, and not a separate accident.

Thus far in our consideration of the words "one accident," as used in this policy, we have purposely approached the question from the standpoint of a somewhat philosophical interpretation of the word "accident." We shall now endeavor to ascertain the ordinary and popular meaning of the word, premising by saying that we are convinced that the ultimate result, so far as this case is concerned, will be found to be the same whether the word "accident" be taken in a philosophical sense or be given its ordinary and popular meaning, one which it may be assumed any intelligent business man would give it. Fortunately the books afford several instances of the business man's construction of the word. In Klein v. Liability Assurance Corp., 9 Ohio App. 241, the court had before it an automobile indemnity insurance policy which contained a clause to the effect that the insurer's liability, "on account of any one accident," resulting in injuries "to more than one person," is limited to a named sum of money. A similar provision is found in the policy which was before the court in McClung v. Pennsylvania Taximeter Cab Co., 25 Pa. Dist. R. 583. In Capelle v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 120 A. 556, 80 N. H. 481, the policy indemnified the assured from liability resulting from claims upon him for damages on account of bodily injuries or death resulting at any one time and suffered by any person or "persons" as the result of "an accident." These contracts—and doubtless many other similar instances could be cited—illustrate the fact that in the realm of business, in contracts presumably entered into between ordinary men of affairs, employing language in a sense which is commonly understood by such men, the term "one accident," or "an accident," is used to cover cases where two or more persons may suffer loss or injury. In Tinline v. White Cross Insurance Association, supra, the case where the assured knocked down three persons while driving his automobile, killing one of them, Judge Bailhache commences his opinion thus:

"In this case plaintiff claims a declaration that he is entitled to be indemnified against the consequences of an accident." (Italics ours.)

These few illustrations will suffice to show that when the term "one accident" or "an accident" is used in automobile indemnity insurance contracts it is ordinarily and popularly understood to include a case where two or more persons are injured in person or in property as the result of an undesigned and unforeseen occurrence of an afflictive or unfortunate character, such as happened in this case.

There would have been no occasion for an opinion of this length were it not for the decision of the English court in the South Staffordshire Tramways Case, [1891] 1 Q. B. 402, referred to supra. Without some thoughtful consideration that case might seem to be at variance with our conclusion. However, a careful analysis of the policy there under consideration will show that case to be sui generis, and that the conflict between it and the views which we entertain is more apparent than real or substantial. There the assured made a written application, which was recited in the policy. When the insurance clauses in the policy and the written application were read together it was apparent that the words "any one accident," in the policy, were intended by the parties to mean an accident to each of several persons who might be injured by the vehicles of the assured upon any one occasion. The policy, after reciting that the plaintiffs had applied to defendants "for an indemnity against all such claims as herein-after mentioned for compensation for personal injuries, and damage to property, caused by vehicles in their possession," witnessed that the defendants did thereby agree that:

"So far as regards claims for personal injury and damage to property made against the assured in respect of accidents caused by vehicles * * * belonging to the assured * * * and for which accidents the assured shall be liable, the association shall pay the assured the sum of £250 in respect of any one accident."

It will be noticed that the application was for indemnity against all claims for personal "injuries" and damage to property, caused by plaintiffs' vehicles. As was pointed out by Bowen, L. J., in his concurring opinion, when the policy is looked to it appears that it limits the words of the application by adding the words "in respect of accidents." This word "accidents," in the plural, occurs twice in the policy preceding the phrase "any one accident," and was evidently intended to refer to "accidents" occurring at any one time, and not to independent and wholly disconnected accidents such as might possibly occur at different times during the life of the policy. It is evident, therefore, that by the use of the word "accidents" in the insurance clause which provides for indemnity against "claims for personal injury * * * made against the assured in respect of accidents caused by vehicles," the parties intended to treat as several accidents all such untoward occurrences as might happen to several persons upon any one occasion; i. e., to regard as one accident whatever happened to each of the persons injured. It follows as a corollary to this construction that the words "any one accident," subsequently appearing in the policy, were intended to mean any one unexpected and untoward event happening to each of several persons who might be injured by plaintiffs' vehicles at any one time. That is to say, if in the preceding part of the policy the word "accidents" was intended to embrace each separate untoward occurrence happening to each of the several persons who might be injured upon any one occasion, then, as was said by Lord Bowen, the word "accident," in the phrase "any one accident," must receive the same construction.

The policy under consideration in the instant case differs radically from that which was before the Court of Appeal in the South Staffordshire Tramways Case. In the insurance contract here in question it is declared that the policy "covers all the assured's legal liability to other persons for the injury to or destruction of the property of such persons * * * resulting solely and directly from the ownership, maintenance, and/or use of the automobile" of the assured, but that in no case shall the insurer be liable for more than one thousand dollars "with respect to claims * * * arising from one accident." The use of the word "claims," in the plural, in connection with the words "one accident," clearly indicates that the parties understood that there might be several claims arising from one accident—as, for instance, where, as here, the vehicles of two or more persons are injured—but that though there might be several injuries and therefore several claims, the total liability of the insurer should not exceed $1,000 if the claims all arose from one accident.

Concluding, as we do, that there was but one accident, and that, therefore, by its payment of $1,000 to the owner of the Cadillac appellant has fully discharged the liability which devolved upon it by reason of the accident, it follows that the demurrer to the complaint was improperly overruled.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to sustain the demurrer.

WORKS, J. I concur in the judgment and in everything that is said in the foregoing opinion. I desire, especially, to announce my concurrence in the reasoning whereby the writer of the opinion distinguishes the case of Staffordshire Tramways Co. v. Sickness & Accident Ass'n, 1 Q. B. 402, from the present one. If, however, that case is not distinguishable from this, I am of the opinion that it was wrongly decided. So much, to my mind, is evident from the general reasoning of the above opinion. I think the English case has been given a fictitious importance by the very general application of its doctrine which has been made by annotators, text-writers, and judges.

CRAIG, J. I dissent, because to my mind the word "accident" in the indemnity policy in suit was intended by the parties to be given its ordinary meaning, and this the opinion of my associates holds it should not receive.

It must be conceded that it is a necessary presumption that the word in question was understood to denote its usual meaning unless some consideration of fact or law appears to the contrary. I find neither. The word "accident," as used in indemnity insurance, appears to have a definite meaning. There can be no dispute upon the proposition that all authorities agree that an "accident" means an "unintended and unexpected occurrence which produces hurt or loss." It is impossible to read into this language any reference to the cause of the occurrence other than that suggested by the words "unintended and unexpected." These words merely describe the quality of the event as unforeseen and undesigned. It cannot be doubted that if this generally accepted definition be taken as applicable here, the facts of this case show that separate accidents occurred to the Overland and Cadillac cars. But my associates hold that an unusual meaning was intended by the parties, and that the word "accident" had reference to the cause of the events rather than to the events themselves. Of course, if this indemnity policy contemplated that an "accident" referred to a cause, and not to an "event," but one accident occurred, for there was but one cause.

Two cases are cited in the majority opinion to sustain the statement that in automobile accidents the injury and the cause are often inseparable, and yet, in such instances the accident is the cause from which the resultant injury flows as an incident. I am compelled to acknowledge an entire inability to discover anything in the language contained in either of these cases to sustain this assertion. Lewis v. Commercial Casualty Insurance Co., 121 A. 259, 142 Md. 472, 28 A. L. R. 1287, was an action upon an indemnity insurance policy, and in which the contest had been based entirely upon the question of whether or not sufficient notice of loss had been given, or, if not given, the requirement thereof had been waived. I find no attempt in the opinion to define the word "accident." In Tuttle v. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co., 190 P. 993, 58 Mont. 121, 16 A. L. R. 601, the court does use the language quoted: "A result, though unexpected, is not an accident; the means or cause must be accidental." But the sentence which immediately precedes explains why the language quoted was used and the limitation clearly intended to be placed upon the same. It is said:

"The word 'accident', in accident policies, means an event which takes place without one's foresight or expectation. A result, though unexpected, is not an accident; the means or cause must be accidental." (Italics mine.)

Of course, it is true that in accident insurance the means must be accidental, for in such policies the form universally employed insures against injury sustained by the insured "caused solely by external, violent and accidental means." Such was the language of the policy which the court had before it. It needs no argument to sustain the proposition that, where the contract expressly provides that the means must be accidental, it is not sufficient that the event only was an accidental one. However, the policy which is the basis of this suit makes no reference to the means. In it we find no provision that the means shall be accidental. It stipulates to indemnify the assured against loss from legal liability paid to others for injury to or destruction of their property, resulting from an accident—that is, a certain kind of an event.

No decision has come to my attention in which the definition of an accident is announced which states that the cause of the event must be accidental, except those construing accident and life insurance policies, using the words "accidental means" in specifying and limiting the grounds of liability of the assured. This was true in the case of Rock v. Travelers' Insurance Co., 156 P. 1029, 172 Cal. 462, L. R. A. 1916E, 1196, and a long list of decisions therein enumerated.

Since it is conceded that in cases arising under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, to produce an accident nothing more is required than that the harm which the plaintiff has sustained shall be unexpected and unintended, such decisions need not be cited. But under them the circumstances of the instant case would necessarily constitute two accidents. However, it is asserted that there are decisions construing accident and life insurance policies which hold otherwise.

If there be such a distinction (and I have found none) both reason and authority make the conclusion inevitable that the decisions which have arisen under the Workmen's Compensation Acts are to be classed with those under ordinary indemnity contracts, rather than accident and life insurance policies in so far as the matter under consideration is concerned. The former, like the second class mentioned, provide for the indemnifying of persons from loss or hurt which has resulted to others. In each of the classes last mentioned the loss which the insurer is obligated to make good is not only one which has befallen a third party, but is one which the insured is required by law or agreement to compensate. Under the former the obligation arises from the direct mandate of the statute; under the indemnity contract it comes about through the fact that the insured is responsible for a happening which makes him liable in damages to another. In both instances the law compels the payment by the insured of the loss sustained. This legal compulsion supplies the element of cause in all indemnity liability, and would supplant that element, if it be conceded as ever included within the definition of an "accident."

If it were true that in certain cases the word "accident" denotes both the cause and its effect, while generally it means the loss or hurt without including in its content any reference to the cause thereof, there is reason for this distinction. This is well exemplified in the considerations which form the foundation for measuring the liability of the insurer.

er in accident insurance policies, and indemnity policies, respectively.

There is a clear distinction between an insurance against accidents which may happen to the insured, and one indemnifying him against loss for injuries which he may wrongfully cause to others. The former, in so far as fixing liability is concerned, clearly involves an inquiry into the intention, and care exercised by the insured, and his part in producing the event from which the loss occurs. The insurer would not agree to pay the insured for a loss which was intentionally caused by the insured himself. It is understood that the insured in such cases must be free from blame and wrongdoing, but in an indemnity contract the opposite is true. There, the contract contemplates reimbursement of the assured by the insurer of loss sustained as a consequence of the latter being required to pay a third party for injuries inflicted upon said third party or his property. Of course, this necessarily involves a recognition of the fact that the assured was guilty of an act violative of the rights of another, so as to create a liability for damages to that other. In such a contract the insurer is not concerned with the cause, except as above indicated; and so, when a limit is placed upon his liability for any one accident, the cause is not taken into consideration, but only the event and the loss resulting therefrom to the assured. Hence, aside from the difference in language to which attention has been called, the definition of an "accident" contained in the ordinary accident insurance policy, and decisions construing it, are not necessarily applicable, but, rather, the more general meaning of the word "accident" is to be accepted, which, as stated in Fenton v. Thorley, etc., Limited, [1903] A. C. 443, is an unintended and unexpected occurrence which produces hurt or loss apart from its cause. Under this definition it is clear that there were two accidents in the instant case.

Nor is the application of the ordinarily accepted meaning of the word "accident," arising under Workmen's Compensation Acts, due to any peculiar phraseology of such acts. It is true that in construing these statutes the courts have said that their language should be given a broad interpretation, but in so stating no exception is made, but rather the general rule is recognized. Substantially the same thing has been said by the courts of various states in construing indemnity insurance policies founded upon contracts having nothing to do with Workmen's Compensation Acts; that is, in interpreting such indemnity policies it has repeatedly been held that they are to be liberally construed with a view to providing fair protection to the insured, and that in all such instances words are to be given their ordinary and accepted meaning, which is all that the Workmen's Compensation Act decisions have done in defining the word "accident." Alabama Fidelity, etc., Co.

v. Alabama Penny Sav. Bank, 76 So. 103, 200 Ala. 337; Murray v. Kaskaskia Live Stock Ins. Co., 204 Ill. App. 568.

But it would seem that all doubt upon this subject should be removed by the decision of the Supreme Court of Nebraska in Chapin v. Ocean Accident & Guar. Corp., Limited, 147 N. W. 465, 96 Neb. 213, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 227, which, like the instant case, involved an indemnity insurance contract, and in which, referring to an accident, it is said:

"The word 'accident' is susceptible of and has received many definitions, varying with the connection in which it is used. It is: 'An event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation; an undesigned, sudden, and unexpected event; chance; contingency; often, an undesigned and unforeseen occurrence of an afflictive or unfortunate character; casualty; mishap; as, to die by an accident.' Webster's New International Dict. In the Century Dictionary, among the definitions given are: '2. Specifically, an undesirable or unfortunate happening; an undesigned harm or injury; a casualty or mishap.' As used in an indemnity policy such as this, we are of opinion that the word 'accident' means an undesigned and unforeseen occurrence of an afflictive or unfortunate character resulting in bodily injury to a person other than the insured."

In an attempt to distinguish the case of Staffordshire Tramways Co., Limited, v. Sickness & Accident Assurance Ass'n, Limited, from the one before us, the foregoing opinion argues that the fact that the indemnity contract sued on used the word "accidents" rather than "accident" in a certain context caused the court to hold that there had been two accidents in that case. The provision quoted from the Tramways Company Case is:

"So far as regards claims for personal injury and damage to property made against the assured in respect of accidents caused by vehicles * * * belonging to the assured * * * for which accidents the assured shall be liable, the association shall pay the assured the sum of £250 in respect of any one accident."

The meaning of this statement seems to me to be clearly just this: That as distinguished from the subject-matter of the rest of the policy, upon the point of "accidents caused by vehicles belonging to the assured," the insurer's liability should be especially limited as therein specified. The quoted language merely designates the subject of this particular clause in the contract. No other intention was indicated as intended to be conveyed, nor does the opinion in the Tramways Company Case contain any language signifying that the court rendering it ascribed any different or special meaning to the provision because of the fact that the word "accidents" is used in plural form than would have resulted if the same idea had been expressed by its use in the singular, which of course could just as well have been done. There is nothing in the opinion under discussion, or in the wording of the policy, to even remotely suggest that the word "accidents" in plural form preceding "accident" was intended to denote that the accidents in question should occur at any one time rather than upon disconnected occasions. The Tramways Company Case is one in which the facts are squarely on all fours with those of that before this court. In the former it was definitely held that upon such facts two accidents, and not one, had occurred; and in so holding the court doubtless fully appreciated the significance of the words construed, quite possibly the more fully because of the brevity of the opinion, which will be quoted later. Others may disagree with the conclusion reached, but the facts of that case cannot be distinguished from those of the instant one. And this is of double importance because like the policy being construed here, the other was one in which the insurer bound itself as surety against the results of wrongful acts of the assured causing injuries to others persons. These cases constitute complete parallels in point of fact, and I am convinced that the court's rulings should be the same.

Although there appears no ambiguity in either the provision above discussed nor in the opinion of the court in the Tramways Company Case, my interpretation of both is strengthened by the opinion in Allen v. London Guarantee & Accident Co., Limited, 28 T. L. R. 254. My learned associates lay stress upon the fact that in the last-named case it was held that there had been but one occurrence, which to my mind is merely an "incident to" the accidents. They ignore the important part of the decision in so far as the instant case is concerned, namely, that there were two accidents. The facts in the case of Allen v. London Guarantee & Accident Co., Limited, supra, were: The defendants assured Allen against accidents caused by his employees when in charge of his horse-drawn vehicles. Two men, Turner and Ridsdale, were injured by a cart driven by one of the assured's drivers. It was found as a fact that the cart struck Turner, who in turn was thrown against Ridsdale, and both men fell and were injured. Each brought suit against the assured for damages. It was held that, although there were two accidents, there was only one occurrence, within the meaning of the policy, and that therefore the defendants' limit of £300 liability applied. The policy provided that the total aggregate liability of the company was to be limited to the sum of £300 for all claims for compensation, costs, charges, and expenses, paid or payable either to the insured or to any claimant or any number of claimants, in respect of or arising out of any one accident or occurrence. This decision goes so far as to be a precedent for holding that, even in the supposititious case of one car being towed by another and both being injured, there would be two accidents. It limits the consideration of the question to that of the event of the injury provided such event was unexpected and unforeseen, and it is so decisive and unequivocal as to preclude the idea of harmonizing it with a holding that there was but one accident in the instant case.

There appears to be no foundation for the idea that the word "accident" is used by business men in a different sense than as defined in the cases whose definitions have been quoted, and others to which reference might be made, containing language of like import. It goes without saying that such cases involved the construction of an insurance contract made in the world of business. In each it was held that the word in question is ordinarily understood to mean an undesigned and unforeseen occurrence resulting in injury. It may well be that in some indemnity contracts the parties expressly or by necessary inference have stipulated that by their use of the word they intended to denote a general catastrophe which might include injury to more than one person. This affords no proof that the word is generally used in the realm of business in that particular sense. It is a matter so generally known as to justify courts in taking judicial knowledge of it that insurance companies write their policies in a great number of forms with the distinct purpose of satisfying the public, who desire insurance against risks of every character. But we need not go beyond cases cited in the opinion of my learned associates, for instances where contracts entered into in ordinary transactions between business men were so worded that courts of last resort held that the word "accident" employed therein denoted not a general catastrophe, but a particular event or occurrence. Such were the cases of Allen v. London Guarantee & Accident Co., Limited, 28 T. L. R. 254; Staffordshire Tramways Co., Limited, v. Sickness & Accident Assurance Ass'n, Limited, supra, and Chapin v. Ocean Accident & Guaranty Corp., Limited, supra. The first two of the cases last enumerated contained provisions worded similarly to that under consideration in the instant case, whereas this is not true of the policies which formed the basis of the suits in Klein v. Liability Assurance Corp., 9 Ohio App. 241; McClung v. Penn. Taximeter Cab Co., 25 Pa. Dist. R. 583; and Capelle v. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 120 A. 556, 80 N. H. 481. Our own Supreme Court has repeatedly stated its view of the meaning popularly assigned to the term "accident" to be the same as that announced in Fenton v. Thorley, etc., Limited, supra, in which it is said:

"The expression 'accident' is used in the public and ordinary sense of the word as denoting an unlooked for event which is not expected nor intended." Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York v. Industrial Accident Commission, 171 P. 429, 177 Cal. 614, 617, L. R. A. 1918F, 856 [citing Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 151 P. 398, 170 Cal. 686; Southwestern Surety Ins. Co. v. Pillsbury, 158 P. 762, 172 Cal. 769].

Adverting now particularly to the contention of appellant that the single act or omission of the driver of the Marmon could not cause two simultaneous "accidents" within the proper interpretation of the phrase limiting liability to $1,000 for loss or injury arising "from one accident," if there was a causal connection between the two collisions, the question presented is as to whether or not respondent's assignor was insured against damage to all other persons collectively to the extent of $1,000 only, if damaged by a single mishap, or against each just and valid claim of one or more persons to whose individual property or person separate and distinct accidents might occur as a direct result of the operation of respondent's automobile.

A pertinent illustration of a case which would exclude liability is Kangas v. Standard Accident Insurance Co., 165 N. W. 268, 138 Minn. 418, L. R. A. 1918B, 504, wherein it was said:

"For instance, if, when the plaintiff was drawn underneath the passing train, a car wheel had passed over his hand thereby severing his four fingers, one at a time, could it be said that the event constituted four accidents and four distinct injuries to his body?"

Had the Cadillac machine had four parts broken by this collision and had a separate claim been made for each, the situation presented would have been similar to that in the case last cited. I am in entire accord with the holding of the Minnesota court that the loss of all the fingers of a man's left hand would in such a case constitute but one accident within the contemplation of the policy of insurance there under consideration. But in the instant case each of two automobiles, in no way interrelated, and owned by different persons, suffered an accident as a consequence of negligence in the management of the Marmon car, which was insured against the liability of its owner for injury to another. True, there was but one incident which superinduced the successive impacts, but as a result of the Marmon leaving its proper course, the Overland was damaged "from one accident" and the Cadillac suffered damage "from one accident." The policy did not stipulate a maximum of liability to the extent of $1,000 for all damage resulting from one proximate cause; it limited the liability "with respect to claims * * * from one accident."

Mention has been made of Southern Staffordshire Tramways Co., Limited, v. Sickness & Accident Assurance Association, Limited, 60 L. J. Q. B. 47, 63 L. T. 807, [1891] 1 Q. B. 402, 55 J. P. 168, in which the English Court of Appeal construed a similar policy of insurance. No clearer exposition of the principle involved and which is applicable in the case at bar can be made then by recounting in some detail the facts of that case, and quoting from the opinions of the justices therein. The Tramways Company was insured against personal injuries, and damage to property, caused by its vehicles, in the sum of £250 "in respect of any one accident." One of the plaintiff's tramcars overturned, injuring 40 persons, as a result of which the Tramways Company sought to collect insurance under said policy for each of the several casualties up to the full amount for which it was indemnified, and "for which the assured shall be liable." One of the questions presented at the trial was "whether the injury caused to each of the said persons constituted a separate accident within the meaning of the policy." Of the two justices hearing the case, one ruled that "any one accident" should be construed to mean that "apart from any question of the number or amount of the claims made in consequence on the insured, as between them and the insurers, such an event as that which happened on November 24, 1888," constituted ground for liability as to but one claimant. The other justice said:

"As to the second question, the meaning of 'accident' in the phrase 'any one accident,' I regret to say that I differ from him. It is, I think, to be borne in mind that the object of the policy is to provide for the assured an indemnity against claims made upon them for injuries resulting from the negligence of their servants. This being so, I think it more appropriate to hold that the preceding word, 'accidents,' is used from the point of view of the several claimants upon the assured for injuries, each of whom claims in respect of a specific accident to himself, and not from that of the insurers, and that therefore 'any one accident' means any accident to any one claimant upon the insured. 'Any claim' would have been a less ambiguous expression. I think, therefore, that the defendants are liable in the full amount; but, as my learned brother is not of this opinion, I withdraw my judgment."

The case was thereupon taken to the Court of Appeal, wherein Lord Esher, M. R., said:

"I think the construction of the policy tolerably clear. The assurance is expressed to be 'as regards claims for personal injury and damage to property made against the assured in respect of accidents caused by vehicles.' These were claims for personal injury, i. e., injury to the person, and each person injured claimed for injuries in respect of an accident to his person caused by a vehicle. If several persons were injured, I think, upon the true construction of this policy, there were several accidents. I agree with the view expressed by Lawrence, J. For these reasons I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for the larger amount, and therefore the appeal must be allowed."

The other two justices concurred, each writing an individual opinion to the same effect.

Regarding the matter from the standpoint of the assured in his relation to a particular damaged car, the injury to the car constituted an accident, and a single one. It makes no difference how many other cars might have been damaged at the time by the same cause; there was one accident which caused the harm to this particular car. Regardless of the number of claims that might exist, all arising from the injury to that car, the greatest amount which the insurance company was obligated to pay for injuries to it would be $1,000. I think the policy is clearly intended to be viewed in this way, and, in that light, each car injured in the same general accident would, for the purposes of this contract, be regarded as having been the victim of its own accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by the C. O. Bashaw Company against the A. U. Pinkham Company, Inc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Perry Evans, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Norman A. Eisner, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment awarding plaintiff damages in the sum of $731.50 and costs for an alleged breach of contract for the sale of peanuts.

It appears that on September 7, 1923, C. O. Bashaw Company, the respondent, with offices in San Francisco, agreed to buy from A. U. Pinkham Company, the appellant, which operates in Seattle, 770 bags of Chinese shelled peanuts in bond to be delivered out of a warehouse in Seattle. The sale was negotiated through a brokerage firm in San Francisco named Lillenthal-Williams Company, hereinafter referred to as agents, and it was stipulated during the trial that all communications from said agents to respondent be considered as communications from appellant, and that all communications from said agents to appellant be likewise considered as communications from respondent. Respondent agreed to buy said peanuts after having examined samples drawn by Laucks & Co., public inspectors and industrial chemists in Seattle, from part of the lot sold, a few weeks prior to the date of the sale, while the peanuts lay on the dock at Seattle before being placed in the warehouse. After respondent agreed to buy the peanuts, the agents, on September 8, 1923, acting under authority from respondent, telegraphed appellant to draw on respondent against negotiable warehouse receipt for the agreed price. Pursuant to these instructions, appellant, about a week later, through a San Francisco bank, tendered a warehouse receipt calling for the delivery of the peanuts, accompanied by a draft representing the amount of the purchase price, and demanded payment. Respondent did not pay the draft at that time, however, upon the ground that before accepting delivery it was entitled to make an inspection of the peanuts in bulk in the warehouse at Seattle, to ascertain whether they conformed to the quality of the samples previously examined. After waiting until September 25, 1923, for respondent to make such inspection and to accept or reject the peanuts, during which time much correspondence passed between the interested parties, as will hereinafter appear, appellant canceled the sale. Respondent thereupon commenced this action for damages.

The decision of the trial court in respondent's favor was evidently based upon the proposition that, although respondent had approved the samples previously submitted and had authorized appellant to draw upon it for the payment of the purchase price, it was entitled, under the law, within a reasonable time thereafter to make an inspection of the bulk of the peanuts in the warehouse before accepting and paying for the same. In this regard the court found that respondent had used reasonable effort to obtain such inspection prior to the cancellation of the sale.

[1] Appellant contends that the transaction constituted a sale by sample, and that the contract was so interpreted by respondent when it authorized appellant to draw upon it on tender of a warehouse receipt; that therefore, under the law pertaining to such sales, respondent was entitled to inspect the goods for comparison either at the time of delivery or within a reasonable time thereafter, but not before, and, as a condition precedent to such inspection, was obliged to pay the draft upon its presentation, receive the goods, and thereafter to reject the same if they proved to be inferior to the samples submitted. The position taken by respondent is that the transaction did not amount to the ordinary sale by sample because representative samples of the subject-matter of the sale were never submitted, those approved being drawn from only part of the lot sold and being taken while the peanuts were on the dock some weeks previous to the sale; that consequently respondent was entitled to inspect the bulk of the goods in the warehouse before paying for the same in order to ascertain if they were of the quality represented by the samples submitted and approved. Puritas Coffee Co. v. De Martini, 56 Cal. App. 628, 206 P. 96; Newmark & Co. v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 339, 146 P. 1064; Civ. Code, §§ 1766 and 1785. Respondent concedes, however, that it was required to exercise such right of inspection and to either accept or reject the goods within a reasonable time after the same were tendered. It would therefore appear that, aside from the legal question involved, if it be shown by the evidence that respondent failed to exercise such right within a reasonable time after tender, appellant was justified in canceling the sale and respondent should not recover.

[2, 3] What is a reasonable time is usually a question of fact and must be determined from all the circumstances of the individual case, but where the facts are not disputed or the matter can be ascertained from the language of the contract, it may be determined as a matter of law. 2 Mechem on Sales, §§ 1129 and 1132. In mercantile contracts it is generally held that the parties have intended to make time the essence (Jensen v. Goss, 39 Cal. App. 427, 179 P. 225; Coats & Williamson, Inc., v. Moran & Co., 67 Cal. App. 46, 227 P. 213; Condley v. Consolidated Lumber Co., 53 Cal. App. 8, 200 P. 69; 13 Corp. Jur. 688); and the same is true where the character of the property is likely to fluctuate in value (6 Cal. Jur. 356).

The evidence without conflict established these essential facts: That respondent approved the samples on September 7, 1923; that on the day following it agreed to purchase the peanuts and authorized appellant to draw on it against negotiable warehouse receipt. It further shows that at the latest the bulk of the peanuts was tendered on September 17, 1923, but that respondent made no effort to obtain an inspection thereof until September 21, 1923, when it telegraphed Laucks & Co. to make such inspection; that notwithstanding respondent received reports from said company after tender and prior to cancellation to the effect that the peanuts tendered compared favorably with the samples approved, it did not up to and including the morning of September 25 indicate to appellant whether it was going to accept or reject said peanuts, but, on the contrary, at that time wired Laucks & Co. instructions to make other and more elaborate tests which necessarily would have required additional delay. In the meantime, the evidence shows, appellant, having acquired the peanuts from the importer thereof, was repeatedly demanding that respondent either accept or reject the peanuts and warning respondent that unless it acted at once in the matter the sale would be canceled, stating in this connection that at that particular time the market was strong and the supply of peanuts limited.

The evidence upon this subject consisted entirely of correspondence, and was as follows: After examining and approving the samples on September 7, 1923, respondent, through said agents, wired appellant that it "definitely confirms and accepts" said peanuts, and on the following day, September 8, 1923, authorized appellant to draw on it against negotiable warehouse receipt. The draft and the warehouse receipt were tendered at the latest on September 17th. The following day, September 18th, appellant, being advised by its bank that respondents had refused to pay the draft unless it received a "weight and quality certificate," wired the agents that it would adjust on basis of "net reweights when loaded out," and demanded immediate payment of the draft. Replying, the agents wired on September 19th that respondent was not refusing the draft, but felt that it should "have Laucks' certificate or sample drawn by Laucks from seven hundred and seventy bag lot," and in a second telegram sent to appellant on the same day stated that respondent wanted a "letter guaranteeing outturn weights and weighing charges * * * also letter from Laucks or certificate guaranteeing lot as sample sent." The telegram concluded: "Please mail eight pounds for samples from eight sacks." Appellant replied immediately by telegraph direct to respondent guaranteeing to "make adjustment basis net reweights when peanuts loaded out," and to assume weighing charges; and after calling attention to the terms of their contract concluded:

"We insist immediate payment of draft accordance of agreement otherwise will cancel. Will not hold up this lot any longer. Peanuts worth fifty cents more than purchase price turned down many orders last week account no supply available please advise Lilienthal definitely accepting or declining."

Appellant also on the same day advised the agents by wire of the contents of its telegram to respondent and added, "We depend on you to settle this matter definitely today and have draft paid before close of banking hours otherwise will cancel." The next day, September 20th, Laucks & Co., telegraphed the agents that in their opinion the remainder of the lot of peanuts from which the previous samples had been taken were of the "same quality when inspected thirty days ago," which telegram was accompanied by one from appellant stating that the Laucks telegram "should be sufficient guarantee" to protect respondent, and stating further:

"We absolutely demand that Bashaw pay our draft before three o'clock today otherwise we cancel depend on you to see this done. As regards sample drawn Laucks showing inspection pier fourteen this original import dock, but peanuts immediately moved to * * * cold storage which to Bashaw advantage insuring peanuts same condition today as thirty days ago."

Respondent, in answer to appellant's telegram of September 19th, wrote appellant a letter dated September 20th claiming that the sample approved by them was not identified with the lot of peanuts tendered, and requesting appellant to "furnish samples of these 770 bags or Laucks' quality certificate to cover," and the next day, September 21, 1923, respondent took the first definite step toward obtaining an inspection of the peanuts by wiring Laucks & Co. to "inspect entire lot wire if identical with samples you sent per your telegram of September twentieth to Lilienthal Williams." At the same time respondent requested a firm in Seattle named Byrnes & Co. to obtain samples and to turn the same over to one Jensen for the purpose of having Jensen wire his opinion as to quality; but as early as September 4th appellant notified the agents that Jensen, being a competitor of theirs with whom they had had some previous difficulty, would not be allowed to pass on the quality of any of its goods. On this same day, September 21st, appellant for a third time wired and also wrote to the agents, complaining of the delay, declaring that they were "disgusted with the whole matter," and that unless payment was made that day the bank would be instructed to return the draft and "forget the matter." On September 22d, Laucks & Co., in response to respondent's request made on the previous day, again assured respondent as to the quality of the peanuts, stating in their telegram:

"Pinkham peanuts total seven hundred forty-seven bags samples taken today compare favorable with samples sent September fourth. * * *"

Regarding the additional 23 bags necessary to complete the order, appellant wired the agents on that same day:

"In order avoid necessity returning invoice and draft advise Bashaw we guarantee excess twenty three bags same seven forty seven. Warehouse receipt attached to draft covers seven hundred seventy bags and quality is uniform. Now after all this trouble see that our draft is paid Monday without fail. * * *"

Even then respondent did not indicate whether it would or would not accept the peanuts, and instead of paying the draft, telegraphed Laucks & Co. two days later, September 24th, as follows:

"Wire us correct percentage of splits and spots and if sound merchantable quality free from vermin mold and rancidity. Mail certificate confirming wire guaranteeing contents."

On the following morning, September 25th, appellant evidently believing, as it had stated in one of its previous communications, that respondent was "stalling," canceled the sale, saying in its letter of cancellation to respondent that, "when Laucks called on us this morning for a permit to reinspect so that they could make five or six different tests, draw samples, etc., we were through." Following the cancellation of the sale, Laucks & Co. wired respondent on September 25th the result of its inspection, and the next day wrote respondent a letter confirming its report. The samples taken were sent to respondent by parcel post. Nothing further transpired until October 1, 1923, at which time respondent sent appellant a telegram as follows:

"Have now had opportunity inspect and compare peanuts same don't equal Laucks first sample but to avoid further trouble will dismiss action and pay draft. Please wire bank authorization deliver merchandise receipt on payment of draft."

In addition to the evidence above set forth it was shown that C. O. Bashaw, the president of the respondent company, with whom this business was transacted, was an experienced trader, having been engaged in the business of importing and exporting of peanuts for about 14 years.

[4] It therefore appears from the evidence without dispute that respondent, after tender of the peanuts, delayed four days before making any effort to obtain an inspection of the same, and, although it received two favorable reports afterwards from its inspectors as to the quality of the goods, did not indicate up to the morning of September

25th, which was eight days after the tender, whether it would accept or reject the goods, but at that time made arrangements for the taking of other samples and the making of further tests which would of necessity consume additional time. In view of these facts and considering the subject-matter of the sale in connection with the circumstances relating to the condition of the market, we think the conclusion inevitable that respondent did not exercise its right of acceptance of the goods within a reasonable time, and that therefore appellant was justified in canceling the sale. It follows that the finding of the trial court upon this issue cannot be sustained.

[5] True, after tender of the goods on September 17th, respondent requested certain certificates or guaranties as to quality, but, construing the contract most strongly against appellant, there was no duty imposed upon the latter to furnish them. After having tendered the goods in accordance with respondent's directions, which tender carried with it an implied warranty that the bulk was equal in quality to the samples (Civ. Code, § 1766), appellant was relieved of any further duty in the matter.

The judgment is reversed.

RAPP v. FRED W. HAUGER MOTORS CO.
et al. (Civ. 5044.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 12, 1926.)

1. Estoppel ⇨119.

Estoppel is a fact question.

2. Estoppel ⇨75—When true owner holds out or allows another to appear as owner or as having full power to dispose of automobile, innocent person thus led into dealing with such other will be protected (Civ. Code, §§ 1142, 2991).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1142, 2991, where true owner holds out or allows another to appear as owner or as having full power to dispose of automobile, innocent third party thus led into dealing with such other will be protected, and his rights do not depend on actual title or authority of party with whom he deals.

3. Estoppel ⇨75—Owner delivering automobile with indorsed certificate of registration, to automobile sales company for purpose of sale estopped to dispute its title and power as against pledgee to whom it exhibited indorsed certificate.

Where automobile sales company, at time of pledging car as security for note, had possession thereof with certificate of registration, on which true owner had indorsed transfer of title to enable company to dispose of it, and there was substantial evidence that indorsed certificate was exhibited to pledgee and was instrumental in inducing him to believe that company was owner, finding that owner was estopped to dispute company's title or power of disposition as against pledgee was justified.

4. Estoppel ⇨117—Whether automobile sales company in possession of car and certificate of registration indorsed by owner at time of pledging it obtained or had possession thereof on prior dates held immaterial on issue of owner's estoppel to dispute its title and power of disposition.

Where automobile sales company had possession of automobile with certificate of registration, on which owner had indorsed transfer of title, when it pledged car as security for note, it was immaterial, on issue of owner's estoppel to dispute company's title and power of disposition as against pledgee, whether it obtained or had possession thereof on dates of bill of sale and subsequent conditional contract of sale to it.

5. Pledges ⇨9, 24.

Pre-existing debt constituted valid consideration for pledge of automobile as security for note, and pledgee's rights were superior to those of owner intrusting car to pledgor under circumstances showing apparent ownership in latter.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Francis T. Rapp against the Fred W. Hauger Motors Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene F. Conlin, of San Francisco (Fred C. Hutchinson, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant.

P. A. Bergerot and A. P. Dessouslavy, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff, Francis T. Rapp, brought this action in claim and delivery to recover possession of an automobile or its value. He was denied the relief prayed for in his complaint, and a judgment for damages in the sum of $1,500 was awarded against him and in favor of defendant J. A. Nougue, from whose possession the automobile in question was taken and subsequently sold subject to the replevin proceedings. Plaintiff has appealed, and urges as principal ground for reversal that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings or the judgment.

At the time the transactions hereinafter mentioned occurred the corporate defendant Fred W. Hauger Motors Company, was handling the San Francisco sales agency for Stearns-Knight automobiles, Fred W. Hauger being the president of said company and conducting the negotiations between the interested parties. Rapp was the owner of a

1920 model touring automobile of the manufacture mentioned, and on March 17, 1921, entered into a written contract with the defendant motors company for the purchase of a new automobile, a 1921 model of said manufacture, for the sum of $3,125, the motors company agreeing to accept Rapp's old model as a payment of $2,450 on the purchase price. Pursuant to this contract Rapp executed and delivered to the motors company a bill of sale of the old model, but, pending the arrival and delivery to him of the new one, was allowed to use the old model after certain repairs had been made thereto and new tires supplied by the motors company. On July 26, 1921, at Hauger's suggestion, a new arrangement was made whereby title to the old model was retransferred by said company to Rapp by means of a bill of sale, and thereupon two conditional sales contracts were entered into between the parties. One of them was for the purchase of the old automobile by the motors company for the sum of $2,450, the receipt of $1,000 being acknowledged, and the balance of $1,450 made payable in monthly installments of $145 each; the other was for the purchase of the new automobile by Rapp for the sum of $3,125, the receipt of $1,000 being acknowledged and the balance made payable in equal monthly installments of $212.50. The new car was delivered to Rapp about September 1, 1921, at which time he surrendered the old one to the motors company with the admitted understanding that it was to be sold by said company. In this connection the conditional sales contract provided that "if the above car is sold by purchaser (motors company), balance of purchase price to be due and payable forthwith." Up to the time the automobiles were exchanged the motors company had paid two installments of $145 each on the purchase price of the old one. On September 12, 1921, at Hauger's request, and in order to facilitate the sale of the old car, Rapp signed the printed indorsement of transfer of title appearing on the reverse side of the certificate of registration issued by the state motor vehicle department and delivered said certificate to the motors company. Said indorsement was in the following form: "Indorsement of transfer with application for re-registration. The undersigned registered owner of this automobile has transferred to the undersigned buyer, with the consent of the legal owner, his interest therein." Rapp, also as legal owner, signed the written consent to said transfer. The automobile in question continued to remain in the possession of the motors company until October 28, 1921, at which time said company executed a bill of sale and transferred the possession thereof to the defendant Nougue to secure the payment of a promissory note executed by the motors company on September 16, 1921, said note having been secured previously by the pledge of another automobile which the motors company had disposed of. During the negotiations between the motors company and Nougue, the motors company exhibited to Nougue, as evidence of ownership, the indorsed certificate of registration showing the transfer of title to said company; also the bill of sale of March 17, 1921, from Rapp to said company. During the following month, November, 1921, Nougue obtained possession of said indorsed certificates and attached his name thereto as second buyer. Upon the delivery of the car to Nougue on September 16, 1921, it was removed by him to his private garage, where it was kept until about December 10, 1921. It was then seized under process issued in this action and subsequently sold by the sheriff for the sum of $1,000. The value of the car when seized, according to the allegations of the complaint and as found by the court, was $1,500, for which amount Nougue was given judgment.

The defendant Nougue pleaded an estoppel, and the trial court based its judgment in his favor on the issue raised by that defense, having found with respect thereto that "said plaintiff is estopped as against defendant J. A. Nougue from claiming the title to or the right to possession of said automobile."

[1] The question of the existence of an estoppel is one of fact. Parke v. Francis, 228 P. 435, 194 Cal 284; Di Nola v. Allison, 76 P. 976, 143 Cal. 106, 65 L. R. A. 419, 101 Am. St. Rep. 84. The important question presented for determination therefore is whether the evidence is sufficient to support the trial court's finding as to the estoppel. We are of the opinion that it is.

[2] Section 2991 of the Civil Code provides that "one who has allowed another to assume the apparent ownership of property for the purpose of making any transfer of it, cannot set up his own title, to defeat a pledge of the property, made by the other, to a pledgee who received the property in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and for value"; and section 1142 of the same Code declares that "Where the possession of personal property, together with a power to dispose thereof, is transferred by its owner to another person, an executed sale by the latter, while in possession, to a buyer in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, for value, transfers to such buyer the title of the former owner, though he may be entitled to rescind, and does rescind the transfer made by him." Agreeable to the legal principles stated in these Code sections, it has been held in a number of cases involving sales or pledges of automobiles by persons clothed with indicia of ownership that, where the true owner holds out another or allows him to appear as the owner of or as having full power of disposition over the property, and an innocent third person is thus led into dealing with him, the rights of the innocent person will be protected; that under such circumstances the true owner can neither legally nor equitably complain or maintain a cause of action against the innocent party for the obvious reason that he himself has put it within the power of the apparent owner to dispose of the property. Anglo-California Trust Co. v. Pacific Acceptance Corp. (Cal. App.) 232 P. 489; Chucovich v. S. F. Securities Corp., 214 P. 263, 60 Cal. App. 700; Parke v. Franciscus, supra; Carter v. Rowley, 211 P. 267, 59 Cal. App. 486; Stukey v. Mihara (Cal. App.) 234 P. 919; Sidney v. Wilson, 227 P. 672, 67 Cal. App. 282. It is furthermore held that the rights of the innocent party do not depend upon the actual title or authority of the party with whom he deals directly, but are derived from the act of the real owner, which precludes him from disputing, as against the innocent party, the existence of the title or power which, through negligence or mistaken confidence, he has caused or allowed to be vested in the party making the sale. Sidney v. Wilson, supra; Carpy v. Dowdell, 47 P. 695, 115 Cal. 677; Fowles v. National Bank of California, 140 P. 271, 167 Cal. 653; Brewster v. Sime, 42 Cal. 139; 10 Cal. Jur. 641.

[3] We believe that the facts of the instant case have been brought clearly within the legal principles above stated, and that the cases cited are decisive herein upon the question of estoppel. Even assuming, as appellant contends, that the motors company wrongfully exhibited to Nougue as evidence of ownership the bill of sale dated March 17, 1921, which appellant claims was superseded by the later transaction of July 26, 1921, the legal situation is not changed for the reason that, aside from the matter of said bill of sale, the motors company, at the time it pledged the car with Nougue, was clothed with indicia of ownership by having possession of said automobile along with the certificate of registration upon which appellant had duly indorsed a transfer of title. Appellant admitted while testifying that the purpose of the delivery of the automobile and of the indorsed certificate of registration to the motors company was to vest in said company the power to dispose of the automobile; and there is substantial evidence to show that the indorsed certificate was exhibited to Nougue by the motors company at the time he accepted the automobile as a pledge, and was instrumental in inducing him to believe that the motors company was the owner of the property about to be pledged. This evidence, when considered along with the other circumstances mentioned, was sufficient to justify the application of the doctrine of estoppel.

[4] Appellant also attacks the findings of the trial court to the effect that said automobile was delivered to the motors company on March 17, 1921, and was in its possession on July 26, 1921, upon the ground that neither finding is supported by the evidence. As already pointed out, the rights of an innocent party do not depend upon the actual title of the party with whom they deal directly, but are grounded upon the acts and conduct of the real owner in clothing such party with apparent ownership. Sidney v. Wilson, supra. The evidence proves without conflict that on October 28, 1921, at the time of the Nougue transaction, the motors company had possession of said car under circumstances showing apparent ownership, and therefore it would seem to be immaterial whether or not the motors company obtained or had possession of the automobile on either of the prior dates mentioned.

[5] The pre-existing debt from the motors company to Nougue constituted a valid consideration for the pledge, and it follows that by reason of the validity thereof Nougue became a pledgee for value, with rights superior to those of appellant, who had intrusted the property to the pledgor. Fowles v. National Bank of California, supra; Smitton v. McCullough, 189 P. 686, 182 Cal. 530; Grange v. Judah Boas Co., 213 P. 712, 60 Cal. App. 484, 492.

The remaining points urged by appellant relate merely to the main ones already disposed of, and therefore do not require discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

CRAIG, J. On or about April 14, 1921, it was agreed by a contract in writing "between Dr. Thos. T. De Vaughn, * * * and J. V. Spaugh, * * * hereinafter designated as party of the first part, and J. T. Payne, architectural engineer, * * * as party of the second part," that the latter should "make all necessary plans and specifications, supervise the bids from subcontractors, and supervise the construction of the proposed new class C theatre and office building," which the parties of the first part, appellants herein, contemplated having erected. It was also stipulated that respondent's compensation for such services should be 4 per centum of the total cost of the building, but that, should the owners fail to negotiate a loan for the purpose of constructing the building, or decide not to build, they should pay respondent $200 "for his sketches and services."

Respondent prepared and furnished to appellants an original sketch and plans and specifications for a building, and received from them on account of such services the sum of $100. Thereafter appellants entered into a contract with one Zeller, who procured a loan for them, and prepared other and different plans and specifications, and a theater building was erected in accordance therewith. Respondent was not permitted to fulfill his part of the contract in suit—the reasons for which we need not recite—and he instituted this action for the sum of $1,072, alleged balance of commissions due under the terms of the contract.

Respondent testified at the trial that, although he had been preparing plans and specifications and supervising construction work for about ten years, and was "doing it every day," he did not have, and had never had, a license from the state board of architecture, as required by the Act of 1903, p. 522. From his testimony it is clear that he not only did not have such license, but that he did not intend to obtain one.

The trial court found that the building was erected at a total cost of $23,000; that the defendants refused to permit the plaintiff to supervise the bids or the erection of the building; that the reasonable value of the services performed by the plaintiff was $575, $475 of which remained unpaid, and gave judgment for the latter amount.

The defendants appealed from the judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial. The principal ground of attack upon the judgment is that, since respondent had no license, and did not inform the appellants that he was not an architect within the meaning of the statute, the contract was illegal and void.

The act in question (Act to Regulate the Practice of Architecture, March 23, 1901, p. 641, Amended Stats. 1903, p. 522), provides, in part, as follows:

"After the expiration of six months from the passage of this act, it shall be unlawful, and it shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by fine of not less than fifty dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, for any person to practice architecture without a certificate in this state, or to advertise, or put out any sign or card, or other device which might indicate to the public that he was an architect; provided, that nothing in this act shall prevent any person from making plans for his own buildings, nor furnishing plans or other data for buildings for other persons, provided the person so furnishing such plans or data shall fully inform the person for whom such plans or data are furnished, that he, the person furnishing such plans, is not a certified architect." Section 5, St. 1901, p. 644.

[1-3] It is urged on behalf of the respondent that, since he at no time represented himself to be an architect, but only an architectural engineer, he did not violate the statute above quoted. The idea seems to be that, unless it appears that he violated every provision of the law in question, the mere fact that he transgressed one of its inhibitions is of no consequence. But for any person to practice architecture in this state without a certificate is made a misdemeanor, and this regardless of whether or not he may also have held himself out to the public or to any person as an architect. Under this statute there is but one way in which a person who has no certificate can legally render such architectural services as were to be performed by respondent. Such person can "inform the person for whom such plans or data are furnished that he, the person furnishing such plans, is not a certified architect." Therefore, if it be shown that the respondent practiced architecture, the burden is clearly upon him to prove that he brought himself within the exception just quoted by giving the appellant the required information. It is not contended that the respondent did this. Under such circumstances the task of the court is a simple one. It is merely to decide whether or not the work contracted to be performed constituted practicing architecture. The rule which brings one within the classification of "architect" has been declared in various jurisdictions. In every instance where the term has arisen for interpretation, so far as we are able to ascertain, it has been held that one who makes plans and specifications for a building, and superintends its construction, is an "architect." In fact, the rule most commonly applied does not embrace the duty of supervision. Wilson & Edwards v. City Council of Greenville, 43 S. E. 966, 65 S. C. 426; Turner v. Haar, 21 S. W. 737, 114 Mo. 335; People v. Lower, 96 N. E. 346, 251 Ill. 527, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1203; Young v. Bohn (C. C.) 141 F. 471; Louisiana Molasses Co. v. Le Sassier, 28 So. 217, 52 La. Ann. 2070. In Bacigalupi v. Phoenix Bldg. & Constr. Co., 112 P. 892, 14 Cal. App. 632, it was held that, although a person who prepared the plans and specifications was not a professional architect, but was a contractor and builder, yet, having performed such services, he was in that instance the architect. Clearly, the services contracted to be rendered by Payne were those of an architect.

[4] But respondent attempts to avoid the effect of this upon the theory that, although he was the contracting party, prepared the plans and specifications, and agreed to supervise the construction, the contract was legal because he was in reality not the principal architect. However, the latter was not a party to the contract. In Wedgevood v. Jorgens, 157 N. W. 360, 190 Mich. 620, a city ordinance was involved which embodied provisions similar to those contained in the statute here under consideration. It was there said:

"An architect, as defined by the ordinance, employs an unlicensed architect to prepare plans and specifications for one of his clients. Does the rule apply in such a case? We think it does. Plaintiff must have known that, as a builder, contractor, and overseer of construction, he was an architect within the meaning of the ordinance. He knew that he had no license, and he admits that he knew that Krieger, the architect who actually prepared the plans, had no license. Whether plaintiff be regarded as an unlicensed architect, or whether he be regarded as a mere contractor and builder, who knowingly employed an unlicensed architect to do the work, he is barred under the rule from recovering on the contract."

The act here in controversy forbids the practice of architecture by an unlicensed person, and makes it a misdemeanor, although it does not prevent him from furnishing plans or data if he shall first have fully informed the person for whom they are intended that he has not been certified. This latter duty the respondent did not observe.

It has frequently been held that a statute or ordinance requiring the payment of a license and procurement of a certificate to perform the services of an insurance agent, attorney, contractor and builder, freight solicitor, insurance broker, peddler, architect, plumber, real estate agent, or stock breeder, is not to be construed as a revenue law alone, but as a police measure, for the protection of the public, and that a contract of an unlicensed person for the furnishing of such services will not be upheld. Pride v. Commercial Union Ins. Co., 63 So. 803, 9 Ala. App. 334; Hittson v. Browne, 3 Colo. 304; Zimmerman v. Brown, 166 P. 924, 30 Idaho, 640; Hughes v. Dougherty, 62 Ill. App. 464; Draper v. Miller, 140 P. 890, 92 Kan. 275; Harding v. Hagar, 60 Me. 340; Goldsmith v. Mfg. L. Ins. Co., 103 A. 627, 132 Md. 283; Stewartson v. Lothrop, 78 Mass. (12 Gray) 52; Wedgevood v. Jorgens, 157 N. W. 360, 190 Mich. 620; McIver v. Clarke, 10 So. 581, 69 Miss. 408; Johnston v. Dahlgren, 59 N. E. 897, 166 N. Y. 354; Johnson v. Hulings, 103 Pa. 498, 49 Am. Rep. 131. In Levinson v. Boas, 88 P. 825, 150 Cal. 185, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 575, 11 Ann. Cas. 661, our own Supreme Court said:

"It is to be noticed that every case from every court recognizes that when a statute has been made for the protection of the public a contract in violation of its provisions is void."

We conclude that respondent practiced architecture in contravention of the provisions of the act regulating the practice of architecture, and that, therefore, the contract upon which recovery is sought was illegal and void.

The sufficiency of the pleadings and of the evidence adduced upon the trial are questioned, but from the conclusion reached herein it becomes unnecessary to consider them.

The appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is dismissed. The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. CONNORS. (Cr. 882.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 14, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 9, 1926.)

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 171—Instrument constituting essential element of crime must be proved substantially, or frequently precisely, as pleaded.

Where an instrument in writing constitutes gravamen of a cause of action, or an essential element of body of crime, or is alleged to have been specific means by which crime has been committed, such instrument must be proved substantially, or, in many cases, precisely, as it is pleaded.

2. Embracery $\S$ 5½, New, 1926 Current Digest—In prosecution for attempting to influence juror by letter, whether juror received identical letter pleaded held for jury (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1093).

In prosecution for corruptly attempting to influence juror in pending case by sending letter to him, whether juror in question received identical letter pleaded in the indictment held a question for the jury, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1093.

3. Witnesses $\S$ 71—Judge, testifying in case tried before him, abused discretion if his testimony discloses facts without proof of which issue such testimony is designed to support cannot be sustained (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1833).

Generally, a judge is not a competent witness in a case being tried before him, and notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1833, leaving it to discretion of judge, it will be deemed an abuse of such discretion if judge's testimony discloses facts without proof of which the issue such testimony is designed to support cannot be sustained.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 1186(4)—Action of judge in testifying as to lost document held not miscarriage of justice, in view of trifling importance of his testimony and conclusive evidence of defendant's guilt (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1833; Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

Action of judge in voluntarily testifying as a witness merely for purpose of proving by secondary evidence a lost document similar to one set forth in indictment held not, in view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1833, authorizing judge to testify, and Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, to have resulted in miscarriage of justice, in view of trifling importance to people of judge's testimony, and fact that jury would not have reached any other verdict, though judge had not testified.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 655(5)—Judge's remark to accused's counsel, "Make your objection; don't take up so much time in statements," and similar remarks, held not prejudicial misconduct.

Remark of judge to accused's counsel, "Make your objection; don't take up so much time in statements," and acts of similar general character, held not misconduct prejudicial to rights of accused.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 1171(1)—District attorney's reply to accused's attorney that "I want to characterize that statement as absolutely malicious and mendacious," though improper, held not prejudicial to defendant, in view of admissions and evidence.

Where district attorney in presenting case stated that accused had admitted on appeal to appellate court that document he offered was a true and correct copy, to which accused's counsel stated that district attorney's statement was made for deliberate purpose of prejudicing this case before jury, district attorney's reply that "I want to characterize that statement as absolutely malicious and mendacious," though improper, held not to have prejudiced defendant, in view of evidence and defendant's admissions that he caused such documents to be distributed and mailed.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 1171(1)—In prosecution for attempting to influence jury in criminal syndicalism case, district attorney's characterization of I. W. W. as an outlaw organization held not prejudicial.

In prosecution for corruptly attempting to influence juror in pending prosecution under Criminal Syndicalism Law, characterization by district attorney of the I. W. W. as an "outlaw organization" held not to have prejudiced defendant, or contributed to the result arrived at by jury.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 720(6)—Attorney's argument may give his interpretation to any act to which there is substantial evidence, and assign to it any motive consistent with nature thereof and circumstances.

Though an attorney in argument to jury must not import any opinion into case which is not fairly within legitimate bounds of record, he may give his own analysis of and interpretation to any act or fact to which there is substantial evidence, and assign any motive which is consistent with nature thereof and circumstances under or by which it was produced.

9. Embracery $\S$ 5—In prosecution for corruptly attempting to influence juror in pending prosecution under Criminal Syndicalism Law, preamble of platform and other literature of I. W. W., of which accused was member, held properly admitted.

In prosecution for corruptly attempting to influence a juror in pending prosecution under Criminal Syndicalism Law by sending letter to him, preamble of political platform and other literature of the I. W. W., offered on theory that they would tend to show that, defendant being in accord with views set forth in them, circulation of letter was to influence a verdict of acquittal, held properly admitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Tom Connors was convicted of attempting corruptly to influence a trial juror, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. W. Henderson, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was charged by indictment found and returned by the grand jury of Sacramento county with the crime of attempting corruptly to influence one H. D. Arnold, a trial juror, in the determination of his verdict in a specifically named criminal case then pending in the superior court of said county. Upon his trial for said offense he was convicted, and he brings his case to this court by an appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying him a new trial.

The present is the second trial of the defendant upon the charge preferred against him in the indictment. He was convicted by the jury of the offense charged by the indictment, but the judgment and the order denying him a new trial were reversed because of the giving of an instruction which this court held involved an erroneous and a prejudicial statement of the rule of law thereby sought to be declared. People v. Connors, 233 P. 362. The opinion disposing of said appeal in the case sets forth, in substance, the following part of the indictment:

"The indictment charges that on the — day of March, 1923, there was pending and set for trial and undecided 'an action entitled the People of the State of California v. Barney Brooks et al.,' that the defendants therein were charged with the crime of criminal syndicalism; that the trial of said action had been set for March 26, 1923; that a regular panel of jurors had been 'duly summoned and drawn'; that one of such jurors was H. D. Arnold; that defendant knew that Arnold had been so drawn and summoned, and that he 'would continue as said summoned and drawn juror during the trial of' said criminal action; and that defendant corruptly attempted to influence said juror 'in respect to his verdict to be thereafter rendered in said action of the People of the State of California v. Barney Brooks et al., * * * by means of a written communication then and there had by said' defendant 'with said juror, H. D. Arnold.'"

The written communication in its entirety follows in said opinion the above excerpt, but, for the purposes of the present opinion, it will be sufficient to present herein so much of the communication only as is set forth in the indictment, as follows:

"The law which makes such gross injustice possible was introduced before your state Legislature by a representative who admits never having read it previous to that time. A trio of degenerates will be on hand when the prosecution offers its evidence, and these three persons will offer, as testimony, some weird tales of crimes committed by themselves. These men who go continually from place to place trading for a few pieces of gold the liberty of honest workmen by claiming that while members of a certain labor organization they themselves had committed certain crimes, at the same time admitting that no punishment has ever been meted out to them for having done so. To the intelligent this should prove a fair example of what extremities men will go to for the sake of $10 per day and expenses.

"Did you ever stop to consider that, with a sometime membership of several hundred thousand members, only three persons are to be found who knew of these acts having been committed. Think again that these three are employed continually for this purpose, and besides being of a very low moral type they admit having remained members of this organization to further the interests of some certain corporate interests who have at all times shown bitter enmity toward all labor organizations.

"There is another matter we would like to mention. In your city there is a wife, a mother, and she is waiting for some one who does not come home. This woman is Mrs. Barney Brooks, who is alone with two very small children because of a certain law which states that a man must answer for the thoughts and ideas of others who may now be dead and forgotten, if ever they lived at all.

"This young man, who led a good, clean life among you for years, made an apparent mistake, but a mistake only from a very narrow and selfish point of view. He wishes to improve working conditions for his own and other people's children when they arrive at the proper age. His wife and kiddies await him at home, and he cannot go to them because three perverted minds have contrived to turn lies into dollars, and laws are enacted which corporations can twist and turn to their financial benefit. This young man is being held under bonds of $2,500; and others already convicted of the same charge are out awaiting appeal under bonds of $250 each.

"We leave these facts for your consideration, and trust that you will investigate them. Then write to your newspaper and responsible officials and, in the name of fairness and justice, demand the repeal of this extremely vicious and inhuman piece of legislation.

"Yours for fair play and justice to all."

Upon proceeding with the trial with which we are now concerned it transpired that the written document upon which this prosecution is founded, and of which in part the above as taken from the indictment is a copy, was missing and could not be found by the prosecuting officers. Other written documents of a like nature, which, as was true of the letter or document referred to in the indictment, were introduced in evidence at the first trial of the accused and marked as exhibits in the case, were also missing, and consequently were not themselves available for use at the trial from which the present appeals arise. Upon laying the requisite foundation, the people introduced secondary evidence of the contents of said missing writings or documents.

At the former trial the defendant testified in his own behalf, but was not a witness in the second trial; that is, the trial the record of which, in certain designated particulars, we are now called upon to review upon his appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order disallowing his motion for a new trial. The people, however, introduced in evidence the testimony given by him at the former trial.

The same witnesses, with the exception of one (Carl E. Scheunert), who testified at the first trial, testified at the trial eventuating in the present appeals, and the oral testimony given at the second or the last-mentioned trial was substantially the same as that given at the first trial. Scheunert, above referred to, was one of the panel of jurors summoned early in March, 1922, to appear for jury duty in the superior court of Sacramento county. Several other jurors of the same panel other than juror Arnold testified at the second trial, as they did at the former trial, that they received through the United States mail a copy of the communication set forth in the indictment. Counsel for the defendant, however, frankly makes the following statement in his opening brief:

"As this court has had occasion to review the evidence in the case upon the former appeal, it will not be necessary to present it in detail in this brief. Except for the fact that the foundation for secondary evidence had to be laid in connection with practically every document, the statement contained in the appellant's opening brief in the former appeal will be found fairly accurate."

The statement of the general facts in the former opinion herein is not only in accord with the evidence as disclosed by the record on the former appeal, but is in full harmony with the evidence as revealed by the record on this appeal and the statement of the facts in the opening brief of appellant filed in support of the former appeal. We, therefore, adopt as a part of this opinion the statement by the presiding justice in the opinion disposing of the former appeal of the facts disclosed by the evidence introduced by both the people and the defendant as follows:

"March 2, 1923, an indictment was duly filed charging Barney Brooks, Joe Wagner, and R. C. Russell with the crime of criminal syndicalism. March 6th the defendants entered pleas of not guilty. The case was set to be tried on the 26th of the same month. The record does not show on what day the order was made setting the case for trial, or whether it was before or after the mailing of the foregoing communication. March 22d, Brooks withdrew his plea of not guilty and entered a plea of guilty. He was thereupon placed on probation. The trial of the other defendants was commenced March 26th. During the month of March three other actions were pending, in which the defendants therein were charged with criminal syndicalism. The trial dates of these cases were set and successively continued as follows: People v. Vargo et al., November 2, 1922, and January 2, January 15, February 21, March 5, March 6, and March 26, 1923; People v. Flanagan et al., February 5, February 6, March 13, and April 27, 1923; People v. Stewart et al., February 5, February 6, March 19, and May 5, 1923. In addition to the foregoing cases, there was pending another criminal syndicalism case against eight defendants. The trial of that action was commenced March 5, 1923, and was still in progress as late as March 18th.

"March 2, 1923, a regular panel of jurors was drawn for service commencing the 12th day of March. Arnold's name was one of those so drawn. From this panel the jury was selected to try Wagner and Russell. Arnold was called in the jury box, examined as to his qualifications, and excused from service in that case.

"The Legislature was in session at the time the alleged communication was mailed. A movement was then in progress to bring about the repeal of the Criminal Syndicalism Law. * * * The defendant contended at the trial and now urges that the communication was not sent for the purpose of influencing any juror, but that it was merely a part of a general agitation to influence public opinion in favor of the repeal of the law. Appellant says that 'the evidence in this case is practically without conflict.' This may be conceded, but conflicting inferences may be rationally drawn from the evidence as to the purpose or intent with which the communication was sent.

"The general defense committee of the I. W. W., with headquarters in Chicago, had charge of the defense of persons arrested under criminal syndicalism statutes. The defendant was secretary of the California branch of the committee, with offices in San Francisco. He was in charge of the defense of criminal syndicalism cases in this state. The alleged communication was mailed in San Francisco March 17, 1923, and the envelope containing it was addressed to H. D. Arnold, Sacramento. The defendant testified that it was a multigraph letter, and that he caused 20,000 copies thereof to be mailed to residents of Sacramento county between the 5th and the 25th of March, 1923; that he knew there were several criminal syndicalism cases then pending in that county; that a part of his work was 'to keep a record of all cases pending'; that he knew Brooks, Wagner, and Russell were 'in jail in Sacramento at that time, and 12 other men throughout the state, which were not listed as cases, they were individuals, they were in jail—no indictment returned, to my knowledge—no record of it in our office at that time'; that he had no information that a jury had been drawn in Sacramento county; that he had never heard of the name H. D. Arnold or of any of the 4 other jurors who, the evidence shows, received copies of the letter; that the thought that any of the letters might reach jurors or prospective jurors never crossed his mind, was never thought of or mentioned; that similar letters were sent to residents of 9 counties prior to his arrest; that 25,000 were sent to Lassen county; that his intention in sending copies of the letter to residents of Sacramento county 'was to make the public acquainted with these facts, to create public opinion which we believed would cause the repeal of this act, and to raise funds to defend these cases'; that there were two Sacramento county telephone directories in his office from which names and addresses of residents of that county were taken in mailing out literature. There were inclosed in the envelopes containing these letters two printed leaflets attacking the Syndicalism Law and prosecutions had thereunder. The defendant's office was searched at the time of his arrest and packages of letters were found therein addressed to the residents of several counties, including Lassen and Siskiyou. The evidence shows that there was a criminal syndicalism case pending in each of those counties at that time."

Counsel for the defendant admits that the foundation for the introduction of secondary evidence of the documentary evidence, including the letter upon which the indictment is founded, was sufficiently laid. Among the copies of the documents received into the record of the case at the former trial which were introduced in the trial involved in the present appeals was that of said letter. It is claimed, though, that the evidence introduced herein is insufficient to show that juror Arnold received the identical letter pleaded or set forth in the indictment. This presents the most important of the several points upon which the defendant relies here for a reversal. The several other assignments involve the claim that the judge of the trial court was, in several instances, guilty of misconduct in the trial of the case which prejudiced the rights of the accused in the trial of the issues; that the district attorney, in his presentation of the case to the jury, was, in a number of instances during the progress of the trial, guilty of misconduct of a character calculated to deny to the accused a fair and impartial trial; that there was prejudicial error in the action of the court in the giving and the refusal to allow certain instructions.

[1, 2] 1. The witness H. D. Arnold, who, as seen, was summoned as a juror early in March, 1923, and by whom the communication or address set forth in the indictment was received prior to the date fixed for the trial of the criminal syndicalism case against Barney Brooks and others, was shown a copy of the said communication or address, and, upon his examination thereof, was asked by the district attorney whether or not he (the witness) "recognized it as being a copy of the letter you received at that time," referring to the date of the witness' receipt of the communication through the mail. To that question Arnold replied, "I did receive a letter at that time addressed 'to the citizens of Sacramento county, of this character,'" referring to the copy of the communication which he had just inspected or read. The witness was not further questioned by the district attorney along that line, and the answer so returned was the only direct testimony presented to the jury tending to show that such a letter or communication as is set forth in the indictment was received by said Arnold at the time mentioned by him and alleged in the accusatory pleading.

It is the settled law that, where an instrument in writing constitutes the gravamen of a cause of action or an essential element of the body of a crime or is alleged to have been the specific means by which a crime has been committed, such instrument must be proved substantially, or, perhaps, in many cases, precisely as it is pleaded. But there is no question here that the letter pleaded in the indictment which is the groundwork of the crime therein charged was the letter or a copy thereof which was sent out by defendant or under his immediate direction to many thousands of the citizens of Sacramento county at the time mentioned in the indictment. That fact was admitted by the defendant at the trial and is not, of course, controverted on these appeals. The only question at the trial was whether the evidence was such as to justify the jury in concluding therefrom whether the letter received by H. D. Arnold, summoned to serve as a juror in the superior court of Sacramento county shortly prior to the trial of the criminal syndicalism cases referred to above, was a copy of the letter set forth in the indictment. The question here is whether we can say, as a matter of law, that such finding is not supported. Of course, the fact of the receipt of the letter or a copy thereof by Arnold at the time mentioned had to be proved to establish the fact of the commission of the crime charged and proved by evidence which would justify the conviction, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the very letter pleaded was actually received by Arnold at the time mentioned. But we can conceive of no just reason for holding that such fact may not be proved as well by circumstantial as by direct evidence. It may first be observed that it was for the jury to determine, from all the facts and circumstances before them bearing upon the charge alleged in the indictment, the meaning intended to be conveyed by Arnold when, upon examining an admitted copy of the letter set out in part in the indictment, he stated, referring to said copy: "I did receive a letter of this character." These facts and circumstances are: That, as a necessary part of the trial, the clerk of the court, upon the swearing of the jury selected to try the case, read to the jury the indictment, which consisted in part of the letter in question or a copy thereof, and stated the defendant's previously entered plea thereto (Pen. Code, § 1093, subd. 1), and thus the letter and its contents were before them in an unquestionably legal form; that defendant admitted that, prior to the date fixed for the trial of the criminal syndicalism cases pending in the superior court of Sacramento county, many thousands of the copies of the letter set out in the indictment were, by his authority and under his direction, addressed and sent through the mails to as many citizens of Sacramento county; that, among the citizens of said county to whom copies of said letter thus were sent, were several citizens, other than said Arnold, who had also been summoned early in March, 1922, on the jury panel for said superior court, and who received said letter or a copy thereof a short time prior to the date fixed for the trial of the criminal syndicalism cases above referred to; that said H. D. Arnold, at the time that he received a letter of the "character" of the one set out in the indictment, was still a member of said jury panel, from which it was the purpose and intention to select a jury to try said syndicalism cases. Interpreting the statement of Arnold that he received a letter or communication at the time mentioned in the indictment of the "character" of the one shown to and inspected by him when testifying by the light of the foregoing facts and circumstances, and the further fact that the letter or communication shown to and examined by him was a copy of the letter or communication set forth in the indictment, the conclusion is fair and reasonable that what he intended to say when he made the statement referred to was that he had received at the time mentioned a letter or communication which in its language and subject-matter was the same as the copy submitted to his examination when on the witness stand and giving his testimony, and justly the jury could have so viewed it. Indeed, it is to be assumed, from the fact that the verdict was that the accused was guilty of the crime as charged, that the jury did so construe the testimony of Arnold in that particular. Certainly, it could not reasonably be expected that the average person could, from the examination alone of a copy of a lengthy written document which, as was true of the witness in this case, had not for a long period of time been in his possession or examined or read by him, readily or at all recall the precise language of such document. Under such circumstances, the most that could be expected from the average witness testifying to the contents of the original document would be to say, if it was true, and as the witness in this case in effect did say, that the original document was of the character, in language and substance or subject-matter, of the purported copy. It is with readiness to be conceded that the conviction of a person of a public offense should not be permitted to rest alone upon such an identification of a document constituting an essential part of the crime charged, the proof of which was, consequently, indispensable to the establishment of the crime against him, yet, where, as has been shown to be true in this case, there are proved facts and circumstances extrinsic to or independent of such testimony which strongly support the probative import and purpose thereof, then the case presented upon the evidence is wholly for the jury and not for this court to decide. In this connection it may be suggested as a matter worthy of note that defendant's counsel did not cross-examine Arnold with the view of testing his memory relative to the contents of the original document or whether he could specifically point out or state definitely, from his examination of the copy, the language or any part thereof contained in the original.

In 10 different instances during the progress of the trial and presented here under as many different and distinct assignments, counsel for defendant charges that the court, in certain of these instances, and the district attorney in others, were guilty of misconduct which prejudicially affected the rights of the accused at the trial. Some of these assignments grow out of those exchanges of sharp words which too frequently occur between attorneys representing adverse interests in the trial of causes in courts of justice, and sometimes, be it deprecatingly said, between court and counsel, which always have the effect of derogating more or less from the dignity with which proceedings in judicial tribunals should uniformly be managed. The first of these assignments to which attention should be given is the outgrowth of the fact that the trial judge himself voluntarily became a witness for the people and testified to a material circumstance. As pointed out above, several citizens of Sacramento county other than Arnold who were summoned on the jury panel for the superior court of said county at the time Arnold was so summoned received copies of the letter or communication described in the indictment. As bearing upon the question of the motive and intent with which said documents were mailed to many residents of the county of Sacramento, three persons were called as witnesses and gave testimony supporting the people's theory of the motive for circulating the literature described in the indictment. Among the parties so called and testifying was juror T. J. Bennetts. He testified that he received such a letter as is referred to in the indictment between the time at which the order was made fixing the date for the trial of Barney Brooks et al., and the date so fixed, and that he delivered the envelope containing the document to the judge presiding at the former, as well as at the present, trial of the defendant. This was one of the missing documents, proof of which the district attorney was required to make by means of secondary evidence, and, to trace and so identify the document, the prosecution deemed it necessary (and obviously for that purpose it was necessary) to show what disposition the judge made of it. Upon the disclosure of this situation the judge voluntarily stated: "I will be sworn, if the clerk will swear me." Thereupon the judge was sworn by the clerk, and, over repeated objections by counsel for defendant, testified that, during the trial of Brooks et al., Bennetts handed him (the judge) the envelope referred to and that he (the judge) delivered it to Mr. Cowan, an assistant district attorney, then in personal charge of the prosecution of the case against said Brooks et al. After Judge Busick so testified and before proceeding to the cross-examination, counsel for defendant moved to dismiss the action on the ground "of a mistrial—on the ground that we are not having a trial before a judge who stands indifferent as between the people and the defendant"; the motion being denied.

Section 1883 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The judge himself, or any juror, may be called as a witness by either party; but in such case it is in the discretion of the court or judge to order the trial to be postponed or suspended, and to take place before another judge or jury."

[3] Counsel for defendant vigorously contends that neither a judge nor a juror is competent as witness to give testimony in a cause being tried before and by him, and that, notwithstanding the foregoing section of our Code of Civil Procedure, the trial judge in the present instance was guilty of a flagrant violation of the rights of the accused by taking the witness stand and giving testimony for the people, and that by so doing wrongfully prejudiced the case of the defendant in the minds of the jury; in other words, the position of counsel is that the act of the trial judge, in testifying for the people in the case, was error per se and worked serious detriment to the rights of the accused. Necessarily, this contention assumes the hypothesis that it is not within the constitutional power or province of the Legislature to declare a judge or juror to be a competent witness and to give testimony in a case being tried before him. But whether said section, in at least impliedly giving a judge the right to testify as a witness to a material fact in a case over which he is the judge presiding, is or is not out of plumb with any provision of the Constitution, or, when given practical application, will be deemed to deny to the party against whom he testified the fair and impartial trial guaranteed by the Constitution to all litigants in civil actions and all defendants in criminal prosecutions, the situation presented here does not require us to consider. One suggestion of uncertain force, however, may be made in this connection, and that is that, conceding that the Legislature has the constitutional right to authorize a trial judge to preside over the trial of a cause and at the same time testify as a witness in the case, the practice is not to be commended and should never be resorted to except in cases where the circumstances imperatively require it, and not even in such a case in public prosecutions where the judge's testimony directly bears upon or involves a fact or facts without the proof of which a conviction cannot be had. Some of the cases and other authorities cited by counsel condemn the practice in any case under any circumstances. Some of these authorities hold that the judge is per se incompetent to testify as a witness in a case pending or being tried before him. Others hold that, where the matter to which the judge is asked to testify unexpectedly arises during the progress of the trial—a situation as to which, in the nature of the case, the necessity of the judge's testimony could not reasonably have been anticipated before the occasion calling for it arose—and the testimony was not of that character that, without it, an important and necessary issue of fact could not be proved, or where it did not directly bear upon or tend to prove an issue or the issues in the case, the judge would not be deemed to be an incompetent witness. Several of the cited cases presented a situation where the judge, before the trial was started, was fully cognizant of the fact that he would or might be called as a witness to testify to facts bearing directly upon one or more of the issues of the case. Of course, in such a case the fact of the judge's knowledge of facts which would, if testified to by him, support one side or the other of the issue to be by him decided, should itself be sufficient to disqualify him from trying the case, regardless of whether he was or was not called as a witness, particularly where the court was to try the questions of fact. In an Oklahoma case (Powers v. Cook et al., 149 P. 1121, 48 Okl. 43, L. R. A. 1915F, 766), it is intimated that, if there existed (as did not then exist in that state) a statute authorizing or permitting a judge to testify in a case tried before him, it would not be improper for the judge so to testify. But it may now be laid down as the generally accepted rule that a judge is not a competent witness in a case being tried before him, and that even where, as in this state, there is a statute which in effect commits the question whether a judge may so testify to the discretion of the court or the judge himself, it will be deemed an abuse of the discretion so vested in the court or judge if the latter's testimony discloses facts without the proof of which the issue such testimony is designed to support cannot be sustained. To illustrate: If the judge was an eyewitness to the commission of an act constituting, as is true of all crimes, one of the basic elements or ingredients of a public offense, or, where a crime was required to be proved wholly by circumstantial evidence, the judge had personal knowledge of a circumstance which constituted an essential link in the concatenation of circumstances absolutely necessary to the establishment of the guilt of the accused, then, in either case, it would be highly improper and, indeed, a flagrant abuse of the discretion vested by law in him or the court for the judge to testify to such fact or facts and at the same time act as the judge in the case. And the same principle would prevail where an analogous situation should arise in the trial of a civil action. The following authorities are interesting and illuminating upon this subject: Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) 305; 3 Ency. of Evidence, p. 215; Jones on Evidence (Civil Cases) 958; 3 Wigmore on Evidence, 25, 26; 1 Chamberlain on Evidence, 745; *Maitland v. [4] In the present case the more serious aspect in which the circumstance here complained of is to be viewed is in the fact that the judge, without first having been requested by the district attorney to testify, voluntarily offered to testify, thus affording some ground for the formation by the jury of the impression that he was throwing the force of his influence, as the presiding judge, against the accused, and thereby indicating that he was of the conviction that the defendant was guilty of the crime charged. But, even with that suggestion in our minds, when we bear in mind the nature of the testimony so given and other significant considerations of which we shall later take notice, we still are unable to persuade ourselves to the conviction that the fact that the judge did voluntarily become a witness and testify in the case itself contributed to the result arrived at by the jury. The present case, in so far as the nature in probative importance of the testimony of the judge is concerned, as well as are also concerned the circumstances which are to be considered in determining its effect upon the rights of the accused, is different in several material respects from most of the cases above referred to and is also such as to remove it from the strict ban of the general rule announced by the text-writers whose volumes on evidence are likewise mentioned. Disregarding the fact that in this state we have statutory authority for the act of a judge in testifying in a case on trial before him, the consideration which may first be suggested as distinguishing this case from those heretofore mentioned is the fact that the judge's testimony, while material, was collateral to the main issue. Its purpose was merely to prove by means of secondary evidence a lost document similar to the one set forth in the indictment, and which, it was claimed, had been addressed to and received by juror Bennetts at the time that Arnold and other citizens of Sacramento county who were on the jury panel referred to received copies of such document, the purpose of proving that Bennetts and other jurors, other than Arnold, each received a copy of said document at the time indicated, being designed to show that the motive of the defendant in causing at that time said literature thus to be generally circulated in Sacramento county was to influence those citizens who might be selected from the jury panel to sit in the cases of Barney Brooks et al., to sympathize with and support the defense set up in those cases, regardless of what the character of the evidence therein might be. In fact, the judge's testimony merely amounted to this: That it tended to prove one circumstance only which, with others, would tend to prove another circumstance which, with others, would tend to show that the defendant, with the intent wrongfully to influence jurors who might be called to sit in the cases of Barney Brooks et al. to favor the defendants in said cases, caused to be addressed and sent to many citizens of Sacramento county the literature in question just prior to the date fixed for the trial of said cases. Furthermore, the fact sought to be proved by the fact of the receipt by Bennetts of a copy of the document in question, to wit, that other jurors besides Arnold had each received a copy of said document at or about the time mentioned, was not dependent solely on the testimony that Bennetts had received said document, since there was testimony to the effect that jurors other than Bennetts and Arnold had received, at the time indicated, a copy of the document pleaded in the indictment and that testimony was, obviously, offered and received for the identical purpose for which the testimony relative to the receipt by Bennetts of a copy of the document was offered and allowed. Thus it is perfectly clear that the judge's testimony was not of overruling, even if more than trifling, importance to the people in the proof of the charge against the defendant. In fact, the testimony relative to the receipt by Bennetts of the literature could have been entirely eliminated from the case or not have been offered, and still there would have been left before the jury ample testimony which, if believed by the jury, would justly warrant them in concluding that the motive or intent with which the literature in question was sent out, at the particular time mentioned, to nearly every juror and citizen eligible to jury duty in Sacramento county, was to influence them against any case the people might develop at the trial of Barney Brooks et al. Indeed, the very literature itself thus sent out and which constitutes the foundation of the indictment here affords evidence of a convincing character that such was the motive or purpose of circulating it generally in a county in which there were then pending certain criminal cases growing out of acts denounced by a law which said literature bitterly attacked and condemned. If that was not the motive, why the importunate request (contained in said letter) to those to whom the literature was sent that they pay a visit to the Sacramento county courthouse and gaze upon the harrowing picture, so vividly drawn, representing several men upon whom the relentless instrument of persecution was to be turned loose, when, on the day set for their trial on a charge of committing an offense against society, they were to face the bar of justice? Why in the same picture is inserted, in perfervid and pathetic coloring, the deplorable condition of sorrow and want into which the family of one of these defendants had been cast by a prosecution growing out of an alleged violation of a law which, the document in effect declares, authorizes a tyrannical invasion of the political and civil rights and personal liberty of the citizens? Why the attempted impeachment in advance of the trial of three witnesses upon whose testimony, mainly, so the document declared, the people were to be required to rely for the proof of the charge against those defendants? These questions, being so plainly self-suggestive from the very character of the literature itself, present evidentiary considerations as to the motive directly actuating its circulation, as explained, which, it may well be assumed, constituted the controlling factors in persuading the jury to the result arrived at by them. At all events, considering the record as a whole, as it has been reviewed herein, we cannot with legal propriety hold that the fact that the judge voluntarily testified as a witness or the character of the testimony given by him has had the effect of producing a miscarriage of justice in this case. In thus concluding, we are not unmindful of the real meaning, scope, and effect which the case of People v. Adams (Cal. App.) 244 P. 106, and the cases therein cited, have ascribed to section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. The construction of said provision of the Constitution by this court, speaking through Presiding Justice Finch, in the Adams Case, is obviously sound and means that, in adopting it into their organic law, the people did not intend that it should be employed to cover up or excuse every disregard of any of the just rights of a citizen in the trial of a case in which his liberty, or, it may be, his life, is at stake. In the present instance, though, it is plainly apparent, from all the considerations to which special notice has above been given, that the jury would not have reached any other verdict than that returned, had the judge not offered to testify voluntarily or not testified at all. Assuming that section 1883 of the Code of Civil Procedure represents a valid exercise of legislative power (we do not say that it does not), then certainly the fact that the judge testified under the circumstances indicated cannot justly be held to have been an act involving an abuse of discretion by the court.

[5] We can perceive nothing of a serious nature in their effect on the rights of the defendant in the several other specifications of misconduct on the part of the judge. In fact, in none of the instances here referred to is there any substantial ground for complaint, unless it was the manner of the judge when making the remarks which counsel conceived to be offensive and injurious to his client and of which we have not and in the nature of things could not have the benefit of a reproduction. On one of the occasions complained of the court said to counsel for defendant: "Make your objection; don't take up so much time in statements." The court, of course, had the right to compel the attorney to make his objection before arguing the point thus intended to be raised. Indeed, the orderly way to proceed was as the court suggested. The attorney, however, was not precluded from making his objection, for he did make it after the court interrupted him, as explained. This circumstance is a fair exemplification of the general character of the several acts of the court during the trial upon which the defendant predicates his complaints that the court was guilty of misconduct prejudicial to the rights of the accused, and therefore further special notice of the other assignments in that particular need not be herein given.

[6] The next assignments involve charges of misconduct on the part of the district attorney in the presentation of the case for the people. Two of these only require special consideration herein. The district attorney, J. J. Henderson, offered to prove by the stenographic reporter of the court that a certain document was a copy of the original introduced at the former trial of this case. The attorney for defendant, R. W. Henderson, objected to the proposed testimony on numerous specific grounds. Replying to said objections, the district attorney stated, among other things, that counsel for defendant had admitted in his appeal to the appellate court in the former case that the document he offered in the present case "was a true and correct copy." To which remark counsel for defendant retorted:

"Now. I want to characterize that statement of the district attorney and the repetition of it, that I have admitted anything with reference to the former case, as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and made for the deliberate purpose of prejudicing this case before the jury."

To that statement the district attorney replied:

"If the court will permit me, I want to characterize that statement as absolutely malicious and mendacious."

The document then under discussion, which was introduced in evidence at the first trial of the defendant, and which, the original having been lost, the district attorney was endeavoring to prove by means of secondary evidence or a copy thereof, was entitled "Ten I. W. W.'s Going to Jail in Sacramento, Singing," referring to the conviction and sentence of 10 members of the organization named in the superior court of Sacramento county some time prior to the trial of the instant case. The particular document, or a copy thereof, was mailed, with the document described in the indictment, to juror Arnold and other jurors and citizens of Sacramento county at the time mentioned, and copies of the same, with other I. W. W. literature, were found at the headquarters of said organization in San Francisco, and it was from said headquarters that the defendant caused to be mailed to the citizens of Sacramento county the literature set out in the indictment, together with the document entitled "Ten I. W. W.'s Going to Jail," etc. The theory of the people in introducing the last-mentioned document at the first as well as at the present trial, was that the fact that said document, with other I. W. W. literature, was found at the San Francisco headquarters of the I. W. W., from which the said document and the document referred to in the indictment were mailed to the citizens of Sacramento county, would tend to prove the defendant's connection with the I. W. W. and consequent interest in the cases of Barney Brooks et al., and that that fact would in turn tend to show that the motive or purpose of sending out said literature to said citizens was to create a sentiment of sympathy for Brooks et al. which might have the effect of so affecting the minds of jurors called to sit in those cases as to prevent them from giving a fair and proper consideration to any case which might be made by the people against said defendants. The district attorney was clearly wrong in making the statement exception to which by defendant's counsel we are now considering; but it is not believed that the statement prejudiced the defendant. This conclusion is founded upon the consideration, above fully gone into, that the defendant admitted that he caused both documents to be distributed in Sacramento county and that they were mailed from the place in San Francisco above referred to; that, furthermore, his membership of the I. W. W. was proved by his membership card, which was introduced in evidence. In fact, he did not deny his membership of the organization, and the fact of his membership of the organization is itself a circumstance of singular significance as in proof of an unswerving sympathy for Brooks et al. in their predicament as accused violators of public law and, consequently, a motive to extricate them from such predicament by any available means, since the prosecution of those individuals for the violation of the mandates of the Criminal Syndicalism Law involved, as is known as a matter of common notoriety, an attack upon the organization of which he was a member.

[7, 8] The second assignment under the present head to which special notice should be given is the outgrowth of the characterization by the district attorney, in his argument to the jury, of the I. W. W.'s as "an outlaw organization." Introduced into this case was a large quantity of I. W. W. literature, in which the principles and purposes of the organization are promulgated. The effect of these principles and purposes, if crystallized into an actuality, would be to destroy all government formed on rational lines. Indeed, well may it be suggested that a government, if properly it could be called such, established in accord with those principles, would be comparable, politically, to the situation, as astronomically described, in that space of incomprehensible immensity in the Southern heavens, near the Southern Cross, where (old astronomers have said) "the Great Author of celestial mechanism has left the chaos that was in the beginning," and in which "the eye of man, with the aid of the powers of the telescope, has been unable to discover nebulae, or asteroid, or comet, or planet, or star, or sun." Thus viewing the proclaimed principles and avowed purposes of the said organization, an American citizen, wedded to the political principles upon which our government is founded and has firmly rested for nearly a century and a half, would not be accused of going far afield in denouncing as an "outlaw organization" an organization which stands for principles and policies which, as may well be said of the political principles of the I. W. W., would inevitably lead to political chaos if ever put into practical operation. But, beyond all this, there can be no doubt that, as a matter of common knowledge, every juror sitting in this case knew that many members of the I. W. W. prior to the trial of the instant case, had been convicted in the courts of this state of the crime of criminal syndicalism, the gist of said crime being in the unlawful methods resorted to for the carrying out of the general political principles of said organization rather than in those principles themselves. It would be idle to argue that the jurors as well as every other citizen of Sacramento county, where, as is also known as a matter of common knowledge, many of such convictions were obtained, did not and do not, in point of fact, know of such convictions. While it is not necessarily to be assumed as true that, from the knowledge of the fact of such convictions, the jurors were of the unqualified opinion that the organization was per se an "outlaw organization" or abstractly is justly to be called such an organization, still they may be assumed to have known from such knowledge of such convictions that the district attorney's characterization of the organization, as indicated, was based upon facts with which they (the jurors) were themselves perfectly familiar and that from those facts the conclusion expressed by that officer as to the general character of the organization might reasonably be deduced. Bearing in mind all the considerations thus adverted to and also the convincing character of the evidence presented by the people to support the indictment, as well as certain admissions of the accused, which, when considered with the general circumstances developed, are of an inculpatory nature, it would, in our opinion, involve a clear transgression of the legitimate power of this court as one of review only to declare, as a matter of law, that the district attorney's characterization in his argument to the jury of the I. W. W. as an "outlaw organization" contributed to the result arrived at by the jury as indicated by the verdict. It is true that an attorney, in his argument to the jury, must be certain not to import any opinion or suggestion into the case which is not fairly and reasonably within the legitimate bounds of the record as made, yet it is equally true that in the exercise of this right of argument an attorney may give his own analysis of and interpretation to any act or fact of which there is substantial evidence in the case and assign to such act or fact any motive or intent which is consistent with the nature thereof and the circumstances under or by which it was produced. See 8 Cal. Jur. § 602, p. 621, and cases named in the footnotes.

The other specifications of misconduct by the prosecuting officer demand no special notice herein. They involved mere harmless exchanges of asperities by and between counsel—the one as often the aggressor as the other—and, as to the effect of the verbal brickbatting, in the parlance of the gladiatorial arena, it truly may be said that each “round” was a “draw,” and so throughout the trial at frequent intervals did the Hendersons, pro and con, continue (in a figurative sense) to “Fence and push, and, pushing, loudly roar,”

But “their dewlaps and their sides” still free from gore!

Or, in other words, the verbal tilts spent their fury without hurting anybody.

[9] The complaint that the court erred in allowing the preamble of the political platform and other literature of the I. W. W. organization to be introduced in evidence by the people is devoid of legal force. As suggested above, the documents here referred to were offered and received in evidence not only to prove the character of said organization, of which defendant was a member, but upon the theory that they would further tend to show that defendant, being in full accord with all that is set forth in said preamble and other literature, was of the view that Brooks et al. were being persecuted for having exercised their constitutional right to stand for and advocate a drastic change in political and industrial control in our country, and that, therefore, the circulation of the document mentioned in the indictment and other literature in Sacramento county was to influence a verdict of acquittal in those cases.

Nor is there merit in the criticism directed against certain instructions given and of the action of the court in disallowing certain instructions requested by defendant. The charge of the court involved a full, fair, and correct statement of every rule or principle of law pertinent to the case as made by the indictment and the proofs.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

1. Agriculture ⇐6—Co-operative marketing association's payment, promised on resale of crop, held not condition precedent to grower's obligation to deliver crops of subsequent years.

Where co-operative marketing association contracted to use its best efforts to resell prunes for net price higher than paid to growers and to pay grower the excess less certain charges, payment to be made before September 1 of year following delivery of prunes, held that promise to pay additional sum was conditional, and payment was not a condition precedent to grower's obligation to deliver crops of subsequent years.

2. Agriculture ⇐6—Co-operative association's performance of contract to resell crop and pay additional sum to grower presumed, and payment made held prima facie proof of performance imposing burden on grower to excuse breach (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 19).

Where co-operative marketing association agreed to use its best efforts to resell prunes for net price higher than paid to growers and to pay excess to growers before September 1 of following year, presumption under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 19, was that association fairly performed contract, and, having rendered account on resale and made payment of excess during December of following year, evidence was sufficient prima facie to support allegation of full performance, and burden of proving facts excusing growers' failure to deliver crop for following year to association was on growers.

3. Contracts ⇐322(1).

Where a promise is to be performed in a certain event, promisee who asserts nonperformance as cause of action or as an excuse for his own failure to perform must prove facts on which obligation of promisor depends.

4. Contracts ⇐173—Where time for performance by one party arrives before time for performance by the other, latter promise is an independent obligation, and its nonperformance is no bar to action by party making it.

In construing contract containing mutual provisions, where time for performance by one party is to arrive or may arrive before time for performance by the other, latter promise is independent obligation, nonperformance of which creates a cause of action merely, and is not a bar to right of party making it to recover for breach of promise made to him.

5. Contracts ⇐303(4).

Breach of contract cannot be justified by anything the other party thereto may have done or omitted to do thereafter, and where plaintiff's breach does not defeat right of action, defendant cannot plead it in bar but only in recoupment of damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by the California Prune & Apricot Growers, Inc., against R. D. Baker and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

S. G. Tompkins, of San Jose, for appellants.
Sapiro & Hayes, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An action by a co-operative marketing association to recover liquidated damages for the breach of contracts providing for the sale and delivery to the plaintiff of certain crops of prunes by defendants, who were members of the association.

The association therein agreed to pay therefor a fixed minimum price per pound upon delivery, the contracts further providing as follows:

"The buyer (plaintiff) agrees to use its best efforts to resell said prunes, together with similar prunes from other sellers, at net prices higher than those paid to the sellers (defendants) upon delivery thereof, and if it shall be able to obtain such higher net prices it will pay the excess above 4 cents bulk basis per pound over to the sellers after deducting from such excess of the net price over 4 cents bulk basis per pound 5 per cent. of all sums payable to the sellers by virtue of this agreement and the sellers' prorated share of the cost of taxes and insurance on prunes purchased by the buyer under such contracts and carried over by the buyer beyond January 1st of each year during the existence of this contract, such additional payment to be made on or before September 1st in the year following the delivery of the prunes hereunder.

"But if the buyer be unable to obtain such basic prices and can obtain only a price lower than the said 4 cents bulk basis per pound, then the seller shall be liable and shall pay to the buyer the difference between the said basic price of 4 cents and the actual selling price, less the sellers' prorated share of expense as hereinbefore set forth."

It was further agreed that it would be impractical and extremely difficult to determine the actual damage resulting to the association should the growers fail to deliver the crops, and the contracts fixed a sum per pound as liquidated damages to be paid to the former in the event of a default in delivery.

It is admitted that defendants failed to deliver to plaintiff 19,400 pounds of the prunes produced by them during the year 1921. Plaintiff alleged its full performance of the contracts and its readiness and ability to receive and pay for the prunes in accordance therewith, which allegations were denied. As a special defense (other defenses being pleaded in support of which no evidence was offered) it was alleged that the association had deducted from the total sums received by it upon resales of the crops delivered by the various growers during the year 1920 charges in excess of those provided by the contracts.

This defense was not pleaded as a counterclaim, but it was urged at the trial, and it is contended here, that the facts alleged constitute a bar to the maintenance of the action by plaintiff. The action was tried by a jury, and, a verdict for plaintiff having been directed by the court, judgment thereon was entered, from which defendants appeal.

The evidence shows without contradiction that defendants produced during the year 1921, 35,605 pounds of prunes; that on or about September 8, 1921, they requested payment by the association of the sum of $200 on account of the crop of 1920, which request was refused; that on September 13, 1921, without notice to the association of their intention or of an election to terminate the contracts, they sold and delivered elsewhere a portion of the crop, thereafter on October 18, 1921, delivering to the association the remainder, which amounted to 16,205 pounds. It further appears that the association during the month of December, 1921, rendered to defendants an account of the resales of the crop of 1920, together with a check for the balance shown by the account to be due the latter, which check was received and indorsed by defendant R. D. Baker and thereafter paid. Above this indorsement was printed the following: "Indorsement of this voucher by payee constitutes receipt in full, no other acknowledgment being required."

An objection to an offer by defendants to prove the facts alleged in the special defense mentioned above was sustained, and it is contended by the latter as grounds for reversal that, the association having failed to pay on September 1, 1921, or on the date of the request mentioned, the proceeds from the resales of the crop of 1920 it was consequently in default under the contracts; that defendants were therefore justified in selling the crop of 1921 elsewhere; that the plaintiff, having alleged full performance, could not recover by showing an excuse for nonperformance, and that the court erred in excluding proof under defendants' special defense. The record does not show when the resales of the crop of 1920 were made or completed by the association, but it is contended by defendants that, according to the contracts, such resales and the payment of the excess therefrom were to be made on or before September 1st, and that the failure to pay on the date of the demand excused performance by them.

[1] As shown by the provisions of the contracts quoted above, the association agreed to use its best efforts to resell the prunes delivered each year for net prices higher than those paid the grower at the time of delivery, and, if successful, to pay to the latter the excess above 4 cents bulk basis per pound less the charges as provided therein, such additional payment to be made on or before September 1st in the year following delivery of the prunes. This promise was conditional, the obligation to pay by the date mentioned or at all being dependent upon the fact of resales for prices higher than the basic price. Success in this particular was not expressly made a condition precedent to the obligation of the grower to deliver the crops of subsequent years; nor, in view of the character and magnitude of the business conducted by the association, and the nature of the services rendered, could such intention reasonably be implied.

[2, 3] It is to be presumed that plaintiff's duty under the contracts was fairly and regularly performed (section 1963, subd. 19, Code Civ. Proc.; Lattin v. Hazard, 24 P. 611, 85 Cal. 58); and, it appearing that an account of the resales of the crop of 1920 was rendered, and that payment of the return shown thereby was made during the month of December, 1921, the evidence was sufficient prima facie to support the allegation of full performance, and placed the burden of proving facts excusing their nonperformance upon defendants. Where a promise is to be performed in a certain event, it is incumbent upon the promisee who asserts its nonperformance, either as a cause of action or as an excuse for his own failure to perform, to prove the facts upon which the obligation of the promisor depended. Rodgers v. Byers, 60 P. 42, 127 Cal. 528; Van Buskirk v. Kuhns, 129 P. 587, 164 Cal. 472, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 710, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 932.

Aside from the effect upon defendants' right to assert a previous default by the association as an excuse for their partial nonperformance, it appearing, as here, that defendants, notwithstanding such alleged default, continued to perform the contracts (Williston on Contracts, §§ 684, 688; Robinson v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 61 N. W. 1014, 103 Mich. 607; Farrelly v. U. S., 159 F. 671, 86 C. C. A. 539, no default by the association previous to the acts of defendants here complained of was shown, and the only question which remains for decision is the effect of a subsequent violation of the contracts by the association in failing to render a true account of the resales of the crop of 1920 upon its right to maintain the action.

[4, 5] In construing contracts containing mutual provisions, where the time for performance of the promise by one party is to arrive or may arrive before the time for performance by the other, the latter promise is held to be an independent obligation, the nonperformance of which creates a cause of action merely and does not constitute a bar to the right of the party making it to recover for a breach of the promise made to him. Kinney v. Fed. Laundry Co., 68 A. 111, 75 N. J. Law 497; Front Street, etc., R. R. Co. v. Butler, 50 Cal. 574; Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Allen, 44 P. 796, 112 Cal. 455, 461; Fresno Canal & Irrigation Co. v. Perrin, 149 P. 805, 170 Cal. 411. 416. A breach of contract cannot be justified by anything the other party to the contract may have done or omitted to do afterwards; and where a breach of contract is not such as to defeat a right of action the defendant cannot plead it in bar, but must take advantage of it by proper pleading in recoupment of damages. Harris Lumber Co. v. Wheeler Lumber Co., 115 S. W. 168, 88 Ark. 491; Barrett v. Verdery, 21 S. E. 64, 93 Ga. 526, 13 Corp. Jur. (Contracts) 739.

While it is urged by respondent that the effect of the rendition of the account, and the acceptance, indorsement, and payment of the check for the balance shown under the conditions printed thereon, was to estop defendants in any event from questioning the correctness of the account, a determination of this question is unnecessary, it being our conclusion that the evidence, which was undisputed, sustained the allegations of the complaint, and that the special defense mentioned was insufficient to bar a recovery.

No error being shown, and it appearing that the court in view of the evidence properly directed a verdict for the plaintiff, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CASE et al. (Cr. 1301.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 15, 1926.)

1. Robbery $\S$ 24(5).

Evidence held to show that robbery was committed by force and fear.

2. Robbery $\S$ 24(1).

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of robbery in first degree, under Pen. Code, § 211a, as against contention that there was no evidence that revolvers used by defendant and others were loaded.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 200(1)—Separate convictions for burglary and robbery, constituting parts of a single continuing transaction, held not violation of Constitution against putting person twice in jeopardy for same offense.

Separate convictions for robbery and burglary, which were parts of a single continuing transaction, held not violation of Constitution as placing defendant twice in jeopardy for same offense, where defendant entered house with intent to commit robbery and after entry was completed did commit robbery.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 569—Evidence held to sustain conviction for robbery as against contention that defendant was acting under threats.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for robbery as against contention that there was no joint operation of act and intent by defendant, and that when crime was committed he was under threats sufficient to show that he had reasonable cause and did believe his life was endangered if he refused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Newton R. Case and others were charged with robbery and burglary, and defendant Case, being tried separately, was convicted on both counts, and appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Groene, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Appellant Case and Frank Brown and William F. Nelson were by information charged with the crime of robbery whereby they did by means of force and fear, etc., take from one A. Sanchez certain described personal property. By a second count of the information it was charged that the same defendants, on the same date, committed the crime of burglary, in that at said time they did willfully, unlawfully, etc., enter the dwelling house of one J. Y. Logan with the intent then and there to commit the crime of larceny. Appellant, tried separately, was convicted on both counts.

[1] At about midnight of March 29, 1925, a number of persons, including Mr. Sanchez, were assembled in a room at the home of Mr. Logan in the city of Los Angeles. In response to a ring of the doorbell, Mr. Logan unlocked the door, but did not open it. Immediately three men "rushed right in" and proceeded to rob the persons present, including Sanchez. The intruders were the defendants Brown, Nelson, and Case. Each of the defendants Brown and Nelson was armed with a "gun." The evidence is amply sufficient to show a robbery committed by a means of force and fear, in the well-known manner of such transactions. Appellant Case was the one who "went through the pockets of the gentlemen that were lined up against the wall," taking their money and some other personal property.

[2] Appellant contends that the accused were not armed with any dangerous or deadly weapon, and that therefore the evidence does not sustain the verdict of guilty of robbery in the first degree. Pen. Code, § 211a. More specifically, the point is that there was no evidence that the revolvers used by these men were loaded. There is both direct and circumstantial evidence that the guns were loaded.

[3] Appellant contends that, because the burglary and robbery (though they might be two distinct offenses when standing alone) were parts of a single continuing transaction, they became merged into one and are punishable only as one offense; that to allow conviction and sentence on both charges would be a violation of the principle stated in the constitutional rule that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. This question was recently considered by this court in People v. Snyder, 239 P. 705. In that case the defendant, accused of both burglary and larceny, entered a house with intent to commit larceny, and after the entry was completed he committed the larceny. For the reasons therein stated and after careful review of the authorities, we sustained the conviction on both counts. The Supreme Court denied a rehearing. The reasoning of that decision fully applies to the present action.

[4] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict in this, that the evidence is not sufficient to establish a joint operation of act and intent on the part of appellant, and particularly that the evidence shows that when the crime was committed "he was under threats and menaces sufficient to show that he had reasonable cause to and did believe his life was endangered if he refused." The testimony of appellant, which was to some extent corroborated by the testimony of defendant Brown, was to the effect that appellant, together with Brown and Nelson, came to the Logan house in an automobile; that until they had arrived at the door appellant believed that they were going to this place for the purpose of playing a game of poker; that Brown and Nelson had concealed from appellant the real purpose which they then had in view; that Nelson entered the house first, Case second, and Brown third; that Brown ordered appellant to enter and enforced his order by the use of a gun pressed against the body of appellant; that appellant in taking the money and jewelry acted under Brown's and Nelson's orders to "shake them down"; that throughout the transaction appellant acted solely under the influence of force and fear of said other defendants. But there is other evidence inconsistent with the testimony above indicated. Mr. Logan testified that when the defendants entered the room the two men with guns came in first, and appellant came last. From this testimony alone, together with the evidence showing appellant's further participation in the transaction, the jury was justified in believing that appellant was not forced into the room by Brown following him "with a gun in his ribs," but that, on the contrary, appellant was a voluntary actor in the transaction.

In addition to the foregoing points, counsel for appellant contends that the court committed sundry errors in its rulings on objections to offered evidence, and in the instructions to the jury, and in refusal of requested instructions, and that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct, with resulting prejudice to appellant. These matters have been examined and considered in their bearing upon the merits of the appeal. If there be any error it has not, in our opinion, resulted in an unfair trial of the case or any miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Where defendant, prosecuted for assault with deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, presented issue of self-defense, held that, notwithstanding he testified that he fired shot to summon assistance, court did not err in giving instruction on subject of self-defense.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Charles Cupp was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant was informed against on a charge of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, he entered a plea of not guilty, a trial was had in the trial court sitting with a jury, the jury returned a verdict, guilty as charged, the defendant made a motion for a new trial, his motion was denied, and a judgment of conviction was entered against him. He has appealed from the order denying his motion for a new trial and from the judgment.

On the evening of the 3d of March, 1925, the defendant entered the Panama Theater and took a seat in the front row. A little later a small boy entered and took a seat on the defendant's left and another small boy entered and took a seat on the defendant's right. During the evening Harry W. Crowley, a police officer, dressed in civilian clothes, and Frank J. McCarthy, his friend, entered the theater and took seats a few rows behind the defendant. The police officer and his companion were acquainted with Chester Conkling, the proprietor, and attended the theater partly to visit the proprietor and partly to see the picture that was being presented. As the performance proceeded the police officer observed certain actions on the part of the defendant that caused him to suspect that the defendant was committing certain acts contributing to the delinquency of the small boys. He excused himself from his companion and held a conversation with the proprietor. Later the police officer took another position where he could the better observe the defendant and his actions. During the evening the proprietor went down the aisle on three different occasions specially to observe if any one of his patrons was misbehaving in any respect. Still later the police officer took a position where he could intercept the defendant and the boys as they came out of the theater. One of the boys arose from the seat above mentioned and went to where some women were seated and did not return to where the defendant was. The other boy and the defendant at a later time came out of the theater. As they approached the police officer the officer testified that he stopped them, and, directing McCarthy to watch the defendant, Crowley proceeded to make inquiries of the boy as to what had happened. In reply to a question propounded to him Crowley stated that the conversation with the boy was held within the presence of the defendant, and thereupon Crowley proceeded to relate the conversation that had taken place. Among other things, he stated that the boy had stated to him the acts committed by the defendant, which need not be recited at this time, but which confirmed the suspicions of the officer. Thereupon Crowley turned to the defendant, who stood nearby with his hands in his coat pockets. As Crowley turned to him he remarked to the defendant, "You are a fine man, aren't you?" The defendant replied, "Yes, you son of a bitch, take that," and he fired a shot. Thereafter, as Crowley attempted to place the defendant under arrest, a struggle ensued. McCarthy went to the assistance of Crowley, and the struggle continued. Later some bystanders assisted, and the defendant was handcuffed. During the struggle the police officer drew his own pistol and held it by the muzzle; he hit the defendant over the head, using the pistol as a club. After the defendant had been handcuffed a call was put in for the patrol wagon, and when it arrived the defendant was taken to the hospital to be treated for the cuts caused by the strokes he had received over the head. The foregoing facts were fully testified to by the police officer and corroborated by the testimony of Frank J. McCarthy and the testimony of Chester Conkling. The boy who had made the statement to the officer stood by until about the time the shot was fired, and then in the excitement he disappeared and the record does not disclose his name, but does disclose the fact that he has not since been seen by the prosecuting witness. The defendant took the stand in his own behalf and testified to the occurrences of the evening and claimed that he had been guilty of no act looking to the delinquency of the boys; that he knew nothing of the reasons why he was stopped on going out of the theater; that he believed that he was being held up; and that he fired the shot for the purpose of summoning assistance to prevent his being held up and robbed.

[1] From the testimony of McCarthy the appellant quotes passages showing that at the time Officer Crowley was talking to the small boy the defendant was so far away that he could not hear the conversation which took place. Thereupon the appellant claims that the trial court committed error in allowing the police officer to state before the jury what was said to him by the small boy. The point is without merit. Before reciting the conversation the witness Crowley testified that the conversation was held within the presence of the defendant; it was made in the presence and hearing of the defendant. Under these circumstances it was not improper to allow the witness to recite the conversation.

[2] The appellant also contends that Officer Crowley had no authority to make the arrest by stopping the defendant as he came out of the theater. As we understand him, his argument is that the offense, if any, committed by the defendant while seated in the front row with the small boys, was a misdemeanor, and that Officer Crowley did not have a warrant when he stopped the defendant as the defendant was going out of the theater. There are two answers to the point. The record does not disclose whether the officer had procured or had not procured a warrant. Furthermore, it was the claim of Officer Crowley that a public offense had been committed or attempted in his presence, and therefore that he did not need a warrant to authorize him to make an arrest. Pen. Code, § 836.

[3] The appellant makes another point that is not altogether clear, but as we understand him it is his claim that when he fired the shot he did not attempt to shoot at Officer

Crowley, but, as he testified, the shot was fired for the purpose of summoning assistance. In connection with this point there is no claim that any evidence was improperly admitted or that any was improperly excluded. All of the facts were presented to the jury. It was therefore a question for the jury to determine what was the intention of the defendant at the time he fired the shot, and, as the record stands, this court has no power to disturb the finding of the jury thereon.

[4] On the trial the appellant presented the issue of self-defense and examined each juror, on his voir dire examination, on the subject of the juror's prejudice, or want of prejudice, as to that defense. Later the appellant testified that he acted in self-defense. The trial court, among other things, instructed the jury on the subject of self-defense. The appellant does not claim that any one of the instructions was an erroneous statement of the law, but he does claim that instructions on self-defense should not have been given in the instant case. In this connection he quotes his own testimony to the effect that the shot was fired to summon assistance and that he had not made the claim that he fired to defend himself from the acts of Officer Crowley when the officer made the statement, "You are a fine man, aren't you?" and took hold of the lapel of the defendant's coat. The record is not to be judged solely by a consideration of the testimony given by the defendant. Finally, in view of the whole record, we are not inclined to the opinion that the instructions were given in an improper case.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ☞1002.

Appellate court cannot substitute its opinion of facts for that of jury, where evidence is conflicting and is sufficient to sustain verdict.

2. Trial ☞296(11)—Instruction that jury, in assessing damages, should not indulge in speculation or be swayed by sympathy or prejudice, but should be controlled by evidence and law, held to overcome objection that instructions given authorized jury to disregard evidence.

Instruction that, if jury found for plaintiff, they should not, in fixing damages, indulge in speculation or be swayed by sympathy or prejudice, but should be controlled by evidence and the law, held to overcome objection that instruction that jury might fix recovery in accordance with their sound discretion implied that they might disregard evidence, and refusal of instruction that they must decide case solely on evidence was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by John M. Nielsen and another, as executors of the estate of Anna M. Nielsen, deceased, substituted for Anna M. Nielsen, against E. Gottschalk & Co., Incorporated, to recover damages for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gallagher, Simpson & Hays, of Fresno, for appellant.

Theodore M. Stuart, of Fresno, for respondents.

YORK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of the above-named Anna M. Nielsen, now deceased, but alive at the time of the rendition of judgment. The judgment was rendered in favor of the original plaintiff herein against the defendant for the sum of $20,000, by reason of injuries sustained by her through negligence of the defendant. The substitution of the executors, as such, has been regularly made herein.

[1] There is substantial conflict in the evidence. But, even if the greater weight of the evidence is on the side of the defendant, there is sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, and this court cannot substitute its opinion of the facts for that of the jury. It is claimed by the appellant that that portion of the evidence which sustains the judgment is inherently improbable. After an examination of the entire case, we cannot say that this is so, nor can we say the amount of the verdict is excessive.

[2] Concerning the court's instructions to the jury, appellant contends that two of the instructions given, relating to the assessment of damages, informed the jury that with respect to certain elements of damage they might fix the amount to be recovered in accordance with their sound discretion, and (by implication) that in so doing they might disregard the evidence. Supplementing their criticism of those instructions, counsel for appellant further insist that the court erred in refusing an instruction requested by them, telling the jurors that they must decide the case solely upon the facts as shown to them by the evidence. On both branches of these objections, it seems to us to be a sufficient reply that the court did instruct the jury as follows:

"If you should decide to find the verdict in favor of the plaintiff in this case, then, in the determination of the amount of such verdict, you are not to indulge in speculation nor should you be swayed by sympathy or prejudice, but you should be controlled wholly by the evidence and the law."

Taken as a whole, the instructions given by the court fully and fairly stated the law of the case to the jury.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Wills  499—Where testatrix left proceeds of residue of property to nephews and nieces, children of niece who predeceased testatrix held not entitled to inherit (Civ. Code, §§ 1310, 1337).

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 1310, 1337, where testatrix by will of 1923 left proceeds of residue of estate to nieces and nephews, children of niece who died in 1907 held, in proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, to determine heirship, not entitled to inherit portion which their mother would have inherited.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Josephine B. Watson, deceased. Action by Ruth Lowry Salberg and another against Ella Coombs and others. Judgment for respondents, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Powers, Riter & Cowan, of Salt Lake City, Utah, and Wm. Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

John A. Rush, Cedric E. Johnson, and Charles H. Taylor, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. Josephine B. Watson, a resident of Los Angeles, died August 6, 1923, and left an olographic will. The will was admitted to probate, and thereafter this proceeding was commenced under the provisions of section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, to determine heirship and the beneficiaries under the will. The trial court made and entered its order in favor of the respondents, and Ruth L. Salberg and Emily K. Eiermann, grandnieces, have appealed from the order.

The appeal presents one point and that is whether grandnieces were included as beneficiaries under the terms of the will. The will, as above stated, was olographic and was as follows:

"April 21, 1923.

"I, Josephine B. Watson, in case of my death, will my husband, S. H. Watson, $10,000, ten thousand dollars—The remainder of my property & means to be sold and the proceeds divided equally among my nieces and nephews—share and share alike including James A. Tracey of Broudy Center, Iowa, nephew of my deceased husband—Stephen Green. This is my last will and wish."

One of decedent's nieces, Mrs. Lowry, died in 1907, leaving her surviving two daughters, Ruth Salberg and Emily Eiermann, the appellants. The decedent made her will on April 21, 1923, and died on August 6, 1923.

The appellants cite section 1310 of the Civil Code and argue that as their mother was a niece, but is dead, as her descendants they are entitled to inherit the portion which their mother would have inherited. In support of their position they cite many authorities from other jurisdictions. Kehl v. Taylor, 114 N. E. 125, 275 Ill. 346, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 948; note, 3 A. L. R. 1688. In reply the respondents cite section 1337 of the Civil Code and argue that as the nephews and nieces constitute a class only those persons will be included who at the testator's death answered the description. In support of that contention respondents cite and rely on Estate of Hittell, 75 P. 53, 141 Cal. 432; Estate of Murphy, 106 P. 230, 157 Cal. 63, 137 Am. St. Rep. 110; and Estate of Willson, 153 P. 927, 171 Cal. 449. In this connection they also cite authorities from other jurisdictions. See note, 5 Ann. Cas. 243-245. The question last presented is one on which the courts in the various jurisdictions do not agree. As will be seen from an examination of the authorities above cited, there are well-considered cases that may be cited in favor of the appellants and others that may be cited in favor of the respondents. Among cases of the latter class is the decision in Estate of Willson, 153 P. 927, 171 Cal. 449. This court is controlled by that case.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Jacob FUHR, Defendant and Appellant. (Cr. 2815.) (Supreme Court of California. May 7, 1926.) In Bank. Motion to dismiss appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Alameda County, Fred V. Wood, Judge, of conviction of murder of the first degree with sentence of death. Motion granted. Littleton & Hunt, and Myron Harris, all of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, C. J. The defendant, Jacob Fuhr, was convicted in the superior court of Alameda county of the crime of murder in the first degree and judgment was pronounced and entered against him sentencing him to be hanged. An appeal from the judgment to this court has been submitted and is pending decision herein. It appears from the affidavit of Frank Barnet, sheriff of the county of Alameda, that the defendant, Fuhr, on or about the 23d day of January, 1926, escaped from the county jail in the county of Alameda, wherein he was confined. He has not since been apprehended and is now a fugitive from justice. Supported by the affidavit of the sheriff, in whose custody the defendant was held, relating these facts, the Attorney General, by motion, asks this court to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the defendant, Fuhr, has escaped from custody and is now at large. Upon the authority of People v. Redinger, 55 Cal. 290, 36 Am. Rep. 32, People v. Elkins, 122 Cal. 654, 55 P. 599, and People v. Clark, 245 P. 1112, it is ordered that the appeal of said Jacob Fuhr in this case be and the same stand dismissed, unless the defendant, within 30 days from this date, return to the custody of the sheriff of the county of Alameda, state of California. It is further ordered that a copy of this order be served upon the attorneys for the defendant within 5 days hereof be considered in determining application of an involuntary payment.

4. Payment $\S$ 41(2).

Court, when required to make application of an involuntary payment, must make it so as to best protect and maintain rights of all parties.

5. Payment $\S$ 38(1), 39(1), 41(1), 47(1)—Neither debtor, creditor, nor guarantor can direct application of involuntary payments made pursuant to compulsory process, but application must be made by court in accordance with equity of parties.

Where payments were made by judgment debtor and his guarantor pursuant to compulsory process, they were not voluntary, and hence neither debtor nor creditor nor guarantor had any right to direct application of payments, but such application must be made by court in accordance with equities of parties under particular facts of case.

6. Payment $\S$ 47(1)—Guarantor of judgment debtor can have involuntary payment of co-guarantor credited as of date of payment on his then contract obligation.

Where judgment creditor collected sum from judgment debtor's guarantor by compulsory process, held that coguarantor was entitled to have such involuntary payment credited as of date of its payment upon his then contract obligation.

7. Payment $\S$ 47(1)—Judgment creditor could, as against guarantor, have judgment debtor's involuntary payment applied to unsecured item rather than one covered by guaranty.

Where involuntary payment was made by judgment debtor on account of items not secured by contract of guaranty, held that, as against guarantor, judgment creditor could insist that payment be applied to satisfaction of such item, rather than one secured by guaranty.

8. Payment $\S$ 46(1)—Where one obligation is secured better than another, application of involuntary payment may be made on least secured obligation.

When obligations are of same class, a ratable application of involuntary payment may be made, but, where one obligation is secured better than another, application may be made on obligation, security for which is most precarious.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Guy R. Crump, Judge.

Action by the Ohio Electric Car Company against Gideon Le Sage. From an insufficient judgment in its favor, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Parker & Parker, of Pasadena, for appellant.

198 Cal. 705

OHIO ELECTRIC CAR CO. v. LE SAGE. (L. A. 8084.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 2, 1926.
Rehearing Denied July 1, 1926.)

1. Payment $\S$ 47(1).

Civ. Code, § 1479, governing application of voluntary payments, is inapplicable to question of application of involuntary payments made by judgment debtor to judgment creditor, involving rights of judgment debtor's guarantor.

2. Payment $\S$ 38(1), 39(1), 41(1).

As between debtor and creditor, neither can make application of involuntary payments, and rules governing application of voluntary payments by court are inapplicable.

3. Payment $\S$ 47(1).

When interest of guarantor has intervened, as between debtor and creditor, his rights must Julius V. Patrosso and C. C. Mishler, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. On January 12, 1915, the appellant entered into a written contract with E. D. and R. B. MacIntosh, doing business under the name of Washington Street Electric Garage Company, by which the garage company was granted the exclusive right to purchase appellant's automobiles for resale in the city of Los Angeles. The order on each car was to be accompanied by a cash payment of $250 and the balance was to be due and payable on shipment. At the time of the execution of the contract and as a part of the same transaction, the respondent and one George E. F. Duffet entered into a contract of guaranty with the appellant. This agreement was indorsed on the principal contract, and is as follows:

"Whereas we are interested in the Washington Street Electric Garage Company and at our request the Ohio Electric Car Company has consented to deliver certain automobiles to the said Washington Street Electric Garage Company without payment therefor in cash, and that the said Ohio Electric Car Company has, further, at our request, entered into the foregoing contract with the Washington Street Electric Garage Company, we hereby guarantee to hold the Ohio Electric Car Company whole and harmless from any and all loss or damage by reason of any transaction or transactions between it and the Washington Street Electric Garage Company.

Geo. E. F. Duffet.
"Gideon Le Sage."

Pursuant to said contract, the appellant, on January 20, 1915, shipped to the garage company automobile No. 5041, at the price of $2,178.70, upon which the sum of $250 was paid, leaving an unpaid balance of $1,928.70. On July 14, 1915, appellant also shipped to the garage company automobile No. 5003 at the same price, upon which the sum of $250 was paid and the balance of $1,978.70 was unpaid. On February 22, 1916, the garage company purchased from the appellant sundry automobile parts and two used cars, for which it became indebted to the appellant as of that date in the sum of $1,144.66, and which was not paid. Thereafter the appellant commenced an action in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles against the MacIntoshes, said Duffet, and Gideon Le Sage, the respondent herein, for the purpose of enforcing collection of all three of said items from the defendants named in said action. On March 30, 1917, appellant recovered a joint and several judgment against all of said defendants for the sum of $5,453.56, being the balance due, with interest, on all of said items, together with $36 costs. The respondent prosecuted an appeal from that judgment and obtained a reversal thereof on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against him, in that said complaint charged him as a principal obligor, whereas his contract constituted him a conditional guarantor or a guarantor against loss only. Ohio Electric Car Co. v. Le Sage, 182 Cal. 450, 188 P. 982. Said reversal was ineffective as to the other defendants named in said action, and said judgment became final as to them, including Duffet, whose contract of guaranty was the same as Le Sage's, and who, had he appealed, would no doubt have obtained a reversal as to himself.

Thereafter the appellant commenced the present action against the respondent, as sole defendant. It alleged in its first cause of action the recovery of the judgment in the former action against the MacIntoshes and Duffet, and that the respondent was indebted to the appellant in the amount thereof, in the second and fifth causes of action the unpaid balance of $1,978.70 on each of said new cars, and in the third cause of action the amount due and unpaid on account of automobile parts and used cars in the sum of $1,144.66. The fourth cause of action alleged an account stated as to the item included in count 3. In its prayer, the appellant sought recovery from the respondent on all of said causes of action.

The answer denied all liability on the part of respondent, and, as affirmative defenses, alleged the collection by the appellant on January 26, 1921, of the sum of $1,810.19 pursuant to execution process against the property of Duffet and the collection by the appellant from E. D. MacIntosh on August 8, 1921, of the further sum of $1,569.55 pursuant to a sale of her property under execution issued in the former action. The respondent prayed that credit be given to him on account of said collections in any judgment that might be entered against him. The court found that the appellant had obtained the judgment in the former action, but that the respondent was not liable to the appellant on account of said judgment; that the respondent was indebted to the appellant in the sum of $1,928.70, being the unpaid balance due on car No. 5003, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from July 14, 1915; that the respondent was also indebted to the appellant in the further sum of $1,928.70 as the unpaid balance due on car No. 5041, with like interest from January 30, 1915. It also found that the respondent, under his contract of guaranty, was not bound to pay the item of $1,144.66 on account of automobile parts and used cars. It further found that the appellant had collected from Duffet by compulsory process the sum of $1,810.19 on January 26, 1921, and the sum of $1,569.55 by like process from E. D. MacIntosh on August 8, 1921. The court concluded that the respondent was indebted to the appellant in the sum of $3,109.19 and costs. Judgment was entered accordingly, and from that judgment the plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll alone, claiming that the judgment in its favor should have been at least $4,402.50.

No computations are incorporated in the record or in the briefs of counsel, but from the facts found and the amount of the judgment it is apparent that the judgment was determined by ratably apportioning both collections between the amount for which the appellant obtained judgment in the previous action and the amount for which the court gave judgment herein. The appellant is insisting upon the application of said collections, or at least one of them, to its claims and demands not included within the respondent's contract of guaranty at the judgment rate of interest.

[1-3] The only question presented on this appeal is as to the propriety of the application of said payments by the trial court, and it involves rules governing the application of involuntary payments made by the judgment debtor to the judgment creditor, having in mind the rights of the judgment debtor's guarantor, whose contract of guaranty is security for some but not for all of the items included in the former judgment. We are satisfied that section 1479 of the Civil Code has no application to this situation. That section governs the application of payments voluntarily made by the debtor, or by the creditor, if the debtor fail to make such application, and, where the application is made by neither the debtor nor the creditor, each having had the right so to do as provided in the section, and where the interests of third parties have not intervened. As between the debtor and the creditor the general rule is stated with supporting authorities in 30 Cyc. at page 1228, as follows:

"Neither the debtor nor the creditor has a right to make an application of an involuntary payment, and the rules governing the application of voluntary payments by the court where neither party has applied them do not govern involuntary payments. Usually the application by the court will be pro rata, but in some jurisdictions involuntary payments insufficient to pay all claims are applied by the court so as to pay the unsecured rather than the secured claims."

When the interests of a third party, such as a guarantor, have intervened, his rights under the particular circumstances of the case must be taken into consideration. The rule in such cases is also stated in 30 Cyc. at page 1251, as follows:

"Third persons, such as guarantors, sureties, indorsers, and the like, secondarily liable on one of the debts, cannot control the application of a payment by either the debtor or the creditor, and neither the debtor nor the creditor need apply the payment in the manner most beneficial to such persons. So, where neither party applies the payment, the court is not required to apply it so as to exonerate such third persons, although their rights will be considered."

[4] An extended excursion into the authorities, in addition to those cited by counsel, has convinced us that it is impossible to find or to lay down any hard and fast rule applicable to all cases, for the reason that, when the duty devolves upon the court to make the application of an involuntary payment, such application must be made in such a manner, in view of all the circumstances of the particular case, as will best protect and maintain the rights of all parties.

"No specific rule can be laid down that will embrace all the cases that may arise for its application, inasmuch as the infinite variety of human transactions cannot be included within the limits of a formulated rule; and therefore courts must be governed by principles rather than by fixed rules." Murdock v. Clarke, 88 Cal. 384, 391, 26 P. 601, 603.

[5, 6] The payments made by Duffet and E. D. MacIntosh were pursuant to compulsory process. They were therefore not voluntary, and in such case neither the debtor nor the creditor nor the guarantor had any right to direct the application of the proceeds, but such application must be made by the court in accordance with the equities of the parties under the particular facts of the case. Crisman v. Lanterman, 149 Cal. 647, 87 P. 89, 117 Am. St. Rep. 167; Murdock v. Clarke, supra; Irvine & Muir Lumber Co. v. Holmes, 26 Cal. App. 453, 147 P. 229; 20 Cal. Jur. 937. In determining the equities, it would seem proper and necessary to look behind the form of the prior judgment, upon which the respondent was not bound, and to consider the nature and source of the obligations on which the payments should be applied and the relationship of the parties thereto to the parties to this action. In considering those factors, it should first be remembered that the respondent was not finally a party to the former action and was not bound by the judgment entered therein on March 30, 1917. The rights and liabilities of the parties to this action were therefore not defined nor established by that judgment. Those rights and liabilities were determined primarily by and under the contract between the appellant and the respondent, apart from any consideration of the former judgment. Under that contract the respondent was bound to hold the appellant harmless on account of the default of the MacIntoshes in their nonpayment for the two new cars. Upon that default he was liable for the unpaid balance of the purchase price in each case, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date of the shipment. According to the findings herein, the combined unpaid balance was the sum of $3,857.40. Appellant was therefore entitled to recover that amount from the respondent, together with interest at 6 per cent. per annum to date of judgment herein, less any credits equitably deductible. On January 26, 1921, the liability of the respondent to the appellant on account of both principal and interest was $5,190.78. When $1,810.19 was collected on that date from Duffet, the respondent's coguarantor, the respondent was entitled to have that payment credited as of that date upon his then contract obligation. It was to his interest that it should be so applied. It was a matter of indifference to the MacIntoshes how it was applied, for the reason that any application of it would reduce pro tanto their obligation to appellant. It was of special interest to Duffet to have it so applied, because it reduced to that extent the amount of any contribution which the respondent might thereafter seek to exact from him. And the appellant is not in position to insist that it be otherwise applied, because it could not equitably obtain double payment of that sum from the coguarantors.

[7, 8] As to the collection of $1,569.55 on August 8, 1921, from E. D. MacIntosh, one of the principal obligors, a different situation is presented. On the date of that collection the indebtedness of the MacIntoshes to the appellant on account of the item for automobile parts, used cars, and costs in the former action with interest thereon amounted to more than the amount of said collection. It would seem that the appellant would have the right to insist that said collection be applied to the satisfaction of that item, for the reason that it was the least secured, lacking, as it did, the security of the respondent's contract of guaranty. When the obligations are of the same class it has been held that a ratable application may properly be made (Star Mill & Lumber Co. v. Porter, 4 Cal. App. 470, 88 P. 497; 20 Cal. Jur. 941), but, where the obligations are not the same, or where one obligation is secured better than another, the application may rightly be made on the obligation the security for which is the most precarious (California National Bank v. Ginty, 108 Cal. 153, 41 P. 38; Murdock v. Clarke, supra). In the early case of Field v. Holland, 10 U. S. (6 Cranch) 8, 28, 3 L. Ed. 136, Chief Justice Marshall, in applying the rule where the power of application devolves upon the court, stated:

"It being equitable that the whole debt should be paid, it cannot be inequitable to extinguish first those debts for which the security is most precarious."

When the application of said credits is thus made in accordance with what appear to be the equities of the parties under the peculiar circumstances here presented, the result is that the respondent is not entitled to credit on account of the collection from E. D. MacIntosh; that the collection of $1,810.19 on January 26, 1921, from Duffet reduced the respondent's obligation to $3,380.59 as of the date of said collection. That sum, with interest thereon at 6 per cent. per annum, fixed the indebtedness of the respondent to the appellant at the date of the judgment herein, on January 24, 1924, at $3,987.97, or $878.78 more than was allowed by the trial court. From this result it will be seen that the respondent is not charged with more than was his legal obligation, and the appellant receives no more from the respondent than was from him justly due.

[9] The contention of the respondent that the appellant was not diligent in pursuing his claims against the principal obligors is not supported by the record. The court found, in effect, that the appellant had exercised reasonable diligence to satisfy its claims against the MacIntoshes prior to the commencement of the present action. As this appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, the said finding must be deemed supported by the evidence, and is not subject to attack on the ground that it is unsupported.

The judgment appealed from is therefore modified by increasing the amount of said judgment by the sum of $878.78, thus fixing the amount of the judgment to be entered in favor of the appellant and against the respondent at the sum of $3,987.97 on the going down of the remittitur. As so modified, the judgment is affirmed, the appellant to recover its cost of appeal.

HARMAN v. HARMAN. (S. F. 11558.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 2, 1926.)

1. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 184(4).

In divorce action, every intendment is in favor of the findings of the trial court.

2. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 150(2).

In divorce action, finding that allegations of complaint are true implies that sufficient evidence, properly corroborated, and satisfying Civ. Code, § 130, was adduced.

3. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 93(3)—Divorce complaint, alleging cruelty in that wife told husband that she did not love him, prevented him from disciplining children, etc., states cause of action.

Divorce complaint, alleging that wife told husband that she did not love him, prevented him from disciplining children, and, while driving automobile, continually gave directions as to its operation, and stated he was unreasonable in his demands for sexual intercourse, etc., states a cause of action.

4. Divorce $\hookrightarrow$ 154.

When divorce complaint adequately states cause of action, and its allegations are sufficiently proved, trial court is not authorized to deny a divorce.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action of divorce by Claude H. Harman against Jessie Harman, to which defendant filed a cross-complaint for separate maintenance. Judgment denying relief to either party, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

T. G. Negrich, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry I. Stafford, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an action for divorce prosecuted by Claude H. Harman, the husband, plaintiff and appellant, against Jessie Harman, the wife, defendant and respondent. The complaint is based upon several asserted acts of cruelty alleged to have been inflicted upon the appellant by the respondent. Respondent filed an answer and cross-complaint for separate maintenance wherein she sets forth three specifications of cruelty. The case went to trial upon the issues, and the trial court, among other things, found that the several allegations of the complaint charging cruelty were true, and that the several allegations of the cross-complaint charging cruelty were untrue. Judgment was entered, however, denying relief to either party, and awarding counsel fees and costs to the respondent.

The appellant asserts that—

“The only question for decision on this appeal is: After the trial court finds that plaintiff has established his right to a divorce, can the court arbitrarily deny him a decree?”

In support of a negative reply to this question the appellant cites, among other cases, Lewis v. Lewis, 167 Cal. 732, 733, 141 P. 367, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 675. That case declares that—

“The court is not authorized to deny a divorce where the evidence of the plaintiff, adequately corroborated, establishes the truth of the allegations of the complaint. Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick, 152 Cal. 316, 92 P. 853; Benkert v. Benkert, 32 Cal. 467. A case having been made out, there is no arbitrary power to grant or refuse the relief. But, in every action for divorce, the court is called upon to determine whether the evidence before it does establish the truth of the charge made in the complaint. As in other cases, every intendment is in favor of the finding made. * * *

[1, 2] In the instant case, we have not before us a transcript of the testimony taken at the trial, but, every intendment being in favor of the findings made, the statement is not unwarranted that sufficient evidence, properly corroborated, must have been adduced by the appellant in support of the allegations in his complaint charging cruelty, for, as already indicated, the trial court found that these several allegations were true. This would necessarily satisfy the provisions of section 130, Civil Code. The allegations of the complaint being sustained by the findings, and keeping in view that the allegations of cruelty in respondent's cross-complaint were found to be untrue, it merely remains to determine whether the several alleged acts of cruelty charged in the complaint, if proved, would warrant the granting of an interlocutory decree to the appellant.

[3, 4] The complaint, in substance, sets forth that on many occasions the respondent told appellant that she did not love him, but lived with him because he was a good provider; that respondent has continually demanded complete control of the children, and has prevented appellant from disciplining them; that respondent frequently told appellant that his mother was “no good,” and that his sister was a “whore”; that, while driving, respondent would continually issue orders and directions to appellant as to the operation of the automobile; that repeatedly respondent has told appellant “that his only idea of marriage is to have a female body at his disposal, and that he is lustful, meaning thereby that plaintiff was unreasonable in his demands of defendant for sexual intercourse”; that appellant is a locomotive engineer, and, upon his seeking to kiss respondent when he returned from trips, she would tell him “that it was his lust for sexual intercourse that prompted him to kiss, or seek to kiss, her * * *”; that respondent has often threatened to commit suicide, stating that appellant would, in such event, "be branded as her murderer"; that, though plaintiff gave his wages to respondent, she has continually complained of having nothing but "rags"; that respondent has called appellant "vile names, too opprobrious to be set out in this complaint"; that respondent on numerous occasions has told appellant's friends that he is "lustful, in that he was unreasonable in his demands upon her for sexual intercourse * * *"; that respondent has frequently informed appellant that she could have married men of wealth; that all of the several alleged acts have greatly disturbed and injured appellant and interfered with his rest and sleep, making him unfit to bear his responsibilities as a locomotive engineer; and "that, by reason of the acts and conduct of defendant as hereinbefore alleged, she wrongfully inflicted upon plaintiff grievous bodily injury and grievous mental suffering."

In our opinion, these several allegations adequately state a cause of action for divorce, and, as already indicated, it must be assumed, in view of the findings that they were amply supported and proved by sufficient evidence, properly corroborated. Under these circumstances, the trial court is not authorized to deny a divorce. Lewis v. Lewis, supra.

The trial court is directed to enter an interlocutory decree of divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty in favor of the plaintiff and appellant. It is also directed to make such provision for the custody, support, and education of the two minor children of the parties, and for the division of the community property as it may deem just.

Judgment reversed with directions.

JACOBY v. WOLFF. (S. F. 11010.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1926.)

1. Taxation ⚡734(4)—Description of property on assessment roll, when sold for delinquent taxes, held sufficient.

Description of property sold for delinquent taxes, contained on face of assessment roll, held sufficient, where it was not in a form to positively mislead a person looking at assessment roll or calculated to mislead him.

2. Appeal and error ⚡204(3), 1050(1)—That court admitted parol proof as to effect of description of property set forth in tax deed held not ground for complaint.

In suit to quiet title to land as against holder of a tax deed thereon, that court permitted witness to testify that numerals appearing upon assessment were not part of description of property and were arbitrarily placed there by assessor held not ground for complaint, where no objection was made, and numerals did not in themselves operate to cloud true description of property, so that it could not have been readily obtained by reference to remaining description as it appeared upon assessment roll, and which, apart from the numerals, correctly described the property.

3. Statutes ⚡205—Statute providing complete plan for sale of property for nonpayment of taxes must be construed as a whole.

Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771, and 3785b, comprising a complete plan for sale of property for nonpayment of taxes, must be construed together as a correlated whole rather than as separate and distinct enactments.

4. Taxation ⚡627—Statutes providing for sale of property for nonpayment of taxes construed as to delinquent list to be published.

Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771, 3785b, relating to sale of property for nonpayment of taxes, manifest a legislative intention to provide for publication of a delinquent list to give notice to defaulting taxpayers and prospective purchasers of what property remains unredeemed and what property will be sold, which list should include therein property upon which taxes have become delinquent, and which will be sold at public auction, or to which a deed of such property was made by state after full five-year period of redemption had elapsed.

5. Taxation ⚡660—Sale of land for nonpayment of taxes not rendered invalid by advertising thereof for sale prior to expiration of redemption period.

Sale of property for nonpayment of taxes held not rendered invalid, in view of Pol. Code, §§ 3764, 3771, and 3785b, by advertising of property for sale prior to expiration of five-year statutory period for redemption, especially where such property was not actually sold until three days after expiration of such period.

6. Taxation ⚡659—Tax collector, in ascertaining post office address of delinquent property owner, need not go beyond examination of assessment roll during period of delinquency.

Inquiry of tax collector in endeavoring to ascertain post office address of delinquent property owner need not extend beyond an examination of assessment roll from date of delinquent assessment down to time of assessment last made before sale.

7. Taxation ⚡659—Sale of land for nonpayment of taxes not invalid, because statute relating to mailing of copy of published notice of sale was not shown to have been complied with.

Sale of land for nonpayment of taxes held not invalid because compliance with Pol. Code, § 3771, relating to mailing of copy of published notice of sale, was not shown, where post office address of landowner did not appear on assessment books during years of delinquency, and it did not appear that such address was actually known to tax collector.

8. Taxation ⚡744—Sale of land for taxes not invalid because no deed had ever been made to state.

Sale of land for nonpayment of taxes held not invalid because no deed had ever been made to state under Pol. Code, § 3785, where sale was had under sections 3764, 3771, 3785b, permitting conveyance to be made to purchaser of property without formality of making a deed to state in first instance; sections 3897 and 3898 being inapplicable.

9. Taxation ⚡658(1)—Notice of sale of land for nonpayment of taxes not invalidated because of defect in form.

Notice of sale of land for nonpayment of taxes, published by tax collector under Pol. Code, § 3771, held not invalidated because of slight discrepancy between notice as published and section 3780; such statute not attempting to prescribe form of notice to be given by tax collector, but merely time within which redemption of property may be made by delinquent taxpayer.

10. Taxation ⚡658(1)—Precise form of notice of sale of land for nonpayment of taxes immaterial, if substantially complying with statute.

Precise form of notice of sale of land for taxes is immaterial, so long as it is in substantial compliance with Pol. Code, § 3780, and with reasonable certainty conveys notice of the intended sale.

11. Taxation ⚡788(5)—Tax deed, offered in evidence as proof of defendant's chain of title, held not objectionable on ground that it was not admissible as prima facie proof of notice of sale.

Where tax deed in suit to quiet title was offered in evidence as proof of defendant's chain of title, it was not objectionable on ground that it was not admissible as prima facie proof that a copy of notice of sale was mailed to person to whom property was last assessed.

12. Taxation ⚡734(2).

Sale of land for nonpayment of taxes will not be invalidated because assessor when making assessment in computing penalties added on a half cent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by Harold Jacoby against Samuel Wolff, with cross-complaint by defendant. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Marcus D. Wolff, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harold Jacoby and Milton Shepardson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Upon a rehearing and reconsideration of this case, we are satisfied with the opinion originally rendered and therefore adopt the same as follows:

In this action to quiet title to a lot of land in the city of Oakland, plaintiff claimed title to said lot of land as the record owner thereof. Defendant claimed title to the same lot of land under a tax deed from the state. Plaintiff's complaint was drafted in the form ordinarily employed in actions of this character. The answer of the defendant, while admitting the plaintiff's claim of title in fee simple to the land in suit, denied that the plaintiff ever was the owner of said land. In addition to his answer, the defendant interposed a cross-complaint wherein he alleged that his claim of title to said land was founded upon a tax deed from the state of California, executed to him by the tax collector of Alameda county, pursuant to a sale, at public auction, to the defendant, for the nonpayment of state and county taxes assessed against said land which were then due, owing, and delinquent. All of the allegations of the cross-complaint by stipulation of counsel for the respective parties were deemed denied.

The plaintiff rested his case upon proof of the fact that the record title to the land in suit stood in his name. The defendant, in response to the general issue, and the issues raised by the cross-complaint and answer thereto, offered and there was received in evidence a tax deed from the state, conveying the property in suit to him, and supplemented this with proof of the several and various proceedings which culminated in the execution of that deed.

The trial of the case centered upon the issues relative to the sufficiency of the things done prior to the execution and delivery of the tax deed to the defendant. Upon the issues as made a judgment for the plaintiff was rendered and entered, based upon general findings to the effect that the plaintiff was at all of the times mentioned in the complaint the owner in fee of the land in suit, and that the defendant did not at any time own said land or have any interest therein. The findings of the trial court evidently proceeded upon the theory that the proceedings leading up to the tax sale, and which culminated in the tax deed from the state to the defendant, were irregular to the point of invalidity, and that, as a consequence, the record title of the plaintiff to the land in suit should prevail.

The facts of the case as revealed by the record before us are these:

In the year 1916 a tax was levied on the land in suit. Joseph Lavigne was the then owner of the land, and it was assessed to him. Subsequent thereto, on June 26, 1917, the said tax having become delinquent, a sale of said land was made to the state for the nonpayment of said tax. Thereafter, on June 2, 1922, pursuant to section 3764, Political Code, the tax collector published for the first time a notice that the five-year period allowed by law for the redemption of said property sold to the state for delinquent taxes would expire on the 27th day of June, 1922. Said property remaining unredeemed, and the sale thereof to the state being uncanceled at the expiration of said redemption period, the lot of land was sold to defendant Wolff on June 29, 1922, pursuant to the provisions of section 3771 of the Political Code. Subsequent thereto, on July 12, 1922, a deed was executed and delivered to defendant by the tax collector of Alameda county on behalf of the state pursuant to section 3785b of the Political Code.

Respondent contends, among other things, that the assessment in question is void because the description of the property, as it appears on the assessment roll, is defective to the point of being misleading. The description complained of appears on the assessment book in the following form, words, and figures:

Taxpayer's Name and Post Office Address.	School District.	Description of Property in Oakland City.	Lot.	Block.
Joseph I. Lavigne.	Oakland, formerly Lockwood.	Havenscourt map, filed of record in the office of the recorder of Alameda county.	23	35 3276

Upon this phase of the case we are in substantial accord with the reasoning and conclusion reached by Mr. Justice Sturtevant of the District Court of Appeal in an opinion rendered by him when the case was heard and determined by that court in the first instance, wherein he says:

"Turning to the map which was introduced in evidence we find at the top: 'Sheet No. 1, Havenscourt, Oakland, California.' The addition of the expression, 'Sheet No. 1,' is no more than though it were marked simply '1' as indicating a page. There is no material variance, therefore, between the map introduced in evidence and the map designated in the purported assessment.

"Commencing to examine the map, one finds that it has on its face a delineation of blocks 15-35, inclusive. One also finds that each block has delineated on it various lots of various sizes. One also finds that block 35 is subdivided into lots 1-52 inclusive. One also finds that there is no 3276 lot, block or otherwise, and that said numeral does not in any place appear on the face of said map.

"During the trial of the case, the defendant called as a witness H. F. Platts. Volume 45 of the Assessment Roll for the year 1916 having been identified, and page 192 having been introduced in evidence, the examination of the witness proceeded. In reply to questions propounded by the plaintiff's attorney, or the defendant's attorney, or the court, the witness testified: 'I am familiar with the method of assessment proceedings in the city of Oakland and I was familiar with the methods employed during the year 1916. There are blocks in the city of Oakland that have the number corresponding to No. 3276. This property has. There are some blocks in the city of Oakland that have this 3276 as an arbitrary number used by the assessor to locate the property. Not every block in the city of Oakland has an arbitrary number. Lots 1 to 100, and 1 to 112, have no other number. All the rest have. The numbers do not run consecutively. Some numbers appear in different places in the county. Some numbers will appear twice in the city of Oakland. Talking about the city of Oakland the annexed district might be 3276; I think there might be a 3212. That will appear again in the Claremont district. Within the city limits of the city of Oakland I think there are some. In using the number that I refer to, which I used on my direct examination, it is simply an arbitrary number that is used by the assessor's office for its own convenience exclusively. As the exigencies of the case require it, some of the arbitrary numbers are changed. It may be changed in one district this year and be an entirely different district next year. The supervisors of this county have never adopted a system of numbering for assessment purposes so far as I know. In the assessment of property in the city of Oakland, we have to deal with properties which are indicated on recorded maps. By giving arbitrary numbers to the blocks in different sections, the assessor has adopted a system for locating the assessment of this property other than by reference to the map by lot and block indicated thereon. The practice was to subdivide the assessments that they might be easily platted on our books and block number given for each page so that, if a new tract was opened, that tract was subdivided in lots that might create new blocks, say 3276 to 3300, meaning that naturally we would cut out that block and make these other numbers later on as the subdivision came along. We were also supposed to fill them up as fast as we could. Then there is supposed to be duplicate numbers too. This same number, 3276, might appear in our books in a different year in another section of the county. We try to have the numbers follow along for a few years, but the rule possibly is to change them in the district not quite so far out as Havenscourt. We had arbitrary numbers but they had to be changed in 1915 and 1916 by virtue of the assessor's authority—an arbitrary method to expedite the work. One deputy assessing in the Piedmont district will have to change certain numbers up there, although the numbers are reported given to the office, and another man may be operating in Emeryville; each has his section; they work simultaneously to get the assessment roll up. The number "3276" has been the uniform number applied to the particular property under controversy and has not been changed since 1916.'

"Looking back over the testimony given by Mr. Platts, it is patent that the number '3276' was no part of the assessment, that it was a memorandum for the convenience of the assessor; that the memorandum could have been in any other column, for instance in the column headed 'Remarks,' and would have had the same force and effect. It further appears that the memorandum might have been in the form of arbitrary letters instead of arbitrary numerals. No authority has been cited, and we know of none, which is to the effect that an arbitrary memorandum placed on the assessment roll by the assessor or any one else will operate to invalidate the assessment.

"A similar question was before the court in the leading case Bosworth v. Danzien, 25 Cal. 296. The lot involved in that case was situated at the corner of Center and Guerrero streets in San Francisco. The assessment contained a description, 'Lot commencing on the north-easterly corner of Center and Guerrero streets, thence easterly on Corbett street, 200 feet, thence at right angles northerly,' etc. The court calls attention to the fact that tax proceedings are in invitum. The landowner intends nothing. Regarding the rules which should be applied, at page 299 the court said: 'The maxim "Ut res magis valeat quam pereat" [that the thing may prevail, rather than be destroyed], is a canon, with reference to which, not only contracts and wills are to be construed, but statutes also—passed, as they are, without any direct co-operation or assent on the part of the citizen. The spirit of the maxim is that nothing should be destroyed merely for the sake of destruction. We have not, by our own examination, been able to find any adjudged case in which it has been held that a false call in an assessment roll, advertisement, or tax deed, necessarily vitiates a tax title. The rule as given in Tallman v. White, 2 N. Y. 66, is as follows: "An assessment of land is fatally defective and void, if it contains such a falsity in the designation or description of the parcel assessed as might probably mislead the owner and prevent him from ascertaining by the notices, that his land was to be sold or redeemed. Such mistake, or falsity, defeats one of the obvious and just purposes of the statute—that of giving to the owner an opportunity of preventing the sale by paying the tax." We accept the above decision, not more on the authority of the court by which it was pronounced, than on our entire conviction that it is correct in principle.

"The test, then, to which every false call occurring in the course of tax proceedings is to be subjected, is this: Has it probably had the effect to mislead the landowner in relation to the land assessed, advertised, and sold? In the case at bar, the description in the assessment roll begins at a point fixed with entire precision, and runs therefrom due east 200 feet. The superadded description of that line, "along Corbett street," was not, in our judgment, calculated to mislead the landowner, and for the manifest reason that it was impossible that the call should be true. The call was not only false, but absurd, and that, too, in the light of facts appearing on the face of the general description of the corner and line."

"In the case of Best v. Wohlford, 144 Cal. 733, 78 P. 293, the land in controversy was 'lot No. 4 in block No. 178 of a subdivision of the Rancho Rincon del Diablo, containing 14.42 acres of land, more or less, according to the official map thereof on file in the office of the county recorder of said San Diego county, state of California.' The defendant claimed under a tax deed describing the land as 'land lying and being within the said Escondido irrigation district * * * county of San Diego, state of California, described as follows, to wit: Lot four (4), block one hundred seventy eight (178), 14.42 acres, Rancho Rincon del Diablo.' In connection with the offer of the deed, the defendant thereupon offered evidence to prove that there is, and was at the time of said assessment under which the deed was made, but one lot 4 in block 178 in the Rancho Rincon del Diablo and that such fact is and was at the time of said assessment well known. Under objection the trial court sustained an objection to the tax deed and the offered evidence. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was relevant and competent and should have been admitted, and reversed the case.

"Lummer v. Unruh, 25 Cal. App. 97, 142 P. 914, was an action to quiet title. The plaintiff claimed title by adverse possession. The defendant attempted to show that he had paid the taxes. The plaintiff claimed that the assessments did not describe the property and were void. The lands were surveyed and platted in 1869 by Goldsworthy. The map was not filed of record until 1901. No one of the assessments referred to a map. On the trial of the case, the defendant introduced evidence to the effect that the Goldsworthy map was the only map on file which purported to be a map of the rancho; that long before the map was filed it was a well-known subdivision of the rancho; and that the assessments as worded described the boundaries so that the lands could be readily located. The court held that the objections of the plaintiff to the admission of the evidence referred to were without merit, and affirmed the judgment of the trial court.

"In the case of Fitzimons v. Atherton, 162 Cal. 630, 124 P. 250, it was held that a description of property in a tax deed as 'lying and being in the county of Kern, state of California, and described as follows, to wit: El. ½ of block 2 Kelly's addition to Delano,' may be explained and rendered certain by the introduction in evidence of the recorded map of Kelly's addition to Delano, and that there was no other recorded map of the addition.

"In the case of Reclamation Dist. No. 673 v. Diepenbrock, 168 Cal. 577, 143 P. 763, the court was considering an assessment made for reclamation purposes. The description contained in the assessment described the land by naming the adjacent owners. On the trial of the case the trial court received oral evidence. The north boundary as set forth in the original description contained the designation of one more adjacent tract than the amended call and the east boundary one less, while three tracts were added to the description to make the western boundary complete. The court held that the oral testimony was properly received and that the description was sufficient.

"[1] To know whether the property was assessed, the owner, purchaser, or other person must look at the assessment roll. In looking at the assessment roll, such person would find an arbitrary memorandum on nearly every single assessment. If he wanted further information as to the lot or block, the assessment contained reference to the map of Havenscourt. An examination of that map discloses no block 35/3276 and no block numbered 3276, but does disclose a block No. 35. In the language of the cases just cited, it cannot be said as a matter of law that the description contained on the face of the assessment roll was in a form to positively mislead such person, or was calculated to mislead him. He may not therefore complain."

culated to mislead him.'" Green v. Palmer (Cal. App.) 229 P. 876.

[2] Some contention is made that the trial court erroneously received in evidence parol proof to vary the description set forth in the deed and assessment roll when it permitted the witness Platts to testify that the numerals "3276," which appeared upon the assessment, were not part of the description of the property, and were placed there as a mere arbitrary number, to be used by the assessor to locate the property in accord with a system in vogue in the assessor's office. The record, however, discloses no objection to this particular piece of testimony, and the record does show that, when counsel for the plaintiff objected to the introduction of the tax deed in evidence upon the ground that it recited a misdescription of the property conveyed, in that it contained, in addition to a correct designation of the block in which the land was situated, the numerals "3276," he specifically requested permission of the court to call "Mr. Platts, deputy county assessor," to supplement that objection "by proof from Mr. Platts * * * that there is no block — shown on the map which has been introduced in evidence—the map of Havenscourt."

Counsel for the defendant, so the record shows, ultimately acquiesced in that request, and thereupon placed Platts on the stand as a witness for the defendant practically for the same purpose desired by counsel for the plaintiff, who proceeded to testify, without the semblance of an objection, as previously indicated. In view of this condition of the record, counsel for the plaintiff is in no position to complain of the reception of the evidence referred to. Moreover, the entry of the numerals "3276" beneath the numerals "35," which latter correctly designated the block in which the land in suit was situated, did not operate, in and of themselves, to cloud the true description of the property to such an extent that it could not have been readily obtained by a reference to the remaining description of the property as it appeared upon the assessment roll, and which, apart from the numerals "3276," correctly described the property.

"It has been repeatedly held that when such is the case the description may be explained by evidence at the trial and then becomes sufficient to answer all the requirements of the law. Campbell v. Shafer, 162 Cal. 206, 212, 121 P. 737; Furrey v. Lautz, 162 Cal. 397, 400, 122 P. 1073; Fitzimons v. Atherton, 162 Cal. 630, 632, 124 P. 250. In Lummer v. Unruh, 25 Cal. App. 104, 142 P. 914, the court quoted with approval the following statement of Mr. Cooley in his work on Taxation: "The designation of the land will be sufficient if it affords the owner a means of identification and does not positively mislead him or is not cal-

Respondent advances the additional theory that the description on the assessment roll is void because the property cannot be identified without reference to two maps; that the assessment calls for one map, while the block reference is taken from another map. In this respect it is urged that the block reference is taken from a private unofficial map of the assessor, while the assessment calls for an official map on file in the recorder's office, and that without both maps the property cannot be identified. The description of the property in suit on the assessment book refers to only one map, viz. Havenscourt. There was a map of Havenscourt on file in the recorder's office, and upon this map there is a lot 23 and a block 35. This, it seems to us, in view of what has been said in reference to the description of the land, was a sufficient reference to the recorded map, and clearly identifies the said land.

It is claimed by respondent that the tax collector was authorized to include in the delinquent list published pursuant to the provisions of section 3764 of the Political Code, only such property as had been sold to the state five years previous to the publication of said list. The land in controversy had been sold to the state on June 26, 1917, and it was included in the delinquent list published on June 2, 1922. Said property, however, was not sold to the defendant until June 29, 1922. This alleged premature inclusion of the property in the delinquent list, respondent argues, deprived the owner of said property of the full time allowed by law for the redemption of property sold to the state for delinquent taxes, and therefore the subsequent sale of said property to defendant was void. Section 3764 of the Political Code, when closely considered, does not lend itself to such a construction.

[3] A perusal of the provisions of sections 3764, 3771, and 3785b of the Political Code makes manifest that they must be considered and construed together as a correlated whole rather than as separate and distinct enactments. These sections comprise a complete plan for the sale of property for the nonpayment of taxes.

Section 3764 of the Political Code, as it existed in 1917, makes provision for the preparation and publication of the delinquent tax list, when it is to be made, what it is to determine, and then specially provides with reference to property previously sold to the state:

"* * * That before publication of said list the tax collector and auditor shall jointly arrange said list in such manner that said publication shall designate in some particular manner the property contained in said list which was sold to the state five years previous under the provisions of section three thousand seven hundred and seventy-one of this Code, on which the taxes remain unpaid, or which property has not been redeemed or the sale thereof canceled, and which property the state would otherwise be entitled to a deed thereof after the lapse of five years from said previous sale." (Italics added.)

Section 3771 of the Political Code, as it stood in 1917, in part, provided:

"That any property contained in the advertised list as provided for in section 3764 of this Code, which has not been redeemed from the sale made to the state five years previously, shall be sold by the tax collector at public auction. * * *"

[4] These Code sections do not in terms, nor by necessary inference, limit the listing of the property proffered for sale only to such property as may have been sold to the state five years previous to the date of the publication of the delinquent list. On the contrary, the provisions of these Code sections, pertinent to the point presented here, indicate that the Legislature intended rather to provide for the publication of a delinquent list which should include therein property upon which taxes had become delinquent, and which would be sold at public auction, or to which a deed of said property was made by the state after the full five-year period of redemption had elapsed. Obviously the primary purpose of the publication of this list was to give notice to defaulting taxpayers and prospective purchasers of (1) what property remained unredeemed, or the sale of which to the state remained uncanceled; and (2) what property would be sold, for which a deed thereto could be given to the state.

[5] It is to be noted in this behalf that, pursuant to the provisions of section 3764 of the Political Code, the delinquent list "shall designate in some particular manner" two classes of property on which taxes remain unpaid, namely: (1) Such property as has been sold to the state five years previous to the publication of the delinquent list under section 3771 of the Political Code; and (2) such property as "has not been redeemed or the sale thereof canceled, and which property the state would otherwise be entitled to a deed thereof after the lapse of five years from said previous sale." Reading section 3764 of the Political Code in the light of this purpose, it seems obvious that the Legislature intended that the delinquent list should include, not only such property as had been sold to the state five years prior to the publication of said list, but, in addition thereto, all other property to which the state would be entitled to a deed thereof after the expiration of five years from the previous sale made to the state. The sale last referred to is that made five years prior to the sale advertised in the delinquent list and not five years prior to the publication of said list. Furthermore, a consideration of the phrase "after the lapse of five years from said previous sale," in conjunction with the context of the Code sections immediately under consideration, fortifies this construction. This phrase connotes a present or a future sale from which a sale made five years previous thereto can be counted and considered. The Legislature doubtless was referring to the sale advertised in the delinquent list rather than to the date of the publication of the delinquent list. The inclusion in the delinquent list of property which would be sold by the state on a date five years from the original sale to the state, although the delinquent list was published prior to the expiration of the full five-year period permitted for redemption, is, we think, authorized by the provisions of section 3764 and the provisions of the several correlated sections of the Political Code which deal with the sale of property for the nonpayment of taxes. The advertising of a delinquent taxpayer's property for sale prior to the expiration of the five-year statutory period for redemption does not operate to toll the period of redemption, nor is the advertising of such property at such a time prohibited by statute. The right of redemption given by statute has no bearing upon the time when the property is to be advertised for sale. It is patent that the respondent was not injured because of the advertising of the property for sale prior to the expiration of the full five years provided for redemption. The land in suit was not actually sold until three days subsequent to the expiration of that period. Moreover, it may be said that the construction contended for by respondent would operate as a decided discrimination in favor of those delinquent taxpayers whose statutory period of redemption would expire on the days between the date of publication of the delinquent list and the date of the sale as advertised.

Respondent contends that compliance with the provisions of section 3771 of the Political Code, as it stood in 1917, appertaining to the mailing of a copy of the published notice of sales, was not shown. In this behalf it is argued that it was incumbent on appellant, who was relying on the tax deed, to make proof of the mailing of said notice in order to establish an essential link in the chain of tax proceedings through which he was claiming title, and that, under the rule announced in the case of Smith v. Furlong, 160 Cal. 522, 117 P. 527, the mailing of such notice was a jurisdictional prerequisite to the making of a valid tax deed by the tax collector.

[6, 7] The rule of law relative to the necessity of mailing a copy of the published delinquent list, as enunciated in Smith v. Furlong, supra, has been limited by the case of Kehlet v. Bergman, 162 Cal. 217, 121 P. 918, to cases where the last known post office address of the landowner was upon the as-assessment roll from the date of the delinquent assessment down to the time of the assessment last made before the sale. The inquiry of the tax collector in endeavoring to ascertain the post office address of the delinquent property owner need not extend beyond an examination of the assessment roll during the period mentioned.

"All the tax collector has to do as to mailing notice is to look at the assessment roll and ascertain to whom the property about to be sold was last assessed, and whether the address of the party appears thereon. If it does, he must mail a notice. If it does not, no mailing of notice is required. He is not bound to look beyond or outside the assessment roll to ascertain the address of a party when the assessment roll does not furnish it." Kehlet v. Bergman, supra; Heaton v. Morrison, 162 Cal. 673, 124 P. 240.

It was an admitted fact in the case that the post office address of the landowner did not appear on the assessment books for the years 1916, 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, and 1922. The record is silent as to whether or not the post office address of said landowner was actually known to the tax collector, and, as was said in Campbell v. Shafer, 162 Cal. 206, 213, 121 P. 737, 740:

"If no address is given on any assessment, in the absence of evidence to the contrary it must be assumed, in accord with the presumption of law that official duty has been regularly performed (Code Civ. Proc. sec. 1963, subd. 15), that the address of the person assessed was not known to the assessing officer. The mere fact that such person had in fact resided at a certain place * * * would not be sufficient to overcome the force of this presumption."

[8] Respondent urges that the state could not execute a deed to the lot in controversy, because no deed had ever been made to the state, as provided by section 3785 of the Political Code. It is respondent's theory, in connection with this phase of the case, that the execution and delivery of the deed to the state was an advertised condition of the notice of sale, and without compliance therewith the state cannot make a deed to a purchaser. In answer to this contention, it may be said that the Legislature provided two methods of selling and transferring real property for the nonpayment of taxes subsequent to the expiration of the period of redemption. One method, the method which governs and controls the instant case, is provided for in sections 3764, 3771, and 3785b of the Political Code. Section 3785b of the Political Code provides for the deed to be executed and delivered by the tax collector to the purchaser. Section 3771 of the Political Code provides that only in case the delinquent owner's property, "if not so redeemed, or if no sale is had," under the provisions of the fourth proviso thereof, to a purchaser, then the property shall be deeded to the state as provided in section 3785 of the Political Code.

If, however, a sale is made to a purchaser under section 3771 of the Political Code, there is no provision made for a deed to the state, but the tax collector is directed to convey the property directly to the purchaser under section 3785b of the Political Code, which section governs and controls the transfer of a delinquent owner's property sold to a purchaser at a delinquent tax sale, "other than the state of California." (Italics added.) Thus it is evident a conveyance is permitted to be made to the purchaser of the property without the formality of making a deed to the state in the first instance.

The sale in the case at bar was not made or had pursuant to sections 3897 and 3898 of the Political Code. These sections relate to and deal with the sale of delinquent property after a deed thereof has been made to the state and a subsequent sale made to a purchaser, and have no application to the sale of the property in the instant case. The authorities cited, construing these sections, likewise have no bearing on the question presented in the instant case. No authorities are cited by respondent where it is held that a sale to a purchaser under sections 3771 and 3785b of the Political Code is invalid unless the property has been first deeded to the state.

That the Legislature had the power to provide for such a method of selling and transferring property to purchasers at delinquent tax sale as is provided by sections 3771 and 3785b of the Political Code we have no doubt. The tax collector has been designated as the agent of the state to perform the required duty of executing and delivering the required deed. The plan is simple and direct, and creates no legal anomaly. If the tax collector can by deed transfer a good title to the state, the state has a right to determine the method by which the tax collector may deed the property to a purchaser, and make his act of corresponding legal force and effect as if the transfer were first made to the state.

[9,10] Respondent claims that the notice of sale was void because of an alleged defect in its form. In this behalf it is argued that section 3780 of the Political Code provides that the redemption of property sold to the state for delinquent taxes may be made within five years from the date of sale to the state, "* * * or at any time prior to the entry or sale of said land by the state, * * *" and that the notice as published by the tax collector stated that the delinquent taxpayer would have five years, and thereafter "until the entry of sale of said land by the state." This slight discrepancy between the notice as published and the wording of the statute cannot be held to invalidate the sale of the land in suit. This notice of sale was published by the tax collector under section 3771 of the Political Code. This Code section provides for the notice of sale to be published, but does not prescribe the form of the notice. Section 3780 of the Political Code does not refer to, nor does it attempt to prescribe, the form or kind of notice to be given by the tax collector; it merely provides for the time within which redemption of property may be made by the delinquent taxpayer. The precise form of the notice of sale is immaterial, so long as it is in substantial compliance with the section, and with reasonable certainty conveys notice of the intended sale.

[11] It is urged that the tax deed from the state to the defendant was not admissible as prima facie proof of the fact that a copy of the notice of the sale was mailed to the person to whom the property was last assessed. The answer to this contention is to be found in the fact, as shown by the record, that the deed in question was offered in evidence, as a pertinent and permissible piece of proof in support of the defendant's chain of title. It was not offered in evidence for any other purpose, and, that being so, of course, no objection was made or could have been rightfully made upon the ground stated.

[12] The point is made for the first time, upon a rehearing of the case, that in computing the penalties an extra cent was added to the penalties due on the second installment. This contention is evidently based upon the fact that the assessor, when making the assessment, added on a half cent. The point is not well taken, we think, nor is it worthy of serious consideration. The excess demanded appears to be less than one cent and it appears to be the rule that a sale will not be invalidated where "the excess is less than the smallest fractional coin authorized by law." Treadwell v. Patterson, 51 Cal. 637.

It not appearing from the record before us that there was any invalidity, as a matter of law, in the tax proceedings leading up to the deed from the state to the defendant, it follows that judgment should have been entered in favor of the defendant on the issues raised by his cross-complaint and the answer thereto.

The judgment is reversed.

MAKINS v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 11799.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 2, 1926.)

1. Master and servant §375(2)—Employee, on working premises, or means of access while going to or from work, is protected by Compensation Act.

Employee going to work, or leaving working premises, without unnecessary loitering, is proected by Compensation Act while on such premises or means provided for access to and departure from them, though they are not wholly under employer's control.

2. Master and servant §375(2).

Generally, injuries to employee going to, returning from, or after leaving, on personal errand, place of employment, are not compensable.

3. Master and servant §375(2)—Bicyclist, injured while returning over prescribed course followed in delivering papers, was in "course of employment" on master's premises.

Bicyclist, returning over course followed in delivering newspapers in area fixed by employer, when struck by automobile, was injured on master's premises in "course of employment."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

4. Master and servant §375(1)—Injury to newspaper carrier held not inflicted outside working district because he was riding bicycle on opposite side of bounding street, as required by traffic laws.

Injury to newspaper carrier, struck by automobile while riding bicycle, as required by traffic laws on west side of street, constituting west boundary of his route, was inflicted within working district.

In Bank.

Proceeding for compensation under the Workman's Compensation Act by George A. Craig, employee, by Mabel Craig, his mother, opposed by J. N. Makins, employer. An award of compensation by the Industrial Accident Commission was annulled by the District Court of Appeal on certiorari by the employer, and the commission's petition for a hearing by the Supreme Court was granted. Award affirmed.

W. S. Angwin, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. [1] The petition of respondent Industrial Accident Commission praying for a hearing by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, having been granted, the proceeding is properly before us for final determination. The respondent commission made an award in favor of respondent George A. Craig, a youth 15 years of age, who was injured by a traffic collision that occurred upon Grove street, city of Oakland, this state. The commission found that said George A. Craig was employed by petitioner, J. N. Makins, as a deliverer or distributor of newspapers, and that the injury sustained by said George A. Craig occurred in the course of, and arose out of, his employment. The circumstances of the injury and the contentions of the respective parties to the proceeding are well stated by Mr. Justice Cashin, author of the opinion adopted by said District Court of Appeal, and we hereby adopt it in part as follows:

"The compensation claimant was, on December 6, 1924, in the employ of petitioner as a carrier of newspapers in the city of Oakland, his route of delivery being within a definite territory, which began at Fourteenth street, and included the section between San Pablo and Telegraph avenues, extending north to the intersection of Grove street with San Pablo avenue, and thence covered the section between Grove street and Telegraph avenue to Thirty-Sixth street in that city.

"Claimant in the course of his employment received each morning at the corner of Sixteenth street and San Pablo avenue a portion of the newspapers to be delivered, being supplied with additional papers at points along his route, and from Fourteenth street proceeded with such delivery in a northerly direction to the southeasterly corner of Grove and Thirty-Sixth streets, at which point the last delivery by him in the course of such employment was made; no deliveries being made by him at any place west of the east side of Grove street. Claimant was paid a stated sum each month for the service rendered, furnished his own means of conveyance, which in this case was a bicycle owned by him, and his duties in every respect ceased each day upon the last delivery being made at the point above mentioned. On December 6, 1924, claimant, after the last delivery on his route, and with the purpose of proceeding to his home, which was situated several blocks to the south and west, crossed to the west side of Grove street at or near its intersection with Thirty-Sixth street, and proceeded thence in a southerly direction along said street, remaining, in accordance with the traffic regulations, on the west side thereof, to its intersection with Thirty-First street, at which point he received injuries from an automobile being driven westerly across such intersection.

"Respondent, as its conclusion from the above facts, found that the injuries occurred in the course, and arose out, of the employment, and awarded compensation therefor.

"Petitioner in this proceeding bases his application for relief upon the contention that the facts shown, and which are not disputed, do not support such conclusion, and that, therefore, respondent acted in excess of its powers in making the award.

"Respondent contends that, the injuries having occurred on Grove street, though the westerly side thereof had not been traversed by claimant in the course of his employment in making deliveries, and at a point approximately five blocks south of the point where the last act in the rendition of services to petitioner was performed, claimant was still within his working territory, and that until he passed the corner of Sixteenth and Grove streets, where the first papers for delivery were received, he remained within the protection of the compensation act.

"The rule is well settled that an employee, in going to work, comes under the protection of the act when he enters the employer's premises or upon the means provided for access thereto, though the premises and such means of access are not wholly under the employer's control or management (Starr Piano Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 433, 184 P. 860; Judson Mfg. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 300, 184 P. 1); and the same rule applies when the employee is leaving such working premises provided he does not unnecessarily loiter thereon (Wabash Ry. Co. v. Ind. Comm., 294 Ill. 119, 128 N. E. 290; Lienau v. Northwestern Telephone Exchange Co., 151 Minn. 258, 186 N. W. 945). * * *

At the time the accident occurred respondent Craig was traveling in a southerly direction upon Grove street, after serving those customers of his employer whose places of business or residences abutted upon the easterly half of said street. The easterly property line of said Grove street marked the westerly boundary of his district in so far as the physical act of delivering newspapers was concerned. Upon making delivery to the last and furthestmost subscriber on Grove street, respondent crossed from the east to the west side of said street, and was traveling homeward over the same course he had gone in his outward journey, which course led southerly past said employer's residence and also past the initial and other points where packages of newspapers were left by the employer for distribution on the outgoing trip. The carrier had traveled about five blocks on the return trip, whereupon an automobile collided with his bicycle. As a result of the impact, the youth suffered a fracture of the right femur about four inches above the knee. The course taken upon his return trip was the one habitually traveled by him, and it was the most practicable route for him to take. He was receiving a flat salary of $15 per month, and his employment was confined to a fixed, definite area or district; the hours of his employment being from 4:45 a. m. to about 7 o'clock a. m. of each day. The papers designed for distribution within the district were divided into three separate packages or bundles, and placed along the route by the employer at fixed stations, and so apportioned as to weight and number as to be convenient for distribution by said employee. As successive stations were reached, the bundles left for distribution by the employer were taken in charge by the employee. The initial station of deposit was located within the district a short distance from the southerly boundary line at a point on San Pablo avenue between Sixteenth and Seventeenth streets. This point marked the beginning and practically the end of the route required to be taken by respondent Craig in the discharge of his duties. The route and method of distribution were laid out by, and were under the control and direction of, the employer. Undoubtedly the employee was required to deliver newspapers in accordance with the instructions given him by his employer. No claim is made that respondent was guilty of loitering within the area of his employment, or that he was guilty of willful misconduct in any degree. The injury occurred after the carrier had thrown his last paper, but before he had arrived at the initial point at which he received the first parcel or lot of newspapers, and while he was yet within the exterior limits of the district to which he had been assigned. While it is a fact that there was no established office or headquarters at which the employee was required to report, it is a reasonable inference arising out of the nature of the employment and the circumstances disclosed by the record that the instructions essential for the proper performance of the service for which Craig was employed were left by the employer and received by Craig at the stations where the parcels of papers were left for distribution, or at some point along the route of his travel.

[2, 3] It is the contention of petitioner that the facts of this case bring it within the rule generally known as the "going and coming rule." This rule has been considered and applied by this court in numerous cases where the person injured was employed to perform service at or in a particular plant or upon particular premises, and the injury claimed to be compensable was inflicted while he was going to, or returning from, his place of employment, or where the employee had left the place of employment on an errand personal to himself. The general rule, subject to many exceptions, however, is that injuries inflicted under the foregoing circumstances are not compensable. California C. I. Exchange v. Industrial Accident Commission, 190 Cal. 433, 213 P. 257; London Guarantee & Accident Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 190 Cal. 587, 213 P. 977. Awards have been affirmed by this court, however, where the facts of the case showed that the injured employee was not at the time he was injured upon his master's premises. Judson Mfg. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 181 Cal. 300, 184 P. 1. Each case must be adjudged by the facts which are peculiarly its own. Industrial accidents are produced by so many varying circumstances that it is rather unusual to find any two or more cases that may be ruled by the same legal precedent. While the facts of this case present a situation that has not heretofore come to the attention of this court, we are of the opinion that the principles of law applicable to the decision of an ordinary case of injuries received by an employee while upon the master's premises, and who is thus injured within the course of his employment, must rule the instant case. It is true that no physical wall or barrier circumscribed the area or district which was adopted by the master as the place of the respondent's employment and to which he had been assigned; nevertheless, the limits of his working district were as definitely fixed by the employer as if it had been inclosed by a physical structure. The area thus definitely marked by reference to designated streets as fixing its boundary was adopted by the employer with full knowledge of all its attendant traffic hazards, and assigned to the youth as his place of employment. The streets were used not only as a means of conducting the business, but were also occupied as supply stations at three separate points along the route of distribution. This, it will be observed, is not a case where an outside worker, such as a solicitor or agent, selects his own territory or working district ad libitum, but it is a case where the employer has definitely fixed the boundaries of a district within which the employee is required to labor without any right upon his part to change them in any respect whatsoever. Under the facts of this case, the district thus established and controlled by the employer will be held to be the employee's place of employment. No unreasonable expansion of the Industrial Accident Act (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended) is required to bring the instant case within its compensatory provisions.

[4] It is a further contention of petitioner that the injury was inflicted without the working district of the respondent, and, therefore, is not compensable. This contention is predicated upon the theory that respondent Craig's district was limited by the center line of Grove street, and not by the street considered with reference to its entire width. There was no other way by which respondent could have returned to the initial point at which he entered without crossing to the westerly half of Grove street. Had he attempted to return on the easterly side of said street he would have violated the traffic laws of the state, and would thereby have subjected himself to arrest and imprisonment.

It would be a harsh and narrow construction of the act, indeed, that would deprive a person of his civil rights who, while acting in obedience to the law's mandate, is injured under the circumstances disclosed by the record in the instant case. As to this issue we think there is no substantial merit in petitioner's contention.

The award is affirmed.

EMMANUEL v. SICHOFSKY et al.
(Sac. 3747.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1926.)

1. Attachment ⚡64—Garnishment ⚡58—Ordinarily, money on person of prisoner not subject to seizure when outside of prison walls is not subject to attachment or garnishment when taken over on incarceration by officer authorized (Pen. Code, § 1587).

Ordinarily, money on person of prisoner not subject to seizure while outside of prison walls is not subject to attachment or garnishment when passing involuntarily from his possession upon incarceration to custody of officer appointed by law to take it, in view of Pen. Code, § 1587.

2. Attachment ⚡64—Garnishment ⚡58—Public policy requiring exemption from attachment or garnishment of money upon person of prisoner at time of arrest does not require extension of exemption to money taken after final conviction in criminal case.

Exemption of money on person of prisoner from garnishment or attachment after passing into hands of officer upon incarceration is based upon public policy to prevent misuse of criminal process in causing arrests in order to reach such money, and therefore is not necessary after final conviction.

3. Attachment ⚡64—Garnishment ⚡58—Money on person of fugitive from justice passing to prison warden on his apprehension held not exempt from attachment or garnishment (Pen. Code, §§ 674-676, 1587).

Money on person of fugitive from justice taken in custody by warden of prison under Pen. Code, § 1587, when fugitive was turned over to him to serve sentence, held not exempt from attachment or garnishment since arrest was not made subject to criminal charge in view of sections 674-676.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by John M. Emmanuel against Albert Sichofsky, wherein J. J. Smith, Warden of the California State Prison at Folsom, was cited to appear and answer concerning property of prisoner in his possession. From an order directing payment by Warden of certain moneys held in trust, latter appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robertson T. McKisick and Thomas H. Christiansen, Deputy Attys. Gen., for appellant.

Marshall B. Woodworth, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Martin I. Welsh and Robt. H. Schwab, both of Sacramento, for defendant.

WASTE, C. J. Appeal from an order of the superior court made in proceedings supplemental to execution. The defendant Sichofsky was prosecuted and convicted in the superior court of Los Angeles county on a charge of grand larceny and felony embezzlement. He appealed from the judgment of conviction, which was subsequently affirmed. 58 Cal. App. 257, 208 P. 340. While the appeal was pending, Sichofsky became a fugitive from justice. Some three years thereafter he was recognized and taken into custody by the sheriff, who delivered him to the warden of the state prison, there to serve his sentence. The sheriff, upon taking him into custody, found $35,890 in currency, other money, and some valuable diamonds upon Sichofsky's person, and upon delivering him to the prison turned the money and property over to the warden, to be kept by the latter pursuant to section 1587, Penal Code. Thereafter the plaintiff, Emmanuel, brought an action in the superior court of Sacramento county against Sichofsky, and obtained judgment against him for $14,300, with costs, for moneys loaned and advanced by Emmanuel to Sichofsky, and for merchandise intrusted by plaintiff to defendant to be sold and accounted for by the latter, and which Sichofsky had in fact sold and converted the proceeds thereof to his own use. These financial transactions between Emmanuel and Sichofsky appeared to have occurred subsequent to the latter's trial and conviction, and after he had become a fugitive from justice. Execution was issued upon this judgment and levy thereof made upon the warden of the prison where Sichofsky was confined. Upon affidavit of counsel for plaintiff, the warden was cited to appear before the superior court (Code Civ. Proc. § 717 et seq.) to answer concerning the property of the prisoner within his possession. The warden admitted that he held the money, but contended that it was in custodia legis and not subject to seizure under execution. The lower court, after hearing, made its order requiring the warden to pay over to the sheriff sufficient of the money in his custody to satisfy the execution. From this order the warden has appealed.

[1] From the authorities upon the subject it may be gathered as a general rule that, if money on the person of a prisoner when outside the prison walls is not subject to seizure, it is not subject to attachment or garnishment when it passes involuntarily from his possession to the custody of the officer appointed by law to take it into possession, when such person enters as a prisoner within the walls. Public policy requires the adoption and maintenance of this rule. Were it otherwise, it would lead to a grave abuse of criminal process. It would tempt creditors whose debtors keep their funds upon their persons, and thus beyond the reach of civil process, to make unfounded criminal charges against their debtors, and bring about their arrest and the transfer of their funds to the custody of the arresting officers, in order to make them reachable by the process of garnishment. It needs no citation of the cases to show that the general rule, as thus broadly stated, is supported by the preponderance of authority. Appellant's position is that the rule finds expression in the section of the Penal Code (section 1587) wherein it is provided that the warden of the prison shall keep a correct account of all money and valuables upon the prisoner when delivered at the prison, and that each convict, when he leaves the prison, shall be supplied with the money taken from him, and which he has not disposed of. Assuming that to be so, it does not follow that the rule must be applied in every case. In Coffee v. Haynes, 124 Cal. 561, 57 P. 482, 71 Am. St. Rep. 99, the principal question presented was whether money belonging to a convicted murderer which was still in the possession of the arresting chief of police, as garnishee, was protected from process because in custodia legis. It was held (page 567 [57 P. 482]) that the property did not come within the reason of the rule and ought not to be placed within its operation.

[2, 3] Respondent earnestly contends, and with much reason, that the rule should be confined in its application to cases where money or property of the prisoner has been taken from his person by the arresting officer in connection with his arrest upon a criminal charge, and before his conviction. It is argued that where the reason for the rule ceases the rule itself should cease, and the reason for the rule is not applicable at all to the present case. The arrest of Sichofsky, when the money was found on his person, was not made as the result of any criminal charge filed against him, either by procurement of this plaintiff or of any one else. It was because he was a fugitive from justice and, in a sense, an escaped convict. His conviction may well be regarded as conclusive evidence that the charge against him was not "trumped up," and that his arrest after conviction did not involve an abuse of process. It seems to us that it does no violence to the application of the rule in question to hold that it may properly be limited to those cases where the money or property is taken from the person of the prisoner in connection with his arrest upon a criminal charge, and may as properly be held inapplicable to cases like this, arising after his conviction upon the charge. A person sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for life is civilly dead (Pen. Code, § 674), but the forfeitures and disabilities imposed by the common law upon persons attainted with felony are unknown to the laws of this state. No consequences follow a conviction of felony except such as are declared by statute. The convicted person is not dead in law. His civil rights in some matters are suspended, but the rights of his creditors are not suspended. Pen. Code, § 676; Estate of Nerac, 35 Cal. 392, 95 Am. Dec. 111; Coffee v. Haynes, supra. He is not, by reason of the conviction, rendered incompetent as a witness upon the trial of a criminal action or proceeding, or incapable of making and acknowledging a sale or conveyance of real property (Pen. Code, § 675), and this court said, in Coffee v. Haynes, supra, (page 566 [57 P. 483]):

"If he may sell his property we can see no reason why his property may not be taken to pay his debts."

While the money involved in that case was held not to be in custodia legis, by reason of the circumstances under which it was obtained by the arresting officer, the reasoning in the case is persuasive, and the decision is authority for the rule that "the custody of the officer is not necessarily nor always the custody of the law." The distinction to be drawn in the cases, and applicable here, is that the general rule rests for its application to cases in which the money is taken from a prisoner on his arrest by an officer charged with that duty. After a final conviction in a criminal case the purpose of the legal custody of the money or property taken from the person of the prisoner has presumably been accomplished. Holker v. Hennessey, 141 Mo. 527, 544, 42 S. W. 1090, 39 L. R. A. 165, 64 Am. St. Rep. 524. To permit the application of the rule of custodia legis to this case would be to subject to misuse and grave abuse a rule salutary and beneficent in its effect when properly applied.

The order of the lower court is affirmed.

CHRISTENSON et al. v. CUDAHY PACKING CO. (S. F. 10854.)(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1926.
Rehearing Denied July 1, 1926.)

1. Pleading ⚡236(5) — Denial of leave to amend answer to conform to proof held not abuse of discretion, where evidence on which leave to amend was grounded had been withdrawn.

Where evidence offered was withdrawn and stricken and jury instructed to disregard it, denial of defendant's motion for leave to amend answer to conform to proof was not abuse of discretion, there being no evidence on which motion could be grounded.

2. Exchanges ⚡9—Under arbitration rules, award of arbitrators before copy of seller's statement of facts was submitted to buyer and without opportunity of buyer to reply thereto held invalid.

Where arbitration rules of association provided that chairman should submit copy of statement of facts to parties to arbitration and each should have right to reply thereto, award of arbitrators before copy of seller's statement of facts was submitted to buyer, and without opportunity to buyer to reply thereto, held invalid, and not validated by act of association's chairman, subsequent to award, in sending copy of statement and offering buyer opportunity to reply.

3. Arbitration and award ⚡16(1).

Party to common-law arbitration may revoke submission and refuse further to participate, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1285.

4. Arbitration and award ⚡57.

An award by arbitrators is not binding on parties thereto unless there has been a substantial compliance with agreement of submission.

5. Exchanges ⚡9—Award of arbitrators appointed by chairman of commerce association held valid, though by-laws did not provide who should appoint arbitrators.

Where at time of request that arbitration be held before commerce association and according to its rules parties had knowledge of by-laws under which chairman was its only officer and had responsibility of carrying out its purposes, but which did not directly authorize anybody to appoint arbitrators, award by arbitrators appointed by the acting chairman was legal, and judgment based thereon is binding.

6. Exchanges ⚡9—Remedy of person dissatisfied with award was in the courts, where remedy of appeal from award was lacking in by-laws and rules of association.

Where machinery for appeal from award of arbitrators was lacking in by-laws and rules of commerce association, remedy of party dissatisfied with award was in the courts.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Eleanor L. Christenson, as executrix of the last will and testament of Edwin A. Christenson, deceased, and others, against the Cudahy Packing Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

Preston & Duncan, and Casper A. Ornbaum, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, and J. W. Parmore, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This action was instituted for the purpose of enforcing two common-law arbitration awards. The facts which form the basis of this controversy grew out of two contracts for the sale and delivery of 11 railroad tank cars of soya bean oil. The contracts were identical in form except as to the date and number of cars of oil. One of them bore date May 21, 1920, and was for six cars of oil, and the other bore date May 25, 1920, and was for five cars of oil. The contracts were entered into by the defendant, the appellant herein, with the firm of Christenson, Hanify & Weatherwax. Since the commencement of this action two of the original plaintiffs have died, and the executrix and executor of their respective wills have been substituted in place of the deceased plaintiffs. There is no controversy over eight of said cars, as they were received by the buyer, the appellant, and paid for according to the contracts. The dispute between the parties concerns the remaining three cars of oil. These cars the buyer refused to accept, claiming that they were not delivered according to contract. They were afterwards sold by the original sellers, Christenson, Hanify & Weatherwax, at public sale, and it is now sought by this action, and the arbitration proceedings in which said awards were rendered, to recover damages for the buyer's failure to accept and pay for said three cars according to the contracts. The amount which they seek to recover is the difference between the contract price and the amount for which the sellers subsequently sold said cars at public sale. Of the three cars in dispute two were covered by, and were a part of, the six-car order of date May 21, 1920, and the other car was a part of the five-car order covered by the later contract of May 25, 1920. Each of these contracts contained the following provision:

"This contract is subject to published rules of the Foreign Commerce Association of the Pacific Coast, adopted and now in force, as same may apply to the commodity herein covered, and which are hereby made a part of this contract, except in so far as these rules may be abrogated by specific conditions written into this contract."

The rules of the Foreign Commerce Association of the Pacific Coast, which association we will hereafter refer to as the Commerce Association, provided for a plan of arbitration as a means of settling disputes arising between its members or arising between any of its members and others who might agree to submit their differences to arbitration according to said rules. We gain from the record that the sellers were members of the association, but the buyer was not. This fact, however, is not in any way material to any of the issues arising herein. The rules provided that in case the parties to any controversy decided to arbitrate their differences according to the plan of arbitration of said association, it was necessary for each of said parties to sign a written request for arbitration. In this writing the parties signing the same requested that arbitration be held before the Commerce Association and under the rules of said association of the matter in dispute, and agreed to abide by the award and findings of the arbitrators. Shortly after the controversy between the parties hereto arose over the delivery and acceptances of said two cars of oil covered by the contract of May 21, 1920, the buyer requested that arbitration of said matter be held before said Commerce Association by signing a written request as provided by said rules. The sellers also signed a written request, similar in form, and the controversy was submitted to three arbitrators appointed by the chairman of said Commerce Association, who rendered an award in favor of the sellers. Rules 105 and 106 prescribed the procedure to be followed by the litigants in presenting their respective claims before the board of arbitration, and are as follows:

"Rule 105: Written statements of fact, together with written arguments thereon, must be presented in duplicate to the Foreign Commerce Association of the Pacific Coast, which shall be submitted in their entirety to the arbitrators, but no oral evidence shall be given unless requested by the arbitrators.

"Rule 106: Immediately upon receipt thereof, the chairman of the association shall submit a copy of the statement of fact to the respective parties to the arbitration, and each shall have the right to reply thereto, but if no such answer is made by either party within a reasonable time, it shall be considered a waiver of the right of answer. Provided, there shall be no interchange by the chairman of any exhibits submitted in connection with any statement of fact."

After the appointment of the arbitrators in the matter of the dispute regarding the two cars of oil, each of the parties to said controversy presented to said arbitrators their written statements of fact, together with written arguments thereon in duplicate, as provided by rule 105. No copy of the statement of fact presented by the sellers, however, was ever submitted to the buyer as prescribed by rule 106, and no reply thereto was made by said buyer, and no opportunity was given said buyer to make any reply to the statement of fact of the sellers prior to the rendition of said award; and without submitting to the buyer the written statement of the sellers and without any reply thereto by the buyer, the board of arbitration rendered its award against the buyer. It appears that it was an oversight on the part of the arbitrators in not sending to the buyer a copy of the sellers' statement of fact, and upon being advised that the buyer had not received said copy the chairman of the Commerce Association mailed a copy of said statement to the buyer, and wrote the latter that if it should find anything in said statement which it felt should be answered, it was at liberty to file a supplemental statement for the arbitrators' consideration. The buyer refused to take any further action in the matter, and the award was allowed to stand by the arbitrators.

Regarding the third car of oil in dispute and being the one covered by contract of date May 25, 1920, it appears that each party signed a written request for the submission of the dispute to arbitration before the Commerce Association as provided by the rules thereof. Three persons appointed by the acting chairman of the association served as the board of arbitration and conducted the arbitration of the matter submitted to them in all respects as provided by the rules of the association. The award in this matter was also in favor of the sellers and against the buyer. The buyer refused to acknowledge either of these awards, and this action was instituted to enforce the same and to collect the amounts claimed to be due thereon. The case was tried by a jury, and after the conclusion of the evidence, upon the motion of the plaintiffs, the court instructed the jury to render a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $3,881.70 upon the award rendered in the two-car controversy and for the sum of $2,496.20 upon the award rendered in the other controversy. The jury acted upon this instruction, and upon their verdict judgment was rendered against the buyer, the defendant herein, for these several amounts, from which it has appealed.

[1] The first contention of appellant is that the court erred in denying its motion for leave to amend its answer to conform to the "proof" made during the trial. By this amendment appellant sought to set forth by way of answer that the sellers had never signed any agreement to submit to arbitration the controversy involving the two cars of oil. Just previous to the making of this motion there had been received in evidence and read into the record a certain request or agreement to submit to arbitration, signed by the sellers, but which, it is claimed, mentioned only one of said cars. Appellant objected to this evidence, and, after the same had been received and the document read into the record, renewed its objection thereto. Whereupon the plaintiffs withdrew their offer and the court struck out the evidence and instructed the jury to disregard the same.

This was the only "proof" tending to support the allegations of appellant's proposed amendment to its answer. It is apparent that there was no evidence before the court upon which appellant could ground its motion to amend, and there was therefore no abuse of discretion on the part of the court in denying the same.

[2] Appellant further contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence the award of the arbitrators relating to the two-car controversy. As recited before, the record shows that after the parties had signed the written request provided for by the rules of the Commerce Association for the submission of this dispute to arbitration, each of said parties, in pursuance of rule 105, presented to the said association written statements of fact, together with written argument in support of their respective claims; thereafter the arbitrators submitted a copy of the statement of fact presented by appellant to the sellers, the predecessor of the respondents herein, and said sellers in due time filed their reply thereto in accordance with said rule 106. Before any copy of the statement of fact presented by the sellers had been submitted to appellant and without any opportunity being given appellant to make any reply thereto, the arbitrators made their award in favor of the sellers. On learning of this action of the arbitrators the appellant refused to take any further part in the proceeding. The chairman of the Commerce Association after the award had been made wrote appellant that it was an oversight that a copy of the required papers had not been sent, and inclosed sellers' statement of fact, and stated that "if you find anything therein that you feel should have been answered prior to arbitration you are at liberty to file a supplemental statement for the arbitrators' consideration." This offer was not accepted by appellant, and the award as originally made by the arbitrators was allowed to stand, and is the one which respondents now seek to enforce against appellant. That this award was not made in accordance with the agreement of the parties submitting the controversy to arbitration must be apparent from the provisions of rules 105 and 106 of the Commerce Association. These rules provide that in place of oral evidence the parties shall present written statements of fact to the association, and that upon receipt of these statements the chairman shall submit a copy of the same to the respective parties and each shall have a right to reply thereto. As before observed, no copy of the statement of fact presented by the sellers was ever submitted to appellant, and no opportunity was given appellant to make any reply to said statement before the award was made by the arbitrators. The statement of fact and reply thereto provided for by the above rules of the association were to be received and considered by the arbitrators in place of oral evidence of the parties. In fact these statements and replies were the only means offered by said rules whereby the parties might present the facts of their respective claims before the board of arbitrators. To deprive either of the parties of this right would be to deny to such a party his right to present his case, or to make his defense, as the case might be, and for the arbitrators to make an award before either party had been given the opportunity to present his statement and reply would be to decide the matter before such party had an opportunity to submit his evidence in support of said cause. In Meloy v. Imperial Land Co., 163 Cal. 99, 101, 124 P. 712, it was held that:

"The parties to an arbitration have a right to introduce evidence in support of their claims. * * * To decide a matter before the evidence thereon, and the matter itself, have been submitted to the arbitrators for decision, is a plain denial of this right."

We do not think that the failure of the arbitrators to permit appellant to be heard in reply to the sellers' statement of fact can be regarded as a mere irregularity and therefore disregarded.

"The want of an opportunity to be heard goes directly to the authority of the arbitrators to make an award." 2 Ruling Case Law, p. 379.

"Where the submission directs that certain requisites shall be complied with by the arbitrators in making their award, they must follow such directions strictly, or the award will be invalid." 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 720; 5 Corpus Juris, p. 119; Ryan v. Dougherty, 30 Cal. 219; In re Abrams and Brennan, 2 Cal. App. 237, 84 P. 363.

[3, 4] We are unable to see that the offer in the letter of the chairman of the Commerce Association to appellant to permit appellant to file a supplemental statement of fact, after the award had been made, for the consideration of the arbitrators, can help out or validate the award thus illegally made. The chairman of the association was not a member of the board of arbitrators, and, assuming that he had the authority to appoint the members of said board, a question we will later discuss, his authority as to the arbitration ceased with their appointment, and any action taken by him thereafter would not be binding on the arbitrators. We are not convinced that had this offer come direct from the board of arbitrators that its effect would have been any different unless they had followed this offer by setting aside the award rendered and giving appellant an opportunity to reply. Had this course been pursued by the board of arbitrators, a different question would be presented. But even if this procedure had been followed, the arbitration not having been made in accordance with the provisions of the code and being simply a common-law arbitration, the appellant could have revoked the submission thereof and refused further to participate in this proceeding. Code Civ. Proc. § 1285; Sidlinger v. Kerkow, 82 Cal. 42, 23 P. 932. In holding the award invalid we do not necessarily find that the board of arbitrators had no jurisdiction to render an award. By the agreement of submission signed by the parties jurisdiction was conferred upon the arbitrators to make an award, but an award is futile and of no binding effect upon the parties thereto unless there has been a substantial compliance with the terms of the agreement of submission. 2 Ruling Case Law, p. 377, § 24; Curtis v. Sacramento, 64 Cal. 102, 104, 28 P. 108; Meloy v. Imperial Land Co., supra. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the award rendered by the arbitrators in the controversy involving the sale and delivery of the two cars of oil covered by the contract of May 21, 1920, was invalid and was not binding upon the appellant, and its admission in evidence was therefore erroneous and prejudicial to appellant's rights. This conclusion, however, does not affect the award as to the one car covered by the contract of May 25, 1920. This latter award is valid and binding upon the parties thereto unless the contention to be next considered is well taken.

[5] This contention, made by appellant, is that both awards are absolutely void on account of a serious defect in the proceedings appointing the arbitrators. This defect, appellant asserts, is the absolute want of authority in the chairman of the Foreign Commerce Association, or the chairman pro tem., or acting chairman of the said association, to appoint the arbitrators who composed the board rendering said awards. It appears to be conceded that the arbitrators of the two-car controversy were appointed by the chairman of said association and that the arbitrators in the other controversy were appointed by the acting chairman of said association. The evidence shows that H. Arthur Dunn was appointed acting chairman, and that in the absence of the chairman he was vested with all the powers of the chairman during such absence, and that while the regular chairman was absent he appointed the arbitrators in the one-car controversy. By reference to the request for arbitration, signed by the parties and heretofore mentioned, it will be observed that the parties agreed that the arbitration be held before the Foreign Commerce Association and under its rules. From the record before us it appears that this association was a voluntary association of firms and corporations engaged in Pacific Coast foreign commerce. It adopted a set of by-laws and also a set of general rules. The by-laws provided that there shall be but one officer of said association, a legal adviser, who shall act as chairman, and who is made the sole executive of the association and given broad powers, including the appointment of the various committees provided for in said by-laws and the general conduct of the affairs of the association. No direct authority is given the chairman to appoint arbitrators when an arbitration is called for under the rules of the association. Neither is it made the duty of any of the various committees provided for by the by-laws to appoint arbitrators, nor have any of said committees any duty to perform in relation to any arbitration matter coming before said association. Unless the chairman had such authority there is no power in the association to appoint arbitrators. No arbitration could therefore be held before said association. The parties requested that such an arbitration be held. This request, it is conceded, amounted in effect to an agreement for arbitration. It must have been made with full knowledge of the by-laws and rules of the association. If so, the appellant knew at the time it made said request that there was no officer or authority directly authorized to appoint arbitrators, but that the chairman of the association was its only officer, and as such had the general direction of the affairs and the responsibility of carrying out the objects and purposes of the organization. With such knowledge on its part the only reasonable inference it could have drawn therefrom at the time it requested that an arbitration be held before said association and according to its rules was that the arbitrators to act thereunder were to be appointed by its chairman. To hold otherwise would be to hold that appellant performed the idle act of requesting that the matter in dispute be settled by arbitration before the association, knowing at the time that there was no power in the association to appoint arbitrators, and therefore that no arbitration could be held. In our opinion appellant was bound by its agreement to accept the arbitrators appointed. Any other conclusion would not only render all the provisions of the by-laws and rules of the association providing for the settlement of a dispute by arbitration inoperative and ineffectual, but it would nullify the agreement entered into by the appellant itself. Respondents advance the claim that the chairman of said association under the power given him to appoint all committees has the power to appoint boards of arbitrators. But whether we hold that the chairman under his general powers or under the by-laws authorizing him to appoint all committees has authority to appoint the arbitrators is not material. In either case the appointment would be valid, and their acts, in so far as they were within the terms of the agreement of the parties, would be legal and binding upon the parties thereto. We conclude, therefore, that the award as to the one-car arbitration was legal, and the appellant is liable for the amount of the judgment based thereon.

[6] It is insisted by respondents that, as the rules of the association provide for an appeal from an award, the remedy of the appellant, if dissatisfied with the award of the arbitrators, was by appeal to the board of appeal provided for by the rules of the Commerce Association. A sufficient answer to this contention is that the machinery for such an appeal is entirely lacking in the by-laws and rules of the association. Not only is there no rule or by-law designating who shall appoint said board, but the rules and by-laws are silent in so far as our attention has been directed thereto, upon a number of essential requirements for such an appeal, including the number constituting said board, the time and manner of taking the appeal, and the power or duty of the board upon appeal.

There were other points discussed by the parties in their respective briefs on appeal, but the claims involved thereunder appear to have been abandoned subsequently, and upon the rehearing the arguments of counsel have been directed in the main to the consideration of the subjects discussed herein.

The judgment is reversed as to the award against appellant amounting to the sum of $3,881.70, and is affirmed as to the award amounting to $2,496.20 rendered against said appellant, appellant to recover costs.

In re STEUER'S ESTATE.

JENSEN et al. v. LARSEN.
(Civ. 5623.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 27, 1926.)

1. Executors and administrators $\S$ 227(2)—When claim against estate of decedent based on instrument in writing, copy of instrument must be attached and filed therewith to relieve it from statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 339, 1497, 1499).

Where claim against decedent's estate is based on instrument in writing, copy of instrument must be attached to statement of claim, and be filed therewith under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1497, in order to relieve it from limitations of sections 339 and 1499.

2. Limitation of actions $\S$ 28(1)—Claim against estate of decedent for services covering period of three years before death held barred as to portion covering services rendered beyond two-year limitation (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 339, 1499).

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 339, 1499, claim against estate of decedent, based on monthly charge for services for period of three years before death, held barred as to that portion covering services rendered beyond two-year limitation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank B. Willis, Judge.

Final accounting of Minnie Larsen, administratrix of the estate of Katinka Steuer, deceased. From a decree settling the account, Laura Jensen and others, heirs of the deceased, appeal. Reversed.

Henshaw, Black & Lyders, Eric Lyders, and William A. Montan, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Wetherhorn, Hoyt & Jones, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Katinka Steuer died in this state on October 6, 1924, intestate, and leaving as her heirs at law four sisters and one brother. One of the sisters, Minnie Larsen, was duly appointed administratrix of the estate, which was of the value of about $3,500. During the course of administration, Christian Larsen, the husband of this administratrix, presented to her his verified claim against the estate, reading as follows:

"For board, room and care furnished to Katinka Steuer from November 27, 1920, to November 27, 1923, total thirty-six months at $70 per month—$2,520."

This claim was in due time approved by the administratrix and allowed by the probate judge. The administratrix then presented her final account, from which it appeared that, after the payment of this claim and the expenses of administration, nothing was left in the estate to be distributed to the heirs. These heirs, other than Minnie Larsen, the administratrix, protested against the allowance of the Larsen claim upon the grounds that a large portion of it was barred by the statute of limitations. These objections were overruled, and the account was settled, and the decree in accordance therewith was entered. From this decree the heirs of the decedent, other than the administratrix, have appealed.

[1] The sole ground urged on the appeal is that all that portion of the claim which did not cover services rendered within the two-year period was barred by the provisions of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure. In this connection attention is directed to section 1499 of the same Code, which provides that no claim must be allowed by the executor or administrator or by a judge of the court which is barred by the statute of limitations. These express inhibitions in the statute are conceded by the respondent, and the only argument which she makes in support of the decree is that the claim does not appear on its face to be barred, and that no evidence was offered to show that the claim was not based upon some instrument in writing sufficient to take it out of the bar of section 339. To the latter point the appellants correctly answer that, if the claim were based upon any such instrument, it was incumbent upon the claimant, under section 1497, Code of Civil Procedure, to attach a copy of the instrument to the statement of the claim, and to file it therewith. In that case the claim must be based on the written instrument. Here the claim is merely "for board, room and care * * * from November 27, 1920, to November 27, 1923, total, thirty-six months at $70 per month," and is based on the legal presumption to pay for services rendered. The case is on all fours with Etchas v. Orena, 127 Cal. 588, 60 P. 45. There a claim, in the same form as the above, was presented for services rendered to the deceased "from June 1, 1885, to June, 1895, * * * at $30 a month." In that case the Supreme Court say (page 592):

"It appears, therefore, on the face of the claim as presented, that all that part of it was barred by the statute except for services that became due on or after January 19, 1894. If barred by the statute of limitations, the claim could not be allowed by the executor or the judge. Code Civ. Proc. § 1499." (Emphasis ours.)

[2] Here the claim shows plainly on its face that it was a monthly charge for services rendered from November 27, 1920, to November 27, 1923. Because of this fact, it follows as of course that the portion of the claim covering services rendered beyond the two-year limitation of the statute is barred, and was improperly allowed by the administratrix and the probate judge. The difference between the indebtedness incurred within the terms of the statute and the amount allowed would, therefore, be available for distribution to the heirs of the decedent and the order settling the first and final account was, therefore, prejudicial to them.

Order reversed, with costs to appellants.

PEDROW et ux. v. FEDEROFF et al.
(Civ. 2960.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 18, 1926. Rehearing Denied April 17, 1926.)

1. Carriers §318(10)—Findings that injuries to plaintiff in leaving defendant's taxicab were proximately caused by defendant's negligence, and hence not due to plaintiff's negligence, held warranted by plaintiff's testimony.

Plaintiff's testimony that defendant's taxicab made sudden jerk or moved while driver was at wheel, thereby throwing her to ground and causing injuries complained of while she was leaving cab in exercise of due care, held to warrant finding that injuries were proximately caused by defendant's negligence, and hence not due to plaintiff's negligence.

2. Appeal and error §1011(1).

Where there is substantial conflict in evidence as to how accident happened, District Court of Appeal cannot interfere with finding for plaintiff.

3. Appeal and error §1010(1)—Reviewing court may set aside findings only where evidence is so weak and unsatisfactory as to afford no support thereto as matter of law, or inherently improbable, and hence unbelievable on face.

Court of review may set aside findings, necessary to uphold judgment, only where evidence is so weak and unsatisfactory on its face as to afford no support to such findings as matter of law, or is inherently improbable, and hence unbelievable on its face.

4. Appeal and error §1011(1)—District Court of Appeal is bound by trial court's decision on facts, where testimony of witnesses for victorious party is in substantial conflict.

District Court of Appeal is bound by trial court's decision on facts, where there is substantial conflict in testimony of witnesses for victorious party, as well as where conflict arises between their testimony and that of opposing party's witnesses.

5. Appeal and error §994(3)—Truth of plaintiff's testimony as to period of employment before injury and time of return thereto afterward held for trial court, notwithstanding employer's conflicting testimony.

Truth of plaintiff's testimony as to how she received injuries held for trial court sitting without jury, though integrity of her testimony as to how long she had worked for laundry before injury, and how soon she was able to return to work thereafter, was shaken by laundry proprietor's testimony from his time book.

6. Appeal and error §994(3)—Witnesses §317(1)—Rule that witness false in one part of testimony is to be distrusted in others merely means that entire testimony may be rejected for such reason, not that fact trier may not believe other parts of testimony, and cannot be invoked in District Court of Appeal on review of facts (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3).

Doctrine that witness false in one part of testimony is to be distrusted in others (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3), is for guidance of fact triers at nisi prius in determining witness' credibility, and merely means that entire testimony may be rejected because of false swearing in material part, not that jury or judge trying facts may not believe and credit other parts of witness' testimony, and rule cannot be invoked in District Court of Appeal on review of facts.

7. Damages §132(2)—$300 for broken tibia and injury to knee joint, necessitating cast on knee and thigh for three or four weeks and use of crutches for six weeks, over five months of pain, possible future suffering, and loss of wages for several weeks, held not excessive.

$300 for impacted fracture of tibia and injury to knee joint causing slight amount of fluid therein, necessitating cast on leg and thigh for three or four weeks and use of crutches for about six weeks, continued pain for over five months, possible future suffering, and loss of wages for several weeks, held not excessive.

8. Appeal and error ⚡1004(1)—Verdict or judgment cannot be interfered with by District Court of Appeal unless damages are so disproportionate to compensation warranted by facts as to shock sense of justice and raise presumption of passion or prejudice.

Unless damages awarded are, as matter of law, so disproportionate to compensation reasonably warranted by facts as to shock sense of justice and raise presumption that they are result of passion or prejudice, verdict or judgment cannot be interfered with by District Court of Appeal.

9. Appeal and error ⚡926(5)—Where record does not show that each witness was called by name and directed to remain outside courtroom until called to testify, it must be assumed that defendant leaving room was not specially commanded to do so.

Where record does not show that each witness was called by name and directed by court to remain outside courtroom until called to testify, it must be assumed that defendant absenting himself from courtroom was not specially commanded to do so.

10. Trial ⚡41(3)—Party to action is not subject to order excluding witnesses from courtroom, but is entitled to remain therein and aid in and observe progress of trial.

Party to action is entitled to remain in court during trial and aid in and observe progress thereof, and is not subject to order excluding witnesses.

11. Appeal and error ⚡206(1)—Counsel not calling court's attention to fact that client, absenting himself from courtroom under order excluding witnesses, was party to suit, cannot complain.

Counsel, not calling court's attention to fact that client absenting himself from courtroom under mistaken belief that order excluding witnesses included him was party to suit, cannot complain.

12. Appeal and error ⚡1046(1)—Defendant's absence from courtroom during trial held not prejudicial to defendants, where fact was not discovered nor suggested until plaintiffs rested case and defendants were about to introduce defense.

Where defendant's absence from courtroom was not discovered nor suggested until plaintiffs rested case and defendants were about to introduce defense, defendants were not prejudiced; their counsel evidently having found no use for absent defendant's presence.

13. Trial ⚡18—Ordering defendant and plaintiffs' witness to stop talking and leave courtroom held proper in discharge of court's duty to maintain decorum during trial.

In ordering defendant and plaintiffs' witness to stop talking and leave courtroom, court did no more than his duty to maintain decorum during trial; presumption being that they were speaking in tone sufficiently audible to disturb proceedings.

14. Appeal and error ⚡1046(i)—Defendants were not prejudiced by exclusion of one of them from courtroom, where he was not present when accident causing injuries sued for occurred and later testified to inconsistent statements by plaintiff, and court weighed testimony carefully and based decision on testimony of other witnesses than plaintiff.

In action against taxicab driver and owner for injuries to passenger, requiring latter to leave courtroom during examination of witnesses of accident by defendants' attorney was not prejudicial to defendants, where he was not present when accident occurred and later testified as to statements by injured plaintiff after accident inconsistent with her testimony as to how it happened, and judge trying case without jury weighed testimony carefully and declared that, but for other witnesses' testimony, he would be disposed to order judgment against plaintiffs.

On Petition for Rehearing.

15. Appeal and error ⚡994(3)—Injured plaintiff's statement, incompatible with testimony as to how accident occurred, held not ground for reversal of judgment for plaintiffs.

Injured plaintiff's statement, inconsistent with her testimony as to being thrown to ground by sudden lurch or movement of taxicab while leaving it, that at time of doing so she handed fare to driver still sitting at wheel, held not ground for reversal of judgment for plaintiffs, where judge stated that he would be inclined to give defendants judgment if there were no other testimony on which to predicate judgment rendered and there was other testimony sufficient to show that accident was directly due to taxi driver's negligence; impeaching evidence merely producing substantial conflict for trial court to resolve.

16. Trial ⚡45(3)—Trial judge's refusal to receive testimony as to statements by injured plaintiff inconsistent with her testimony as to how accident occurred held not available error; question to witness as to whether he was in party in front of defendant's place when defendant and attorney were there not disclosing nature or materiality of testimony expected.

Refusal of court, trying personal injury suit against taxicab driver and owner without jury, to receive testimony as to statements by injured plaintiff inconsistent with her testimony as to how accident occurred, held not available error; question to witness as to whether he was in party in front of owner's place when latter and attorney putting question were there not showing nature or materiality of testimony expected.

17. Appeal and error ⚡205—Questioner, to reserve exception, must formally reframe question to make materiality apparent, where not material on face.

Where question is not material on its face, questioner, to reserve exception, must formally reframe question so that its materiality is apparent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by Thomas J. Pedrow and wife against W. R. Federoff and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John R. Connelly, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Crofton & Wetmore and Frank A. Duryea, all of Marysville, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action for personal injuries alleged to have been received by the plaintiff Lydia Pedrow through and by the negligence of the defendants. The complaint alleges the facts in detail, and prays for damages—damage to Lydia Pedrow, damage to Thomas J. Pedrow, and for doctor's bill and medicine, each separately stated—in the total sum of $1,750. The answer specifically denies the allegations of the complaint and sets up as a special defense contributory negligence. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and plaintiffs were awarded judgment in the sum of $369. The defendants appeal from the judgment, supporting the same by a transcript of the proceedings taken at the trial as authorized by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The principal point is that there is no evidence which sufficiently supports the findings.

The plaintiffs, as the title indicates, are husband and wife, and, at the time of the injuries herein complained of were sustained, resided in Yuba City, in Sutter county. The defendant Federoff was at said time the owner of a taxicab business in the city of Marysville and locally engaged in the transportation of passengers from place to place for hire, and at the same time the defendant O'Neil was in the employ of Federoff as a taxicab driver. Yuba City is situated a mile or less from the city of Marysville, in Yuba county; the two places being divided by the Feather river, across and over which a bridge for the use and accommodation of the traveling public is maintained.

The facts as herein stated will be based largely upon the testimony of the plaintiff Lydia Pedrow.

The home of the plaintiffs, at the time the injuries were received by Lydia Pedrow, was at 143 Kiley avenue, in Yuba City. In front of their home was an embankment, which sloped perceptibly toward the curbing directly in front of the residence. At and before the day on which the accident occurred, both plaintiffs were employed at a laundry in the city of Marysville; her duties being those understood as a "press" worker. The elder of the two daughters of the plaintiffs was, at the time Lydia Pedrow received her injuries, and had been for a period prior thereto, attending school in the city of Marysville, and the younger child was then attending school at Yuba City. Early on the morning of the 12th day of May, 1924, Lydia Pedrow left her home in Yuba City for Marysville, for the purpose of purchasing a can of oil to be used in oiling a vacuum cleaner. She was accompanied by her two daughters and her husband, the latter going to Marysville for the purpose of resuming his daily labors at the laundry above spoken of. They arrived in Marysville shortly before 8 o'clock a. m. and, after making the purchase of the oil, she started on her return home. This was about 8 o'clock. She noticed a taxicab standing at a corner of a street in Marysville, not far distant from where she stood when she first observed the cab, and, being anxious to get back to her home as soon as possible because of the fact that her younger daughter was required to report at school in Yuba City at the hour of 8:30 a. m., she sent one of the girls to the taxi driver to inquire what his charge would be to convey the three to Yuba City. The charge for the service being satisfactory, she and the two girls entered the cab and were driven to Yuba City and directly to their home. The cab was stopped in front of her residence, the door was opened (she stated by the driver), the two children alighted, and, as she was in the act of leaving the cab, her left foot on the running board and the right still inside the cab—her body half in and half out of the cab, as she explained it—the machine suddenly started, or, as she several times described it, started to roll down the embankment, or, as she also once described it, the cab made a movement in the nature of a "jerk," and she was by said jerk or movement thrown to the ground. The driver, one O'Neil, without assisting or offering to assist her to her feet, immediately started away and was soon out of her sight. She stated that she was unable, unaided, to get on her feet, but, after some effort, finally succeeded in getting into her house and onto a couch by crawling on her hands and knees. On getting into the house she began to realize that her left knee had been injured, as she was suffering much pain in the region of the knee cap. She remained on the couch, unable to use her left leg, until her husband returned from his work in the late afternoon, when he sent for a physician, who called at the house, examined the injured limb, found a bruise on the knee, which was swollen, and some fluid in the joint. He administered temporary treatment of the injured limb for the purpose of alleviating the suffering of Mrs. Pedrow, as far as thus it could be done under the circumstances. On the following morning the doctor caused the patient to be conveyed to his office, where he took an X-ray plate of the injured knee. The doctor, by the aid of the X-ray plate, discovered a "possible fracture of the upper end of one of the small bones of the left leg" (the "tibia," as technically the doctor described the bone), "with an injury to the knee joint sufficient to cause a slight amount of fluid in there. I took her home," proceeded the doctor, "and put a cast on her leg and thigh, immobilized the knee. * * * I think she had the cast on for three or four weeks." The doctor stated that the main injury to the leg was what is called an "impacted fracture," further explaining that "an impacted fracture is not a bone broken off but just mashed in." He stated that it would be difficult in such a case to venture a definite prognosis as to the length of time in the future during which the patient would suffer pain from the injuries she had received. After the limb was put in a cast, as above explained, Mrs. Pedrow was able to go about on crutches. From the time she was injured until the time she dispensed with the use of the crutches a period of about six weeks was covered.

Both plaintiffs testified that, for several weeks after Mrs. Pedrow was hurt, the husband was compelled to perform the household duties of their home. These he would attend to in the early morning before going to work and in the evening on returning from work. The elder daughter was required to remain home from school to assist her mother until the latter's injured limb was removed from the cast. Mrs. Pedrow testified that she had suffered more or less pain from the injuries from the time she received them down to the time of the trial, a period of over five months from the time she was hurt. Particularly, in damp weather, she said, was the pain noticeable. She received as compensation for her work at the laundry, when employed, the sum of $19.50 per week.

The explanation by Mrs. Pedrow of the manner in which she fell or was thrown to the ground was in part corroborated by her daughter (the elder of the two) and a Mrs. Mack, a neighbor, whose house was next to that of the Pedrows. Mrs. Mack stated that she was out on her porch engaged in sweeping when the cab stopped in front of the Pedrow home. The Pedrow children first alighted from the cab, and then, as Mrs. Pedrow was attempting to do likewise, one foot being on the running board and the other on the inside of the car, and her body being "half in and half out" of the car, the cab made a sudden move, throwing Mrs. Pedrow to the ground. She stated that the driver was in his seat in the cab when it made the move.

The testimony of the driver of the cab, O'Neil, was directly contradictory to the testimony of Mrs. Pedrow as to the manner in which she fell to the ground, and was to the effect that the cab was standing perfectly still when Mrs. Pedrow left the car and in doing so fell to the ground. O'Neil testified that the moment that he reached a point directly in front of the Pedrow home, he stopped the motor and that the car did not move, nor was it moved after he stopped it and until he started on his return to Marysville. He stated that Mrs. Pedrow fell after her feet struck the ground, there being there at the time "a lot of rubbish," etc., into which she stepped. He said that he assisted Mrs. Pedrow to her feet and that she thereupon went into the house without apparent difficulty or inconvenience. Another witness, a lady then living near the Pedrow home, stated that she saw Mrs. Pedrow leave the cab and that the car did not move nor was it moved while she (Mrs. Pedrow) was in the act of getting out of the machine. That witness further testified that the driver of the cab assisted Mrs. Pedrow to her feet and that she (Mrs. Pedrow) walked into her house, but was supported by her two children. And as to how Mrs. Pedrow got into the house after she was hurt, her testimony and that of her elder daughter are not altogether in harmony.

Certain witnesses for the defense testified that Mrs. Pedrow, prior to bringing this action, and shortly after the accident, made certain statements as to the manner in which the accident occurred which, if true, would be inconsistent with her testimony given at the trial. This impeaching testimony, however, she contradicted, positively declaring it to be a fabrication.

[1-3] It will not be disputed that if, as Mrs. Pedrow testified, the cab made a sudden jerk or lurch or moved while the driver was still in his seat at the wheel, and she, exercising due care when the act of leaving the cab, was thrown to the ground and received the injuries by reason of such moving or lurching of the cab, then, manifestly, the court, believing her story, was legally authorized to find that the proximate cause of her injuries was the negligence of defendant and, consequently, not due to negligence on her part. It is to be conceded that, upon the face of the record, there is a conflict in the evidence upon the question of how the accident resulting in the injuries happened, but it is a substantial conflict. In such a situation as to the evidence, this court, as is well understood, is without legal right to interfere with the verdict, so far as is concerned the evidentiary phase of the case. It is only where, upon its face, the evidence from which findings necessary to uphold the judgment have been drawn is so weak and unsatisfactory as to justify the conclusion that it, as a matter of law, affords no support to such findings, or is inherently improbable, and therefore unbelievable upon its face, may a court of review set aside the findings, and, as stated, this we cannot say as to the evidence upon which the findings in this case are founded.

[4-6] The rule that a court of appeal is bound by the decision of the trial court upon the facts where the evidence is in substantial conflict upon such facts applies as well where such conflict arises in the testimony given by the witnesses for the party victorious in the trial as where the conflict arises between the testimony given by the witnesses of one of the parties and that given by the witnesses testifying for the opposing party. It is suggested, however, that Mrs. Pedrow's own testimony was not only shown to be false in part, but that the court, in deciding the case, in effect so stated. This has reference to her declaration that she had worked for the laundry in Marysville for a period of two or three years prior to the time when she was hurt, and also that she was unable to return to her employment for about three or four weeks after she was injured, and then resumed her work while on crutches, whereas, the proprietor of the laundry, testifying from his time book in which a record of the days, weeks, or months during which his employees worked at the establishment was kept, stated that, about two years prior to the day she was hurt, both Mrs. Pedrow and her husband worked for him in his laundry, but that they left the laundry and were gone about two years; that they returned after that period of time and were re-employed by him and put to work in the laundry in the latter part of April, 1924; that, within a few days after she was injured, she returned to her work. With the integrity of her testimony thus shaken, it was still with the trial court to determine whether her testimony as to the manner in which she received her injuries was true or false. The doctrine that "a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others" (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3) is a rule designed for the guidance of the triers of the questions of fact at nisi prius in passing upon and determining the credibility of a witness whose testimony they may find has been in part false. "The rule merely means that where the witness is found to have sworn falsely in a certain material part of his testimony, his entire testimony may for that reason be rejected. But no one will attempt to challenge the right of a jury or a judge, trying the facts, to believe and credit certain parts of the testimony of a witness who has been shown to have sworn falsely as to certain other material parts thereof." The rule is in any event "one which cannot well be invoked in a court of appeal on a review of the facts." Brandt v. Krogh, 111 P. 275, 279, 14 Cal. App. 39, 48; Robinson v. Robinson, 113 P. 155, 159 Cal. 203.

[7, 8] We cannot say that the judgment is excessive. The doctor testified that for the professional services rendered Mrs. Pedrow by him his fee amounted to $60, and it was shown that the plaintiffs paid $9 for medicines to be used and which were used in the treatment of Mrs. Pedrow's injuries. The court, in deciding the case, stated that it "will allow $369 damages—that includes the doctor's bill and medicine," and, as seen, rendered and caused to be rendered judgment in accord therewith. There is thus left the sum of $300 to plaintiffs for damages as in compensation for the damage actually sustained. That sum appears to constitute a reasonable admeasurement, in terms of money, of the damages which will at least approximately compensate plaintiffs for the injuries and the consequences to them following therefrom. There was the loss of wages for several weeks, also the pain and suffering Mrs. Pedrow endured when the injuries were still fresh and at the time of the trial, which took place something over five months after the accident happened, and possible future suffering. It is, of course, always difficult in cases of this character to fix the amount which should be allowed for the element of pain and suffering, present and future, but unless it can justly be said, as a matter of law, that the damages awarded by the verdict or the judgment "are so far disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice and raise the presumption that they are the result of passion or prejudice, rather than of honest and sober judgment," interference with the verdict or the judgment by a court of review is forbidden. 8 Cal. Jur. § 88, p. 834, and cases named in the footnote. As before indicated, under the state of the record as to the evidence in this case, we cannot so hold here.

[9-11] The defendant complains of the action of the court in excluding from the courtroom during the progress of the trial the defendants W. R. Federoff and J. W. O'Neil. On the opening of the case, counsel for defendant stated: "For the reason that there is a conflict of evidence we would like the witness to testify out of each other's hearing." The record then shows the following in parentheses: "At this time the witnesses are excluded from the courtroom." While the defendants were putting on their case, the following occurred, as the record shows:

"Mr. Connelly (Attorney for Defendants): I see that one of the defendants was excluded with the rest of the other witnesses. (J. W. O'Neil is called into the room.)"

[12] The record does not show that, in making the order excluding the witnesses, each of the latter was first called by name and thereupon directed by the court to remain outside the courtroom while the trial was going on and until called to testify, and it is therefore to be assumed that O'Neil was not specially commanded to depart from and remain outside the courtroom until required to give his testimony, and, of course, being a party to the action, was not, and could not have been so intended to be, subject to the order of exclusion. Counsel for defendants better than the judge knew who O'Neil was—whether he was the defendant O'Neil or only a witness having no interest in the case other than as a witness—and knowing that a party to an action is entitled to remain in the court during the trial of such action and aid in and observe the progress thereof (Chester v. Bower, 55 Cal. 46, 48), it was his duty to protect the right of O'Neil in that respect by calling the attention of the court to the fact that he (O'Neil) was a party to the suit. Having failed to take that course, counsel can blame no one but himself for the act of O'Neil in absenting himself from the courtroom under the mistaken belief that the order of expulsion included him. But, aside from these considerations, it is clear, from the record, that defendants suffered no prejudice from O'Neil's absence from the courtroom while the trial was in progress, as (so the record would indicate) his absence was not discovered, or at least it was not suggested, until the plaintiffs had rested their case and the defendants were about to introduce their defense. Evidently counsel for defendants had found no use for O'Neil's presence while the plaintiffs were introducing their proofs or when their witnesses were undergoing cross-examination by him; otherwise, undoubtedly, counsel would have called for O'Neil.

[13.14] When counsel for plaintiffs were about to take up the cross-examination of the defendant O'Neil, the court interrupted, addressing the defendant Federoff and one Winship, the latter, a witness for plaintiffs, having already testified, and saying: "Stop your talking back there, gentlemen. Don't look at me that way. Leave the room." Thereupon, so the record states, Mr. Federoff and Mr. Winship left the room. The defendants assign the action of the court in thus ordering Federoff to leave the courtroom as misconduct prejudicial to the rights of the defendants. It is to be presumed that, when the court ordered the parties named to "stop talking," the latter were speaking in a tone of voice sufficiently audible to disturb the proceedings. A court has the right—indeed, it is its duty—to maintain decorum in the courtroom when a trial or other judicial proceeding is under way therein, and, of course, may to that end require all present to remain orderly and quiet, and in ordering the individuals named not to carry on a conversation in the courtroom while the trial was in progress, the judge did nothing more than what it was his duty to do to preserve proper demeanor on the part of those in attendance upon the trial, and thus the dignity with which trials and proceedings in courts of justice should always be conducted. It is not, however, pointed out by counsel how or in what way, if at all, the defendants were prejudiced by the action of the court in ordering and requiring Federoff to depart from the courtroom, and, from the record itself, as it is presented here, we cannot say that prejudice to defendants followed from the circumstance. Federoff was not present when the accident occurred, so he could have been of no assistance to his attorney in the latter's examination and cross-examination of the witnesses as to that matter. He was later called into the courtroom and testified to statements alleged to have been made by Mrs. Pedrow after the accident inconsistent with her testimony as to how it happened. Besides, there was no jury to be prejudiced by the action of the court, if, indeed, such a circumstance would or might have the effect of causing prejudice to arise in the minds of the intelligent and fair-minded men and women of whom it is to be presumed trial juries are usually constituted, nor is it made to appear that the judge's decision was affected thereby. To the contrary, the record shows that the judge was scrupulously careful in weighing the testimony and reaching a conclusion therefrom, for he did not base his decision entirely on the testimony of Mrs. Pedrow. He declared that, but for testimony given for plaintiffs by other witnesses than Mrs. Pedrow herself, he would be disposed to order judgment against plaintiffs. He stated this in deciding the case, saying that it was his opinion that the plaintiffs tried to "squeeze the damages up" by testifying that Mrs. Pedrow was forced to remain from her employment for a longer period than the real truth disclosed. He based said opinion upon the testimony of the proprietor of the laundry at which she had been, and at the time she was injured was, employed to the effect that she returned to her labors some two weeks prior to the time at which both plaintiffs testified that she resumed her work there.

There are some other criticisms of the record, but in these, as in other assignments to which attention has herein been given, there is no substantial merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

HART, J. [15] Two points are urged for a rehearing of this cause. The point first made in the petition was practically considered and disposed of in the original opinion. It is this: That the testimony of Mrs. Pedrow is, upon its face, plainly incredible, and that, in deciding the case, the trial court should have attached to it no weight whatsoever, and that, in giving it credit, as presumptively it did, it abused its discretion. It is to be conceded that Mrs. Pedrow made one statement while testifying which does not bear the earmarks of truth, and that was that, while in the act of alighting from the cab, she at the same time handed to the driver, still sitting in the taxi and at the wheel, the fare for conveying her and her daughters to Yuba City. This statement appears to be incompatible with her testimony that, on attempting to leave the car, and while her body was outside the cab, she was thrown to the ground by reason of a lurch or sudden movement of the taxi. But we paid no specific attention to that apparent inconsistency in the former opinion because, as shown in said opinion, the record showed that the judge, in deciding the case, stated that he would be inclined to give defendant judgment if there were before him no other testimony than that of Mrs. Pedrow upon which the court could justifiably predicate a judgment for plaintiffs. Thus, it would clearly appear to be true, the judge discredited, to some extent at least, Mrs. Pedrow's testimony. And, as shown in the former opinion, there was testimony other than that of Mrs. Pedrow sufficient to show that the accident and the resulting injuries to Mrs. Pedrow were directly due to the negligence of the taxi driver. It follows that, without considering Mrs. Pedrow's testimony involving her version of the circumstances under which the accident happened, there exists substantial evidentiary support to the decision, and the evidence presented by defendants as in impeachment of the case of plaintiffs as made by the proofs, merely had the effect of producing a substantial conflict in the evidence as a whole which it was the sole function of the trial court to resolve.

[16, 17] The second point stressed by counsel in support of the petition here is that the court erroneously refused to receive testimony the particular object of which is not disclosed by the record, but which counsel declares in his briefs and the petition here would have the effect of impeaching the testimony of Mrs. Pedrow; that is, that it would show that she had at some other time made statements as to the manner in which or the circumstances under which the accident occurred which were in material particulars inconsistent with her testimony before the court. One L. B. Smith was called by defendants for that purpose, and the following thereupon occurred:

"Q. (By Counsel for Defendants): Mr. Smith, were you in the party that went over in front of Mr. Federoff's place some time the latter part of May, on the evening when Mr. Federoff and myself were there? A. Yes, sir.

"The Court: Are you going to testify, too?

"Mr. Connelly (Counsel for Defendants): No, I won't.

"The Court: If you don't mind, I don't think this will have any effect on me whatever.

"Mr. Connelly: It is only as to statements made.

"The Court: I am not paying any attention to them.

"Mr. Connelly: Then that is all."

Whereupon the witness was withdrawn. It cannot be determined from the question propounded to the witness what the nature of the testimony was that counsel expected to elicit from the witness, or whether, whatever the nature of the testimony thus proposed to be introduced, it was material to any issue in the case. Even counsel's explanation to the trial court of what the testimony would be afforded no enlightenment upon that proposition. He merely stated that it related "only as to statements made," of what character or by whom made was not by him made to appear. The trial judge's remarks regarding the proffered testimony would imply that he was familiar with the character thereof, and, assuming that he was, it may also be assumed, from the record as it stands with regard to the matter, that he considered it as not being material to any issue in the case. But, however that may be, it is clear that we cannot, from the record, say whether it would or would not be material. The counsel should have propounded a question to the witness in such form as that it would have indicated the nature of the testimony which he expected and desired the witness to give, in which case an exception to a ruling excluding the testimony, if it thus was shown to be material to any of the issues of the case, would have justified and facilitated a review of the ruling by this court. "Where the question does not show on its face whether or not it is material, the questioner, in order to reserve an exception, must formally reframe the question so that its materiality is apparent." People v. Singh, 182 Cal. 457, 482, 188 P. 987, 998; Snowball v. Snowball, 164 Cal. 476, 129 P. 784; 9 Ency. of Evidence, 170; People v. Bryant (Cal. App.) 246 P. 815.

The petition for a rehearing must be denied, and it is so ordered.

SKAGGS v. TAYLOR, Constable. (Civ. 5231.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 22, 1926.)

1. Replevin $\S$ 103(4).

Where property replevied is delivered to plaintiff and delivery back to defendant cannot be had, judgment for defendant need not be in alternative under Code Civ. Proc. § 667, but may properly be for its value alone.

2. Replevin $\S$ 103(4)—Where property replevied was delivered to plaintiff, and defendant made claim for its return pleading circumstances under which he had been deprived of it which were uncontradicted, defendant held entitled to return of property or its value when plaintiff was nonsuited.

In action in claim and delivery in which property was delivered to plaintiff and defendant made claim for its return, pleading circumstances under which he had been deprived of it, which were uncontradicted, defendant held entitled to return of property or its value when plaintiff was nonsuited.

3. Replevin $\S$ 103(4).

Granting return of property replevied or its value to defendant does not depend on his proof of title to the property, but upon his obtaining a judgment in his favor and upon having made a claim for return of the property.

4. Replevin ⚡103(1).

Judgment of nonsuit against plaintiff is "judgment for defendant" within meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 667, relative to judgment for defendant in claim and delivery action.

5. Judgment ⚡303.

Where judgment of nonsuit in claim and delivery action failed to provide for return of property or its value to defendant under Code Civ. Proc. § 667, court may modify judgment to make such provision.

6. Courts ⚡90(7).

Decision of District Court of Appeal in prior case similar in principle to case under consideration is conclusive on points involved therein.

7. Appeal and error ⚡105.

Minute order granting nonsuit held not appealable where it was superseded by judgment from which appeal had been taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action in claim and delivery by Ammie Skaggs, also known as Mrs. James E. Skaggs, against Walter J. Taylor, Constable of Oakland Township in and for the County of Alameda. Judgment of nonsuit, and defendant appeals from the minute order granting the nonsuit, the judgment, and the order denying his motion to modify such judgment. Judgment and order denying motion to modify reversed with directions. Appeal from the minute order dismissed.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Silverstein, Collier & Silverstein, of Oakland, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff brought this action in claim and delivery to recover possession of an automobile which, following the commencement of this action, was seized by the sheriff subject to the usual replevin proceedings, and upon the failure of defendant to except to the sufficiency of plaintiff's sureties or to give an undertaking for its return, was delivered before the trial into the possession of the plaintiff. At the trial judgment of nonsuit was entered, and although defendant's answer contained a claim for the return of said automobile or its value in case a return could not be had, no order or judgment to that effect was granted or rendered. Subsequently defendant moved the court to modify its judgment so as to incorporate such provision therein, but the motion was denied. The defendant has taken three appeals, the first being from the minute order granting the nonsuit, the second from the judgment of nonsuit, and the third from the order denying his motion to modify said judgment.

The judgment of nonsuit conformed in terms to the order made in that respect, and was as follows:

"* * * Witnesses on the part of the plaintiff were duly sworn and examined, whereupon plaintiff closed his case, and thereupon defendants moved the court for a judgment of nonsuit on the ground that plaintiff had failed to prove a sufficient cause of action against said defendants and the court having heard the arguments of counsel for the respective parties and being fully advised in the premises, granted said motion for nonsuit, and ordered a judgment of nonsuit entered against said plaintiff and in favor of said defendants and the defendants have their costs herein. Wherefore by virtue of the law, and by reason of the premises aforesaid, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff take nothing by this said action, and that judgment of nonsuit be, and the same is hereby given, made, and granted in favor of said defendants, against said plaintiff and that defendants shall have and recover of and from the plaintiff his costs. * * *

Said judgment was entered on December 23, 1924, and subsequently, on January 2, 1925, defendant served and filed a notice of motion to modify the same in the manner hereinabove mentioned upon the ground that said judgment did not conform to the provisions of section 667 of the Code of Civil Procedure. At the hearing of the motion defendant offered in evidence, in support thereof, "all of the papers, records, and files in the above-entitled action, and particularly the second amended complaint of plaintiff and the answer of defendant thereto. * * *" Said answer, besides denying plaintiff's claim of ownership and right to the possession of said automobile, set forth facts showing the circumstances under which said automobile came into defendant's possession and was being detained by him. Those circumstances, briefly stated, were that as constable he levied upon said property under a writ of attachment issued in an action brought by a corporation named Field & Lee against James E. Skaggs, the husband of this plaintiff, and later sold the same under execution proceedings to said Field & Lee; that on or about September 11, 1923, pursuant to a demand made upon him by this plaintiff, he surrendered the automobile to her, and afterwards she voluntarily returned the same to him; that thereafter said automobile remained in his possession until seized by the sheriff under process issued in this action, without further demand of any kind being made upon him. Said answer also contained certain denials and allegations as to value and damages, but the same are unimportant here. The prayer of the answer was that plaintiff take nothing by her action and that defendant be given judgment for a return to him of the property or the value thereof in case a return could not be had, together with damages for its depreciation while in plaintiff's possession. As additional evidence, defendant offered in support of the motion an affidavit made by one of his attorneys which set forth, among other things, that at the time of the commencement of the action said automobile was at the request of this plaintiff seized by the sheriff, had since been in the possession of the sheriff or the plaintiff, and had not been returned to the defendant; that at the time of the seizure said automobile was in defendant's possession, and that he was entitled to the return thereof; that it was stipulated during the trial that the value of said automobile at the time it was seized was $400. In the return to the writ of replevin which was filed in the action prior to the service of the notice of motion, the sheriff stated that after the seizure defendant failed to except to plaintiff's sureties and "omitted to require a return of said property and no other person other than the defendants having made return thereto, I did, at the expiration of the time required by the statute for seeking such delivery and making such claim, to wit, on the 4th day of December, 1923, deliver the property so taken to the plaintiff herein as by said order I am commanded." The evidence thus offered by defendant was not contradicted by plaintiff, no showing whatever being made in opposition thereto.

[1-3] Section 667 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relied upon by defendant in furtherance of his contention that he was entitled to the relief above mentioned, provides that in an action to recover the possession of personal property, "if the property has been delivered to the plaintiff and the defendant claim a return thereof, judgment for the defendant may be for a return of the property or the value thereof, in case a return cannot be had, * * *" or, as the cases hold, where it appears that a delivery cannot be had, or the property is lost or destroyed pending trial, the judgment need not be in the alternative, but may properly be for its value alone. Nahas v. Browning, 183 P. 442, 181 Cal. 55, 6 A. L. R. 476; Erreca v. Meyer, 75 P. 826, 142 Cal. 308. In construing said section 667 it has been held that where there is no prayer, claim, or demand of any kind in the answer for a return of the property or its value, a judgment for its return to the defendant, or its value in case a return cannot be had, is not permissible. Banning v. Marleau, 35 P. 772, 101 Cal. 238; Imperial Valley Auto Co. v. Toney, 190 P. 1043, 47 Cal. App. 541. But in this connection it is also declared that it is not necessary for a defendant to allege affirmatively that he, or a third person, is entitled to the possession of the property, but that the general denial, if the plaintiff fails to prove his averments, determines that the property should be restored to the defendant; that consequently if in his answer the defendant has made due claim for such return, he is entitled to a judgment to that effect. Pico v.

Pico, 56 Cal. 453. It would therefore seem that defendant's answer herein not only met the requirements of the law to entitle him to the judgment sought, but went even further than was necessary by having pleaded the circumstances under which he had been deprived of the property by plaintiff; but in any event having set forth a claim in unmistakable terms for the return of the property, he was clearly entitled to such relief. Pico v. Pico, supra; Lee v. De La Motte, 189 P. 1034, 47 Cal. App. 23; Al G. Barnes Shows Co. v. Toyo Kisen Kaisha Oriental Steamship Co., 214 P. 1015, 61 Cal. App. 304; Imperial Valley Auto Co. v. Toney, supra. Plaintiff concedes that defendant "pleaded" for a return of the property, but contends that having introduced no testimony to substantiate his claim, was not entitled to the relief now demanded. It is manifest, however, that the reason no such evidence was offered was that a nonsuit was entered. Moreover, the granting of such relief to a defendant does not depend upon the strength or weakness of the defendant's proof of title to the property, but upon his obtaining a judgment in his favor and upon having made a claim for the return of the property. Pico v. Pico, supra.

[4] It cannot be successfully maintained that a judgment of nonsuit is not a "judgment for the defendant" within the meaning of said section 667 for the reason that it has been expressly held in the case of Kowalsky v. Nicholson, 137 P. 607, 23 Cal. App. 160, that a defendant is entitled to the full benefit of the provisions of said section notwithstanding that the judgment is one of dismissal. The case of Nahas v. Browning, supra, holds likewise. In Kowalsky v. Nicholson, supra, the action was in claim and delivery wherein plaintiff secured possession of the property pending trial. After the cause had been at issue for nearly four years, the court, upon notice to the plaintiff, granted defendant's motion to dismiss the same for want of prosecution. Subsequently the court, upon due notice to the plaintiff, amended its order of dismissal nunc pro tunc as of the date of its original entry by adding the following:

"And the defendant is entitled to have returned to her all the property taken from her under the previous proceeding of this action of replevin, or if return thereof cannot be had, then she shall have judgment for the value thereof in the sum of $1,000 and for the delivery to her of the undertaking in this matter."

[5, 6] The record, so the decision states, did not show that the original entry as made by the clerk was different from the one directed by the court; and plaintiff therefore contended as respondent claims here that the court had no power to change the order or judgment. Upon appeal the action of the trial court in amending its order and judgment of dismissal was sustained, the court saying:

"Upon the dismissal of the action in the case at bar defendant was entitled to the return of the property involved in the action; and a failure to enter the requested correction of the judgment would be equivalent apparently to a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs on the merits of the case. This would be manifestly unjust; and as the record shows that defendant was entitled to judgment as finally entered, and as the motion to correct the mistake was promptly made, the action of the court in the premises must be sustained."

We find no difference in principle between that case and the one before us, and consequently the decision therein must be held to be conclusive upon the points here involved.

[7] For the foregoing reasons the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion to modify the judgment must be reversed, with directions to grant said motion and to modify said judgment so as to give the defendant the benefit of the relief provided for in section 667 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Etche-pare v. Aguirre, 27 P. 668, 929, 91 Cal. 288, 25 Am. St. Rep. 180. It is so ordered. The appeal from the minute order granting the nonsuit is dismissed upon the ground that the same was not appealable, having been superseded by the judgment from which an appeal has been taken.

PEOPLE v. MORALES. (Cr. 902.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 17, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 14, 1926.)

1. Criminal law — 1129(3).

The appellate court does not review assignments of error, unless complaining party points out reasons on which they are founded, or shows or attempts to show substantial merit therein.

2. Indictment and information — 71—Omission to state that "duel" was fought with deadly weapons held not to render information objectionable, in that it did not state offense so as to enable defendant to know what was intended (Pen. Code, § 950, subd. 2, and sections 225, 226, 951, 952; Words and Phrases, "Duel").

In view of Pen. Code, § 950, subd. 2, and sections 951, 952, omission to allege in information for dueling, under sections 225, 226, that duel was fought with deadly weapons, held not to render it objectionable, in that it did not so state offense as to enable one of common understanding to know what was intended; "duel" meaning a "combat between two persons, fought with deadly weapons, by agreement" (citing Words and Phrases, "Duel").

3. Indictment and information — 71.

Generally, each essential ingredient of a public offense, as such offense is defined by law, should be set forth in clear and understandable language.

4. Criminal law — 518(3)—Proper foundation was laid for admission of defendant's extrajudicial statements, where he was informed that his statements must be voluntary, and that they would be used against him at trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 2052).

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, in prosecution for dueling, evidence that, preliminarily to questioning defendant about the combat and prior to his statements, prosecuting attorney informed him that his statement must be voluntary, and would be used against him at trial, held sufficient foundation for evidence as to his extrajudicial statements as to facts of the combat.

5. Criminal law — 519(1).

To admit defendant's confession, it is necessary to show only that he made it freely and voluntarily without coercion by threats or undue pressure or promises of reward or leniency.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Daniel Morales was convicted of dueling resulting in death, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. K. Robinson, of Auburn, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted in the superior court of Placer county of the crime of fighting a duel with one Zacharius Martinez, which resulted in the immediate death of the last named. Pen. Code, §§ 225 and 226. He made a motion for a new trial and the same was denied. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and the order denying him a new trial.

The defendant, as was the deceased, is a Mexican, and both, at the time of their fatal meeting on the afternoon of the 7th day of March, 1925, were employed as laborers in the sewer pipe department of the Gladding, McBean & Co. Pottery, at Lincoln, in Placer county. About half past 3 o'clock on the afternoon of the day named, the two men engaged in a quarrel, and, so defendant testified, the deceased called him (defendant) a "bad name," whereupon the defendant continued to testify, the following angry colloquy took place between them: Deceased addressing defendant: "What kind of a man are you?" Defendant, replying: "You well know who I am." Deceased to defendant: "I do not think you will come out with me to-night." Defendant answered: "Let's go right now." Deceased replied, "Come on, let's go," and thereupon the two men left their work; the defendant requesting another employee to tell the foreman that he (defendant) had gone out "to arrange some business," and deceased making a like request. Before leaving the pottery, the two men agreed to meet at some spot near a "little red house," which was situated approximately three miles from and east of the town of Lincoln. The land there was hilly and covered with brush and trees. The defendant, on leaving the pottery, went directly to his home and there procured a weapon described as a "32-20" pistol. The deceased went to his home and armed himself with a Luger revolver. The defendant stated that the deceased carried two pistols or revolvers to the scene of the shooting. However, the two men, within a short time after departing from the pottery, met at the place agreed upon. It is not necessary to go into the details herein of what occurred between the men, as described by the defendant, after they arrived at the place where the shooting was carried on. It is sufficient to state that, immediately upon reaching the place above indicated they began firing at each other, with the result, after a number of shots were exchanged, that the deceased received a mortal wound in the head; death following from said wound instantaneously, in the opinion of the doctor conducting the autopsy at the post mortem examination of the body of the deceased, while defendant was shot in the breast, and conveyed to the county hospital of Placer county and was there administered medical treatment.

The attorney for defendant sets forth in his brief 120 distinct specifications of error alleged to have been committed by the court in the trial of the case. When called for hearing in this court the cause was submitted for decision without oral argument, but upon the briefs on file, and two only of the multiplicity of specifications of error does counsel for defendant, in his briefs, attempt to support by argument, or to point out wherein the numerous rulings complained of were erroneous and prejudicial to his client. All that appears in the briefs of defendant as to each of the specifications of error, with the exception of the two referred to above, is the mere statement or charge that the court erred in giving certain instructions or in its ruling upon evidence, for example as follows: "The court erred in giving instruction No. 20," and "the court erred in overruling defendant's objections found in lines 11 to 20, transcript, p. 22."

[1] We are not required to review assignments of error unless the party relying upon them points the reasons upon which the assignments are founded or shows or attempts to show wherein there is substantial merit therein. The appellate courts are not supposed to perform the work of counsel who present cases thereto for review. The rule thus stated and to which the appellate courts of this state almost uniformly adhere is explained as follows in People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, 309, 67 P. 770, 771:

"We again repeat what we have said before that we will not examine alleged errors presented in this way. It is due to this court from the members of the bar to point out clearly and concisely the rulings complained of as erroneous and the reasons why they are so, with reference to authorities, if any. In case counsel will not take the trouble to do so, we shall deem the matter as of not sufficient importance to merit notice in an opinion. People v. Woon Tuck Wo, 120 Cal. 297 [52 P. 833].

The cases of People v. Cebulla, 137 Cal. 314, 70 P. 181, and People v. Chutnacut, 141 Cal. 682, 685, 75 P. 340, are to the same effect.

[2] The two points to which counsel addresses argument in his briefs are: (1) That the information does not state a public offense and is obnoxious to the objection that it does not satisfy the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code; (2) that it was error for the court to admit in evidence certain extrajudicial statements made by the defendant after the alleged duel was fought.

1. Section 225 of the Penal Code defines the crime with which it was sought to charge the defendant as follows:

"A duel is any combat with deadly weapons, fought between two or more persons, by previous agreement or upon a previous quarrel."

Section 226 of said Code reads:

"Every person guilty of fighting any duel, from which death ensues within a year and a day, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than seven years."

The charging part of the information is as follows:

"* * * The said defendant * * * did willfully, unlawfully and feloniously fight and engage in a duel with one Zacharius Martinez, and he, the said defendant, did then and there kill said Zacharius Martinez while he, the said defendant, was so fighting said duel with said Zacharius Martinez, a human being," etc.

It will be noted that the information omits to state that the duel was fought by the parties "with deadly weapons," and this omission is employed as the predicate for the argument by counsel for defendant that the accusatory pleading fails in the statement of a public offense, as the crime is thus attempted to be charged.

The defendant demurred to the information on both general and special grounds, and the demurrer was overruled. The special exceptions to the information, as stated in the demurrer, are that two different and distinct offenses are charged, to wit: (1) A felony, in that the defendant engaged "in the fight and duel with one Zacharius Martinez"; and (2) that defendant is therein charged "with committing a felony, in that he, said defendant, did then and there kill Zacharius Martinez while he, said defendant, was so fighting said duel with said Zacharius Martinez, a human being." Nowhere does the demurrer specifically or directly object to the information on the ground that therein it is not charged that the combat between the belligerents was fought with deadly weapons. The information stands challenged, therefore, on the general ground only, and the question is whether it sufficiently states the offense attempted thereby to be charged to overcome the objection presented by a general demurrer, or, in other words, whether it states an offense known to the law.

[3] We think that, in charging the crime of fighting a duel, where deadly weapons were used, and the result of the fight is the death of one of the combatants, it would be the better practice to allege in the information or indictment that deadly weapons were used by the parties in fighting the duel, but we do not think that mere failure to do so would render the accusatory pleading subject to the objection that it does not state the offense "in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." Pen. Code, § 950, subd. 2. The conclusion thus announced is with full appreciation of the general rule that each of the essential ingredients of a public offense, as such offense is defined by law, should be set forth in an information or indictment in clear and understandable language, or in the manner above indicated. In the present case, the information not only states that the defendant and the deceased fought a "duel," but further alleges that, in fighting such duel, and as a direct result thereof, one of the combatants was killed. The word "duel" bears a fixed, definite signification, not only colloquially, but juridically. Webster's Dictionary defines a "duel" as a "combat between two persons, fought with deadly weapons, by agreement." This definition is, as stated, the common—in fact, we may truthfully say the universal—understanding of the word. It indeed, is its intrinsic signification, and as so defined has been invariably adopted and used in the law and followed by the courts. See 3 Words and Phrases, p. 2258; State v. Fritz, 133 N. C. 725, 45 S. E. 957; State v. Herriott, 1 McM. (S. C.) 126, 130; Bassett v. State, 44 Fla. 2, 33 So. 262, 265; Davis v. Modern Woodmen of America, 98 Mo. App. 713, 73 S. W. 923, 924; 9 Cal. Jur. 940; Const. Cal. art. 20, § 2. In State v. Fritz, supra, the signification of the term is thus explained:

"A 'duel' is defined to be a combat between two persons, fought with deadly weapons, by agreement. The use of weapons of some kind seems to be a necessary ingredient of the offense, since it is held that challenging to fight a fair fight with fists and hands, and not to use any deadly weapon, is not a 'challenge to fight a duel,' within Code, § 1012, providing that any person challenging to fight a duel shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Thus the word itself, or when taken alone, expresses as fully the complete thought embraced within its intrinsic signification as does the word "murder" without the amplification necessary to the specific expression of all the essential ingredients of the crime so generically designated, expresses the fact of the "killing of a human being with malice aforethought." When Doe says to Roe, "A murder has been committed," Roe thus immediately has conveyed to his mind the fact that some one has unlawfully, and with premeditation and malice aforethought, taken the life of another human being; in other words, it is not necessary, in ordinary parlance, to express the fact that the crime of murder has been committed, to say that some person has willfully, premeditatedly, and with malice aforethought killed a human being. So it is true, where B. is told by A. that a "duel has just been fought" or "is about to be fought," that the thought thus immediately conveyed to B.'s mind is that at least two persons have been engaged or are about to engage in a combat with one another, with deadly weapons, by previous agreement or upon a previous quarrel. To express the fact that a duel has been fought, it would be wholly superfluous to say that it was fought between two persons, since, manifestly, no single person can fight a duel or any other kind of a personal combat. Thus it would seem that it is tautological to say that "two persons have fought or are about to fight a duel, with deadly weapons, by previous agreement," etc. This involves a view of section 225 of the Penal Code from a grammatical standpoint, but we do not concede the impropriety of that view of the section as an aid to the determination of the question whether the information in this case states the offense therein intended to be charged "in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." To what we have hereinabove said, however, we may add that, if the words "with deadly weapons" had been eliminated from the section or not inserted therein by the Legislature, we would have no hesitation in saying that the courts would construe the section as meaning a combat fought between two or more persons with deadly weapons and this construction would be predicated upon the proposition that such is the natural or intrinsic signification of the word "duel."

Our conclusion is, as is necessarily to be understood from the views thus expressed, that the information sufficiently complies with the requirement of the statute as to the essentials of a properly stated crime in a criminal pleading; that the defendant could not have been under the least misapprehension as to the specific crime that was intended to be charged against him; and that, in point of fact, since he made no objection to the information or objected to any evidence introduced at the trial upon the ground that the crime of fighting a duel with deceased with deadly weapons was not properly and understandably thus charged to his account, it is clear that he did not at any time experience any difficulty in determining the precise issue or charge against which he was called upon by the information to defend himself or to prepare himself for a defense.

[4, 5] 2. The complaint that the rulings admitting in evidence certain extrajudicial statements of the defendant in which he recited the circumstances leading to and attending the fatal combat between himself and the deceased, and involving, in effect, a confession of guilt of the crime charged, were erroneous, for the alleged reason that a proper foundation was not laid for the admission of said statements, cannot be sustained. Immediately following the fatal shooting, the district attorney interviewed the defendant at the county hospital and secured from him a statement, which was reduced to writing by a stenographer and admitted in evidence. A day or two thereafter the district attorney again held an interview with defendant at the county hospital and again obtained from him a statement of the facts and circumstances of the duel. This statement was also taken down and transcribed by the stenographer, and was also introduced in evidence. The facts of the case as they were given by defendant on both occasions were substantially the same. Before offering these statements in evidence the district attorney showed that, preliminarily to asking defendant any questions about the combat and prior to the making of the statements by him relative to the circumstances or facts of the fight, he informed the accused that he was not required to make a statement of the facts leading to and attending the act of killing the deceased; that, if he did make such a statement, it must be voluntary on his part; and that whatever statement he might make which would involve a confession of the commission of a crime or any incriminatory admissions regarding any charge growing out of the killing of the deceased would be used against him by the people at the trial of such charge. In reply the defendant, in effect, stated that he understood the situation with respect to any statement he might make, and thereupon proceeded to give his version of the circumstances and facts of the case. It is clear that a sufficient foundation was laid for admitting the statements in evidence. Counsel, however, seems to be of the opinion that, besides showing that the statements were voluntarily made, it was also necessary, before proof of the confession could be made, to show the time and place at which the same was made and the persons present at such time and place. This contention involves a confusion of the rule prescribing the prerequisite to the proof of a confession with the rule prescribing the prerequisites to the impeachment of a witness on the ground that he had at some time made statements inconsistent with the testimony given by him at the trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 2052. All that it is necessary to show before a confession by a defendant that he committed the crime with which he is charged may be proved is that he made the confession freely and voluntarily or without being coerced to make the confession by threats or undue pressure of any sort practiced upon him by those in authority or upon promises of reward or leniency by those having authority, either real or apparent, to grant immunity from punishment or from the heavier penalties of the law. This is elementary. If, however, the element of "time, place and persons present" were an essential component of the foundation to be established as a prerequisite to the admissibility of evidence of a confession, there would still be no ground for complaint that a proper foundation for the proof of the statements in this case was not laid prior to their reception in evidence, for the times and place at which they were made and at least some of the persons present at those times were shown in the appropriate order of proof in such instances.

Although, as above stated, most of the points suggested in the opening brief of defendant we have not been required to review for the reason heretofore explained, we have, nevertheless, read the entire record, and thus have been convinced that the record is free from error of a prejudicial character; that in fact, on the whole the case was carefully and fairly tried; and that the verdict is abundantly supported.

Accordingly, the judgment and the order are affirmed.

JAQUITH v. JUSTICE COURT IN AND FOR BRAWLEY TP., IMPERIAL COUNTY, et al. (Civ. 4127.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 23, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐901.

Order refusing to issue a peremptory writ of prohibition will be affirmed in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1088, 1094, 1105, where bill of exceptions does not show that refusal was not based on failure of appellant to support allegations of his petition by proof.

2. Appeal and error ⇐901.

Burden is on one who appeals from a judgment of superior court to convince appellate court that it was rendered through error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Proceeding for writ of prohibition by E. C. Jaquith, in which Elmer M. Jaquith, executor, was substituted on plaintiff's death, against the Justice Court in and for Brawley Township, County of Imperial, State of California, and another. From judgment denying writ, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Goodspeed & Pendell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James L. Allen, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

WORKS, J. E. C. Jaquith was originally the petitioner in this proceeding. After the present appeal was prosecuted, he departed this life, and Elmer M. Jaquith, executor of the last will and testament of E. C. Jaquith, deceased, was substituted in his place as appellant and petitioner. This is a proceeding for the writ of prohibition. Petitioner appeals from an order or judgment of the trial court refusing to issue a peremptory writ.

Upon the filing of the petition the trial court issued its alternative writ of prohibition and the writ was served upon the respondents. After some sort of hearing, the nature of which is not clearly confided to us, the court made its order refusing to issue the peremptory writ. The record comes to us by bill of exceptions. The bill recites:

"No answer or pleading of any kind was filed by the defendants, or either of them, in said matter above entitled."

Following a copy of the petition for the writ and copies of other papers which were served with it, the bill of exceptions next contains the recital that it appearing that the defendants had been duly and regularly served with the writ and other necessary papers, "the matters mentioned in said petition were argued" by the respective attorneys, whereupon the court "made its order denying said petition." A copy of the order is then set forth in the bill. It shows, "This matter coming on regularly to be heard," the parties on each side being "represented" by counsel, who are named, and "after hearing the arguments of counsel for both parties and after listening to the authorities cited in support of said arguments, the court being fully advised in the premises, denies the plaintiff's application to make the writ permanent." This constitutes the total material showing of the bill of exceptions.

[1] Unless we are able to determine from this unsatisfactory record that the court's refusal to issue a peremptory writ did not spring from a failure of appellant to support the allegations of his petition by proof, the court's order must be affirmed without going further. If the record allows the assumption that evidence was introduced and considered, we must also assume that the decision turned upon a question of fact and that the evidence supported the order which was made. We are bound to resolve all possible intendments in favor of the ruling of the court. Section

1088 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which concerns the writ of mandate, but which by section 1105 of the same Code is made to apply also to the writ of prohibition, provides:

"The writ cannot be granted by default. The case must be heard by the court, whether the adverse party appears or not."

Section 1094, which is also made to apply to the writ of prohibition by section 1105, contains the following:

"If no answer be made, the case must be heard on the papers of the applicant."

There are at least two decisions which seem directly to bear upon the meaning of these two sections. The first of these cases is Pereria v. Wallace, 129 Cal. 397, 62 P. 61, a proceeding for the writ of mandate which was commenced in the superior court. The writ issued and the defendant appealed. The facts show that a demurrer to the petition was interposed, but that, the demurrer having been overruled, no answer was filed. The opinion of the Supreme Court then recites that—

"The matter was heard upon the complaint, and the court made and filed findings, and ordered a writ of mandate to issue. * * *"

The conclusion of the court was stated in this language:

"Appellants * * * contend that the judgment is contrary to law and void; that the writ cannot be granted by default. (Citing Code Civ. Proc. § 1088.) The complaint was verified, and the failure of the defendants to answer conceded the truth of all the facts alleged. Facts so conceded do not need to be otherwise proved. (Code Civ. Proc. § 1094; Hayward v. Pimental, 107 Cal. 390 [40 P. 545])."

The remaining case to which we have referred is Jackson School District v. Culbert, 134 Cal. 508, 66 P. 741. In that proceeding the superior court rendered judgment refusing to issue the writ of mandate and the petitioner for the writ appealed. Following is the language of the Supreme Court in disposing of the questions arising upon the appeal:

"No answer was filed by the respondent. The judgment, after a recital of preliminary matters, among which is the statement that C. P. Vicini and William J. McGee appeared as counsel for respondent, is: 'It is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said petition be, and the same is, hereby denied.' It is said that the court filed an opinion, but it is not before us, and we can only surmise upon what ground the writ was denied. The opinion, however, if we were at liberty to take it into consideration, would not supply the defect. Section 1088 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: 'The writ cannot be granted by default. The case must be heard by the court, whether the adverse party appear or not.' If the trial court cannot grant the relief upon the pleadings, it would seem to follow that this court cannot reverse a judgment denying the writ, unless it is made to appear that such a showing was made before the lower court as would require the issuance of the writ. As the allegations of the petition are not taken as true because of the default, it may be that it was there shown that the board of supervisors had fully performed their duty. At all events, appellant must show by the record that the court erred in refusing the writ, or the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered."

It is said in Ferguson v. Board of Education, 95 P. 165, 7 Cal. App. 568, that there is a conflict in the two opinions of the Supreme Court from which we have just quoted, but it appears to us, from a consideration of the effect of the two cases, that the conflict does not exist. In the Pereria Case a demurrer was interposed to the petition for the writ of mandate, but no answer was filed. The opinion in the Culbert Case shows that no answer was presented there, and an examination of the record on appeal shows also that no demurrer was filed. There was therefore no appearance whatever in the latter proceeding. This difference in the two cases seems to place them upon an entirely different footing. That they do not conflict in result appears from an examination of other cases decided by the Supreme Court. In a proceeding for the writ of prohibition it was said that "the legal effect of the [demurrer] was to admit the truth of allegations of the [petition]." Heilbron v. Campbell, 23 P. 1032, 5 Cal. Unrep. 745. In another proceeding of the same nature this language occurs:

"The cause was submitted on a demurrer to the petition. The facts alleged are therefore admitted to exist." Favorite v. Superior Court, 181 Cal. 261, 184 P. 15, 8 A. L. R. 290.

The context of each of the opinions in these two cases shows that it was by them determined, not that the facts alleged were admitted by demurrer merely for the purposes of the demurrer, but that they were admitted for all purposes. This result seems to have sprung from the view that a demurrer in a prohibition or mandate proceeding is equivalent to an "answer" under the provisions of section 1094 of the Code of Civil Procedure, when a respondent has appeared by demurrer and has submitted the proceeding for decision thereon. This result is doubtless upon the theory that it is to be deemed that the respondent thereby admits that he cannot deny the allegations of the petition. The rule stated in the Heilbron and Favorite Cases supports the conclusion reached in the Pereria Case, although in the latter the court did say that the facts alleged in the petition were conceded by a failure to answer, not by the filing of demurrer and the submission of the proceeding thereon. This circumstance appears at first glance to be trivial, as in the Pereria Case the proceeding was submitted upon the petition and the demurrer thereto, exactly as in the Heilbron and Favorite Cases, but the circumstance appears to be worthy of mention as it apparently misled the court in Ferguson v. Board of Supervisors, supra.

It now appears that Jackson School District v. Culbert, supra, stands alone, unimpeached by any utterance of the Supreme Court in any other decision. When the court says in that case, "If the trial court cannot grant the relief upon the pleadings," we think upon a consideration of what immediately follows the expression, that it meant to decide that a trial court cannot grant the writ upon the petition, where no demurrer or answer is filed. When the court says further, in that case, "As the allegations of the petition are not taken as true because of the default," we understand, considering what follows those words, that the court decides that the allegations of a petition for the writ are not taken as true because of a default. The District Court of Appeal of the Third District was evidently inclined to the same view in Ferguson v. Board of Education, supra, although the court found it unnecessary to decide the point, for it was said in the opinion there rendered:

"Respondents contend that under section 1088 of the Code of Civil Procedure it was incumbent upon appellant to allege and prove demand whether denied or not. Where default is made the section seems to uphold this view; and in Jackson School District v. Culbert [66 P. 741], 134 Cal. 508, where the defendant failed to answer, it was said: 'If the trial court cannot grant the relief on the pleadings, it would seem to follow that this court cannot reverse a judgment denying the writ, unless it is made to appear that such showing was made before the lower court as would require the issuance of the writ.'"

[2] When we come to apply the Culbert Case to the present controversy, the situation becomes plain. The trial court could not have issued the writ upon the allegations of the petition. The hearing of evidence to support the pleading must have preceded such a result. This is equivalent to saying that the court could not have tried the facts of the case except upon the consideration of evidence introduced to prove the allegations of the petition, whether the decision were to be rendered on the facts either in favor of or against the petitioner. Of course, the reception of such evidence was not strictly necessary to a denial of the petition, for the court might have refused the writ under the issue of law arising upon the face of the pleading itself. There is, however, no showing by the bill of exceptions that the issuance of the writ was denied on that ground. No demurrer was filed—the bill of exceptions affirmatively shows that. There was no "appearance" in opposition to the petition, but the court permitted "attorneys" of respondent to present argument in his behalf at the hearing of the case which was had. The bill of exceptions is barren of a showing that any objection was made by these attorneys to the legal sufficiency of the petition. Again, the bill does not show that the court entertained or expressed the view that it was insufficient. The bill also fails to show whether or not evidence was heard in support of the petition. In short, we are left altogether in the dark upon the question whether the petition was denied under an issue of fact or under an issue of law. It is a settled rule that the burden is upon one who appeals from a judgment of a superior court to convince the appellate court that it was rendered through error. Under this rule it was incumbent upon appellant to bring to us a bill of exceptions showing, if such was the case, that the denial of the writ for which he prayed did not result from a failure on his part to support his petition by proof. In the absence of such a showing, we are bound to assume that the writ was denied for that reason, and not only so, but that the evidence which was heard justified the finding of the trial court that it was not sufficient to warrant the issuance of the writ. These views find ample support, among many cases, in Jackson School District v. Culbert, supra.

Judgment affirmed.

LANDSRATH v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 5275.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 21, 1926.)

1. Master and servant — 417(7).

Power to review findings of fact by Industrial Accident Commission is limited to consideration of question whether there is substantial evidence on which findings may rest.

2. Marriage — 50(1)—Finding of Industrial Commission that evidence was insufficient to show claimant was deceased's wife held not supported by evidence (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1959, 1963).

In compensation proceeding, where claimant showed she had been living with deceased and holding herself out as his wife and that marriage ceremony had been performed, finding of commission that evidence was insufficient to show marriage held not supported by evidence, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1959, 1963, raising presumption that man and woman deporting themselves as husband and wife are lawfully married.

3. Marriage — 50(1)—On issue of marriage of claimant for compensation with deceased, that deceased had said that marriage meant only slip of paper, and that there was no record of marriage between parties, held merely negative (St. 1917, p. 844, § 14).

In claim under St. 1917, p. 844, § 14, for compensation for death of husband, where issue was whether claimant was wife of deceased, that husband had stated that he regarded marriage as slip of paper, and that there was rumor that he had lived with another woman without marriage for 11 years, and that there was no public record of marriage of claimant and deceased, held merely negative evidence, not touching question of sufficiency of evidence adduced sustaining marriage of parties.

4. Evidence — 53—Mere inference will be allowed to stand, not against facts represented, but only in lieu thereof.

Mere inference will be allowed to stand, not against facts represented, but only in lieu thereof, and where facts are proven to be contrary to inference, no conflict in evidence arises.

5. Master and servant — 388.

Woman in good faith believing herself to be wife of deceased, cohabiting with him, and at all times holding herself out and recognized as such, held entitled to compensation for his death as "dependent," under St. 1917, p. 844, § 14, subd. 1.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Mrs. Pauline Landsrath, claimant, for compensation for the death of A. H. Landsrath, her husband. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission, awarding compensation to Alvina Landsrath and rejecting claimant's claim, she brings certiorari. Award annulled.

Leslie H. Kranz, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner and Warren H. Pillsbury, both of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Acc. Commission.

Adams, Adams & Binford, of Los Angeles, for respondent Alvina Landsrath.

HOUSER, J. The purpose of this proceeding is to review an award made by the respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

From the return herein it appears that one A. H. Landsrath was killed while engaged in his employment, and that in due course the respondent commission made an award in the sum of $4,900 in favor of the infant daughter of the deceased. The petitioner herein, who claims to be the widow of the deceased, was denied any relief, and it is because of such latter fact that a review of the proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission is sought by petitioner, to the end that her rights may be finally determined. It is conceded by the parties hereto that the reason for the failure of the commission to award any relief to the petitioner was predicated upon its finding of fact as follows:

"That the evidence is insufficient to establish as a fact that the applicant, Pauline Landsrath, was dependent upon the employee at the time of the sustaining of said injury by him, or that she was his wife at said time."

[1] The power of this court to review findings of fact by the Industrial Accident Commission is limited to a consideration of the question of whether there is any substantial evidence upon which such findings may rest. In the absence of evidence to support a given finding, it cannot stand, but if with relation to such finding a mere conflict appears in the evidence, or if opposing inferences may reasonably be drawn therefrom, the conclusion reached by the commission is final and cannot be disturbed by this court. Walker v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 737, 171 P. 954, L. R. A. 1918F, 212. So far, therefore, as concerns this tribunal in the instant case, it is authorized to consider the evidence adduced on the hearing before the respondent commission for the purpose only of determining its sufficiency to warrant the finding that the evidence was insufficient to establish either the dependency of the petitioner of that she was the widow of the deceased.

By one of the terms of the statute (section 14, Stats. 1917, p. 831), a wife living with her husband at the time he received an injury which resulted in his death is conclusively presumed to have been wholly dependent for support upon her husband. In cases other than those for which the statute expressly provides, the question of whether a given person is a "dependent" must be determined in accordance with the facts as they may appear as of the time of the receipt of the injury by the employee. It therefore becomes of importance to ascertain whether at the time A. H. Landsrath received the injury the petitioner was his wife, in which case she would be conclusively presumed to be "dependent" and entitled to share in the award, or, failing in establishing the fact that she and the deceased were husband and wife at the time in question, in accordance with the provisions of the statute she may otherwise be legally considered as a "dependent" and as such entitled to recognition in the award.

[2] The evidence of the marriage between the petitioner and A. H. Landsrath included the following facts: That before the marriage took place petitioner had been engaged to be married to Landsrath for a period of about four weeks; that petitioner accompanied Landsrath in an automobile to the courthouse in Jeffersonville, Ind., for the purpose of procuring a marriage license; that petitioner sat in the automobile while Landsrath was inside the courthouse presumably for the purpose of procuring the license; that immediately thereafter Landsrath had a "paper" in his possession which petitioner "supposed" was a license; that thereupon the parties went to a "shabby" office on the window of which was a sign "Justice of the Peace"; that Landsrath handed the "paper" which he had in his hand when he came out of the courthouse to a man, who afterward performed the marriage ceremony between the parties; that the ceremony was performed in the presence of a witness; that before that time petitioner had been once married and was familiar with the marriage ceremony; that the magistrate who performed the marriage ceremony between petitioner and Landsrath gave to petitioner a marriage certificate; that after the ceremony had been performed petitioner saw Landsrath with some money in his hand and presumed that he gave it to the magistrate; that immediately thereafter the parties went to the home of the mother of petitioner, and, before coming to California, lived with a sister of petitioner for a period of approximately two months; that after their arrival in California for a period of about one month the parties lived with petitioner's "folks," including the mother and the sister of petitioner, the sister's husband, and a little boy; that continually from the date of the marriage of petitioner and Landsrath they lived together as husband and wife, deported themselves as husband and wife, held themselves out to the world as husband and wife, were reputed to be husband and wife, were publicly recognized as husband and wife, declared themselves to be husband and wife, were received among their friends, relatives, and neighbors as husband and wife; and that at all times after said marriage ceremony petitioner believed herself to be the wife of said Landsrath.

As opposed to the conclusion that the parties were legally married, the respondent suggests that the evidence showed that prior to the marriage between petitioner and Landsrath he had "expressed the view that marriage meant only a slip of paper anyway, and he didn't see that it made any difference"; to which statement petitioner immediately responded that she "didn't believe in anything like that and would not under any circumstances ever live with any one without being married legally," and that she would insist on a ceremony of marriage; to which Landsrath immediately acceded; that some time after the marriage ceremony was performed petitioner was "informed" that for a period of 11 years Landsrath had lived with another woman without being married to her; that at the time the marriage license was issued and the marriage ceremony between the parties was performed, records of the issuance of marriage licenses and of marriage certificates were being kept at Jeffersonville, Ind., but that petitioner failed to produce any evidence showing a record of either the marriage license or the marriage certificate, or that the records covering the period in question had been destroyed.

From an examination of the return of the writ herein it may be noted, as hereinbefore set forth, that the finding is not that no marriage ceremony was performed, but that the finding declares "that the evidence is insufficient to establish as a fact that the applicant Pauline Landsrath was dependent upon the employee * * * or that she was his wife at said time." No attempt is made by the findings to actually determine the fact in issue. They are simply declarant of the opinion of the commission that there is a lack in the quantity of evidence necessary to a determination of the point involved.

By section 1959 of the Code of Civil Procedure a presumption is defined as a deduction which the law directs to be made from particular facts. Section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure contains a list of presumptions which "are satisfactory, is uncontradicted." Among them is the presumption (30) "that a man and woman deporting themselves as husband and wife have entered into a lawful contract of marriage." The evidence introduced at the hearing before the commission, and which was uncontradicted, among other things, established the fact beyond peradventure that the petitioner and Landsrath conducted themselves as husband and wife. In addition thereto, the positive first-hand testimony of the petitioner was that a marriage ceremony had been performed by which she was married to Landsrath. While testimony might have been given by the justice of the peace who performed the marriage ceremony, or by the witness thereto, such testimony, as well as evidence of the issuance of the marriage license or the recordation of the marriage certificate, would have been merely cumulative of facts as testified to by the petitioner. Her testimony of the surrounding facts, including the performance of the marriage ceremony, was primary evidence and was sufficient in itself as a basis for a conclusion that petitioner and Landsrath had been legally married. In view, therefore, of the legal presumption of marriage arising from the conduct of the parties to which reference heretofore has been had, together with the undisputed testimony of the petitioner, it must be held that the evidence, instead of being insufficient, as found by the commission, was ample to establish the fact that petitioner was the wife of Landsrath at the time he received the injury which resulted in his death.

[3] But it is suggested by respondent that the question presented is whether the facts that Landsrath had expressed the view that

"marriage meant only a slip of paper," that there was an unproved rumor that prior to his marriage with petitioner he had lived with a woman for 11 years without being married to her, and that no record of the marriage between the parties herein was produced, raise a reasonable inference upon which the finding by the commission to which reference has been had may be sustained. Such assumed facts are wholly negative in character and do not touch the question of the sufficiency of the evidence adduced sustaining the marriage between the parties. The only possible office which evidence of the nature of that referred to could fulfill would be that of creating a conflict in the evidence which, were it of sufficient strength and vitality, might justify a positive finding of fact that no marriage ceremony had been performed. That a man stated that he regarded marriage as "a slip of paper," that a rumor existed to the effect that during a period of 11 years he had lived with a woman without being married to her, and that no public record of the issuance of a marriage license or the performance of a marriage ceremony was produced, certainly do not rise to the dignity of constituting a reason upon which a deduction or an inference of the nonperformance of the marriage ceremony might be founded. The "rumor," of course, is no evidence at all; nor does the failure on the part of the petitioner to produce the record to which we have referred necessarily establish the fact that the record is nonexistent. The same thing is true with reference to the alleged view of Landsrath that a marriage was but "a slip of paper." Assuming that he did make such a statement, it would merely serve as a foundation for the inference that he had no regard for the marriage ceremony—not of the ultimate fact that no marriage ceremony had actually been performed.

[4] There is, then, no reasonable inference contained in the evidence which conflicts with the positive testimony given by the petitioner that a marriage ceremony was performed and that she was the wife of Landsrath at the time he received the injury which resulted in his death. Moreover, it has been ruled in effect that a mere inference will not always be enough to create a conflict in the evidence. In the case of Maupin v. Solomon, 41 Cal. App. 323, 183 P. 198, it is said (syllabus):

"* * * Inferences are allowed to stand, not against the facts they represent, but only in lieu of proof of such facts, and where the facts are proven to be contrary thereto, no conflict arises and a finding of the jury in accordance with such inference cannot be supported thereby."

The question presented in that case was whether positive testimony that an employee was not acting in the scope of his employment at the time a collision occurred between two automobiles which caused the damage, and which damage was the foundation for the action, could be overcome by an inference to the contrary. In denying the petition for hearing by the Supreme Court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, ruling as hereinbefore indicated, the Supreme Court said in part:

"In this case the direct uncontradicted evidence introduced in response to the prima facie case as to the circumstances under which the employee of appellant was driving appellant's automobile was of such a nature as to leave no reasonable ground for an inference based solely on the fact of appellant's ownership of the automobile and the further fact that the person driving was an employee of appellant, that the driver was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the accident. The verdict, therefore, was contrary to the evidence, and this is all we understand the opinion of the District Court of Appeal to decide."

In the case of Everett v. Standard Accident Insurance Co., 45 Cal. App. 332, 187 P. 996, the court distinguishes presumptions from inferences, and says:

"The rule differs as to an inference which can be drawn only from facts proved. Where evidence is offered controverting the inference which might ordinarily be drawn under the circumstances, the jury is bound to find according to the controverting evidence. The distinction is found in the Code. Section 1958 of the Code of Civil Procedure defines an inference as 'a deduction which the reason of the jury makes from the facts proved, without an express direction of law to that effect.'"

In Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corporation, 190 Cal. 1, 210 P. 269, it is ruled:

"A fact is proved as against a party when it is established by the uncontradicted testimony of the party himself or of his witnesses, under circumstances which afford no indication that the testimony is the product of mistake or inadvertence, and when the fact so proved is wholly irreconcilable with the presumption sought to be invoked, the latter is dispelled and disappears from the case."

In that case the court cited numerous authorities, and quoted the following from Savings & Loan Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 529, 39 P. 922, 925:

"Disputable inferences or presumptions, while evidence, are evidence the weakest and least satisfactory. They are allowed to stand, not against the facts they represent, but in lieu of proof of them. The facts being proven contrary to the presumption, no conflict arises;

the presumption is simply overcome and dispelled."

See, also, Ransford v. Ainsworth (Cal. Sup.) 237 P. 747, 750, where the court, referring to this same subject, said that "the difficulty with the appellant's contention lies, not with the law, but with its application to the facts of the particular case."

[5] There is, however, another reason why the finding to which reference has been had should not be permitted to stand so as to form the basis for a refusal on the part of the respondent commission to make its award in favor of petitioner. It will be remembered that, in addition to that part of the finding relating to the sufficiency of the evidence to establish the fact that Landsrath and petitioner were husband and wife, the finding also declares that "the evidence is insufficient to establish as a fact that the applicant, Pauline Landsrath, was dependent upon the employee. * * *" As heretofore pointed out herein, by the terms of the statute (section 14, subd. 1), a wife is conclusively presumed to be dependent "upon a husband with whom she was living at the time of his death. * * *" But, independently of such provision, it is laid down in the case of Temescal Rock Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 180 Cal. 637, 182 P. 447, 13 A. L. R. 683, that:

"If the applicant is a member of the family or household of such employee in good faith, compensation may be awarded, although he or she may not bear any relation by adoption, blood, or marriage to the employee."

In that case an award was allowed to a woman who in good faith believed that she was married to a man with whom she had been living and cohabiting, although no marriage ceremony between them had been performed. The evidence in the instant case is uncontradicted, and establishes beyond question that petitioner and Landsrath lived and cohabited together as husband and wife, that they deported themselves as such, that they were so recognized by their neighbors, friends, and relatives, and that at all times during which petitioner and Landsrath so lived and cohabited together petitioner in good faith believed herself to be the wife of said Landsrath. The finding of the commission, therefore, is unsupported by the evidence and cannot stand.

It is ordered that the award of the commission be and it is annulled.

WORKS, J. Each of the petitioners in these proceedings was formerly an attorney at law. Each is now resting under the ban of a judgment of disbarment. Each asks for a reinstatement in the ranks of the profession. We refrain, for reasons which will appear upon a perusal of what follows, from stating the matters of fact upon which a reinstatement is prayed in each proceeding.

A recent decision of the Supreme Court (In re Stevens, 241 P. 88) makes it convenient and proper for us to lay down for the conduct of the present proceedings, not only such rules as may apply specifically to them, but which as well may serve as our guide, whenever applicable, in other matters of a like character which in the future may be presented for our consideration.

[1] In every instance in which is presented an application such as those which now lie before us, two prime questions will arise: (1) Is the applicant in the possession of the honesty, integrity, and general morality which would entitle him to reassume the discharge of the trust of which he has been deprived? (2) Has he the degree of learning in the law that would enable him to discharge efficiently his duty to the public whose servant he desires again to become? The attributes contemplated by the first of these questions will be referred to for convenience, throughout this opinion, as moral qualifications, while those intended by the second question will be designated as mental qualifications.

[2] Upon the score of his moral qualifications, each of the petitioners presents evidence in the form of affidavits, accompanying his petition for reinstatement. Contrary evidence, if it exists, should be uncovered and presented, and findings of fact should be made upon all the evidence which may be produced either by the petitioners or by respondent. The process by which the evidence shall be accumulated, sifted, and weighed is pointed out below. No more is to be said at present upon the subject of the evidence which is to bear on the issue of moral qualifications.

[3] The question as to the mental qualifications of the respective applicants calls for a more extended consideration, as that matter was the subject of the opinion in Re Stevens, supra, and is therefore our principal concern here. In that opinion the Supreme Court decided that the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure creating and defining the powers of the state board of bar examiners do not require that an applicant for reinstatement as a member of the bar shall submit himself to the board for an examination as to his mental qualifications. In concluding its discussion of that particular question, and in laying down what we may term a rule of discretion, as distinguished from the rule of the statute which was contended for by the respondent in the proceeding, the court says:

"In any event, it is proper to say that we are not prepared, in the absence of legislative expression, to accept the conclusion that every applicant for restoration to practice must submit to a re-examination as to his mental qualifications. No adequate reason occurs to us for making the rule invariable. The law is interested in the regeneration of erring attorneys, and in the enforcement of a sound discipline its disposition ought not to be to place unnecessary burdens upon them. In some cases, where it would be in the interest of justice to restore to his life work a disbarred attorney, and concerning whose grasp of the law there is no question, such a requirement would be unnecessary. On the other hand, cases may arise where it is apparent the applicant has not shown as an attorney that he possesses the requisite mental qualifications, and in such cases the rule contended for would be properly applied. In our opinion, the alternative rule proposed by the respondent that the question of a re-examination of the applicant by the board of bar examiners should be left to the sound discretion of the courts we hold to be the proper one, and, in a case calling for such re-examination and restoration, the same procedure may be followed as in the case of an original applicant seeking admission."

It seems clear to us that in an endeavor in most proceedings to make application of the rule of discretion here enunciated, a sifting and weighing of evidence must become necessary. It may require but a perfunctory effort in an occasional instance to determine whether the applicant is one "concerning whose grasp of the law there can be no question," but we apprehend that in a vast majority of cases the ascertainment of the applicant's mental attributes will not involve a labor so easily to be discharged. A part of the language of the Supreme Court, included in the paragraph which is quoted above, bears upon this question, and it is so presented as to require the most serious consideration on our part. The court says, immediately following its reference to those "concerning whose grasp of the law there is no question":

"On the other hand, cases may arise where it is apparent the applicant has not shown as an attorney that he possesses the requisite mental qualifications, and in such cases the rule contended for would be properly applied."

[4] We understand this sentence to contemplate the cases of applicants who have not shown, while they were attorneys, and before their disbarment, the possession of the requisite mental qualifications. If this view is correct, and if we take the context of the entire opinion with the sentence, we regard the expression as showing nothing more than an intention on the part of the court to state, by way of illustration, a single circumstance or condition requiring an examination as to mental qualifications. It having been determined that a discharge of the duty contemplated by the rule of discretion announced by the court is incumbent upon the District Courts of Appeal, we cannot suppose that the discretion was intended to be circumscribed within the narrow limits of the sentence. The discretion having been held to exist, it is logical to believe upon general principles, that we are to exercise it in its fullness, subject only to the application of a proper corrective for its abuse in particular cases, as such cases may arise. Not only so, but, as we have already remarked, the sentence does not appear to have been intended as a limitation upon our power. Furthermore, it seems obvious that a variety of considerations, not included within the expression, may show a necessity for the ascertainment of the mental qualfications of one who, having been disbarred, would procure a restoration to the ranks of the legal profession. It is proper to state here, in so far as we may outline them in advance, the sources from which may arise such a question, including the matters mentioned by the Supreme Court. These are: The age of the applicant at the time of his admission to the bar; whether he took an examination to test his qualifications when admitted; the nature and extent of the examination, if he did take one; the length of the period during which he practiced law, from admission to disbarment; the nature and extent of the business which he conducted during his practice and the ability and facility with which he performed his duty as a lawyer; the nature of his pursuits since disbarment, with particular reference to the question whether his employments have required the exercise of mental activity; the extent of his mental activity generally since disbarment, and especially the extent to which he has kept himself informed in the law and in the changes which have been effected in it and in its administration; the length of time which has elapsed between the date of disbarment and the filing of petition for reinstatement; the petitioner's soundness of mind at the time of the investigation under application for reinstatement, whether any alleged unsoundness be total or partial, continuous or occasional; and his physical condition at the same time, in so far as it may affect his mental ability to discharge his duty to his clients if his reinstatement be ordered, or to perform generally the labors of the profession.

While in this catalogue we have stated matters which in particular cases may turn out to be trivial, and others which in every case will require but a brief or casual examination, we do not pretend to have exhausted the subject. In individual cases, other considerations may be discovered which will aid in determining whether there is a question as to the applicant's possession of the mental qualifications requisite to the acceptable performance of the duties of the legal profession. We do not intend that the rule ejusdem generis, or any other restrictive tenet of construction, shall be invoked against the above bill of particulars to prevent a full examination into every subject which may aid in weighing the mental qualifications of any applicant for reinstatement who may come before us. And if we appear to descend to trivialities in considering the various phases of the general subject with which we deal, let it be remembered that the subject is one of transcendent import, even to its every ramification, and that we endeavor to treat it in such fashion that what rules we lay down may serve as guides, in the degree of completeness with which our ingenuity may invest them, for our future labors in cases like the three which now give us such great concern.

Having premised so much concerning both the moral and the mental qualifications of applicants for reinstatement, let us say something as to principles which in a great measure should influence the ascertainment of the moral attributes of such a petitioner, returning again later to the subject of mental qualifications. The Supreme Court says, in the prevailing opinion in Re Stevens, supra, "The law is interested in the regeneration of erring attorneys, and in the enforcement of a sound discipline its disposition ought not to be to place unnecessary burdens upon them"; and language to the same effect is found in a dissenting opinion filed by two of the justices. It is to be observed that the expression just quoted from the majority opinion of the court was employed in the course of a discussion as to the correctness of the contention that a petitioner for reinstatement must undergo an examination for the ascertainment of his mental qualifications, but in form it would seem to apply to the question of the determination of moral qualifications as well. To the extent that a disbarment is disciplinary or punitive, the courts, in removing the ban, should exercise a clemency which in some measure may be like unto that residing in the exercise of the pardoning power by the executive. If the erring practitioner be viewed as a culprit, and his fate alone be regarded, we may treat him with the last degree of leniency. We understand the expression of the Supreme Court so to operate, and no further. After all, however, the real question to be determined, even under the language employed by the court, is as to where shall be drawn the line between "unnecessary burdens" upon the petitioner for reinstatement and those requirements which, while they may be onerous upon him, are imperatively necessary to the protection of those who so greatly outnumber him that his fate, as compared with their interest, is dwarfed into insignificance. The Supreme Court has said, in dealing with the right of the Legislature to authorize the disbarment of lawyers who have shown the possession of a bad moral character:

"It requires no argument to prove that the possession of this prerequisite," a good moral character, "to the receipt of and continued exercising of the right or privilege of engaging in the practice of the law is a matter of such paramount public interest as to entirely justify the Legislature in prescribing that the commission of crime involving moral turpitude by one either seeking to obtain this right or privilege or thereafter exercising it should constitute sufficient ground for its original denial or for its subsequent revocation." In re Collins, 188 Cal. 701, 206 P. 990, 32 A. L. R. 1062.

This paramount public interest of course demands the tender care of the courts when reinstatements are asked, as imperatively as it requires the solicitude of the Legislature in providing for admissions or for disbarments.

"When a member of the profession has been found lacking in the requisites which go to make him a helper to his clients and has been discovered to possess aims, views, and purposes which indicate a moral obliquity in him, and which might make his clients his victims, it is well that he were removed from the possibility of doing them harm. When he has been once disbarred, a mistaken charity should not restore him to his position." In re Shepard, 35 Cal. App. 492, 170 P. 442.

A proceeding for reinstatement is "one in which the public has a large interest." In re Thompson, 37 Cal. App. 344, 174 P. 86.

"In truth, whether the legal profession is to be maintained as an honest and honorable calling is a matter of grave general concern." In re Cate, 60 Cal. App. 279, 212 P. 694.

"In proceedings of this character, the court owes a solemn duty to the community and to the legal profession which must be performed without regard to feelings of sympathy for the applicant." In re O'Connell, 64 Cal. App. 673, 222 P. 625.

It is for these reasons that a most searching investigation must be made into the moral qualifications of applicants for reinstatement. Each of the three petitioners who are now before us doubtless is convinced that he is entitled to be clad again in the robes of the profession, and each is deserving of credit for the effort he has made toward a rehabilitation of character. We, however, must be satisfied that the effort has been successful, to the end that the public shall not be called upon to suffer from a relapse of any of the petitioners into moral delinquency. What is plain to petitioners must be made plain to us.

When we turn again to the matter of mental qualifications, it seems that the same principles should govern. The public, in its dealings with the legal profession, deserves at our hands a protection from incompetency, as well as from knavery. The maintenance of that standing at the bar which the public interest requires demands, not alone a sterling honesty in the individual lawyer, but an intellectual capacity as well. The law is essentially a learned profession. It is because of this truth that we have attempted above to state with meticulous care the criteria whereby to determine whether there is reason to question the mental qualifications of a petitioner for reinstatement.

[5] From what we have said it is apparent that the ascertainment of an applicant's mental attributes may require the taking of two steps. The first branch of the inquiry may be stated in the form of a question: Are the circumstances in a given case such that the applicant should submit himself to an examination in order to test his qualifications? If this question is resolved in the negative, the issue as to mental qualifications is at once determined. If it is decided in the affirmative, the examination will then be taken, and this constitutes the second branch of the inquiry.

At present we are concerned only with the first of the two steps, and it is this first or preliminary step that is contemplated by the remark of the Supreme Court in Re Stevens, supra, as to those "concerning whose grasp of the law there is no question." Without descending to particulars, we cannot, from the evidence which is now before us, say that there is no question, in the case of any of the present petitioners, as to his grasp of the law. The determination of the first branch of the issue as to the mental qualifications of each of the three applicants will therefore require further and special consideration.

What machinery shall be employed as to each of petitioners, as a means whereby to determine the issue as to his moral qualifications and the first branch of the issue as to his mental qualifications? The taking of evidence upon disputed questions of fact doubtless is being confided, in an increasing degree as time passes, to referees, by the District Court of Appeal. Certainly, that method is being more and more pursued by this division of the court. It seems feasible to adopt that means in the present instance. In fact, in a very recent case in which a reinstatement was asked (In re O'Connell, 49 Cal. App. Dec. 160 ¹) one of the justices was designated as a "commissioner" to take evidence upon the issue as to moral qualifications. This particular form of reference has its advantages, but it has also its disadvantages. We think a more satisfactory means of solving, preliminarily at least, the two questions with which we now deal, is by reference to the state board of bar examiners, a body ready at hand and which has the machinery necessary to a proper performance of the work of taking evidence and of making findings upon it. We have lately said, in a case in which was assailed the constitutionality of the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure providing for the creation of the state board of bar examiners and prescribing its functions:

"Bar examiners, or law examiners, as they are termed in some states, have been provided for in many jurisdictions as aids to the courts in the discharge of the duty of ordering admissions to the bar. These bodies are so helpful to the courts, and the laws concerning them trench so little upon the rightful exercise of the judicial power to admit, that the new instrumentality practically everywhere has been put into operation without apparent thought as to an unconstitutionality upon the grounds suggested by the present applicant." In re Chapelle, 234 P. 906.

It is provided by section 279 of the Code of Civil Procedure, an enactment prescribing the rules for admission to the bar, on motion, of attorneys coming from other states and countries:

"Before admitting any such person to practice, the court shall require an investigation and report by the board of bar examiners as to his moral and other qualifications, unless the court shall otherwise direct in a particular case."

The wisdom of this requirement long has been evident. The board has proven its efficiency in the discharge of the duty imposed upon it by the section, and we anticipate the same happy result from the practice of confiding to that body a similar line of work in those cases in which, in the exercise of a sound discretion, we may think a searching inquiry should be made into the alleged moral regeneration or into the mental qualifications of those who, having been disbarred, may petition for a reinstatement as attorneys at law.

It is perhaps not proper for us to lay down in advance the rules of evidence which are to govern the board of bar examiners in the conduct of the three references which we are about to make to that body, or which are to guide ourselves later, except to the very limited extent which will be specified in a succeeding paragraph of this opinion. Those matters have not been argued in the briefs, and we should not make a decision upon them in the absence of an opportunity to the parties to be heard. We shall, however, cite the various cases in this state which deal, more or less thoroughly, and with greater or less directness, with those questions, and which cite earlier decisions touching the general subject, to the end that the decided cases may be found in one place for the benefit of all concerned in these or in future proceedings of a like character. They are In re Shepard, 35 Cal. App. 492, 170 P. 442; In re Thompson, 37 Cal. App. 344, 174 P. 86; In re Hahn, 56 Cal. App. 702, 206 P. 473; In re Stevens, 59 Cal. App. 251, 210 P. 442; In re Cate, 60 Cal. App. 279, 212 P. 694; In re O'Connell, 64 Cal. App. 673, 222 P. 625; In re Morton (Cal. App.) 243 P. 32; In re O'Connell, 49 Cal. App. Dec. 160 2.

[6, 7] One rule stands out so clearly from these cases, although they do not specifically announce it, and it is apparently so correct that we do not hesitate here to declare it. The burden of proof is upon one who seeks, after disbarment, to accomplish a restoration to the ranks of the legal profession. Accordingly, in each of the present proceedings, the petitioner will first produce his evidence, that of respondent will then be presented, and the petitioner will close. As individuals may always be found who will cast aspersions upon the integrity or the ability of those situated as are petitioners—and by this remark we would not discourage in the least degree the production of legitimate evidence contrary to their desires—each of the petitioners will be given the fullest opportunity, within a reasonable time, to meet in his closing case all affirmative evidence which respondent shall have produced against him. We refer specially to this matter because of the difficulty which is often experienced in an endeavor to meet evidence derogatory to character or standing.

[8, 9] If it shall be determined finally that any of petitioners must undergo an examination to test his mental qualifications, a question will naturally arise as to what shall be the extent and character of the examination. In the opinion In re Stevens, supra, the Supreme Court has said that, in a case calling for an examination to ascertain mental fitness, "the same procedure may be followed as in the case of an original applicant seeking admission." We are of the opinion that the word "may" in this extract is intended to be directory and not mandatory, and, whether that be so or not, we are of the further opinion that the Supreme Court, by the employment of the expression "the same procedure," did not intend to say that the character of examination to which an applicant for admission is subjected is to be required of an applicant for reinstatement. For the purposes of the present references, therefore, and until report upon them, we shall say that a special character of examination may be provided for any applicant for reinstatement, the nature of the examination in each instance to depend upon the exigencies of the particular case. This matter, however, will in its entirety be left for our final determination in any of these proceedings in which it shall be found that an examination is necessary.

The references about to be made to the board of bar examiners are several and not joint; that is to say, while we have treated the three proceedings together in this opinion for convenience, they cannot be so handled by the board. Each of the proceedings will therefore be conducted and reported upon by the board independently of the other two.

[10] After completing its investigation in each proceeding, the board of bar examiners will report the evidence by filing a transcript or copy of it with the clerk of this court, together with its findings upon each and every one of these issues, except that a finding may be omitted upon the third if the finding upon the second is in the negative: (1) Whether or not the applicant is possessed of such moral qualifications as to entitle him to a reinstatement. (2) Whether or not there is such doubt as to the mental qualifications of the applicant that an examination is necessary to test them. (3) The character and extent of the examination to which the applicant should be subjected.

[11] In each proceeding either the petitioner or the respondent may take exceptions to any or all of the findings of the board. The exceptions shall be presented in a manner similar to that followed in Re Ryzek (Cal. App.) 232 P. 473, and in Re Scott (Cal. App.) 234 P. 128.

Each of these matters is referred to the state board of bar examiners for proceedings in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

I concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.

CRAIG, J. (concurring). Since the opinion rendered by our Supreme Court in Re Stevens, 241 P. 86, it must be accepted as the law in this state that, upon an application for reinstatement of a disbarred attorney the question of the mental qualifications of the applicant is one which may properly be made the subject of inquiry. I find nothing in that decision which permits a question to be raised concerning the existence of such qualifications previous to or upon the date of admission. A fact once existing is presumed to continue to exist. It is true that there are many conditions any of which might result in a lawyer ceasing to possess this faculty, but it would be quite infrequent that the circumstances of the transaction which resulted in disbarment would alone overcome the presumption above mentioned to the extent of requiring proof to be taken as to the existence of such mental qualifications. I doubt if such circumstances are shown by the records in the petitions involved in this decision. However, as the matter is not one involving an issue of jurisdiction, but is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, it may be that the facts here disclosed are sufficient to raise such a doubt in the judicial mind as to warrant further inquiry, and hence I concur in the order.

77 Cal. App. 462

CURRAN v. EARLE C. ANTHONY, Inc., et al.
(Civ. 5458.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 15, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 14, 1926.)

1. Negligence ⚡135—Evidence held not to raise inference of joint enterprise between deceased and automobile salesman demonstrating automobile to prospective purchaser.

In action for death of occupant of automobile being driven by defendant's automobile salesman who was demonstrating automobile to friend of deceased, evidence that one of purposes of deceased was to aid salesman, latter at all times operating car, and that deceased suggested route to be followed during demonstration, is insufficient to raise inference that deceased controlled operation of car or conduct of salesman, rendering rule of joint enterprise applicable.

2. Negligence ⚡93(1)—Joint enterprise involves community of interest in objects of undertaking and equal right to direct and govern movements and conduct.

Parties cannot be said to be engaged in joint enterprise within meaning of law of negligence, unless there is a community of interest in objects or purposes of undertaking, and an equal right to direct and govern movements and conduct of each other with respect thereto.

3. Master and servant ⚡316(1)—"Independent contractor" is one who exercises independent employment and represents employer only as to results of work and not as to means.

An "independent contractor" is one who, in rendering services, exercises an independent employment or occupation, and represents his employer only as to results of work, and not as to means whereby it is to be accomplished.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Independent Contractor.]

4. Master and servant ⚡318(1).

Chief consideration which determines one to be independent contractor is fact that employer has no right to control as to mode of doing work.

5. Automobiles ⚡244(4) — Evidence held to sustain inference that automobile salesman was employee and not independent contractor.

In action for death of occupant of automobile while being driven by defendant's automobile salesman, evidence that it was salesman's duty, in addition to selling cars, to demonstrate cars to prospective buyers, and that use of cars for such purposes was limited to fixed hours each day, supports inference that salesman during working hours was subject to direction and control of defendant, and sustained finding of jury that salesman was employee of defendant, and not an independent contractor.

6. Automobiles ⚡244(4) — Evidence held to show automobile salesman, in inviting deceased to accompany him while demonstrating automobile to prospective purchaser, was acting within scope of authority.

In action for death of occupant of automobile while being driven by automobile salesman, who was demonstrating it to friend of deceased, evidence held to sustain finding that salesman, in inviting deceased to accompany him during demonstration, was acting within scope of his authority.

7. Principal and agent ⚡124(1)—Nature and extent of agent's authority, and whether particular act was within its scope, is for jury, where evidence is conflicting.

Where nature and extent of authority conferred orally on agent are to be determined on conflicting evidence or to be implied from facts or circumstances, question is for jury, unless but one conclusion can be reasonably drawn from the evidence.

8. Automobiles ⚡181(2)—One accompanying automobile salesman partly for purpose of rendering service to buyer held invitee (Civ. Code, § 2338).

Deceased who, at authorized invitation of defendant's automobile salesman, accompanied salesman and friend of deceased during demonstration of automobile, not only for his own pleasure, but for purpose of rendering service to buyer, held to be an invitee, in view of Civ.

Code, § 2338, for whose safety defendant was bound to use ordinary care, rendering defendant liable for damages resulting from its omission.

9. Witnesses ⚡321—Defendant cannot impeach his own witness by inquiring whether he had been convicted of a felony and offering to prove that he had pleaded guilty to charge of burglary (Code Civ. Proc. § 2049).

Where testimony of witness was taken by deposition, at which time he was cross-examined by defendant, and his deposition was read at trial by plaintiff, held that, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, defendant could not, after plaintiff had rested, and after swearing and examining witness as a defendant witness, impeach him by inquiring whether he had been convicted of a felony, and offering to prove that he had previously pleaded guilty to charge of burglary.

10. Automobiles ⚡224(5)—Whether passenger, by failing to remonstrate against excessive speed or withdraw from vehicle, was wanting in ordinary care is dependent on circumstances.

Passenger's duty to remonstrate against excessive speed or to withdraw from motor vehicle, reasonable opportunity therefor being afforded, is not absolute; question whether by failure to do either he is wanting in ordinary care being dependent on circumstances of particular case.

11. Automobiles ⚡245(13) — Contributory negligence of occupant of automobile held for jury.

Although one knowing that driver of car is carelessly operating it must use ordinary care for his own safety, whether his failure to protest against course pursued by driver or to leave vehicle constituted want of ordinary care proximately contributing to his injuries is question for jury, unless from evidence but one conclusion might reasonably be drawn.

12. Negligence ⚡82—Fault of injured person does not affect right of action, unless it proximately contributed to injuries.

The fault of an injured person does not affect his right of action, unless it proximately contributed to his injuries, and it must be proximate in same sense in which defendant's negligence must have been proximate in order to give right of action.

13. Trial ⚡194(16)—Refusal of requested instruction in action for death of automobile occupant to find for defendant, if deceased, knowing that driver was careless or reckless, failed to remonstrate and withdraw, held properly refused, where question was for jury under the evidence.

In action for death of automobile occupant, refusal of requested instructions that, if deceased knew that driver was careless or reckless, and failed to remonstrate with him or withdraw from vehicle, verdict should be for defendants held not error, where such question was under the evidence for jury, and instructions correctly stated duty of passenger under conditions as shown by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Edna A. Curran against Earle C. Anthony, Inc., and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, James P. Sweeney, and Geo. El. Stoker, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry I. Stafford and Cyril Appel, both of San Francisco (Ivores R. Dains, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An action by Edna A. Curran, the surviving wife of Daniel M. Curran, to recover damages for the death of the latter, alleged to have resulted from the negligence of appellant, Earle C. Anthony, Inc., a corporation, and Almond Houston, co-defendants in the action. A verdict was returned by a jury, on which judgment was entered against both defendants, and from which the corporation has appealed.

Appellant was, on July 22, 1922, a dealer in new and used automobiles, with its place of business in San Francisco; defendant Houston being in its employ. Among the duties of the latter was that of demonstrating to prospective purchasers the used automobiles for sale by appellant, occasionally rendering assistance at its place of business in appraising used cars; his compensation, however, being limited to commissions on the price of cars sold by him. Curran, who had formerly been in the employ of appellant, was acquainted with Houston, and from time to time communicated to him the names of prospective buyers; his services in that connection being gratuitous. On the date mentioned Curran informed Houston that one O'Doan was desirous of acquiring an automobile, and an appointment was made with the latter for the evening of the same day. At the appointed time and place Curran, O'Doan, and Houston met; the latter having in his possession a car owned by appellant, the characteristics of which Curran had already discussed with O'Doan. The three, with two others who happened to be present, but who were not in the employ of appellant, entered the car, and rode therein, Houston driving, to a point on an avenue leading over Twin Peaks, in the city mentioned, where, due to the negligence of the latter in his operation of the car, Curran was killed.

Appellant urges as ground for reversal that the deceased was engaged in a joint enterprise with Houston, and that the latter was an independent contractor; that, assuming him to have been the agent of appellant, his invitation to the deceased to ride in the car was beyond the scope of his authority; and further assigns as error certain rulings by the court as to the admissibility of evidence and its refusal to give certain instructions offered by appellant and its modification of others.

[1-4] In the instant case, though it appears from the evidence that one of the purposes of the deceased was to aid the salesman, the latter at all times operated the car; and, other than the fact that the former suggested the route which should be followed during the demonstration, it cannot reasonably be inferred from the testimony that the deceased had an equal or any right to direct or control its operation or the conduct of the driver. As held in Bryant v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 164 P. 385, 174 Cal. 737, 741, parties cannot be said to be engaged in a joint enterprise within the meaning of the law of negligence, unless there is a community of interest in the objects or purposes of the undertaking and an equal right to direct and govern the movements and conduct of each other with respect thereto. Each must have some voice and right to be heard in its control and management. Pope v. Halpern, 223 P. 470, 193 Cal. 168. An independent contractor is one who, in rendering services, exercises an independent employment or occupation, and represents his employer only as to the results of his work, and not as to the means whereby it is to be accomplished. Barton v. Studebaker Corporation, etc., 189 P. 1025, 46 Cal. App. 707; Green v. Soule, 78 P. 337, 145 Cal. 96, 99. As was said by the court in the latter case, the chief consideration which determines one to be an independent contractor is the fact that the employer has no right to control as to the mode of doing the work contracted for.

[5] In the case at bar, while Houston's compensation was limited to a percentage of the price of cars sold by him, it appears from the evidence that it was his duty, in addition to that of soliciting business, to demonstrate to prospective buyers the various cars owned by appellant; that, although allowed a wide discretion as to his movements and time while so engaged, unless otherwise specially permitted, the use of cars for these purposes was limited to fixed hours each day. It further appears from his testimony that on the day of the accident, the manager of the department with which he was connected being absent, he was engaged at the place of business of appellant "in doing the appraising of used cars and trade-ins." This evidence reasonably supports the inference that Houston was during working hours as to his duties and the mode of their performance subject to the direction and control of appellant, and sustains the finding of the jury on the issue as to the character of his employment.

[6, 7] The evidence further shows that the deceased was invited by Houston to accompany O'Doan, the prospective buyer, during the demonstration; and it was impliedly found by the jury that the salesman in doing so was acting within the scope of his authority. In this connection it was testified by Houston that, upon the arrival of the deceased and O'Doan at the place appointed, the latter expressed his purpose to buy the car then in the salesman's possession, provided it possessed the qualities represented by the deceased; that both requested that a demonstration be then given, further testifying that the deceased, being a friend of the buyer, was "doing the talking" after the trip commenced, for the reason, as expressed by the witness, that "naturally being a friend of the man who was purchasing the car he would have confidence in him, that is, more than in me, because he knew I was trying to sell the car—in fact he was selling him the car, you could put it that way, he was selling the car. The man had more confidence in him than he had in me naturally, and, if I would be telling him what the car was, and the kind it was, and one thing and another, he would figure that was my business." While it is evident that the deceased desired to assist the agent to make the sale, the testimony also supports the inference that his purpose was to advise the buyer as well, and that it was the wish of the latter that he should so act. A request, expressed or implied, by a prospective buyer that a qualified third person be present when property for which he is negotiating is to be examined or tested is not unusual; and where, as here, the invitation to accompany the prospective purchaser at the latter's implied request did not necessarily involve risks which would negative the conclusion that the employer contemplated that his employee should in a proper case extend such invitation, the finding by the jury that the employee in doing so was acting within the scope of his authority is reasonably sustained by the evidence. Where the nature and extent of the authority conferred orally upon an agent are to be determined upon conflicting evidence, or to be implied from facts and circumstances the question as to the nature and extent of the agent's authority, and whether the particular act in question was within its scope, is, unless but one conclusion can reasonably be drawn from the evidence, one for the jury. 2 Corp. Jur. (Agency) p. 962; Earl Fruit Co. v. Curtis, 48 P. 793, 116 Cal. 632.

[8] The authority of the agent being shown, and that the deceased participated in the demonstration, not alone for his own pleasure, but for the purpose of rendering a service to the buyer in a transaction in which the latter and the employer had an interest in common, the deceased was an invitee, for whose safety the employer was bound to use ordinary care, and was liable for the damage resulting from its omission. Foster Lumber Co. v. Rodgers (Tex. Civ. App.) 184 S. W. 761; Royal Indemnity Co. v. Platt, etc.,

Co., 163 N. Y. S. 197, 98 Misc. Rep. 631; Adams v. Tozer, 149 N. Y. S. 163, 163 App. Div. 751; Civ. Code, § 2338.

[9] It is contended that the court erred in sustaining objections to appellant's inquiry of the witness Houston as to whether the latter had been convicted of a felony, and to its offer to prove that he had previously pleaded guilty to a charge of burglary in this state. The testimony of the witness was taken by deposition, which was read by respondent at the trial. At the time the deposition was taken, the witness was cross-examined by appellant; no foundation being then laid for impeachment upon the ground thereafter urged. This deposition was offered and read in evidence by respondent at the trial; the witness not being called to testify, though present in court. Respondent having rested, Houston was sworn and examined as a witness for appellant, and was asked as to certain statements made by him at a hearing before the coroner of the city and county of San Francisco held after the death of Curran, which tended to contradict his testimony contained in the deposition. This evidence having been admitted, appellant then for the first time sought to impeach the witness upon the ground mentioned. Though the witness was a party to the action, no appearance therein was made by him, and no evidence offered on his behalf. The question asked as the foundation for the impeachment was one which properly should have been asked at the time the deposition was taken, or by recalling the witness for further cross-examination before the close of respondent's case. The effect of the course pursued by appellant was to make Houston its own witness, and, while subject to impeachment by contradictory evidence, he could not be impeached in the manner proposed (Code Civ. Proc. § 2049), and the objection thereto was properly sustained.

[10-13] It is further contended by appellant that the court erred by refusing the following instructions:

"You are instructed that, if a driver be careless or reckless in his conduct, and this is known to the passenger, and there be reasonable opportunity to do so, it would be the passenger's duty to caution the driver and remonstrate with him, and, if the driver persisted in his improper conduct, leave the vehicle.

"You are instructed that a passenger in an automobile may be negligent in continuing to ride with a driver who is manifestly incompetent or inattentive to his duty. If you find from the evidence that the defendant Houston was driving negligently or carelessly, or was manifestly incompetent or inattentive to his duty, and that the said Daniel M. Curran knew, or should have known, that such was the case, I instruct you that it was his duty to remonstrate with said Houston concerning the operation of the car, and to have insisted upon the automobile being stopped, so that he, the said Curran, might remove himself therefrom, if the said Houston continued to operate the automobile negligently or carelessly.

"I therefore instruct you that, if you find that the defendant Houston was manifestly incompetent or inattentive to his duty, and that this was known, or should have been known, by Daniel M. Curran at the time, and that the said Curran failed to remonstrate with said Houston, your verdict should be for the defendants."

The duty of a passenger to remonstrate against excessive speed or to withdraw from the vehicle, a reasonable opportunity therefor being afforded, is not absolute, the question whether by failing to do either he is wanting in ordinary care being dependent upon the circumstances of the particular case. Dowd v. Atlas T. & A. Service Co., 202 P. 870, 187 Cal. 523. While one who knows, or should know, that the driver is carelessly operating the car must use ordinary care for his own safety, and it is incumbent upon him to take proper steps for his own protection, still whether by failing to protest against the course being pursued by the driver, or to leave the vehicle, constituted a want of ordinary care which proximately contributed to his injuries was a question of fact to be submitted to the jury, unless from the evidence but one conclusion might reasonably be drawn. Nichols v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 174 P. 319, 178 Cal. 630; Thompson v. Los Angeles & San Diego Beach Ry. Co., 134 P. 709, 165 Cal. 748; Parmenter v. McDougall, 156 P. 460, 172 Cal. 306; Fujise et al. v. Los Angeles Railway Co., 107 P. 317, 12 Cal. App. 207. The fault of the injured person does not affect his right of action, unless it proximately contributed to his injuries. It must be proximate in the same sense in which the defendant's negligence must have been proximate in order to give a right of action. Richmond v. Sacramento Valley R. R. Co., 18 Cal. 351; Flynn v. S. F. & S. J. R. R. Co., 40 Cal. 14, 6 Am. Rep. 695; Fernandes v. Sacramento City Ry. Co., 52 Cal. 45.

In the instant case it cannot be said as a necessary conclusion from the evidence that the deceased was wanting in ordinary care in any of the particulars specified in the proposed instructions, the effect of which would have been to withdraw from determination by the jury the question whether deceased was wanting in ordinary care in failing to remonstrate or withdraw from the vehicle under the circumstances stated, and whether such want of ordinary care proximately contributed to the injury.

On the question of the duty of a passenger to use care for his own safety the following instruction was given by the court:

"I further instruct you that a passenger in an automobile operated by another not for hire is required to use ordinary care for his own safety. If he is aware that the operator is carelessly operating the automobile, or is carelessly rushing into danger, it is incumbent upon him to take such steps as an ordinarily prudent person would take under the same circumstances for his own safety.

"I therefore instruct you that, if you find from the evidence that said Daniel M. Curran, while a passenger in the automobile in which he met his death, by the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the injuries which he received, then your verdict should be for the defendants."

This instruction, with the exception of the words "not for hire," which were inserted therein by the court, was offered by appellant, and, as modified, correctly stated to the jury the duty of a passenger under the conditions shown by the evidence in the instant case.

The evidence being sufficient to sustain the verdict, and no error being shown, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

TAYLOR et al. v. BUNNELL. (Civ. 3069.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 22, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1926.)

1. Trusts $\hookrightarrow$ 86—In determining if evidence shows that defendant is involuntary trustee of land conveyed to him by wife, with alleged agreement to convey remainder to plaintiff, evidence must be viewed favorably to plaintiff.

In determining whether evidence is sufficient to show that defendant is involuntary trustee of property conveyed to him by his wife with alleged agreement to reconvey to plaintiff, evidence must be viewed in light most favorable to plaintiff.

2. Trusts $\hookrightarrow$ 89(1)—Evidence held to show that defendant was owner of only life estate in land conveyed to him by wife, with alleged agreement that he would convey remainder to plaintiff, and that he held legal title to remainder in trust.

In action to establish title under deed alleged to have been made by defendant conveying remainder interest to plaintiff at time defendant's wife conveyed property to him, evidence held to show that defendant was owner of only life estate and held legal title to remainder in trust.

3. Trusts $\hookrightarrow$ 99—Breach of promise to spouse, after obtaining absolute deed without consideration other than parol promise to convey or hold land to carry out trust in favor of grantor, is constructive fraud, making grantee involuntary trustee for grantor.

If one spouse, without consideration other than parol promise to convey or to hold land for purpose of carrying out trust in favor of grantor, obtains absolute deed from other, breach of promise is constructive fraud, and makes grantee involuntary trustee for grantor, although at time there was no intention not to perform.

4. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 236(3)—Declarations of deceased wife, after execution of deed to her husband, not made in his presence and in disparagement of title, held erroneously admitted in action against him.

In action to establish trust in property conveyed to defendant by his deceased wife, admission of evidence of declarations of deceased wife after execution of deed, and not in defendant's presence, in disparagement of title, held erroneous.

5. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 278—Evidence of declarations of deceased wife that deed to husband was absolute, held erroneously admitted on question whether there was agreement by husband to convey to another (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1853 and 1870, subd. 4).

Evidence of declarations of deceased wife after execution of deed, that she had made deed of gift absolute to husband, held inadmissible, where plaintiff claimed husband agreed to convey to her, as Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1853 and 1870, subd. 4, relating to declarations of deceased person against interest had no application, interest of plaintiff if any, being created by deed conveying property to husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Alma Taylor and husband against Edwin Bunnell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Preston & Duncan, of San Francisco, and R. M. Rankin, of Willows, for appellants.

George R. Freeman, of Willows, and Arthur C. Huston and Arthur C. Huston, Jr., both of Woodland, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant is a physician and surgeon, and for many years has been engaged in practice in San Francisco. In the year 1906 he and Margaret A. Peterson married, and they thereafter lived together as husband and wife until the death of the latter on the 30th day of May, 1921. Both had been married before, and, at the time of their intermarriage, Margaret Peterson was childless and the defendant had two daughters, who were then young girls, and were living with and thereafter continued to live with their grandmother. No children were born of the second marriage. The defendant owned property in San Francisco, the extent and value thereof not appearing. At the time of and prior to her marriage to defendant, Mrs. Peterson owned 926 acres of land in Glenn county, which she had received from her father's estate. At the time of the trial it was of the value of $25 an acre. W. H. Taylor is joined as a party plaintiff, for the sole reason that he is the husband of Alma Taylor, and the latter therefore will be referred to as the plaintiff. The plaintiff is a daughter of a deceased sister of Mrs. Bunnell. In June, 1920, Mrs. Bunnell underwent a serious operation and was thereafter an invalid until her death. On the 26th day of April, 1921, she executed and delivered to defendant a deed conveying her Glenn county land to him. Immediately thereafter, on the same day, the defendant signed and acknowledged a deed purporting to convey the same land to the plaintiff. The defendant never delivered this deed to the plaintiff, or to any person for her, but, on the day following the signing and acknowledgment thereof, he placed both deeds in his and his wife's safe deposit box.

The complaint alleges that Mrs. Bunnell "desired to leave a life interest in said property to her husband, the defendant, in the event of her death, and that plaintiff, Alma Taylor, should have the remainder interest in the same after her husband's death; * * * that during the month of April, 1921, the said defendant stated to his wife, * * * while she was ill and confined to her home and unable to interview or obtain advice from any other person or persons, that the proper procedure or method for the said Margaret A. Bunnell, in carrying out her wishes, would be to execute and deliver a deed of gift to him, * * * and that he * * * would thereupon deliver to the plaintiff, Alma Taylor, a deed conveying said remainder interest to her, the plaintiff; that the said Margaret A. Bunnell, * * * relying upon said statements of the defendant, * * * did, on or about the 26th day of April, 1921, make, execute, acknowledge, and deliver to the defendant a deed of gift, purporting to and which did convey the property herein described to the defendant, and, at the same time and concurrently with the making, execution, and delivery of said deed, * * * defendant did make, execute, and acknowledge a deed of gift conveying the remainder interest in said property after his life estate, to the plaintiff herein, Alma Taylor, and directed said defendant to deliver said deed of gift to the said plaintiff, Alma Taylor, and the said defendant did accept from the said Margaret A. Bunnell the said deed of gift so made, executed, and acknowledged by her for the said plaintiff herein, Alma Taylor, and did promise the said Margaret A. Bunnell that the defendant would fulfill, carry out, and perform her (the said Margaret A. Bunnell's) wishes in that particular;" that after the death of Mrs. Bunnell the plaintiff "demanded of the defendant that the said defendant deliver to her * * * the said deed conveying to her the remainder interest in said property," but that the defendant refused to do so, and "informed said plaintiff that he had destroyed said deed from defendant to plaintiff, and that she (the plaintiff) would have no interest in said property whatever. In this behalf plaintiff * * * states * * * that the said defendant, subsequent to the death of his wife, the said Margaret A. Bunnell, conceived the idea and intention of fraudulently evading his obligation to carry out, on his part, her wishes, and to vest in plaintiff the remainder interest in said property after defendant's life estate." The complaint states a second cause of action in the usual form of an action to quiet title. The prayer is for a decree adjudging that the defendant holds but a life estate in the land and that the plaintiff is the owner of the remainder. The answer does not deny the execution and delivery of the alleged deed from Mrs. Bunnell to defendant or the signing and acknowledgment of the alleged deed from defendant to plaintiff, but denies the other aforesaid allegations of the complaint. The court found all controverted matters against the plaintiff, and entered judgment in favor of defendant, adjudging "that the plaintiffs have no right, title, or interest of any kind or nature in or to the real property described in plaintiffs' complaint, and that the defendant is the owner thereof in fee simple." The plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment.

There is testimony to the effect that Mrs. Bunnell so disliked the defendant's daughters that "she did not want them to have anything to do with the property or even to put their feet on it." On the other hand, the defendant testified that the relation between Mrs. Bunnell and his daughters was "cordial," and that between her and the younger daughter was "affectionate." Witnesses for the plaintiff testified that Mrs. Bunnell often said that she intended her husband to have the land during his lifetime, but that she desired it to go to her blood relatives at his death. Witnesses for the defendant testified that Mrs. Bunnell often stated that she intended to leave the land to defendant alone.

A witness for the plaintiff testified:

That, two or three days before the deeds were executed, Mrs. Bunnell "said that she wanted to make a will whereby she could leave the doctor the ranch during his lifetime, and then it was to go to her family, and asked me to find out how that could be done. * * * The same day or the day after, * * * in Dr. Bunnell's office, * * * I said, 'Dr. Bunnell, * * * Marge wants to make a will, and she does not know how to do it.' * * * Would you tell me what to do?' He said, 'What does she want?' I said, 'She wants to leave you the ranch during your lifetime and at your death it is to go to her family.' He said, 'Here is a piece of paper. Tell her to write out, "I declare this to be my last will and testament, and I hereby leave my ranch and all my personal property to my husband, Edwin Bunnell," and sign it.' * * * I went into Mrs. Bunnell's room and told her. I said, 'Here is a piece of paper. You can write this and then the doctor will get what you want him to have, and everything will be all straight,' * * * and she said, why, she would not think of writing it. That is not what she wanted. * * * She said, '* * * I want him to have it during his lifetime, and to go to my family after his death.' * * * When I went out I met the doctor, and I said she would not not do it because there are so many things she wants changed. * * * He did not say anything."

The defendant denied that this witness told him that Mrs. Bunnell desired him to have the land during his lifetime and that it should go to her family after his death. The remainder of such testimony of the witness stands uncontradicted, the defendant expressly admitting his part in the facts narrated. He testified:

"Early on the 26th day of April my wife said to me, * * * 'I want to make a deed to you, Bunny, of this property. Will you have that deed made?' I said, 'Yes.' In this conversation she said to me, 'I want my ashes, when I die, dear, spread upon the Hayes Valley hills in the springtime when the flowers are out.' She also told me that she wanted to be cremated when she died. * * * And when she told me these things, I replied to her, 'That then consecrates that land to me as long as I live, spreading your ashes there, and it should be held consecrated to your memory after my death. Now, who have we got that will hold that land?' And she says, 'I don't know.' I went over all our relatives, including Billy Raterath, who was her favorite niece, Alma Prentice (Taylor), Edna Prentice, Francis Prentice, and she rejected them all. She said, 'They won't keep that land.' 'Well,' I said, 'now you ain't going to die anyway, dear. Alma is just as good as any of them. I will make a deed to her, to take effect at my death.' She says, 'I don't want you to.' I went out of the room crying. * * * And then that same day I obtained those blanks from Crocker & Co., with instructions from the partner of my brother-in-law, Albert H. Elliott, to take them to a public stenographer, * * * with the old deed that I had, and she would fill out those forms, which was done. * * *

"Q. What time of day was the deed from Mrs. Bunnell to you executed? * * * A. Signed and witnessed before Mr. Samuels in the evening, after 6 o'clock. Q. In the bedroom of your home? A. Yes. * * * Q. Now, at the time that she executed that deed, * * * did she make any statement to you, or to Mr. Samuels, about the deed? * * * A. Mr. Samuels asked her if she knew it was a gift deed, and she said certainly she did. * * * She was sitting up in bed. * * * Q. Was the other deed, from yourself to Alma Taylor, signed by you? A. It was, * * * in my office, the same night. * * * Q. Did Mr. Samuels take the deeds away from the house at all? * * * A. He went upstairs and put his seal on them and brought them back. * * * Q. Did he deliver them both to you? A. Yes, sir. Q. And what did you do? A. Put them in my pocket. * * * The next day I took them to the safe deposit box and deposited them. Q. Whose safe deposit box was that? A. Mine—that is, a joint deposit box of mine. My wife had access to it. * * * Two or three days afterwards my wife, Margaret, * * * said to me, 'Have you told Alma Taylor about that deed which you made?' I said, 'No; I haven't.' She says, 'I haven't, and I am not going to.' She says, 'Where is that deed?' I says, 'It is in the safe deposit box.' She says, 'Get it and destroy it. I don't want Alma Taylor to have a thing of mine.' * * * Q. Did you destroy the deed? A. I did. * * * With reference to the conversation, it was the same day. * * * Q. You never had delivered anybody that deed, had you? A. No, sir; * * * Q. After that * * * did you have any further or additional conversation with your wife about this deed * * * to you? A. No, sir. Q. Did you ever have any further or other conversation with her about the deed which you had made and which you destroyed? A. No, sir. * * * Q. Now when you said to your wife, 'I will make it to Alma,' why did you say, 'I will make it to Alma?' A. To get rid of the conversation and have the conversation over with, and to stop talking about death before my sick wife. * * * Q. When did you intend to tell Alma Taylor that you * * * had made a deed to her? * * * A. Never. I expected her to find it in my safe deposit box at my death."

A witness for the plaintiff testified:

"He (defendant) said that he wished she (Mrs. Bunnell) would leave him the ranch. He asked me why I did not talk to her about it. * * * It was some little time before she died, a matter of weeks probably."

Referring to the day after the deeds were executed, the witness testified:

"I went into the doctor's office, and he said, 'Last night Marge called me in and told me she wanted to arrange her * * * property. I asked her what she wanted to do with it and I would tell her how to do it. * * * She said, 'I want you to have my ranch for your lifetime, but after your death I want it to go to Alma because I never want your daughters to inherit my property.' * * * And he said, 'I will tell you what we will do; you make out a deed to me and I will make out a deed to Alma, and in case of your death I will immediately turn over the deed to Alma;' also his wife said that she wanted him to pay her mother $50 a month for life; and he said, 'I explained to her that if she put the property in trust or something it might be difficult for me to pay the $50 a month to her mother always because they would interfere; and she seemed satisfied with this, and we signed the deeds.'"

The defendant denied having made the foregoing statements, but testified that, referring to the land, on the day after the execution of the deeds, he said: "She has deeded it to me, and I have deeded it to Alma, to take effect at my death." Witnesses for plaintiff testified that "some days" after the deeds were executed Mrs. Bunnell stated, in substance, that the deeds were executed pursuant to an understanding between her and the defendant that he was to take a life estate in the land and the plaintiff the remainder. A witness for defendant testified that Mrs. Bunnell, a few days before her death, said that "she had deeded the ranch to Bunny, the doctor; that she was leaving it to him without any strings on it." Another witness for defendant testified that, at a time subsequent to the execution of the deeds, Mrs. Bunnell said "that she had made a deed of gift absolute to her husband of the ranch, without any strings on it." Each party made appropriate objections to the evidence introduced by the other relative to such statements.

[1-3] The trial judge filed a written opinion in which he said:

"The defendant's testimony concerning the conversations which took place between him and Mrs. Bunnell just prior to, at the time of, and shortly subsequent to the time of the making of the deeds referred to, is to me not very convincing, but if it be entirely disregarded there is no evidence as to what took place between them or was said by either of them to the other at said times and the statements and admissions testified to by the various witnesses * * * are in themselves insufficient in my opinion to create an inference that any promise was made by Dr. Bunnell to Mrs. Bunnell, or that any understanding was had between them, and which, by reason of any failure of the defendant to perform, or by the imposition of any fraud, either actual or constructive, by him, a constructive trust was thereby created."

In determining whether the evidence is sufficient to show that the defendant is an involuntary trustee, it must be viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. So viewing the evidence, it appears that Mrs. Bunnell expressed a desire to leave the land to defendant for life and the remainder to her family; that such desire was communicated to defendant; that he thereupon prepared the draft of a will leaving him the property absolutely; that Mrs. Bunnell refused to execute the instrument so prepared; that a few days later Mrs. Bunnell told defendant that she desired to so dispose of her land that he would have a life estate therein and the plaintiff the remainder; that the defendant then promised his wife that if she would make a deed of the property to him he would convey the same to plaintiff, to take effect at his death; and that Mrs. Bunnell thereupon conveyed the property to defendant, and that at the same time and as a part of the same transaction he signed and acknowledged a deed thereof to plaintiff, but never delivered it to her. In view of the confidential relation of husband and wife and the further fact that the defendant was the active adviser of his wife in the transaction, and that, pursuant to his suggestion and advice, he was placed in a position which afforded him every opportunity to perpetrate a fraud upon the plaintiff, it seems clear that the evidence is sufficient to show that defendant is the owner of only a life estate in the land, and that he holds the legal title to the remainder in trust for the benefit of the plaintiff. The court certainly was not bound to accept defendant's explanation that he did not promise to convey the land to plaintiff and that his wife instructed him to destroy his deed to the plaintiff.

"If one spouse, without consideration other than a parol promise to convey or to hold land for the purpose of carrying out a trust in favor of the grantor, obtains an absolute deed from the other, the breach of promise is constructive fraud, and makes the grantee an involuntary trustee for the grantor, although at the time there was no intention not to perform." 13 Cal. Jur. 869, and cases there cited; Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 583, 587.

See, also, Logan v. Ryan, 229 P. 993, 68 Cal. App. 448.

"The authorities fully bear out the assertion that in such cases a constructive trust arises, and that the statute of frauds has no application." Brison v. Brison, 17 P. 689, 691, 75 Cal. 525, 530 (7 Am. St. Rep. 189).

Respondent contends that:

"As to the alleged admissions of defendant, it is well settled that the admissions of a trustee cannot be used for the purpose of proving a trust."

In answer to a similar contention, the Supreme Court said:

"The declarations of the defendant which were made to the children of the deceased, Mrs. Cooney, a few days after the execution of the conveyance, were not declarations constituting a promise made at that time to hold the property in trust, but they were statements by him admitting that at the time the deed was executed he had made these promises. They constituted evidence therefore of what had occurred at the very time of the transaction and were not subsequent promises made by him." Cooney v. Glynn, 108 P. 509, 157 Cal. 589.

[4] It was error to admit evidence of the declarations of Mrs. Bunnell, made after the execution of her deed and not in the presence of defendant, in disparagement of the title thereby conveyed to him. Bollinger v. Bollinger, 99 P. 196, 154 Cal. 695, 705; Kershaw v. Madsen, 216 P. 55, 62 Cal. App. 11, 15; McGehee v. Curran, 193 P. 277, 49 Cal. App. 186, 199; Steinberger v. Young, 165 P. 432, 175 Cal. 81, 90. By delivery of his deed to the grantee, a grantor parts with his title, and he will not be permitted thereafter to disparage the title so conveyed. Fisher v. Oliver, 164 P. 800, 174 Cal. 781, 788. There is no contention that the deed was not delivered to defendant or that it did not convey the legal title to him. The complaint alleges that the deed was delivered, and that it "did convey the property herein described to the defendant." The case therefore is unlike that of Williams v. Kidd, 151 P. 1, 170 Cal. 631, 649, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703, where the question in issue was whether or not the deed there involved had been delivered. In that case it is said:

"Of course it is true that after such delivery no acts or declarations of the grantor in derogation of his grant will be received."

[5] It was also error to admit evidence of declarations of Mrs. Bunnell, made after the execution of the deed to defendant, "that she had made a deed of gift absolute to her husband, without any strings on it," and other similar evidence. Prior to the time those declarations were made, Mrs. Bunnell had conveyed the land to defendant, either absolutely or impressed with a trust in favor of plaintiff. In either case she parted with all her pecuniary interest in the property upon the delivery of her deed to defendant. Sections 1853 and 1870, subd. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to evidence of declarations of a deceased person against his pecuniary interest, therefore, have no application. Plaintiff is not claiming as successor to any interest remaining in Mrs. Bunnell after the execution of the deed to defendant, but she claims an interest conveyed by that deed. Her interest in the land, if any, and that of the defendant were created by the same instrument, and there is no more reason for admitting proof of Mrs. Bunnell's declarations in favor of the one party than the other. Such declarations were purely hearsay and therefore inadmissible. Hannah v. Canty, 167 P. 373, 175 Cal. 763, 770; Thaxter v. Inglis, 54 P. 86, 121 Cal. 593, 594; Estate of Baird, 223 P. 974, 193 Cal. 225, 241. In view of all the circumstances, it is clear that the error of admitting such testimony was prejudicial.

The judgment is reversed.

INTERSTATE REALTY & IMPROVEMENT CO. v. CLARK. (Civ. 5559.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 26, 1926.)

Plaintiff held not estopped by Code Civ. Proc. § 448, from disputing validity of tax deed pleaded in answer, on any other ground than genuineness and due execution, though he did not controvert it by affidavit.

2. Taxation ⇨734(3)—Tax deed held valid, though property was assessed to one who was not record owner, where it correctly recited name of person assessed (Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3785).

Tax deed held valid, though property was assessed to one who was not record owner, where it correctly recited name of person assessed, in view of Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3785.

3. Taxation ⇨734(9)—Valid title held to pass at tax sale held more than 28 days after last day for publication of notice, where designated day of sale was within stipulated time, and it was continued from day to day (Pol. Code, §§ 3764-3767, 3771a).

Valid title held to pass at tax sale held more than 28 days after last day for publication of notice of sale notwithstanding Pol. Code, §§ 3764-3767, where designated day of sale was within stipulated time, and sale was continued from day to day under section 3771a.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the Interstate Realty & Improvement Company against S. A. D. Clark. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Catherine A. McKenna and J. Irving McKenna, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.
L. B. Stanton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to quiet title to certain real property situated in Los Angeles county. The defendant answered, setting up in hac verba a tax deed from the state covering the same property. The plaintiff did not controvert the deed by affidavit or further pleading and the parties went to trial on the complaint and answer. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff upon findings that the tax deed was void on its face, and from the judgment the defendant has appealed on a typewritten record.

The tax deed was executed on July 21, 1922, and recited that the property was regularly assessed for taxation in the year 1916 to Bernard Hiss, and was sold on July 5, 1922, to the defendant for nonpayment of taxes which had been levied in the year 1916. At the trial, the plaintiff offered evidence to show that title to the property passed from Bernard Hiss to Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank on October 3, 1913, by deed which was duly recorded on October 31, 1913. The plaintiff urges that the tax deed was void on its face because it appeared from the recitals therein that the property had not been assessed to the true owner, that it was sold for a delinquency of 1916, upon an assessment of 1915, and that the date of sale was not within the time fixed by the Political Code. The defendant insists that plaintiff's failure to attack the deed by affidavit under section 448, Code of Civil Procedure, is an admission that the tax deed was valid.

[1] If under our rules of procedure the respondent could attack the validity of the tax deed upon any of the grounds noted, and if any one of these grounds is sufficient to invalidate the deed, then the judgment must be sustained. Section 448, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, when a written instrument is pleaded in the answer, the plaintiff is deemed to admit its genuineness and due execution, unless he controverts it by affidavit. This, however, does not estop the plaintiff from disputing the invalidity of the deed upon any other ground than "its genuineness and due execution." Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 432, 51 P. 630, 631; Bublitz v. Reeves, 40 Cal. App. 75, 79, 180 P. 28; Munro v. Whitlow, 54 Cal. App. 448, 451, 201 P. 964.

[2] Turning to the tax deed, we find that the property was assessed for the year 1916 to Bernard Hiss. The proof is that Hiss was not the record owner at that time—that he had conveyed all his title to another by a conveyance recorded in October, 1913. For this reason the respondent insists that the tax deed is void. The answer is that the statute, section 3628, Political Code, expressly provides that:

"No mistake in the name of the owner or supposed owner of real property shall render the assessment thereof invalid."

In interpreting this section, our Supreme Court has said:

"The assessment is not against the owner, but is of the property, and that must be correctly described. The name of the owner of the property assessed is an incidental provision for the sake of convenience, but a failure to give the correct name of the owner is declared by the statute not to impair the assessment." Klumpke v. Baker, 131 Cal. 80, 82, 63 P. 137.

This rule has been universally followed, and numerous cases might be cited to the same effect, the last in point of time which has been called to our attention being Hanson v. Goldsmith, 170 Cal. 512, 517, 150 P. 364. The authorities cited by the respondent are not in point. They involve the question of an error in the name of the person "assessed" appearing on the tax deed as distinct from an error in the name of the owner in the assessment itself; that is to say, that, as section 3785 of the Political Code requires the tax deed to recite the name of the person assessed, an error in this respect was held to render the tax deed void because the requirement of the section cited was a naming of the person assessed as that name appeared upon the assessment roll. But here there is no claim that the deed does not correctly recite the name of the person assessed.

The second point of attack is based upon a misconception of the record. In one of the printed briefs it was stated that the land was sold for delinquency of 1916 upon an assessment of 1915. Reference to the transcript discloses, however, that the assessment was for the year 1916, and that the original deed correctly recited that fact.

[3] The last point of attack is that the sale was not made within the time fixed by sections 3764 to 3767 of the Political Code. The argument is that, as the delinquent tax list must be published on or before June 5 and must designate a day for the sale, which must not be less than 21 nor more than 28 days from the time of publication, the sale of the property in suit on July 5 was outside the limits fixed by the statute. The answer is that the record does not disclose the date of publication of the notice of sale or the date of sale designated therein. Invoking the presumption of regularity in the proceedings in the absence of a direct attack to the contrary, we must assume, therefore, that the publication was had on June 5, the last day permitted by the statute, and that the date of sale was fixed as of July 3, which would have been within proper time. It appears from the tax deed that the sale was made on July 5, and that this was a continuance from day to day of the sale of July 3 in accordance with section 3771a of the Political Code. The propriety of a continuance of a tax sale, regularly noticed within the time prescribed by the statute, was expressly determined by this court in Bell v. Brigrance, 240 P. 50, where the court said:

"Reading all of the provisions of the statute together, it does not seem to be doubtful that the sale should commence within the time mentioned, not less than 21 days and not more than 28 days after the date of the first publication of the notice, but that it is within the contemplation of the statute that the sale may be continued from day to day if additional time is required."

Judgment reversed.

PEOPLE v. WHITHOLT. (Cr. 1337.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 27, 1926.)

1. Infants $\S$ 20—Conviction of committing lewd and lascivious acts held supported by victim's and police officers' testimony (Pen. Code, $\S$ 288).

Victim's positive testimony as to commission of acts charged by defendant, and police officers' corroborating testimony, held sufficient to support conviction of committing lewd and lascivious acts inhibited by Pen. Code, $\S$ 288.

2. Witnesses $\S$ 240(1).

Asking leading questions of prosecuting witness is not necessarily error as matter of law.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 1036(2).

Defendant not objecting during trial to leading questions asked of prosecuting witness cannot complain on appeal.

4. Witnesses — 383.

Witness cannot be impeached on collateral statement first made by him on cross-examination.

5. Criminal law — 382—Evidence not presenting facts favorable to party introducing it, nor contradicting facts apparently established by opponent, is immaterial or collateral.

Evidence not presenting any fact favorable to cause of party introducing it, nor contradicting fact apparently established by opposing party, is immaterial or collateral to inquiry.

6. Witnesses — 383—Reading of prosecutrix's testimony at preliminary examination held improper to impeach her testimony on cross-examination as to similar acts committed by defendant before those charged.

In trial for committing lewd and lascivious acts, reading to prosecuting witness of transcript of her testimony at defendant's preliminary examination was improper to impeach her testimony, first brought out on cross-examination, as to similar acts committed by defendant before those charged; the matter being a collateral one.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Tony Whitholt was convicted of committing lewd and lascivious acts, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Dana Ong, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of the commission of lewd and lascivious acts as inhibited by the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code.

[1] In contending that the judgment should be reversed, appellant urges that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. Without a recital of the details of the evidence, it will suffice to state that the transcript on appeal discloses that the victim of defendant's assault testified positively to the commission by defendant of the acts of which he was accused in the information. In addition thereto, each of two police officers gave testimony which strongly tended to corroborate the testimony given by the prosecuting witness. Appellant's contention, therefore, cannot be sustained.

[2, 3] Prejudicial error is also suggested by appellant, in that the court permitted the prosecution to ask leading questions of the prosecuting witness. But, even though it might be conceded that the asking of such questions was erroneous (which, as a matter of law, does not necessarily follow), it appears that no objection by defendant was made thereto at any time during the course of the trial. It is too late now for him to complain.

[4-6] Appellant also specifies error in that he was unduly restricted in his cross-examination and attempted impeachment of the prosecuting witness. The record discloses the fact that on such cross-examination, in response to questions asked by defendant's counsel, the prosecuting witness testified that on an occasion preceding that specified in the information defendant had been guilty of conduct in connection with the prosecuting witness similar to that for which he had been placed on trial. Thereupon defendant's counsel directed the attention of the witness to the transcript of testimony given by her at the preliminary examination of defendant, and, after many questions with the respective answers thereto had been read to the witness from such transcript, an objection by the prosecution to further reading therefrom was sustained by the court. Appellant makes no claim that, so far as the testimony read to the witness was concerned, any contradiction or any inconsistency appeared between it and the statement which was under attack. Nor was it either suggested by defendant at the trial, or is it by appellant here, that, if permission had been granted to read further of the testimony given by the witness on the preliminary examination of defendant, any such variance would be discovered. From a practical standpoint, therefore, it is difficult to perceive in what manner defendant was harmed by the ruling of the court. But, viewing the situation from another aspect, it is a rule of long standing that a witness cannot be impeached on a collateral statement first made by him on cross-examination. Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) vol. 1, § 449; People v. Chin Mook Sow, 51 Cal. 597, 600; People v. Furtado, 57 Cal. 345; People v. Webb, 70 Cal. 120, 11 P. 509; People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 108, 16 P. 537; People v. Smith, 189 Cal. 31, 35, 207 P. 518. In the case of Faulkner v. Rondoni, 104 Cal. 140, 148, 37 P. 883, quoting from People v. Devine, 44 Cal. 458, it is said:

"A recognized rule, or rather qualification of the rule, governing the impeachment of the credit of a witness by proof of contradictory statements elsewhere made by him, is that the matter involved in the supposed contradiction must not itself be merely collateral in its character, but must be relevant to the issue being tried."

In a case of the character of that here involved, assuming the admissibility on the part of the prosecution of evidence of acts of a defendant of a nature similar to that charged in the information tending to establish his proneness to commit the particular act of which he is accused, it does not necessarily follow that the same evidence would likewise be admissible on the part of the defendant. The purpose of evidence is to present some fact favorable to the cause of the party introducing the evidence, or to contradict a fact apparently established by the opposing party. If the offered evidence tends to do neither the one nor the other, it is immaterial or collateral to the inquiry. In the instant case evidence produced by defendant of the fact that on some occasion other than that specified in the information the defendant had been guilty of an act similar to that of which he was accused would in no sense be favorable to the cause of defendant; neither would it tend in any way to controvert the case made by the prosecution. Therefore, so far as the defense was concerned, evidence of such former acts by defendant was collateral to the question of whether at the time and place set forth in the information he had performed the acts therein specified. The rule, then, forbidding impeachment on collateral facts first brought out on cross-examination would apply to the situation here presented, from which it would result that no error was committed by the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

PORTER et al. v. GESTRI. (Civ. 3072.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 26, 1926.)

1. Sales $\S$ 261(6)—Contract held to contain express warranty that grapes sold were of black variety.

Clause, "Whereas the seller covenants and warrants that he is the owner of a certain lot of * * * dried black grapes," held an express warranty that grapes sold were of black variety.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1039(2)—Defect of complaint in failing to allege facts which prevented discovery of breach of warranty at time of delivery of goods sold, if any, held not prejudicial.

In action for breach of contract to sell dried black grapes, defect of complaint, if any, in failing to state facts which prevented discovery of breach of warranty at time of delivery, held not prejudicial, in view of allegations of answer that buyer inspected grapes, and undisputed testimony showing no effective inspection was made, but warranty placed in contract in lieu thereof.

3. Sales $\S$ 284(1, 2).

Where there is an express warranty, buyer is under no obligation to inspect or examine goods purchased.

4. Sales $\S$ 442(4)—Damages for breach of warranty that dried grapes sold were black grapes held properly based on prices at place to which grapes were shipped in reliance on seller's warranty.

Where buyer, while loading grapes on steamer for shipment to New York became suspicious, but was assured by seller that grapes were black, as warranted, held, buyer was justified in proceeding with shipment, and damages were properly based on New York prices.

5. Sales $\S$ 441(4).

In action for breach of warranty that dried grapes sold were black grapes, evidence of market value of such grapes in New York held sufficient to sustain recovery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by D. H. Porter and others, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of D. H. Porter & Sons, and the partnership D. H. Porter & Sons, against A. Gestri. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank L. Simons, of Fresno, for appellant. Williams & Fenstermacher and Chester O. Hansen, all of Fresno, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. On the 7th day of June, 1923, the parties entered into a written contract of sale by defendant to the plaintiffs of a certain lot of grapes. The parts of the contract material to the questions raised by the appeal are as follows:

"Whereas, the seller covenants and warrants that he is the owner of a certain lot of 2,400 twenty-five pound boxes of dried black grapes, principally Zinfandel and Mission variety. * * * The said seller * * * does hereby sell said dried black grapes, and all of them to the buyer, and the buyer * * * does hereby buy the same from the seller for the price of 11¼ cents per pound net f. o. b. cars * * * Fresno, California, loading to commence not later than the 8th day of June, 1923, or as soon thereafter as the transportation company can furnish cars suitable for loading. The buyer agrees to pay said seller the sum of * * * $6,750 as follows, to wit: Net cash and acceptance, Fresno."

Admittedly, on the 8th day of June, 1923, 3,561 25-pound boxes of dried grapes were, by agreement of the parties, "delivered by defendant to plaintiffs under and by virtue of the terms of the written contract," for which the plaintiffs paid the defendant the agreed price of 11¼ cents per pound. The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs, in reliance upon the warranty contained in the contract, received the grapes and shipped them to New York City, believing that the grapes were of the kind mentioned in the warranty; that upon their arrival in New York the plaintiffs ascertained that the lot of grapes purchased "contained dried white grapes, as well as dried black grapes"; that the "defendant well knew that plaintiffs purchased said dried grapes for shipment to Eastern markets"; that if the grapes had been as warranted they would have been of the value of $16,000 in New York, but that, by reason of the white grapes contained therein, they were of the value of only $6,000. The answer denies the foregoing allegations and alleges that the plaintiffs inspected the grapes before the execution of the contract and inspected and accepted them upon their delivery at Fresno. The court found the facts in accordance with the allegations of the complaint except as to the value of the grapes. In that respect it found that had the grapes been as warranted they would have been of the value of $14,021.43 in New York, but that, by reason of the mixture of white grapes with the black, they were of the value of but $7,789.68 in that city. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs for the difference. The defendant has appealed from the judgment.

Plaintiff S. A. Porter, who made the purchase for the plaintiffs, testified: That the plaintiffs are wholesale jobbers, located in San Francisco. That defendant called at plaintiffs' place of business and stated that he "had about a car" of black grapes at Fresno and asked witness to go to Fresno and "look the lot over and he could probably sell them" to plaintiffs. That witness went to Fresno a few days later "for the purpose of examining the black grapes." That he and defendant "looked at part of the pile, examining 15 or 20 boxes, and they seemed to be apparently all black grapes." That the witness later examined 7 or 8 more boxes. That "the pile was stacked so we couldn't break into it all, and I took Mr. Gestri's warranties that they would be black grapes." That he and defendant then went to a lawyer's office to have a contract drafted and executed. That in the lawyer's office "I told Mr. Gestri that as long as they were all black grapes, that I was satisfied. Mr. Gestri said they were all black grapes. I said, 'As long as you will warrant that, we will take them.'" That the "contract was then drawn up. I said I had to rely on him that they were to be all black grapes; that I was in a hurry to get them on the boat and I didn't have time to look them all over. * * * I told Mr. Gestri that they had to make the steamer of the American-Hawaiian line." That he told defendant at that time that plaintiffs expected to ship the grapes to New York and had cargo space reserved for that purpose. That after the grapes arrived in San Francisco, and three-fourths or more of them had been loaded in the steamer's hold, "I noticed the spillage on the dock, and that it was a little bit off at the time. * * * We spoke to Mr. Gestri about it, and he said they were all right, so I thought it could be settled with very little adjustment." That at that time the boxes were strapped, "two boxes to a bundle, wire strap on each end so it was almost impossible to break the wires on those cases, and there was a few cases yet unstrapped, and I looked at five to seven cases. * * * I told Mr. Gestri we thought we might have trouble with the raisins, * * * that they were not all black grapes, and Mr. Gestri said they were all right. He said: 'They will go through. They are all black grapes. You won't have any trouble.' * * * And then I relied on it more than ever, because he said there might be a few cases like that, but they were all black grapes. * * * I opened a few cases that were still unstrapped, and there I noticed a little difference from what I had purchased. * * * I relied solely on Mr. Gestri's warranties, more than I did on the inspection." The witness further testified that the New York buyer rejected the whole lot of grapes because they were not black grapes; that an inspection in New York disclosed that only 20 per cent. of them were black grapes; that plaintiffs sold the grapes, after such rejection, for 8¾ cents a pound; that that was the "very best" price that could be obtained for them; that the market price of black grapes in New York at that time was from 16 to 17¼ cents a pound; and that before shipment to New York the plaintiffs had contracted to sell the grapes at 16 cents a pound for a part thereof and 16½ cents for the remainder. Most of the grapes purchased were of the crop of 1920. The contract is silent as to the year grown. The evidence shows that in 1923 black grapes of the 1922 crop were of the market value of from 15 to 16 cents a pound f. o. b. at Fresno; those of 1921, 14½ to 15½ cents; and those of 1920, 14 to 15 cents. Witnesses for the defendant testified that about half of the grapes were of white varieties. The defendant testified that the boxes were labeled "dried black grapes"; that at the time of the execution of the contract he did not know, and that Porter did not tell him, where the grapes were to be shipped, except that they were to be sent to San Francisco. In other respects Porter's testimony stands uncontradicted.

[1] Appellant contends that "the general demurrer should have been sustained because there is no allegation in the complaint * * * that the defendant did not deliver to the plaintiff the goods specified in said contract." The theory of the complaint, however, is not that the plaintiffs did not receive the particular lot of grapes purchased, but that the grapes contained in such lot were not of the kind warranted. It is clear that the clause of the contract first quoted herein constitutes an express warranty that the grapes mentioned therein were of black varieties. Burge v. Albany Nurseries, Inc., 176 Cal. 313, 319, 168 P. 343; Rauth v. Southwest Warehouse Co., 158 Cal. 54, 60, 109 P. 839; Newhall Co. v. Hogue-Kellogg Co., 56 Cal. App. 90, 95, 204 P. 562; Firth v. Richter, 49 Cal. App. 545, 548, 196 P. 277; Barrios v. Pacific States Trading Co., 41 Cal. App. 637, 639, 183 P. 236. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the parties intended it to be such.

[2-4] It is next urged that "there should have been a statement of specific facts which prevented the discovery of the breach at the time of the delivery." If it be conceded that the complaint is defective in the particular mentioned, the answer alleged that the plaintiffs did in fact inspect the grapes prior to the execution of the contract and at the time of delivery, and the undisputed testimony, admitted without objection, shows that no effective inspection was made and that by reason thereof the warranty was inserted in the contract. Under such circumstances, the alleged defect in the complaint did not prejudice the rights of the defendant. "Where there is an express warranty the buyer is under no obligation to inspect or examine the goods purchased, but may rely on the warranty. The main purpose of a warranty is often to excuse examination and render examination unnecessary." 35 Cyc. 378; Morris v. Fiat Motor Sales Co., 32 Cal. App. 315, 317, 162 P. 663, 664. "Even if the buyer does make an examination of the goods, this does not necessarily do away with the effect of the warranty." 35 Cyc. 378; W. R. Grace & Co. v. Levy, 30 Cal. App. 231, 236, 156 P. 626. The defendant knew that the grapes were to be shipped to New York. On the arrival thereof in San Francisco, and after the greater part of them had been loaded on the steamer, plaintiffs discovered facts which created a doubt as to whether the grapes were of the kind mentioned in the warranty. The defendant thereupon assured plaintiffs that, with a few exceptions, the boxes contained only black grapes. Under the circumstances, and in view of the express warranty contained in the contract, the plaintiffs were justified, under the authorities cited, in proceeding with the shipment without further inspection. It follows that the damages awarded plaintiffs were properly based upon New York prices. W. R. Grace & Co. v. Levy, 30 Cal. App. 231, 234, 156 P. 626; Krasnikoff v. Dundon, 8 Cal. App. 406, 409, 97 P. 172. See, also, Burge v. Albany Nurseries, Inc., 176 Cal. 313, 318, 168 P. 343; Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 585, 590, 96 P. 319; Shearer v. Park Nursery Co., 103 Cal. 415, 419, 37 P. 412, 42 Am. St. Rep. 125.

[5] It is contended that there is no evidence to show the market value of black grapes produced in 1920. The plaintiff testified that the market price of black grapes in New York was from 16 to 17½ cents a pound. Another witness testified that black grapes have a higher market value than white grapes; that "they want a grape to make claret wine * * * as a rule in the Eastern cities"; that in 1923, about the time of the sale herein involved, black grapes grown in 1922 were of the market value of 15 to 16 cents, f. o. b. Fresno; and that as to those grown in 1920 "there would not be a difference in value of over a cent a pound on them." There is no other evidence bearing upon the question of value. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it may be inferred that there was the same difference in value in New York as in Fresno between grapes grown in 1920 and those grown in 1922. The court found that if the grapes had all been black grapes as warranted, they would have had a market value in New York of 15¼ cents a pound. The evidence fully supports this finding.

The judgment is affirmed.

JOHNSON v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR FRESNO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5594.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 28, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 24, 1926.)

1. Courts ⇨198—Superior court sitting in probate held without jurisdiction to make order affecting testamentary trust or its administration after decree of final distribution in estate of testator (Code Civ. Proc. § 1699).

Superior court sitting in probate held without jurisdiction to make order affecting testamentary trust or its administration after decree of final distribution in estate of testator, since by such decree court was divested of all jurisdiction over trust found except to settle accounts of trust under Code Civ. Proc. § 1699.

2. Guardian and ward ⇨123—Probate court held without jurisdiction in guardianship proceeding to hear and determine guardian's claim against testamentary trust for support and education of ward after decree of final distribution in estate of testator (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1757, 1770, 1771; Civ. Code, §§ 201, 726).

Probate court held without jurisdiction in guardianship proceeding to hear and determine guardian's claim against testamentary trust for support and education of ward after decree of final distribution in estate of testator, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1757, 1770, 1771; Civ. Code, §§ 201, 726, authorizing court to provide for support, maintenance, and education of ward.

3. Certiorari ⇨5(1)—Certiorari held to lie to review order of probate court in guardianship proceeding directing trustee of testamentary trust to pay monthly allowance for support and education of minor ward (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subds. 1, 3).

Certiorari held to lie to review order of probate court in guardianship proceeding directing trustee of testamentary trust to pay monthly allowance for support and education of minor ward, since order is appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3, not being order for payment of "claim," and subdivision 1 is not applicable to probate matters.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1166—Court's want of jurisdiction to enter order directing trustee of testamentary trust to pay monthly allowance to certain minor held not cured by Constitution (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Probate court's want of jurisdiction to enter order directing trustee of testamentary trust to pay monthly allowance to certain minor held not cured by Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Application for certiorari by J. A. Johnson, trustee under the will of Oliver Moline, deceased, to review an order of the Superior Court of California in and for Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge. Order annulled.

L. N. Barber, of Fresno, for petitioner.

James Gallagher, of Fresno, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. This is a proceeding for a writ of review whereby petitioner, J. A. Johnson, seeks to have reviewed and annulled an order made by the superior court in and for the county of Fresno, in the matter of the guardianship of the estate of Marie Elizabeth Moline, a minor, directing petitioner to pay to the guardian of said minor, for the latter's support and education, a continuing monthly allowance of $40 out of funds which had been distributed to petitioner as testamentary trustee under a decree of final distribution in the matter of the estate of Oliver Moline, deceased, the grandfather of said minor.

The will of the decedent contained the following provisions:

"First, I give, devise, and bequeath all the property, real and personal, of which I die possessed, to my beloved granddaughter Marie Elizabeth Moline.

"Second, I nominate J. A. Johnson of Kerman, county of Fresno, state of California, to be the executor of this my last will and testament, without bonds.

"Third, I direct my said executor to keep all moneys which may be realized from the collection of notes, securities and other obligations belonging to my estate, in the First National Bank of Kerman until my said granddaughter shall reach the age of eighteen years."

The residue of said estate, consisting of $5,530.99 in cash and a note secured by a mortgage in the sum of $2,500, was distributed on November 20, 1920, "to J. A. Johnson, as trustee for Elizabeth Moline," and said trustee was "directed to collect all securities belonging to said estate, and upon collection of any thereof to keep the proceeds, together with all cash belonging to said estate and hereby distributed to him, in the First National Bank of Kerman until said Marie Elizabeth Moline shall reach the age of eighteen years."

In June, 1925, Anna M. Moline, the mother of said minor, obtained letters of guardianship of the estate of her daughter, and in October, 1925, upon petition, procured and thereafter served upon the said J. A. Johnson as trustee an order requiring him to show cause why he should not pay the sum of $40 a month from the trust fund for the support and education of said minor. In response to said order, Johnson, besides appearing in court personally and by attorney, filed a written appearance setting forth that he appeared specially for the purpose of objecting to the hearing of said petition "upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of said petition or of the person of said trustee," and that he appeared "for no other purpose." The court proceeded with the hearing, and after receiving oral and documentary evidence granted the guardian's petition, and on November 20, 1925, entered an order directing Johnson as trustee to pay to the guardian of said minor the monthly sum of $40, commencing on October 1, 1925, and to continue until the further order of the court. At that time the minor was 14 years of age.

[1] We are of the opinion that, as petitioner contends, the respondent court sitting in probate was without jurisdiction to make any order affecting the trust mentioned or the administration thereof for the reason that upon the rendition of the final decree of distribution in the estate of Oliver Moline, deceased, which has long since become final, the custody and control of the trust fund were definitely set apart and distributed to petitioner and that thereby the probate court was divested of all further jurisdiction over the same (More v. More, 133 Cal. 489, 65 P. 1044, 66 P. 76; Mackay v. San Francisco, 128 Cal. 678, 61 P. 382), excepting, as provided in section 1699 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it may settle the accounts of the trust. In the case last cited in referring to the effect of the distribution of an estate to trustees it was said:

"The administration was closed, the accounts of the executors allowed, and the property distributed to them in a different capacity. By their discharge as executors they were as completely separated from the business of the estate as if they had been dead. (Willis v. Farley, 24 Cal. 502.)"

In California Jurisprudence (11 Cal. Jur. 248) the treatise upon the subject of the jurisdiction of the probate court clearly points out that the superior court derives its jurisdiction from the Constitution, the grant of powers in matters of probate being contained in the general definition of the jurisdiction of that court; and that such court is not therefore, while sitting in probate, a statutory tribunal, deriving its power from the act of the Legislature, but a court of general jurisdiction. "Yet," says the author, "its probate jurisdiction is separate and distinct from its jurisdiction in a civil action, or in equity, and differs from them in that it is essentially a jurisdiction under the control of the Legislature. The proceedings being statutory in their nature, the court has no other powers than those given by statute and such incidental powers as pertain to it and enabling the court to exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon it, and can only determine those questions or matters arising in the estate which it is authorized to do. Thus, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it, its jurisdiction is limited and special, or limited and statutory, in the sense that its jurisdiction is limited by the mode and procedure prescribed by the statute. Not only the character and extent of the jurisdiction, but the procedure by which that jurisdiction may be invoked, are under legislative control; and that procedure must be followed, or relief under the jurisdiction cannot be secured. It is said that the Code is the chart and compass of the court, which cannot amplify its jurisdiction nor arrogate to itself any power beyond that given to it by the statute. And whenever the acts of the court are shown to have been in excess of the power conferred, such acts are nugatory and have no binding effect even upon those who have invoked its authority or submitted to its decision."

[2] There appears to be no statutory authorization for the probate court to hear and determine a proceeding like the one under review. The Code provisions, it is true, confer upon that court in a guardianship proceeding power to provide for the support, maintenance and education of the ward (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1757, 1770 and 1771; Civ. Code, §§ 201 and 726), but in the exercise of that power it may deal with only such persons and subject-matter as are under its control.

The proceeding instituted by the guardian here to obtain said allowance was not directed against the estate of the minor, which admittedly was subject to the control of the probate court, but against a testamentary trust which, by the rendition of the decree of final distribution, as we have seen, had been permanently removed from the jurisdiction of the probate court for all purposes excepting the settlement of the accounts of the trust; consequently neither the property belonging to the trust nor the trustee thereof were any longer amenable to the orders of that court. The controversy which the probate court presumed to adjudicate was, therefore, in effect, one between adverse claimants to the trust fund; and "it is hardly necessary to cite authorities to the point that a probate court has no jurisdiction to determine controversies between the estate in hand and adverse claimants where there is no provision of law conferring such jurisdiction; but the principle is declared in the following cases: Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 459; Barnard v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 512, 517 [16 P. 307]; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 360, 361 [11 P. 724]; In re Burton, 93 Cal. 464 [29 P. 36]; Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 68 [22 P. 1081]; Smith v. West-erfield, 88 Cal. 374 [26 P. 206]." In re Guardianship of Breslin, 135 Cal. 22, 66 P. 962.

[3] Respondent claims, however, that notwithstanding the probate court may have exceeded its jurisdiction in determining the proceeding in question, the writ of review should be denied upon the ground that petitioner has a remedy by appeal. This claim is based mainly upon two assumptions: First, that the order directing the allowance to be paid was in effect one for the "payment of a claim" in the matter of the guardianship proceeding, and therefore appealable under subdivision 3 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure; secondly, that said order amounted also to "a final judgment" from which an appeal may be taken. We think the contentions are without merit. The word "claim" as employed in the subdivision of the section mentioned "is limited to debts and claims which can be allowed, rejected, or ordered paid." 2 Cal. Jur. 193. Manifestly the order under consideration was not based upon such a claim, but to all intents and purposes constituted an adjudication of a matter pertaining to the operation of a trust, over which the jurisdiction of the probate court had ended; and as to respondents' second point, assuming that the order assailed was "a final judgment," admittedly it was rendered in probate, and the right of appeal in probate, being purely statutory, is confined to such orders and judgments as are enumerated in subdivision 3 of said section 963 (Wrynn v. Superior Court [Cal. Sup.] 241 P. 849), which does not include the particular kind of a final judgment here contended for. It may be conceded that an appeal lies from "a final judgment" under subdivision 1 of said section 963, but that subdivision has no application to probate matters, which are provided for in a different category, by subdivision 3. Estate of Franklin, 133 Cal. 584, 65 P. 1081; Estate of Winslow, 128 Cal. 311, 60 P. 931.

The case of Murphy v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 592, 24 P. 310, cited by respondent, we believe is not in point for the reason that there the petitioner Murphy, who was appointed trustee by deed, was by the same instrument appointed guardian. In the latter capacity he was subject to the jurisdiction of the probate court, and therefore the order directing him to pay an allowance for the ward's support was construed as a probate order for the payment of a claim, which gave him the right of appeal under subdivision 3 of said section 963.

[4] The want of jurisdiction herein cannot in our opinion be cured by the application of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

For the foregoing reasons the order under review is annulled.

In re CRYER.

ALLEN v. CRYER.

(Civ. 5199.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 28, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 24, 1926.)

1. Elections — 291.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, counting ballot in favor of candidate other than one for whom it was cast is presumed to be result of innocent mistake, and throwing out ballots is presumed to be result of honest judgment.

2. Elections — 285(3)—Statement on Information in election contest that judges in all precincts were guilty of misconduct held insufficient to support contest (Code Civ. Proc. § 1111 et seq., and sections 1115, 1117).

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1115, 1117, statement on information in election contest that judges in all precincts in city were guilty of misconduct, in that they counted ballots for contestee cast for other candidates and threw out ballots of other candidates, does not allege intentional misconduct sufficient to support an election contest under section 1111 et seq.

3. Elections — 271.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1111 and 1112, "malconduct" is intended to include erroneous conduct without wrongful intention, and is sufficient to support an election contest if candidate not receiving highest number of votes is declared elected.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Malconduct.]

4. Elections — 285(3).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1111 et seq., requires some definite particularity in charge of malconduct of election officers to support an election contest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Petition by Edna Allen, contesting the election of George E. Cryer for Mayor of the City of Los Angeles. From a judgment of dismissal, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; CONREY, Justice pro tem., not participating.

Gesner Williams and Morris R. McLaughlin, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clarke & Bowker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Section 328 of the charter of the city of Los Angeles, relating to primary nominating elections, provides as follows:

"In the event that any candidate for nomination to any office for which only one person is to be elected shall receive a majority of the votes cast for all the candidates for nomination to such office at such primary nominating election, the candidate so receiving such majority of votes shall be deemed to be and declared by the council to be elected to such office. * * *

On the 5th day of May, 1925, at the regular primary nominating election, George E. Cryer was one of six candidates for nomination for the office of mayor. Thereafter in due course the city council canvassed the returns of said election and declared that George E. Cryer was elected at said election as such mayor of the city. Thereafter the contestant, Edna Allen, an elector of the city, filed in the superior court a written statement of contest of said purported election. The court having thereafter sustained a demurrer to the statement of contest, and having at the same time granted a motion to dismiss said statement, judgment of dismissal of the proceeding was entered. The contestant appeals from the judgment.

Section 1115 of the Code of Civil Procedure prescribes the facts necessary to be set forth in a statement of election contest. Without question, the statement of contest shown in the record here was sufficient, except that it is claimed that it did not comply with the requirement that such statement shall set forth "the particular grounds of such contest." Section 1117 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows:

"No statement of the grounds of contest will be rejected, nor the proceedings dismissed by any court for want of form, if the grounds of contest are alleged with such certainty as will advise the defendant of the particular proceeding or cause for which such election is contested."

The amended statement of contest in this proceeding sets forth the grounds of contest in the following paragraph, numbered IV:

"That petitioner herein, said elector, is informed and believes and states on information and belief, that in each of said precincts set forth and mentioned in said Exhibit A, at which voting was had on said May 5, 1925, for the office of mayor, there was malconduct on the part of the board of judges and of each member thereof, in that they and each of them counted ballots which were cast at said election for the said George E. Cryer for mayor, which were not intended to be cast for him, which said ballots had been at said election lawfully cast for such other candidates; and, furthermore, disqualified and threw out ballots and failed to count the same for other candidates, which said ballots had been at said election lawfully cast for such other candidates; and thereby procured the said George E. Cryer to be declared elected to the office of mayor of the city of Los Angeles, when he had not received the number of votes necessary and proper for him to have received to have been so declared."

In the bill of exceptions it was stipulated that Exhibit A of the statement (the ordinance calling the election) need not be copied into the bill of exceptions, but that the same may be exhibited to this court if required. Without actually examining said exhibit, we shall assume, according to the undenied statement in the brief of counsel for respondent, that said ordinance shows that at the time of said primary election, there were 1,026 election precincts within the city of Los Angeles. Presumably, votes were cast in each of said precincts. The grounds of contest permitted by the law as stated in section 1111 of the Code of Civil Procedure include the following: "1. For misconduct on the part of the board of judges, or any member thereof." In the statement of contest herein, there was no attempt to state any recognized ground of contest, unless that part of the statement which we have quoted can be construed as stating in some one or more particulars the fact of misconduct of the board of judges in some precinct or precincts. It is alleged by petitioner on her information and belief that in each of said precincts "there was misconduct on the part of the board of judges and of each member thereof." Under the rule that a demurrer admits the truth of the pleading against which it is directed, we are asked to assume, extraordinary though the fact may be, that each and all of the 1,026 boards of judges at said election, and each and all of the members thereof, were guilty of misconduct, and that the industry of petitioner was such that prior to filing her petition she obtained information upon which to found and declare her belief in such universal misconduct. Yet, notwithstanding such amazing prevalence of guilt or incompetency, the statement of contest contains no charge of corrupt or otherwise willful wrongdoing on the part of any judge of election. There are two, and only two, varieties of alleged misconduct stated. The first of these is that in each precinct ballots were counted in favor of Cryer which were not intended to be cast for him and which had been lawfully cast "for such other candidates." The second is that said judges "threw out ballots and failed to count the same for other candidates, which said ballots had been at said election lawfully cast for such other candidates."

[1] It needs no argument to show that the counting of a ballot in favor of a candidate other than the one for whom it was cast may be the result of an innocent mistake in the reading, or may result from an innocent clerical error in marking the tally sheets. It is equally true that when an election board "throws out" ballots, and thereby fails to count the same for the candidates in whose favor they were cast, such action of the board may be the result of an honest and fair, even if erroneous, opinion of the judges, that for some sufficient reason the ballots were illegal in form or were illegally cast. It is one of the presumptions of law, although a disputable presumption, and is so declared in section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "(1) That a person is innocent of crime or wrong; * * * (15) That official duty has been regularly performed."

[2, 3] We are satisfied that the statement filed by petitioner did not allege any intentional misconduct on the part of any judge or board of judges of the election. We are of the opinion, however, that the word "misconduct," as used in section 1111, Code of Civil Procedure, was intended to broadly include erroneous conduct without wrongful intention. This is made clear by section 1112, Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

"No irregularity or improper conduct in the proceedings of the judges, or [of] any of them, is such misconduct as avoids an election, unless the irregularity or improper conduct is such as to procure the person whose right to the office is contested to be declared elected, when he had not received the highest number of legal votes."

From this we infer that it was intended that if by irregularity and error in the counting of the votes a person has been declared elected "when he had not received the highest number of legal votes," such election may be contested by the mode of procedure outlined under the title "Contesting Certain Elections." Section 1111 et seq., Code Civ. Proc. If this were not so, the apparent purpose of the statute would be frustrated in all cases of mere error resulting in the awarding of an election certificate to a person who in fact was not elected.

[4] Although the provisions of the statute relating to the statement of contest should be liberally construed, it remains true that the law contemplates that there shall be at least some definite particularity in the charge of misconduct by election officers. It is absurd to suppose that a single elector, without any information on which to base his complaint, is entitled to impose on the superior court the burden of recounting the entire vote cast by the electors, in a great city in which there are hundreds of thousands of voters. To the contest of such an election we may well apply the rule stated by this court in Thorner v. Hart, 29 Cal. App. 234, 155 P. 90:

"While section 1117 of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides that no statement of the grounds of contest will be rejected for want of form, if the grounds [of contest] are alleged with such certainty as will advise the defendant of the particular proceeding or cause for which such election is contested, it does seem clear that the contestee in such cases is entitled to have stated the particulars in which it is charged that misconduct was committed on the part of the officers conducting the election."

The statement of contest in this case does not come up to the standard of the rule above stated. Without the slightest emphasis on any part of the conduct of the boards or officers of election, the statement distributes its accusation evenly across the whole field of more than a thousand precincts. It is not anything other than a general charge that the election count was irregular and erroneous. As well might the contestant say, without more extended phraseology: "The entire count by the boards of election was wrong; Mr. Cryer was not elected; I demand a recount by the superior court." The statute never was intended to authorize any such obstruction of public business.

For the foregoing reasons, we think that the appeal is without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

DE MOTTE et al. v. ARKELL. (Civ. 3064.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 28, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 24, 1926.)

1. Associations ☞16—Under lease of premises to lodge, requiring lessee to keep premises in repair, all members of lodge are tenants, bound by lease.

Lease of premises by lodge, providing that lessee keep premises in good repair, makes all members of lodge tenants obligated to keep premises in repair, though lessee may have sublet premises for public purposes.

2. Landlord and tenant ☞167(1).

Leasing premises to lodge does not bring it under rule applying to injuries arising where premises are leased for amusement purposes.

3. Landlord and tenant ☞164(1)—Rule relieving landlord of liability to tenant due to defective condition of premises, in absence of fraud, concealment, or covenant, held not changed by Code (Civ. Code, § 1941).

Rule that, in absence of fraud, concealment, or covenant, landlord is not liable to tenant for injuries due to defective condition or faulty construction of demised premises, held not changed by Civ. Code, § 1941.

4. Landlord and tenant ☞164(6)—Lessee's duties under lease expressly obligating him to repair held not altered by landlord's implied knowledge of defective condition of premises.

Implied knowledge by landlord of defective condition of demised premises, arising by reason of fact that examination would have disclosed defect, held not to alter duties of lessee under lease expressly obligating him to keep premises in repair, and hence landlord is not liable for injuries due to defective railing.

5. Landlord and tenant ☞164(2).

Landlord, if under duty to repair balcony railing, to be liable for injury from its defective condition, its use at time of injury must have been such as was contemplated at time of lease and for which it was constructed.

6. Landlord and tenant ☞164(2).

Platform and railing in rear of hall leased by lodge held not intended to be used for lounging or social purposes, and hence landlord was not liable for death of member of lodge leaning against railing and falling from platform while smoking there.

7. Landlord and tenant ☞169(11)—If platform is being used for intended purpose, reasonableness of pressure against railing thereon, in action for injury due to defective railing, is for jury.

If rear platform of leased premises is being used for purpose for which it was erected, or if there is any conflict whether contemplated use is being made thereof, reasonableness of pressure against railing on platform in action for injury from defective railing is for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by Mertie O. De Motte and others against Joseph Arkell. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

William P. Hubbard, of San Francisco, and L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for appellant.

R. R. Fowler and Vernon F. Gant, both of Modesto, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiffs for damages on account of the death of William H. De Motte alleged to be due to the negligence of the defendant. Plaintiffs had judgment, and the defendant appeals.

The record shows that some time during the year 1913 the defendant became the owner of a certain building situated in the city of Turlock, county of Stanislaus, state of California, commonly known as "Broadway Hall"; that on or about the 1st day of October, 1920, the defendant leased the second story of said building, together with the appurtenances thereto to the Turlock lodge of Independent Order of Odd Fellows for a term of three years from the said 1st day of October 1920. Said lease contained among other things, the following provision:

"That the said party of the first part (being the defendant) shall not be called upon to make any improvements or repairs whatsoever upon the said demised premises, or any part thereof, but the said party of the second part agrees to keep the same in good order and condition, at (its) his own expense."

The lease covered the entire second floor of the building, together with all its appurtenances. There was a large entrance and stairway to the hall leading from a street, known as Broadway street. From this entrance a stairway led to the second story of the building where the hall mentioned was situated. This stairway led up into a wide passageway. Leading down from this passageway was a narrow passageway continuing to the rear side of the building. At the end of this narrow hallway was a door leading to a passageway or platform on the rear of the building. From this platform are stairs leading down to an alleyway. Adjoining the narrow passageway just described was a small room used as an anteroom for the accommodation of candidates awaiting initiation into the secrets of the orders using the assembly hall. The assembly hall was well lighted; there were a number of windows in the side of the wall over the alleyway. These lighted the platform at the rear of the building; there was also a light in the small passageway which led to the rear platform. This threw light on the platform when the door was opened. The platform was about 19 feet in length, 5 or 6 feet in width, was constructed of Oregon pine supported by upright posts 4 inches by 6 inches in size, and extending above the platform some 3½ feet. To these posts were toe-nailed two guard rails 2 inches by 4 inches in size and about 9 feet in length. The upper guard rail was about 31 inches from the floor of the platform; the lower of the guard rails was about 12 inches from the upper rail. The platform was about 12 feet above the alleyway. On the evening of June 30, 1922, William H. De Motte, deceased, entered the Broadway building by the main stairway entrance and ascended the main stairway to the second floor for the purpose of attending a meeting of the Odd Fellows Lodge, of which he was a member, and for the purpose of taking one of the degrees for which he was a candidate. While waiting in the anteroom he suggested to another person in the anteroom that they go outside to get some fresh air, and opened the door leading onto the platform, passed out onto the platform, accompanied by one Tony Smith. A short time afterwards the said William H. De Motte fell to the alleyway below, sustaining injuries which resulted in his death.

The amended complaint sets forth the cause of action in the following language:

"That on said 30th day of June, 1922, and for a long time prior thereto, said guard rails inclosing said porch or platform were not in good or safe repair, but were insufficient, insecure, and unsafe, and in want of repair, in this: That said guard rails in and about said porch or platform consisted of two pieces of 2x4 lumber placed horizontally and approximately parallel with the floor of said porch or platform, one of said rails being approximately 16 inches above said floor, and one of said rails being approximately 30 inches above said floor, said rails being supported by wooden posts at each end of said rails. That said rails were not nailed or fastened to said posts except insecurely at the extreme ends thereof, and were loose at said ends. That said rails were so short that they did not rest, as to their ends, upon said posts. That said rails were composed of warped, shrunken, decomposed, and rotten wood and were for the reasons aforesaid unsubstantial and insufficient, and would not hold nails or spikes, and that said defects were of such a degree that said rails were unfit, unsafe, insecure and dangerous to lean against by persons using due care.

"That said defendant knowingly, carelessly, and negligently maintained, kept, and permitted, and knowingly, carelessly, and negligently caused to be maintained, kept, suffered and permitted, said guard rails to be and remain in said unfit, unsafe, insecure, and dangerous condition on the 1st day of October, 1920, and for a long time prior thereto and thereafter to and including the 30th day of June, 1922, notwithstanding the said defendant had during all of said time complete and full knowledge and notice of said insufficiency and want of repair of said guard rails at said place, and said defendant carelessly and negligently wholly failed to caution or warn the persons present in said Broadway Hall that said platform or the rails inclosing the same were dangerous, or to provide or place, or cause to be provided or placed, any signs or notices of any kind, warning or notifying the users of said porch or platform that said porch or platform or the guard rails inclosing said porch or platform were unfit, unsafe, insecure and dangerous, and did negligently and carelessly permit, suffer, and allow human beings to use and occupy said porch or platform."

There were two eyewitnesses to the occurrence, to wit: Antone Smith and W. A. O'Hara. Antone Smith gives the following version:

"It was in the Broadway Hall on the balcony platform about half past 9 in the evening; I was waiting in that room, and they declared a recess to get ready for the ceremony for the first degree, and a few of the brothers come out and also Mr. De Motte come out; yes, sir, come in through the door. Then I was going to stand in the anteroom, and he told me, he says, 'Tony, there is a door here; let's see what is out here.'

"Q. See what is out here? A. Yes. After he opened the door, he noticed the balcony there, or platform. He says, 'Well, it is a platform here; we better be out here; it is a little cooler out here.' We got outside, then we went first the rail— Q. (Interrupting): Now, what rail; where was the rail that you referred to in regard to this platform, where was the rail that you referred to? A. The rail right straight from the door.

"Q. What were you and Mr. De Motte doing at that time? A. Leaning up against the rail backwards.

"Q. Now, in what manner were you leaning? A. We were leaning backwards, this way.

"Q. Now, when you say 'leaning,' what do you mean, throwing your whole force against it? * * * A. If you will permit, I will show you.

"Mr. Fowler: Show us. A. He was leaning this way against the rail. I was this way, cross-legged, talking, Mr. De Motte on my left, leaning about the same way, and Mr. Thompson introduced Mr. O'Hara, and Mr. De Motte kind of start to make himself acquainted with him, because he was running for auditor, and he stepped ahead just a few steps.

"Q. Show what he did. A. He was this way, and he stepped ahead and shake hands with Mr. O'Hara, and then he pulled out his card and showed him.

"Q. Who did? A. Mr. De Motte.

"Q. What did he do with the card? A. He gave it to Mr. O'Hara.

"Q. What did he say, if anything? A. He says, 'If you mind to take one of my cards. Can you read it?' He says, 'Yes.'

"Q. What did Mr. O'Hara do? A. He says, 'I saw your card in the paper, and I keep the card,' and talking there just a few moments, and Mr. De Motte came right back to the rail, and as soon as he strike the rail, he dropped back down. I was leaning this way (showing).

"Q. At the time he fell, are you prepared to state how he was leaning, or how he touched the rail? A. I wouldn't swear how he was leaning, but what I know, he had both feet on the floor.

"Q. He had both feet on the floor? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you observe him at any time that evening, sitting on the rail? A. No, sir. * * *

"Q. Did he sit on the rail? A. No, sir.

"Q. Was there a light out there? A. There was a light; yes, sir.

"Q. If Mr. De Motte had been sitting on that rail, would you have seen him? If he had been sitting on it, could you have seen him? A. No, sir—of course, I believe I would have seen him if he was sitting on it.

"Q. Now, how long were you and Mr. De Motte out there on the platform, leaning against the rail as you have told us, before Mr. O'Hara came out. A. About five minutes.

"Q. About five minutes. And how was he leaning at that time; how was Mr. De Motte leaning? A. He was leaning back this way.

"Q. Just take this—this is the rail here? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Will you tell us about how far the rail was from the floor? A. Striking me about here. * * *

"Q. Just show us about how you leaned. A. I was leaning this way.

"Q. Leaning that way? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Just the weight on one foot and the other crossed over? A. Yes.

"Q. How, about, was he leaning, if you recall? A. Well; I wouldn't swear the way he was leaning, because he stepped ahead and speak to Mr. O'Hara.

"Q. Well, during the few minutes you were there? A. He was leaning this way.

"Q. He was leaning that way? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I see. Now, during the time that you and he were in that position, the rail stood your weight all right? A. Yes, sir. Of course we wasn't pressing no weight against there.

"Q. In other words, the three of you, you and Mr. De Motte still leaning against the rail, talking to Mr. O'Hara? A. Yes.

"Q. Four or five minutes after he got out there before he fell over? A. Yes sir.

"Q. That would make it about nine or ten minutes in all? A. Yes.

"Q. That you and Mr. De Motte were out there? A. Yes.

"Q. Leaning against the rail before he actually fell over? A. Yes, sir."

Mr. O'Hara's testimony, so far as it relates to the incident in question, is as follows:

"A. And he just handed me the card, and I stepped back like that; the light was shining; and I stepped back to read his card, and just as I glanced at his card, why, he stepped—he handed it to me and I stepped back and he was gone!

"Q. From the time that he stepped back after handing you his card, from the moment he stepped back, what interval of time elapsed before he was gone, as you state? A. Well, I just held the card, like—he just handed it to me, and he stepped back like that, and I just glanced at the card, didn't have a chance to read it or anything; he just stepped back like that and he was gone!

"Q. I see. Now, when you say he was 'gone,' you mean what? A. He went over backwards.

"Q. And did anything occur to any portion of the platform at the time he went over? A. Well, the rail, you could hear it, the end of it. Well, what drew my attention to it, Mr. Smith, he jumped forward like that; that is, he jumped forward, I noticed, and I went to grab Mr. De Motte.

"Q. Grabbed him, you say? A. I tried to reach him; I tried to catch his hands. He threw his hands up like that and I tried to catch him, but he was too far from me.

"Q. And what became of the rail, if you know, at that time? A. The rail went first; he followed the rail down.

"Q. Did you hear anything to indicate before Mr. De Motte fell that the rail was going; was there any noise? A. Well, there may have been a little, but not enough to—just might have been a splinter or something like that. Of course, when it started, I heard it, that is what drew my attention to it."

The testimony further shows that the witness, Antone Smith, was a man of ordinary size, and the deceased was a man weighing from 225 to 260 pounds. The testimony further shows that the rear stairway and platform were used for the purpose of taking in refreshments and supplies when the lodge was giving banquets, and taking out garbage, also, that a piano box was stationed at one end of the platform, and used by the lodge as a coal bin; that the door leading from the narrow passageway onto the rear platform was equipped with what one of the witnesses called a thumb lock and was supposed to be kept locked at all times, which was not always done; that the door could be opened from the inside by turning a knob on the lock. It does not appear from the transcript that the rear platform was used for any other purposes than as herein stated, though some of the witnesses testified that they occasionally saw people go up and down the back stairs, but such use was infrequent. The main entrance to the hall and the upper floor of the building where the hall was situated was from the Broadway side of the building, and was the one in general use for reaching the hall used by the Odd Fellows. It further appears from the record that the deceased was not a member of the Odd Fellows' Lodge at the time the premises in question were leased from the defendant, but became a member a short time thereafter. There is some testimony in the record that at the time when the Carpenters' Union occupied the hall members of the union would occasionally go out on the balcony for the purpose of smoking. It also appears from the record that the lessees of the hall in question permitted other organizations to hold meetings in the hall.

As to the condition of the hand rails or guard rails, the testimony is conflicting; that introduced on the part of the plaintiff is to the effect that the rail which gave way was loose, defective; that the porch or platform had warped so that the ends of the guard rail had drawn away from the posts to such an extent that the guard rail was loose and would shake when taken hold of. On the other hand, there is testimony to the effect that the guard rail was secure and sufficient at least for all the purposes for which it was intended. The testimony also shows that during the time the premises were under lease to the Odd Fellows, and that the Odd Fellows procured the services of a carpenter to repair the back porch and stairway; that the carpenter so employed repaired the underpinning of the posts which we have described, made other repairs thereto, made some repairs to the floor of the platform, noticed the condition of the guard rail, that it was not in what he considered a safe condition, but that he made no repairs thereto; that he simply repaired that portion of the structure in question which he was directed to repair by the lessee. There was testimony to the effect that the posts were decayed at the nail holes where the guard rails were nailed to the posts. The record shows also that at the time of the execution of the lease, October 20th, the defendant and a Mr. Ferguson, the representative and person acting for the Odd Fellows' Lodge, made an examination of the premises, including the back stairway and platform, and also the suitability of the platform for the location of a coal box. The testimony on the part of the plaintiff was to the effect that the back porch, including the guard rails, was in a defective condition as described at the time of the lease, and remained so during all the period of time embraced in the controversy. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground of contributory negligence, that the use made of the platform and guard rail was not such as was intended at the time of the lease, that the premises were leased to and under the control of the Odd Fellows' Lodge, of which the deceased was a member under a written lease which expressly provided for the making of repairs and the keeping of the same in good condition by the lessee. The defendant's motion for a nonsuit was denied, after which the defendant introduced testimony tending to show that the guard rail was in good condition and suitable for the purpose for which it was intended at the date of the lease.

It is contended upon this appeal that the defendant's motion for a nonsuit should have been granted, and, further, that the judgment against the defendant is unwarranted by the facts.

[1] While the complaint alleges negligence on the part of the defendant in maintaining a defective guard rail during all the period of time elapsing between the execution of the lease until the date of the death of the deceased, there is nothing in the complaint alleging, nor is there anything in the record showing or tending to show, either fraud or concealment on the part of the defendant at any time. If the allegations of the complaint are true, a clear case of obvious defects is established, even though it is alleged that the deceased was unaware of such defects. The complaint does not allege any latent defects, but is based solely upon the fact of the continuing defects which we have mentioned, and the lack of knowledge thereof on the part of the deceased. The complaint omits mention of the fact that the premises in question, including the porch and stairway, were under lease to the Odd Fellows' Lodge, of which the defendant was a member, but apparently counts upon the fact that the Broadway hall, as alleged in paragraph 4 of the complaint, was "used for human occupancy and at divers times and with great frequency during said period of time last aforesaid, with defendant's knowledge, consent and permission, divers persons gathered, assembled and met therein, and public and semipublic gatherings, audiences, meetings, congregations, and assemblages of human beings were, with defendant's knowledge, consent, permission, and approval, had and held in said rooms, compartments, apartments, and/or halls on said second story or upper floor of said Broadway building," and invokes the rule applicable to injuries of third persons where the premises have been leased for amusement or public purposes. That the lessee may have let the premises for some public purpose or purposes does not alter the situation here. The premises were leased to the Odd Fellows' Lodge, of which the deceased was a member, which renders all members of the Odd Fellows' Lodge leasing the premises tenants under obligation to repair the premises and keep the same in good condition. This is not a case involving injury to any one other than a tenant, and we need not discuss the law relative to the rights of third persons where halls leased for amusement or public purposes, in fact, may be involved. The lessee in this case was a private fraternal organization composed of a limited, known, and accepted membership, each one having equal rights and liabilities, and the hall was not a place and was not at the time used as a place for the assembling of the general public. This is not a case of the visiting by a patron of a public amusement place, but is a case of a use thereof, which was for the private convenience of the tenants for a limited purpose. If it were a case where the premises were leased for a public use, then the rule would apply that the lessor of property intended for a public use is not liable for injuries received on account of the defect in that portion of the premises intended only for private use. There is nothing in the record in this case that shows that the back stairs and balcony were intended for public use, in the sense of the word in which that word is ever used in applying to a place or premises leased for public or amusement purposes. The wide stairway leading from Broadway street is shown to be the only one intended for general use in reaching the hall in question, irrespective of the purpose for which the hall at the particular time was being used. See note to Morong v. Spofford, L. R. A. 1915B, 387.

[2] That the leasing of premises to a lodge does not bring it under the rule applying to injuries arising where the premises are leased for amusement purposes, see note to Feeley v. Doyle, L. R. A. 1916F, pp. 1123-1129. See, also, Jordan v. Sullivan, 181 Mass. 348, 63 N. E. 909, in which the action was based upon an allegation of a failure to properly light the entrance of a public hall, and the defendant was injured by falling over a step therein. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts thus states the law. We quote from the syllabus:

"Where an owner of a building let a hall for the installation of a lodge, agreeing to light and heat the same, and a party, in entering the building to attend the ceremonies, fell, and was injured, owing to the insufficient lighting of the entrance thereto, she could not recover for her injury from the owner, being at most an invited guest of the lodge, and as such having only the rights against the owner which the lodge itself would have had, and the lodge not having any right to complain that a gas jet should have been put in to light the entrance, it having rented the building without such jet being in."

[3] The allegations of the complaint setting forth the substance of section 1941 of the Civil Code that the building was intended for human occupation does not present a situation where the common law in relation to the duties and liabilities of landlords to tenants does not apply. As set forth in 15 Cal. Jur. 704:

"In the absence of fraud, concealment, or covenant in the lease, a landlord is not liable to a tenant for injuries due to the defective condition or faulty construction of the demised premises. This is the rule at common law, and it has not been changed by section 1941 of the Civil Code." Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58, 22 P. 304; Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 563.

In Gately v. Campbell, 124 Cal. 520, 57 P. 567, the Supreme Court, having to do with a similar question, thus states the law:

"The controlling question left in this case is whether or not the landlord, in the absence of fraud, concealment, or covenant in the lease, is liable to the tenant for an injury suffered by him during his occupancy by reason of the defective condition or faulty construction of the leased premises. At the common law the lessor is not liable for such injury. Keates v. Earl of Cadogan, 10 C. B. 591; Howard v. Doolittle, 3 Duer [10 N. Y. Super. Ct.] 464; Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, §§ 175a, 382. And this court has often laid down the same rule. Brewster v. De Fremery, 33 Cal. 341; Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 565; Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173 [18 P. 260]; Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58 [22 P. 304]; Daley v. Quick, 99 Cal. 181 [33 P. 589]."

In Robinson v. Leighton, 122 Me. 309, 119 A. 809, 30 A. L. R. 1386, a case involving liability between landlord and tenant, the rule is similarly stated as follows:

"A rule similar to that of caveat emptor applying, it certainly may be defined as a general proposition applicable to premises actually let, that the lessor, in his relation to the lessee, does not warrant their condition, and that he is not liable for any injury suffered by the tenant during his occupancy by reason of defects. There must be proof of exceptional circumstances to make the landlord liable in such cases; some proof of fraud or misrepresentation, or direct concealment of a fact known to the lessor, which the lessee did not have any reasonable opportunity of discovering. There must be proof of some direct omission by the lessor, of the performance of a duty which he owed to the lessee, in order to make the landlord liable. Libbey v. Tolford, 48 Me. 316, 77 Am. Dec. 229; McKenzie v. Cheetham, 83 Me. 543, 22 A. 469; Whitmore v. Orono P. & P. Co., 91 Me. 297, 39 A. 1032, 40 L. R. A. 377, 64 Am. St. Rep. 229; Bennett v. Sullivan, 100 Me. 118, 60 A. 886; Hill v. Day, 108 Me. 467, 81 A. 581, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 971."

In the note to Hill v. Day, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 971, following the decision in that case setting forth the rule in accordance with what has been said, in commentator used the following language:

"It is held in the reported case that unless there is an express covenant, the lessor does not warrant that the premises are fit for use and he is not obliged to keep them in repair, 'but the tenant, on the principle of caveat emptor, and in the absence of any fraud on the part of the landlord, takes the property in the actual condition in which he finds it,' and therefore the plaintiff cannot recover damages for personal injuries caused by the fall of a ceiling. The case of Kabus v. Frost, 50 N. Y. Super. Ct. 72, supports the principle laid down in the reported case. In that case it appeared that a written lease provided for certain repairs, but there was no reference made as to repairing the ceiling. The plaintiff brought an action to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the fall of the ceiling, and the court, dismissing the action, said: 'There is no implied warranty or obligation on the part of the landlord that the premises were in a safe condition for use, or that they would not become unsafe.' See, also,

Ross v. Pizer, 132 App. Div. 696, 117 N. Y. S. 404; Miller v. Rinaldo, 21 Misc. Rep. 470, 47 N. Y. S. 636; Kennedy v. Fay, 31 Misc. Rep. 776, 65 N. Y. S. 202; Garcewich v. Ascherman [Sup.] 129 N. Y. S. 418."

[4] In the case at bar there is not only an absence of a covenant to repair, but an express covenant in the lease that the tenant shall make all repairs and that the landlord shall not be called upon to make any repairs during the continuance of the lease. The implied knowledge of the defective condition on the part of the landlord in this case is supported by the argument that an examination would have readily disclosed the condition of the guard rail and the necessity for repairs. This, however, does not change the situation. In Toner v. Meussdorffer, 123 Cal. 462, 56 P. 39, the court, speaking through Justice Temple, answers said argument:

"The assertion is little more than what would be called simplex commendatio, rather than a representation, had defendants themselves been the landlords. The duty of making an examination rested as much upon the lessee as upon the landlord, and to all such transactions the rule of caveat emptor applies. It is not averred that the lessee abstained from making an examination because of the representations, and clearly he would not have been justified in refraining from so doing in reliance upon such an assertion."

In Daley v. Quick, 99 Cal. 179, 33 P. 859, the court quoted from Baxter v. Roberts, 44 Cal. 187, 13 Am. Rep. 160, and sets forth the duty of the lessee to make an examination, as follows:

"It is as much the duty of the lessee to satisfy himself that the premises are safe as it is of the lessor to make them so; and when it would appear from an examination, such as an ordinarily prudent man would make before venturing to reside in or upon the premises, that they were unsafe, and the defect rendering them so discernible, the lessee is presumed to have had notice of such defect and accepted the risks incident thereto if he occupies the premises."

From the fact that the deceased was a member of the tenant lodge and thus one of the tenants, we do not deem it necessary to discuss or review the cases having to do with injuries sustained by third persons, and, also, in view of the further fact that the landlord surrendered control of the platform and stairway to the lessee, it is not necessary to review the cases relating to the landlord's liability under such circumstances. We will, however, cite a few of the cases having to do with the misuse of platforms and guard rails in cases where the landlord actually retains control. In the case of Kelley v. Lawrence, 195 Mo. 75, 92 S. W. 1158, where a servant was injured by leaning against the guard rail along the side of a four-foot viaduct which was used as a passageway, the court considered the question in this manner:

"The floor of this viaduct was four feet wide, and it was such floor that was designed as the passageway or walkway for the use of employees in going to the buggy room or returning therefrom, and so long as plaintiff was walking upon this floorway or standing upon it he was entirely safe, and it was not until he undertook to improperly use the banister or railing which were placed on either side of this walk, for a purpose for which such banister or railing was not intended or designed, that he was in any danger of being injured. That this railing or banister on either side of this viaduct was not placed there to be used as a seat or resting place for employees in using such viaduct, is too plain for discussion. No one will seriously contend that in the placing of that railing or banister on either side of the viaduct that it was designed for any other purpose than simply a guard rail and to prevent those who should use the viaduct in an ordinarily careful manner from being hurt."

In that case the plaintiff and another person started to cross the viaduct, and after proceeding a short distance stopped, engaged in conversation, and the plaintiff started to sit down on the railing, which gave way and precipitated him to the ground beneath, causing serious injuries, for which suit was instituted. It was held that the defendants were not liable. In Offutt v. O'Leary, 204 Ky. 726, 265 S. W. 296, the Supreme Court of Missouri states the rule as to the use of premises for a different one than intended, as follows:

"It is equally clear that the liability of the landlord does not extend to injuries occasioned by defects in the portions of the premises not intended to be used as an entrance, exit, or passageway. * * * This rule would not, however, apply to a hidden defect so contiguous to a path as to form a trap for the unwary traveler using it in the ordinary manner."

To the same effect is Morong v. Spofford, 218 Mass. 50, 105 N. E. 454, L. R. A. 1915B, 387, where the injured person used a back stairway instead of a front stairway, which was the one provided for giving access to the part of the building sought to be entered. In the case of Pavlovchik v. Lupariello, 101 Conn. 567, 127 A. 18, the testimony showed that a woman weighing 200 pounds leaned forward at the edge of a porch against a railing and pulled on a clothesline. The railing gave way, and the plaintiff fell and was injured. The landlord was held not liable by reason of the misuse being made of the railing by the plaintiff. In Glain v. Sparandeo, 119 Ia. 339, 44 So. 120, the plaintiff attempted to lower a dresser from a platform or balcony at the rear of a building, leaned against a guard rail, which gave way, resulting in a fall and injury to the plaintiff. The defendant was held not liable. In the case of Kinney v. Onsted, 113 Mich. 96, 71 N. W. 482, 38 L. R. A. 665, 67 Am. St. Rep. 455, the Supreme Court of Michigan held that the defendant was not liable where the plaintiff had leaned against a guard rail on a passageway and was injured by reason of the guard rail giving way, on the ground that the plaintiff was putting the guard rail to a use which was not intended. In deciding that case the court refers to the case of Stickney v. Salem, 3 Allen, 374, as follows:

"In Stickney v. Salem the action was against the city for injuries resulting to deceased caused by leaning against a fence or railing which marked the terminus of the street, and was built upon the top of a seawall. The plaintiff, in company with a friend, had walked to this point to view the sea, had turned his back to and leaned against this railing, which gave way, because of defects, and he received serious injuries. The court says: 'The fact that the railing was defective and would have proved an insufficient barrier in case it became necessary for a traveler to use it for a legitimate object is wholly immaterial. It is a sufficient answer to the plaintiff's case that the defendants were not bound to keep the railing in repair for the purpose for which it was used by the deceased at the time of the accident'"—citing Orcutt v. Kittery Point Bridge Co., 53 Me. 500.

[5, 6] In Robinson v. Leighton, supra, the plaintiff was injured in making use of a fire escape in a manner other than that intended and for a purpose other than for which it was constructed. Judgment was for the defendant. The notes to that case collect a number of cases supporting the rule above stated. It thus appears that if the duty had devolved upon the defendant to make repairs to the balcony, stairway, and guard rail, the use at the time of the injury must have been such as was contemplated at the time of the lease and for which the back porch, balcony, and guard rail were constructed. At the time that the guard rail gave way, the witness, Tony Smith, was leaning against one portion thereof. Prior to the time that the deceased stepped forward to give the witness O'Hara a campaign card, both the deceased and the witness Smith had been leaning against the guard rail. Each was standing, as described by a witness, upon one foot, with the other crossed over, and had been in such position for some minutes, when two others appeared upon the porch and the deceased was introduced to O'Hara and again stepped back to the railing. Just what force was exerted by him against the railing does not appear. The witness Smith does state that they were not leaning heavily against the railing, and that the deceased did not sit down upon the railing. The weight of the witness Smith does not appear in the record further than he is stated to be a man of average weight. The weight of the deceased was given at between 225 and 260 pounds. It thus appears that two men weighing together in the neighborhood of 400 pounds were standing leaning against the railing for some minutes, that one of them remained leaning against the rail until it gave way, and that the other stepped back against it just preceding the instant of time when the railing broke loose. Irrespective of the actual pressure exerted by the two men against the railing, it is clear that the guard rail was not intended to be used for leaning against, nor was the platform or balcony erected as a place to be used for lounging or social purposes.

[7] Where it is shown that a back porch or balcony is being used for the purpose for which the same was erected, then the weight or pressure brought against a guard rail as to whether it was reasonable or unreasonable, or any greater than should have been anticipated, becomes purely a question for the jury; also, in cases where there is any conflict in the evidence as to whether the intended and contemplated use is being made of the stairway and balcony. The facts appearing in the transcript, in view of the law which we have cited, show that the defendant's motion for a nonsuit in this case should have been granted. The appellant argues error on the part of the trial court in the giving and refusing of instructions. As the judgment must be reversed, from the fact that we have fully set forth the law applicable to this case, it becomes unnecessary to review each assignment of error. However, in view of what we have said, we think the trial court will experience no difficulty as to any further questions relating to instructions. The judgment is reversed.

WALLACE v. CLOTHIER.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 24, 1926.)

1. Divorce $\S$ 127(4)—Considerable number of important and material facts relied on by plaintiff in divorce action must be corroborated, although it is not necessary that there be corroboration of every act testified to (Civ. Code, $\S$ 130).

Under Civ. Code, $\S$ 130, providing divorce may not be granted on uncorroborated testimony of parties, there must be corroboration of considerable number of important and material facts relied on, although it is not necessary to have corroboration of every act testified to by plaintiff.

2. Divorce $\S$ 127(3).

Uncorroborated testimony of plaintiff in divorce action as to cruelty and desertion held insufficient under Civ. Code, $\S$ 130.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter J. Wood, Judge.

Action for divorce by Albert C. Clothier against Flora M. Clothier; R. Boyd Wallace, guardian of Albert C. Clothier being substituted as plaintiff on plaintiff's being declared incompetent. Interlocutory decree of divorce, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. W. Satterwhite, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. H. Donnelly, of Stafford, Kan., for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment granting the plaintiff a divorce. Since the interlocutory decree of divorce was entered, plaintiff has been judicially declared to be an incompetent person, and his guardian has been substituted in his place and stead in this action.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the record contains no corroboration of the plaintiff's testimony upon which the divorce was granted. A reading of the record convinces us of the correctness of this contention. The plaintiff testified that, just prior to the separation of himself and wife, they were living together at Long Beach, Cal. He was not working because of illness and had never worked during the period of the marriage. His wife assisted in maintaining the household by keeping boarders and taking in washing. One of these boarders was a man named Miller. Mrs. Clothier sold the house in which they were living, and, when she was about to move, she asked her husband to make arrangements for hauling the furniture. He did so, protesting that he did not wish Miller to continue as a boarder or move into the new house. Mrs. Clothier said Miller was to move with them, and, according to plaintiff, suggested that Mr. Clothier might go elsewhere. The separation occurred at this time. Plaintiff testified to several other incidents which would have had a cumulative value in sustaining his case had they been corroborated; but they were not corroborated. On the other hand, defendant contradicted plaintiff's testimony in all important particulars, and was corroborated in her statements that plaintiff used intoxicating liquors to excess over a long period of time. The trial judge appreciated the weakness of plaintiff's case, and several times during the trial impressed upon the parties that there was no corroborating evidence of either cruelty or desertion, the offenses alleged. The matter was finally taken under advisement by the court, and the decree granted. Section 130, Civil Code, provides that a divorce may not be granted upon the uncorroborated testimony of the parties, and the decisions in this state, while holding that it is not necessary that there be corroboration of every act testified to by the plaintiff, nevertheless lay down the rule that there must be corroboration of a considerable number of important and material facts relied upon. Blanchard, 10 Cal. App. 203, 101 P. 536; Johnston v. Johnston, 17 Cal. App. 241, 119 P. 403; Percy v. Percy, 188 Cal. 765, 207 P. 369. The record in the instant case does not meet this test.

The judgment is reversed.

et al. (Civ. 5215.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 23, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1926.)

1. Limitation of actions $\S$ 172—Parties claiming through grantee of fraudulent conveyance cannot set up statute of limitations, after being joined as parties to suit by defrauded creditor to subject property to judgment against grantor.

Parties claiming through grantee of fraudulent conveyance cannot raise question of limitations, after being joined as parties to defrauded creditor's action to subject property to satisfaction of judgment, not being parties to original action, nor related, by privity or otherwise, to grantor, who owed them nothing.

2. Limitation of actions $\S$ 173, 175.

Statute of limitations is plea personal to debtor, who may waive it.

Grantee takes grantor's interest in property, qualified only by interest of grantor's creditors, as to whom conveyance was fraudulent, and is ordinarily entitled to surplus after satisfaction of their claims.

4. Fraudulent conveyances $\S$ 179(2)—Limitation of actions $\S$ 172.

Creditors of grantee under fraudulent conveyance may reach his interest by execution and plead limitations for him, in suit by grantor's defrauded creditor to subject property to judgment against grantor.

5. Limitation of actions $\S$ 172—Grantee's creditors, after conveyance of his interest, and grantor's acquisition thereof as owner of corporation succeeding to it, could not plead statute for grantee, in suit by grantor's defrauded creditor to subject property to judgment against grantor.

Where grantee conveyed interest acquired, and grantor secured it by reason of his ownership of corporation which succeeded to it, grantee's creditors had no interest, and could not plead statute for him, in suit by grantor's defrauded creditor to subject property to judgment against grantor.

Where grantee, after conveying his interest in property, acquired record title as statutory trustee by virtue of directorate in defunct corporation, formed to take over grantor's property, and failed to perform assessment work on mining claims for purpose of allowing forfeiture, after which he relocated them, with aid of funds advanced by grantor for assessment work, in name of one who subsequently conveyed them to him, he was mere trustee for grantor, and his creditor, having full knowledge of claim of grantor's creditor, could not subject property to grantee's debts.

Purchaser at execution sale under judgment against debtor holding record title as mere trustee for another took no title, as such purchasers take only debtor's title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by Goldberg, Bowen & Co., a corporation, against J. K. Demick, H. H. Blood, the Security Trust Company, and others. From a judgment quieting title of defendant Blood in certain mining claims, defendants Trust Company and others appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. Wiley and Wiley & Harvey, all of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Mervyn R. Dowd and Dowd & Reagh, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This action is one brought to set aside certain conveyances of real property claimed to have been made for the purpose of defrauding creditors. It is in the nature of a creditors' bill in equity.

The record is involved and voluminous, and contains many facts which do not affect the questions here presented. We will therefore confine ourselves to a recital of such facts only as are necessary to discuss the points relied upon for a reversal.

On November 1, 1907, defendants Demick and Blood executed certain promissory notes to plaintiff, Goldberg, Bowen & Co., a corporation. These notes were subsequently merged in a judgment rendered in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco on December 22, 1911, which was for the sum of $3,094.08 and costs. An appeal was taken therefrom, but the judgment was affirmed February 8, 1915, and a remittitur was issued to the court below 30 days thereafter. For some unexplained reason, but probably for failure to pay the fee, the remittitur was not filed by the clerk until September 16, 1919. On March 6, 1919, less than 5 years after the affirmance of the judgment, an execution was issued out of the superior court, which was subsequently returned wholly unsatisfied. On November 8, 1919, an alias execution was issued to the sheriff of Kern county, but no return was ever made thereon. Thereafter, in November, 1919, supplementary proceedings were had under section 715, Code of Civil Procedure, at which time defendant H. H. Blood was examined, but the hearing failed to disclose the ownership of any property in him, and the order of examination was discharged. The examination did reveal, however, that he had disposed of his property through mesne conveyances to a corporation known as the Sterling Development Company. Blood was the president of this corporation, and owned all of its stock. Plaintiff thereupon, on the 28th day of March, 1921, commenced this action against such corporation and the other defendants, among whom was C. C. Little and his wife, to obtain a decree establishing and determining that certain mining claims, the property here involved, held by them belonged to defendant Blood, and had fraudulently been conveyed by him to Little and by mesne conveyances to the corporation to defeat plaintiff's judgment. A lis pendens was recorded against the mining property. After the filing of this complaint, and on June 8, 1921, another corporation known as the Security Trust Company, a defendant herein, recovered a judgment against Little for the sum of $3,462, and on the 6th day of December following it sold the mining claims to defendant Lee Rankin. On March 30, 1922, plaintiff herein filed an amended complaint joining appellants and the mining claims sold by the sheriff to defendant Lee Rankin as parties to the action.

The prayer of the amended complaint was that the conveyance by Blood to Little be declared fraudulent, and that Rankin be decreed to have no interest against the plaintiff or defendant Blood by reason of any certificate of sale or deed which defendant Rankin may have acquired at the sheriff's sale, and that Blood be decreed to be the owner of the property and entitled to the possession; that Rankin be required to surrender such possession unto defendant Blood.

To this complaint the appellants filed a general denial. They also set up the defense that the cause of action against them, if any, was barred by the statute of limitations. The other defendants, including Blood and Little, defaulted. The trial court found, in substance, that the Littles were relatives of Blood and his confidants in all of his business transactions; that shortly after the time of the commencement of the original action the Sterling Development Company, a corporation, was formed with Blood as its president, for the purpose of holding all the assets of Blood; that all of the stock in the corporation was owned by him; that prior to the formation of the corporation, and after the commencement by plaintiff of their original action, Blood had conveyed the mining property to C. C. Little; that Little conveyed the same to Blood's attorney, who, in turn, conveyed to the Sterling Development Company; that this corporation forfeited its charter for failure to pay its franchise and license taxes; that the property of the corporation was thereafter held by Blood, Little, and others as trustees; that the transfer by Blood to the corporation of his assets was made without consideration, and for the specific purpose of defrauding plaintiffs. It further found that, after the corporation mentioned had forfeited its charter, Blood sent to C. C. Little the sum of $1,700 to be utilized by him in performing assessment work on the mining claims; that Little failed to perform the work; and that his purpose in so doing was to allow the claims to be forfeited, so that the same could be relocated; that Little induced defendant Raney, who was his uncle, to relocate the claims, which he did, and subsequently delivered to Little a quitclaim deed to the same. Under these circumstances the court found that Little held the property as trustee of the defunct Sterling Development Company in trust for the creditors of Blood. Other findings are to the effect that the claims of Rankin and the judgment of the Security Trust Company arose subsequent to the filing of plaintiff's complaint. In conformity with these findings it was ordered that the conveyance by Blood to Little, made to defraud his creditors, be canceled, and it was also ordered that the conveyances made under the execution sale to Lee Rankin be likewise canceled. From the judgment quieting the title of Blood in the mining claims, the appellants Security Trust Company, Lee Rankin, W. A. Rankin, and the sheriff, D. B. Newell, who made the sale, have appealed. No appeal has been taken by Blood or any of the other defendants; they having defaulted.

The point relied upon for a reversal of the judgment is that the executions issued out of the superior court of San Francisco in the original judgment were void, and had no force or validity, for the reason that they were issued after the expiration of 5 years from the docketing of such judgment. In support of this claim it is argued that, since the execution of the judgment had not been stayed pending appeal, and since more than 5 years had elapsed from its docketing, it could only be carried in force by leave of the court upon motion made under the provisions of section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, no such motion having been made, the judgment obtained by plaintiff against Blood and Demick had no force or validity at the time of the commencement of this action.

[1-4] We do not think that we are at all here concerned with any question relating to the statute of limitations, for we are of the opinion that appellants are in no position to raise any such question. They were not parties to the original action, nor were they in any manner concerned therewith. Blood was never indebted to any of the appellants. The judgment obtained by the Security Trust Company was against Little. The statute of limitations is a plea personal to the debtor which he may use or waive as he pleases. It is true that, where some privity exists between parties, a different question may be presented. But the facts here involved, as we understand them, present no such question. The action was one against Blood by his creditor to subject certain property fraudulently conveyed by him to the satisfaction of a judgment secured by such creditor against Blood. Appellants herein are in no manner related to Blood by privity, nor in any manner whatsoever, as he at no time owed them anything. Blood failed to plead the statute of limitations against this action, but he was under no legal obligation to do so on behalf of appellants, for he owed them nothing. This being so, appellants who claim through Little are in no manner concerned with any plea that Blood may or may not have made. It is none of their affair so far as he is concerned. The only manner in which they might be affected is through their relation to Little. As a grantee under the fraudulent conveyance, Little took whatever interest Blood had in the property, as the conveyance to him was perfectly valid. Huellmantel v. Huellmantel, 49 P. 574, 117 Cal. 407. The interest that he acquired was limited or qualified only by the interest of the creditors of Blood; the conveyance as to them being fraudulent. As to them only, his interest was subordinate. If, after their claims were satisfied, there remained any surplus, Little would ordinarily be entitled to that surplus. Loosemore v. Baker, 166 P. 26, 175 Cal. 420; Estate of Vance, 75 P. 323, 141 Cal. 624. And this interest was one that his creditors might reach by execution, for as to this interest they might be said to stand in his shoes by relation or privity, and, if he failed to plead the statute, they might do so for him. Brown v. Campbell, 35 P. 433, 100 Cal. 635, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314.

[5-7] But at the time this action was brought Little had some 10 years previously, as above recited, conveyed whatever interest he may have acquired under the fraudulent conveyance, and the defendant Blood had secured the same by reason of his ownership of the Sterling Development Company which succeeded to the interest. At the time this action was commenced, Little owned no interest whatsoever. The interest which he acquired under the fraudulent conveyance had passed out of his hands, and no question is here raised concerning the validity of Little's transfer. So far, therefore, as this interest was concerned, Little having none at the time of this suit, his creditors had none by relation to him, and they could not interpose the statute in his behalf. Having none against Blood, they could not therefore plead the statute on behalf of any one. At the time of the commencement of this action, however, the property stood in the name of Little. This record title was acquired by him in the following manner: Little was chosen by Blood as one of the directors of the Sterling Development Company which was formed to take over the title to all of Blood's property. That company failed to pay its license and franchise tax, and in consequence became a defunct corporation, resulting in Little's acquiring an interest in its property as one of the statutory trustees to wind up its affairs. Thereafter, in December, 1916, Blood sent the sum of $1,700 to his nephew, Little, to perform certain assessment work on the mining claims. Little received this sum, but failed to perform the work within the time required by law, with the express and fraudulent purpose of allowing title to the claims to become forfeited, and he thereafter, in the following year, with the aid of the funds so advanced, caused the property to be relocated in the name of his uncle J. E. Raney. Thereafter, in 1918, Raney conveyed the claims by a quitclaim deed to Little. In June, 1921, appellant Security Trust Company obtained its judgment against Little, and levied upon and sold under execution the property so acquired by Little as trustee. At this time, and long prior thereto, the trust company had full knowledge of plaintiff's claim to the property by reason of its action against Blood and the lis pendens which was recorded. Under these circumstances the trial court found that the judgment of the trust company was subordinate to plaintiff's claim, and that Little was a mere trustee of defendant Blood. The interest of Little in the property being that of a mere naked trustee, of which fact the trust company had notice, it was not subject to the debts of Little, and could not be reached or affected by any act of his creditors. De Cellis v. Porter, 59 Cal. 464. This being so, the purchaser at the execution sale took no title to the property, as purchasers at such sales take only the title the debtor has; no more, no less. 16 R. C. L. 138.

Under all the circumstances of the case, the trial court rightfully held that title to the property was in Blood and not in Little, and, this being so, the defense relied upon by appellants is one that they are in no position to make. They being complete strangers to Blood, they are not concerned with any defense that he might or might not make. There is no merit in the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by A. K. Detwiler against W. H. Clune for damages for breach of contract. From a judgment for plaintiff not granting all the relief demanded in the complaint, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; CONREY, Justice pro tem., not participating.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, for plaintiff.

Nathan Newby, of Los Angeles, for defendant.

CONREY, P. J. These are appeals by the several parties from one and the same judgment. The defendant appeals from all of the judgment "except that portion of said judgment in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff as to the first and second counts of the complaint therein, alleging causes of action in favor of the plaintiff on his personal claim against said defendant." The plaintiff appeals from that part of the judgment which was excepted from the defendant's appeal; that is to say, that part of the judgment which reads as follows:

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the causes of action alleged by plaintiff in the first and second counts of his complaint herein, and therein alleged to have accrued to him in virtue of sundry transactions between himself personally and the said defendant, are barred by the force and effect of the judgment in the former action (No. B-50816 in the clerk's register of actions in this court) wherein the said A. K. Detwiler was plaintiff and said W. H. Clune was defendant, which judgment was duly entered in that action on the 4th day of June, 1918, in favor of the defendant therein, and against the said plaintiff, and that the plaintiff in the present action take nothing by reason of the causes of action alleged in the said first count and in the said second count of his complaint in the present action, respectively."

The judgment in the present action was entered on the 31st day of October, 1921, and the action itself was commenced by the filing of the complaint on the 11th day of July, 1919.

The causes of action of the plaintiff are set out in sixteen separate counts of the complaint. Eight of these counts are alternative (common count) forms of pleading of the several demands stated in the odd-numbered counts. The first two counts are based upon a contract of date November 22, 1915, made between plaintiff and defendant. The others consist of assigned causes of action arising out of similar contracts made between the defendant and persons other than the plaintiff.

It is alleged in the complaint that theretofore, between the 1st day of August, 1915, and the 1st day of February, 1916, the defendant was engaged in promoting the production and manufacture of a motion picture film called "Ramona," and in promoting the formation and organization of a corporation for the purpose of owning the negative of said film and exhibiting prints thereof, and effecting the sale of stock in such corporation. The contract between the plaintiff and defendant was in writing, as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., 11-12-15.

"Ramona to cost about $55,000.00.

"A limited number of investors—all to share alike. Investors to receive their money back, dollar for dollar, first out of net profit. California alone should pay investors back. Investors to receive 60 per cent. of net profit after receiving original investment back. Investors to own Ramona motion picture negative for entire world. Ramona should make a minimum profit of $400,000 in the entire world.

"Respectfully,

W. H. Clune.

"Received from A. K. Detwiler $2,500 (twenty-five hundred dollars) to be applied towards the complete making of the moving picture production Ramona. When Ramona corporation is perfected, A. K. Detwiler receives his pro rata of stock; the same being based on the amount of money herein subscribed.

"[Signed] W. H. Clune."

Generally speaking, the other contracts were made under similar circumstances and in like terms as the contract with the plaintiff. But the Crisp contract (count 15) and two of the Poole contracts (amended count 13) did not contain the closing sentence, "when Ramona corporation is perfected," etc. The effect of this omission as to those contracts will be considered later herein. The expected cost of the picture, as stated in four of the contracts, was $55,000, and in the others was stated in varying sums, running from $40,000 up to $90,000. In its findings the court determined that it was the true intent and meaning of the terms of each of these several contracts that the defendant would form and perfect a corporation, for the purpose of owning said motion picture film and the negative thereof and exhibiting prints of the same, and would cause stock in such corporation to be issued to the several persons with whom the contracts were made, proportionate to the amounts of money paid to the defendant by said investors respectively, as shown by the terms of the said several contracts.

The court further found that no part of the said several sums of money has been repaid to the plaintiff or his assignors, except certain small sums specified in the findings, and that defendant has never paid to any of said persons any part of the net profits, but no net profits of the production or exhibition of said motion picture were made or derived by defendant before this action was begun; and defendant has never caused plaintiff or any of his assignors to own any interest in the Ramona picture negative. The proposed corporation never was formed.

The court found that the plaintiff and his assignors, respectively, have sustained damages in the several stated sums set forth in the findings, and accordingly caused to be entered a judgment against the defendant for the several amounts which the plaintiff was found to be entitled to recover, viz. the unpaid balances of moneys paid to the defendant.

Concerning the demand of the plaintiff arising out of his own contract with the defendant as set out in the first and second counts of the complaint, the court held that, by reason of the effect of the judgment entered on June 4, 1918, in the above-mentioned action No. B-50316, which was pleaded by defendant as another and further defense to the plaintiff's action in the present case, the plaintiff could not recover on these counts of his complaint. Said action No. B-50316 was an action in which Detwiler as plaintiff sued Clune as defendant to enforce an attempted rescission by Detwiler of said contract of November 22, 1915. Judgment in that action having been entered in favor of the defendant Clune he pleaded the same in bar of plaintiff's demand upon his contract in this action.

We will take up these appeals in their order, giving prior consideration to the case (Civil No. 4444) in which defendant, Clune, is appellant.

[1, 2] The argument on behalf of appellant, Clune, is based chiefly upon the claim that the only obligation assumed by him in favor of Detwiler and his assignors was the obligation created by his promise that they should be repaid out of the net profits of the enterprise, and should further share in those profits, and upon the fact that there were no net profits. From these premises it is quite logically argued that the plaintiff has not established any right of recovery herein. The rule undoubtedly is, as stated by counsel, that where the performance of an agreement depends upon the happening of an event over which neither party has control, or upon the existence of a specific fund, and where the contingent event does not occur or the fund is not realized, then the obligation is discharged. And in less general terms, it must be accepted as true that in an action upon a contract providing for payment out of net profits of a venture, the complaint fails to state a cause of action unless it is alleged therein that such profits were in fact realized.

[3] Having thus maintained, at least to their own satisfaction, that no cause of action was alleged or proved in relation to the counts upon the express contracts, counsel for appellant, Clune, further contend that the plaintiff has likewise failed to establish any right of recovery upon the counts which rest in assumpsit. The contention is that, since in each instance there was a specific contract, that contract limits the measure of damages that may be recovered. Without doubt the rule is as stated. 5 Corp. Jur. "Assumpsit," § 91; Palmer v. Guillo, 224 Mass. 1, 112 N. E. 493. And if it were true that the established right of action herein is only a right to recover damages for some failure in the performance of those contracts, then it would follow that the measure of damages is limited by the amount of loss sustained by the breach. But this rule is doubtless subject to the qualification that, where, by fault of the promisor, the consideration paid to him has wholly failed, the amount so paid may be recovered.

The case for the plaintiff, as his counsel seek to maintain it, rests upon a construction of the contracts, wholly different from that of the defendant, and upon breaches of those contracts, amounting to an entire failure of the consideration upon which the money was received by defendant. It is the theory of the plaintiff that, although in the contracts as written there was no direct statement that Clune promised and agreed to form a corporation for the ownership and exhibiting of the picture film, nevertheless the language used in the contracts, when taken together with the circumstances under which the contracts were made, was sufficient to establish the interpretation of the contracts for which the plaintiff contends.

"A contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as the same is ascertainable and lawful." Civ. Code, § 1636.

"A contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates." Civ. Code, § 1647.

"If the terms of a promise are in any respect ambiguous or uncertain, it must be interpreted in the sense in which the promisor believed, at the time of making it, that the promisee understood it." Civ. Code, § 1649.

"In cases of uncertainty not removed by the preceding rules, the language of a contract should be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. The promisor is presumed to be such party." * * * Civ. Code, § 1654.

In conformity with plaintiff's theory of the action as above indicated, plaintiff in each of the several counts of the complaint in which the several written contracts were set forth, pleaded the intent and meaning of the terms of the contract as follows:

"It was the true intent and meaning of the terms of said contract, and by its terms the said defendant agreed and undertook that he would form and perfect a corporation for the purpose of owning said motion picture film and the negative thereof and exhibiting prints of the same, and would cause stock in such corporation to be issued to said (naming the investor) proportionate to the amount of money paid by said (naming the investor), as above alleged, estimated at the time of such contract at (naming the alleged proportion) of the total amount of the stock of such corporation."

[4] The findings of the court affirm the truth of these allegations of the complaint. The evidence received in support of the issues thus tendered (all of which were denied by the answer of the defendant) covers very fully the circumstances which led up to the execution of the contracts and the various transactions connected therewith. In July, 1915, defendant, Clune, had entered into an agreement with Little, Brown & Co. of Boston, publishers of the novel called "Ramona," whereby that company granted to Clune the motion picture rights appertaining to the picture (with an exception not material here), and granted to him the exclusive right, license, and privilege to make photographic reproductions of that book and the theme thereof, for the term of the copyright of such book, and with the privilege of exhibiting, licensing, and trafficking in motion pictures thereof throughout the world. Defendant also owned a studio at Los Angeles equipped for the manufacture of motion picture negatives and films. In his testimony, the defendant admitted that he intended that a corporation would be formed to handle the Ramona picture.

Proceeding under the rights thus obtained, defendant, Clune, commenced the manufacture of negatives and films of the proposed motion picture. In order to obtain some of the capital necessary for the enterprise, he undertook to obtain from various persons such sums of money as they were willing to subscribe. It was in connection with this effort to obtain capital for the stated purpose that defendant, Clune, received from the plaintiff and his assignors the several sums of money stated in the complaint, and executed the several written contracts which are set forth in the complaint.

There is evidence quite sufficient to sustain the findings to which we have referred, concerning the meaning and intention of the contracts, as understood by the parties thereto. One or two examples will suffice. In conversation with Ahmed Abdullah, one of plaintiff's assignors, defendant, Clune (so Abdullah testified), recommended to Abdullah to "buy some of this stock," stating that the picture would cost $50,000 or $55,000 at the most, and that, "as soon as the picture completed, we issue stock to the stockholders." Accordingly Abdullah invested by paying money to Clune and by receiving therefor the contract shown in the complaint. Further, Clune said to Abdullah that, if Abdullah had any friends who would buy stock, it was a good thing. Accordingly, Abdullah broached the matter to Flint, another of plaintiff's assignors. "He asked me to go and see Flint right after I bought my stock." The conditions under which the contracts were obtained, and the methods used by defendant to obtain the subscriptions, were clearly sufficient to impose upon him the responsibilities of a promoter in the formation of a proposed corporation. California-Calaveras Mining Co. v. Walls, 170 Cal. 285, 149 P. 595.

[5] The position in which defendant, Clune, placed himself, by receiving the money of the "investors" (so designated by him in the contracts, which he prepared), under the circumstances as shown by the evidence, obligated him to retain in his hands, until the formation of the proposed corporation, the property rights which were to constitute the principal assets of that corporation. It was his duty to cause the corporation to be organized within a reasonable time, and to transfer to it the motion picture films and the right to use the same, as granted to him by Little, Brown & Co.

Instead of performing these obligations, the defendant by his voluntary acts, and without consent of the "investors," made such performance impossible. He changed the plan and scope of the work so that the cost of the picture was increased far beyond the amounts of estimated costs which he had represented to the investors. He transferred the picture rights as a whole to the Clune Film Producing Company, a corporation controlled by himself, in which the plaintiff and his assignors had no interest. The Clune Film Producing Company sold and transferred, to various purchasers, territorial rights to exhibit the Ramona picture in several portions of the United States. The subsequent attempted retransfer of the property by the Clune Film Producing Company to Clune was of course not effective to restore to him the rights which had been sold to others. We need not further extend the story of the defendant's conduct in relation to this business. Not only did he make useless the formation of the corporation which he had proposed to organize, but also he made it impossible for the investors to become, in any form, owners of the property and property rights for which they had paid their money to him. By this conduct he breached his contract, and in effect abandoned any attempt to perform the same.

The defendant repaid to the "investors" certain small sums, which he called "dividends." There were not dividends to them as stockholders of a corporation, for the corporation did not exist. They were not dividends or shares in profits of the Ramona picture business, for no such profits ever were made. These payments therefore were nothing else than a partial return of money which the defendant in fact owed, and of which he should have repaid all.

[6] The defendant did make a belated offer to the plaintiff to form a corporation with a capital stock of $100,000, in $1 shares, and cause to be issued to plaintiff 2,500 shares. Under the conditions which then existed, this would not have been at all in compliance with the written agreement; nor would it have been of any value to the plaintiff, since the corporation would not have acquired the property which it was to have owned. It was, we conclude, clearly established that there was a total failure of the consideration upon which plaintiff and his assignors paid the several sums paid by them to the plaintiff.

"In such a case, the law raises a promise on the part of the receiver of the money that he will pay it to the person entitled thereto, and that, too, without any previous request." Mathony v. Standard Gas Engine Co., 187 Cal. 399, 405, 202 P. 146, 149; Gray v. Ellis, 164 Cal. 481, 129 P. 791.

As has been noted above, the Crisp contract and two of the Poole contracts did not contain the sentence beginning, "When Ramona corporation is perfected," etc. Let it be assumed, therefore, that in those contracts there was no agreement to form a corporation. It remains true, however, that Crisp and Poole, as "investors," were to own an interest in the moving picture production Ramona, no different in its nature from the interest therein of the other investors. As to all of these investors, it was equally true that they received no consideration for the money paid by them.

We pass now to Civil No. 4316, the appeal of the plaintiff. As a separate defense to this action, the defendant alleged "that, on or about the 26th day of February, 1917, the said plaintiff served upon the defendant a notice of rescission of said contract set out in paragraph 1 of the first cause of action in said complaint, and that thereafter, to wit, on the 3d day of May, 1917, the said plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, wherein A. K. Detwiler was plaintiff and W. H. Clune was defendant, being action No. B-50316, to enforce the said rescission of said contract; that thereafter said action was tried before said superior court and, after a trial thereof, judgment was duly entered therein on the 4th day of June, 1918, in favor of the defendant and against said plaintiff, which judgment was never appealed from, and the defendant pleads the judgment rendered in said action in bar of the further prosecution of this action by the said plaintiff." Upon the issue thus tendered, the court made the following finding:

"But, by reason of the effect of the judgment entered on June 4, 1918, in the former action between plaintiff and defendant, No. B-50316, pleaded by defendant as another and further defense to the plaintiff's action in the present case, the particulars of which judgment are hereinafter more fully found, the defendant is not now indebted, and was not indebted at the beginning of this action, to the plaintiff in the sum of $2,125, or any other sum, because of the matters hereinabove found or any of them, nor for money had or received by defendant on the 15th day of July, 1917, or at any other time, to the use or for the benefit of the plaintiff."

The court further found as follows:

"Upon the matter pleaded in said answer touching the effect of the judgment in the former action of A. K. Detwiler, Plaintiff, v. W. H. Clune, Defendant, No. B-50316, in the register of the clerk of this court, the court finds as follows: On or about the 2d day of March, 1917, the plaintiff in the present action served upon the defendant in the present action a notice of rescission of the contract set out in the first cause of action in the present complaint—the contract of date November 22, 1915, between defendant and plaintiff—and afterwards, to wit on the 3d day of May, 1917, said plaintiff commenced said action No. B-50316 in this court, wherein he (said A. K. Detwiler) was plaintiff and said W. H. Clune was defendant, to enforce the said rescission of said contract. Thereafter said action was tried before said superior court, and, after a trial thereof, judgment was duly entered therein on the 4th day of June, 1918, in favor of the defendant and against said plaintiff, which judgment has never been appealed from, and such judgment is a bar to the prosecution of the present action on the matters stated in the alleged first count or cause of action, and also the matters stated in the alleged second count or cause of action in the plaintiff's complaint in the present action, which counts respectively purport to allege causes of action in favor of plaintiff arising out of transactions had by him personally with the defendant; but such bar does not extend to or affect the plaintiff's other causes of action alleged in his pleadings here, wherein he sues as the assignee of other persons."

At the trial of this action, the defendant offered in evidence the judgment roll in said action B-50316. To this offer objections were made by the plaintiff, which objections were overruled, and the judgment roll (except certain omitted portions which both parties agreed were immaterial in the present case) was received in evidence. The plaintiff's objections were:

"That there is no sufficient plea here of a former adjudication—no special plea, that is, to justify the production or the introduction of the evidence. * * * There is no showing at all in this answer of any identity of issues. The mere fact that there was an action for rescission of the contract is no proof at all that issues were made or determined in that case, which are material to the present action.

"It appears here from the findings and decision offered in evidence, signed on the 29th day of May, 1918, 'that the written contract set out in the answer and in these findings is still in full force and effect, and that the plaintiff is entitled to take nothing by his said action'; that is, his action for rescission. We claim that a judgment which denied a rescission does not work an estoppel in the present case on any issue.

"It appears from the documents offered that the suit proceeded for rescission on the ground of alleged fraud by defendant in inducing the plaintiff in that suit, by false representations, to enter into it (the contract); and fraud is not the basis of the present action at all.

"That the judgment roll offered in evidence is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, constitutes no defense to the present action; that if there are any issues in the present case which are claimed by defendant here to have been involved in that trial and determined in that case, the issues are not specified in his plea."

In its conclusions of law in the present action the court determined that, "by reason of the bar of the judgment in the former action of Detwiler v. Clune, No. B-50316, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything because of the matters alleged in the first and second counts or causes of action, respectively, alleged in his complaint." The judgment followed this "conclusion of law." It is from this part of the judgment that the plaintiff appeals.

In the former action, B-50316, the plaintiff sought to obtain a decree to enforce an attempted rescission by him of the same contract which is the subject of the first and second counts of the complaint in the present action. Plaintiff sought to rescind upon the ground that the defendant had obtained plaintiff's subscription and money by means of sundry promises and representations, of which certain of the representations of fact were false, and by the defendant well known to be false, and that the representations and promises were made for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the plaintiff, and without any intention of the defendant to complete or perform the said promises. A total failure of performance by defendant was alleged. The plaintiff sought to obtain a decree declaring the contract canceled and rescinded, and further to recover judgment against the defendant for the sum of $2,500 subscribed and paid by him, etc. The answer of the defendant in that action, while admitting the making of the contract and the payment of the money by the defendant, denied very fully the allegations which constituted the gist of the action in relation to the right of rescission. There was also a plea of laches in serving the notice of rescission and also in relation to the time of commencement of the action to enforce the same. Pursuant to its decision in favor of the defendant upon those issues (including the defense of laches), the court as conclusions of law therefrom determined "that the written contract set out in the answer and in these findings is still in full force and effect, and the plaintiff is entitled to take nothing by his said action." Thereupon judgment was entered that the plaintiff take nothing and that the defendant recover his costs.

Appellant, Detwiler, contends that the court erred in overruling his objections to the judgment roll in action B-50316 when offered as evidence in this action; that the difference in the nature of the two actions is such that the judgment rendered in the first action could not constitute a bar to the second action; that as to any matters of estoppel created by reason of the decision and judgment in the former case, such matters of estoppel were not pleaded herein by the defendant in such manner as to entitle him to make proof thereof.

[7] There is a clear difference between the effect of a judgment as a bar to a subsequent action of an identical nature, and the effect of a decision upon issues in controversy when such decision is pleaded, not as a bar to a subsequent action of an identical nature, but only as an estoppel against further litigation of those issues.

"In the application of the doctrine of res judicata there is sometimes a distinction to be made concerning the effect of the judgment in a former action. Thus (1) a former judgment may be conclusive evidence that no cause of action exists—that is to say, it may be offered, not as estoppel to proof of any fact, but as proof of the nonexistence of a cause of action at all—or (2) treated from the standpoint of its use as a piece of evidence, it may be produced when specifically pleaded as an estoppel, as was done in the instant case, as evidence of some material fact in the cause of action on trial, the truth of which both parties are estopped from denying. In the latter case the judgment gives an indefinite life and irrebuttable probative force to any fact found by the judgment to be true. The latter is the effect produced when the controversy is again raised in another suit upon a different cause of action." Estate of Clark, 190 Cal. 354, 361, 212 P. 622, 625.

"We should perhaps, in this connection, call attention to the distinction between a judgment operating by way of estoppel in a later action upon a different cause of action and one operating by way of bar against a second action upon the same cause of action. If in this case the other action had been upon the same cause of action as the present—that is, had been an action to abate the defendant's obstructions—a judgment for the defendant upon the merits would have been a bar to a second action for the same purpose, regardless of what different or various issues may or may not have been presented. But, as we are given to understand, the other action was not the same as the present. The judgment in it can therefore not operate as a bar to the present action, but at most only as a judicial determination binding upon the parties of issues again involved between them. In order that it may so operate, it must of necessity appear that it did in fact determine those issues." Horton v. Goodenough, 184 Cal. 451, 461, 194 P. 34, 38.

[8] In the case at bar it appears that the former action was pleaded generally as in bar of the present action, and was so considered and sustained by the superior court (as to counts 1 and 2 of the complaint herein), in its decision in this action. Having in mind the distinctions noted in the next preceding paragraph, it is necessary to determine whether the cause of action in the action No. B-50316 was the same as the causes of action against which it has been interposed in the case at bar. Of course, in finding our answer to the question, the fact that one action was called an action to declare and enforce a rescission of the contract, while the other is nominally an action for damages, or nominally for recovery of money paid upon a consideration which has failed, is not a fact of very much importance. The gist, or gravamen, or substance (as variously we may try to designate the thought), of the several causes of action, must be ascertained and compared.

In the former action the right which the plaintiff sought to enforce was the right to have entered a decree of a court of equity, establishing the ultimate fact that for good and sufficient reasons the plaintiff had rescinded and put an end to the contract. And, by way of further relief, he sought to compel repayment of his money. Primarily the right so claimed was based upon grounds which, if sufficient, would have nullified the contract as one voidable from its beginning. Appellant, Detwiler, now argues, in effect, that the alleged existence of fraud in the inception of the contract, whereby the contract was, at the election of the plaintiff, subject to annulment, constituted the entire substance of that action. But there was something more. A party to a contract may also rescind for failure of consideration, "if such consideration, before it is rendered to him, fails in a material respect, from any cause." Civ. Code, § 1689. In action B-50316 the plaintiff relied upon this failure of consideration, and alleged facts showing the same, although he did also allege and rely upon the alleged fraudulent conduct and purpose of the defendant. Upon the issues thus presented, the court might have affirmed the plaintiff's right of rescission, even though at the same time the charges of fraud were not sustained. The court had power to grant to the plaintiff "any relief consistent with the case made, by the complaint and embraced within the issue." Code Civ. Proc. § 580. In that action, however—as inspection of the judgment roll very plainly shows—the court found against the plaintiff, not only upon the charges of fraudulent representations and the charges of promises made by defendant "without any intention upon his part to keep or perform the same." The court also found in favor of the defendant upon the principal issues relating to the demands of plaintiff which rested upon the alleged failure of consideration. Placing its decision upon all of these grounds, the court determined that the written contract was "still in full force and effect," and adjudged that the plaintiff take nothing.

The judgment in that action having thus determined that the contract remained in force, it follows that Detwiler could maintain an action to recover damages, if any such accrued to him by reason of breaches occurring subsequent to the date of that judgment. The present action, however, is not an action to recover on account of any such subsequent breaches of the contract. The plaintiff here seeks to recover, on the ground of failure of consideration, the money paid by him. But, as we have seen, that failure of consideration, assuming that it occurred as found by the court from the testimony received in this action, is the same failure of consideration alleged in the former action, the existence of which is negated by the decision and judgment in that action. We conclude that the court did not err in overruling the objections to the judgment roll as evidence, or in holding that the plaintiff's right of action herein, as to said counts 1 and 2, is barred by the former judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

to pay any premium due under this policy, the mortgagee shall on demand pay the same," held not covenant which would require payment by mortgagee in action by insurer's assignee after insured failed to pay, in absence of express or implied promise.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Sydney L. Schmitt against Walter A. Gripton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. Walton Brown and Leet W. Bissell, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edward J. Jose, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An action to recover the earned premiums upon certain policies of fire insurance from the mortgagee of the insured property.

The court found, in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, that three policies of insurance were executed and delivered by respondent's assignors to California Lumber Products Company, a corporation, insuring property owned by the latter in Mendocino county against loss by fire; that at the special instance and request of appellant there was attached to each a clause providing that any loss within the terms of the policy should be payable to the mortgagee, and that it was further provided therein that, should the corporation neglect to pay any premium on such policy the mortgagee would on demand pay the same; that the insured failed to pay; that demand was made therefor upon the mortgagee, and, upon his refusal, the policies were canceled.

Upon the findings, judgment for the aggregate amount of the earned premiums was entered against the mortgagee, and the appeal was taken by him therefrom.

The clause attached to each policy was the standard form of mortgage clause, the material portions of which are as follows:

"Standard Forms Bureau Form 371 (May, 1923).

"Mortgage Clause With Full Contribution.

"(Only for Policies Covering Buildings.)

"Loss or damage, if any, under this policy, on buildings only, shall be payable to Walter A. Gripton, mortgagee (or trustee), whose mail address is —, as interest may appear. Subject to all the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth in this rider, this insurance, as to the interest of the mortgagee only therein, shall not be invalidated by any act or neglect of the mortgagee or owner of the within described property, nor by any foreclosure or other proceedings or notice of sale relating to the property, nor by any change in the title or ownership of the property, nor by the occupation of the premises for purposes more hazardous than are permitted by this policy.

SCHMITT v. GRIPTON. (Civ. 5355.)

1. Insurance —146(3).

Provision in fire policy for payment of premiums by mortgagee of insured property will be construed most strongly against insurers.

2. Insurance —182—Provision for payment of premiums by mortgagee of insured property, contained in "condition one" of fire policy, held not to be covenant to pay.

Clause attached to fire policy, "Condition one —in case the mortgagee or owner shall neglect

Appellant urges as the ground for his appeal that the paragraph of the mortgage clause, designated therein as "condition one," should not be construed as a covenant on his part to pay the premiums, but as a condition which, if not complied with, would prevent recovery by him under the preceding provisions thereof.

In the few cases wherein similar clauses have been considered, the word "provided" was used where in the instant case the word "condition" appears, the decisions following the determination from the use of the word in connection with the provision that, "in case the mortgagor or owner shall neglect to pay any premium due under this policy, the mortgagee (or trustee) shall on demand pay the same," whether a condition or a covenant should be implied.

In St. Paul Fire, etc., Ins. Co. v. Upton, 2 N. D. 229, 50 N. W. 702, the clause mentioned was construed as an absolute agreement to pay the premiums; while in the later cases of Home Ins. Co. v. Union Trust Co., 40 R. I. 367, 100 A. 1010, L. R. A. 1917F, 375, and Coykendall v. Blackmer, 161 App. Div. 11, 146 N. Y. S. 631, the same clause being under consideration, it was held that a condition and not a covenant was thereby created; and such was the view of the author of the opinion in Johnson, Sansom & Co. v. Fort Worth State Bank (Tex. Civ. App.) 244 S. W. 657, the question, however, not being decided in the latter case.

In Boston Safe Dep. & Trust Co. v. Thomas, 59 Kan. 470, 53 P. 472, the case principally relied upon by respondent, and which was distinguished upon its facts in the two cases last cited, the facts were that the agent of the mortgagee negotiated for the insurance and the mortgage clauses were attached at his request; these circumstances being considered by the court in construing the clause in question.

In Home Ins. Co. v. Union Trust Co., supra, the court said:

"There is nothing in the context of this instrument which requires a construction of this clause as a covenant. The parties have used the technical word 'provided,' to which the courts in numerous cases have applied a certain well-known construction. The mortgage clause in question is in the standard form, and presumably was carefully worded by experienced lawyers who were familiar with the customary legal construction of the word. Had the intention been that the word 'provided,' as used in this clause, should not be given its primary legal meaning and effect, but that the clause should be construed as a covenant rather than a condition, any possible ambiguity could easily have been removed by the addition of a few words such as 'and it is agreed' or any similar phrase."

[1, 2] The language of the clause is to be construed most strongly against the insurers (26 Corp. Jur. "Fire Insurance," 72; Welch v. British American Assurance Co., 148 Cal. 223, 82 P. 964, 113 Am. St. Rep. 223, 7 Ann. Cas. 396; Pacific Heating, etc., Co. v. Williams- burgh, etc., Ins. Co., 158 Cal. 367, 111 P. 4; Greer-Robbins Co. v. Insurance Co. of State of Pennsylvania, 47 Cal. App. 63, 190 P. 187); and, if the word "provided" as used in the policies considered in St. Paul Fire Ins. Co. v. Upton and Boston Safe Dep. & Trust Co. v. Thomas, supra, might in the connection stated be held to be equivocal, and that a condition was not thereby expressed with certainty, the use of the word "condition" in the same connection fairly removed the ambiguity and clearly expressed the intention that the clause should be construed in the sense which the word implies, namely, as a condition, and not a covenant. While the court found that the mortgage clauses in the instant case were attached at the request of appellant, the evidence shows that, according to his agreement with the mortgagor, the latter was to procure insurance upon the mortgaged property, the loss to be payable to the former as further security; that the policies were procured through the agency of a broker, who, at the invitation of appellant's attorney, met at the latter's office in San Francisco the manager of the corporation mortgagor, at which conference the attorney was present. The broker was then advised as to the amount of insurance and the form of the policies required. Thereafter the persons mentioned, with an agent for one of the insurers, visited the property, following which the policies were issued to the broker and delivered to the attorney. Through an oversight on the part of the broker the mortgage clauses were not then attached, but were by him, at the request of the attorney, procured; these with the policies being subsequently delivered to the appellant in accordance with the original agreement with the insured. Had an ambiguity appeared in the expression of the intention of the parties in the mortgage clauses, this evidence, which supports the finding mentioned, would have been relevant for the purpose of ascertaining such intention; but where, as here, the intention is expressed with certainty, the circumstances shown and the finding were immaterial. Salter v. Ives, 171 Cal. 790, 792, 155 P. 84.

In Colby v. Thompson, 16 Colo. App. 271, 64 P. 1053, cited and relied upon by respondent, a mortgagee, in consideration of the renewal of certain policies insuring the mortgaged property, agreed unconditionally to pay the premiums. In the instant case such facts do not appear. There were procured by the broker, as testified by him, two extensions of the time for the payment of the premiums, the first upon his representation that payment would be made (for which no authority from appellant was shown), and the second following the request that appellant make such payment. The latter request followed the voluntary bankruptcy of the insured, at which time appellant had taken possession of the mortgaged property under the terms of his mortgage, the appellant in reply thereto stating that the property might be taken over by others, in which event, as testified by the broker, "he would try to turn the policies to whatever interests might take over the plant." No other or further promise was shown, and it is not contended that the extensions were otherwise induced or that appellant failed in any respect to perform.

It being our conclusion that the clause mentioned should be construed as a condition, and that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding that the mortgagee, after the issuance of the policies and the attachment thereto of the mortgage clauses, expressly or impliedly promised to pay the premiums, the judgment is reversed.

Force or violence is necessary element of robbery, and distinguishes it from larceny.

3. Insurance — 425.

Where assured, while moving through a crowd, felt a hand against her chest as it grabbed her bar pin, but did not see the hand or any suspicious move, and looked on floor and her dress for pin, held loss was within exception to highway robbery policy, excepting from protection property disappearing without knowledge at the time of the assured.

Craig, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action to recover under a policy of burglary insurance by H. H. Anderson and wife against the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, a corporation. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jud R. Rush and William B. Beirne, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

George L. Greer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action to recover under a policy of insurance. Judgment went for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

[1, 2] The policy which respondent issued to appellants insured them, originally, against the direct loss of certain specified property "by burglary, theft, or larceny * * * by its felonious abstractions from within" the place of residence of the assured. Later the protection of the policy was by a rider "extended to cover loss from highway robbery by force or violence" of certain property "from the person of any one insured under this rider while wearing or carrying the same anywhere in the United States or Canada." The rider also contained this language:

"Mere disappearance of property from the person of the assured, unless accompanied by force or violence and unless also within his or her knowledge at the time, is not a risk covered by this rider, and it is not intended hereby to cover pocket picking."

The manner in which the loss occurred out of which this action arose is shown by a stipulation that was entered into at the trial and by the findings of fact which were based upon it. Omitting immaterial or undisputed matters, the stipulation and findings recite:

"That * * * Claire Anderson * * * was the owner of a diamond bar pin, * * * and * * * she was a guest on the battleship Texas, then at anchor in the outer harbor of San Pedro, inside of the breakwater. That at about the hour of 2 o'clock, a. m., Claire Anderson was trying to get to the officers' quarters * * * for the purpose of securing a fur cape, it being checked there while she was attending the seventh anniversary of the ship. This anniversary was attended by perhaps from 2,000 to 5,000 people. There was a crush as people tried to get to the dressing rooms, and she was forcing or working her way through as fast as possible. She distinctly felt a hand against her chest as it grabbed her bar pin. The hand was there just an instant. She did not see the hand or any suspicious move of any one but at once looked down to see her pin. It was gone. She looked on the floor and on her dress, but it was not there. People were moving past her in both directions, and no one made any unusual or suspicious move. * * * The pin was on her dress at the time she felt the hand as described above. The pin and hinge were still upon her dress after the occurrence described. The valuable part, consisting of the filigree and diamond, was snapped or broken off, and the dress to which it was fastened was torn for about three-quarters of an inch."

There is no question that the ornament which was thus lost was included in the property which was protected against loss by the policy. There is also no question but that appellants must recover under the terms of the rider if at all. Our first concern, then, is to ascertain the meaning of the term "highway robbery," as employed in the rider. Some question may exist as to whether the force exerted in removing the bar pin from Mrs. Anderson's person was of such a nature as to translate the act of purloining it into the crime of robbery. We shall neither discuss nor decide that question. We shall assume as a starting point that the act was robbery. But the rider did not insure against robbery. The protection afforded by it was against highway robbery. What did the parties contemplate when they employed that expression in their contract? The use of the two words together indicates that the assured were to be protected against something different from mere robbery. In a grammatical sense the word "highway" plainly qualifies the word "robbery." In a legal sense, to what extent does the limitation operate? What is highway robbery?

The expression is not known to the Penal Code of this state, nor, so far as we can discover, has it been made the subject anywhere of legislative or judicial definition which fits the facts here presented. Certainly it has never been defined by the courts of California. The phrase, however, is in constant use throughout the English-speaking world. We must commence with the view that it was employed by the present parties in the sense in which it is so generally used. What is that sense? There was a time in the British Isles, the early clearing house of English linguistic development, and even in the most populous portions of them, when the roadside robber haunted every land thoroughfare. The country was badly policed and worse lighted, and it was even unsafe to venture at night upon city streets unarmed. In truth, the "quality" seldom fared forth after nightfall, even in densely populated centers, without an armed guard. The highwayman was a creature of the lanes, byways, and roads. Moreover, his activities were so frequent and his exploits so daring that he was the public enemy. Gibbets were maintained at important crossroads, and upon them robbers were summarily hanged. Their corpses were allowed to swing until their bleached skeletons became dismembered under the action of winds and rain, because of the example thus furnished. It is no exaggeration to say that the land was filled with the clanking of chains and the swaying of bodies which were suspended from them. It is impossible now to understand fully the conditions which then prevailed, but they contributed a striking feature to the annals of Great Britain, they furnished a dominant element in the growth of English criminal law, and they have colored with a carmine hue the literature of every English-speaking people. It is proper first to enter the domain of history, for out of that has emerged the influences which have operated under the conditions above depicted. The terrors of highway robbery menaced the population of England during a long period of time. In a chapter devoted to social conditions between the years 1200 and 1400 Aubrey says:

"The traveling was attended with many inconveniences, and was often dangerous as well as difficult. Traders could not venture through England with their merchandise, unless attended by a large armed escort. Persons formed themselves into caravans for mutual protection when about to undertake a long journey, or to cross a forest or a heath. The perils were greater to that numerous class who had to travel on foot, and who could not always insure reaching a place where lodgings might be found. Not only were there dangers from bandits and outlaws, but knights, landed gentry, and noblemen connived at their dependants practising highway robbery, and shared in the plunder."

Macaulay, dealing with conditions following the Peace of Ryswick, which was concluded in 1697, sets down the following graphic recital:

"The peace had, all over Europe, and nowhere more than in England, turned crowds of old soldiers into marauders. Several aristocratical equipages had been attacked even in Hyde Park. Every newspaper contained stories of travelers stripped, bound, and flung into ditches. One day the Bristol mail was robbed; another day, the Dover coach; then the Norwich wagon. On Hounslow Heath, a company of horsemen, with masks on their faces, waited for the great people who had been to pay their court to the King at Windsor. Lord Ossulston escaped with the loss of two horses. The Duke of Saint Albans, with the help of his servants, beat off the assailants. His brother, the Duke of Northumberland, less strongly guarded, fell into their hands. They succeeded in stopping 30 or 40 coaches, and rode off with a great booty in guineas, watches, and jewelry. Nowhere, however, does the peril seem to have been so great as on the Newmarket road. There, indeed, robbery was organized on a scale unparalleled in the kingdom since the days of Robin Hood and Little John. A fraternity of plunderers, 30 in number according to the lowest estimate, squatted, near Waltham Cross, under the shades of Epping Forest, and built themselves huts, from which they sallied forth with sword and pistol to bid passengers stand."

In a note to the first sentence of this text, the great historian says:

"George Psalmanazar's account of the state of the south of France at this time is curious. On the high road near Lyons he frequently passed corpses fastened to posts. 'These,' he says, 'were the bodies of highwaymen, or rather of soldiers, sailors, mariners, and even galley slaves, disbanded after the peace of Reswick, who, having neither home nor occupation, used to infest the roads in troops, plunder towns and villages, and, when taken, were hanged at the county town by dozens, or even scores sometimes, after which their bodies were thus exposed along the highway in terrorem.'"

The "Fortnightly Review" makes this statement as to conditions existing as late as the period 1780-1786:

"Even a walk or drive to Kensington or Chelsea, both country villages at that time, was not undertaken without fear of highwaymen or footpads."

When we enter the realm of the law, it is not surprising that the effect of these startling aberrations from a regulated state of society becomes manifest. Under the English law, from an early period, robbery on the king's highway was distinguished from other forms of crime. It was punished capitally and the offender was denied the benefit of clergy. 4 Bl. Comm. 243, 373. Without going to sources, an interesting statement upon the subject of highway robbery, as contemplated by the English law, is found in the arguments of counsel and in the opinion in State v. Johnson, 61 N. C. 140. In that case the defendant was charged under a statute which prescribed the death penalty for robbery perpetrated in or near a public highway. The evidence showed that the victim of the crime which was sought to be punished in the case was assaulted and robbed while walking along a railroad track. It was said in the course of the brief filed on behalf of the defendant:

"Highway robbery insidiatio viarum was excluded from clergy at common law previously to Statute 25, Edw. III, Pro clero; 4 Bl. 373; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 675; 2 Hale, 333. The statute Pro clero gave clergy for any treasons or felonies not touching the king himself or his royal majesty. Yet a construction prevailed after this that insidiatores viarum might be denied it (Hale & Haw. ubi supra); the reason assigned being that it was a sort of hostile act and bordered upon treason. 4 Bl. 373; 1 Ch. Cr. L. 675. Upon complaint of this to Parliament, the Stat. 4, H. IV, c. 2, granted it to them. The reason above grew out of the fact that the king had a right of passage for himself and for all his subjects. Comyn, Chemin (A, 2) p. 27. Where highways are unsafe, the whole country is in peril. The policy of this security applies only to places where every citizen has a right to pass and repass at pleasure, particularly to such upon which every man is sometimes compelled to be, and to transport articles of value, and expose such at lonely places; at the same time that the robber himself cannot be excluded from being thereupon, having the right to pass and repass as well as others, and being under the protection of the sovereign in the enjoyment of his right."

The following appears in the opinion of the court:

"The benefit of clergy is taken from the offense of robbing any person in or near any public highway. Statutes Hen. VIII. and Ed. VI. re-enacted, Rev. Stat., c. 34, § 1, and also re-enacted, Rev. Code, c. 34, § 2, in connection with section 22. These statutes, from the earliest time, have received a uniform construction, by which it is held that, although, at the date of the passage of the original acts, there were three sorts of public highways—one called 'iter,' over which the people passed on foot; another called 'actus,' over which they passed on foot or on horseback; and a third called 'via,' over which they passed on foot or horseback, or in vehicles with wheels (Coke Lit., 56, a, b)—and, although the statutes use the words 'public highway,' still they do not embrace any but the last kind, the 'via,' or, by way of pre-eminence, the highway. 1 Hale, 535, Id. 333; 2 Hawk. 476; 4 Blackstone, 373. For it was considered that the mischief intended to be remedied existed in a special degree in regard to the 'via,' or highway of most importance; that is, those over which all of the King's subjects, were at liberty to pass and repass on foot, on horseback, and in carriages; and it was resolved by the judges that a statute so highly penal, and affecting human life, should be confined to the most important kind, and could not, by construction, be made to include the two other kinds, notwithstanding the mischief in some degree extended to them."

Upon this reasoning the court determined that a railway was not a highway within the meaning of the North Carolina statute. This final result is not stated for the purpose of showing that the unknown person who relieved Mrs. Anderson of her brooch, under the facts in the present case, was not a highway robber, but in pursuit of our endeavor to ascertain the accepted meaning of the term "highway robbery." The import of that expression under the English criminal law is determinable in some degree from an inspection of modern lexicons. A part of the matter under the word "highway" in the Standard Dictionary reads:

"In English history, highway designated the main public road, which was the subject of special royal enactments controlling the policing thereof; it was properly known as the king's highway."

It is said in Webster, under the word "highway":

"Originally, highway designated a chief or principal way, which, being traveled by the public in general, was, early in English history, brought under the protection of the king's peace."

When we turn to English literature, and especially to those works of fiction which are based on historic fact, what a broad foundation is found upon which has been built a popular understanding of the expression "highway robbery"! The activities of the roadside robber furnish one of the most persistent themes in British story. Who that has read English fiction—and even the pages of history from which the English novelist has taken his facts—has not heard of Dick Turpin, Jack Sheppard, and Robin Hood? Scott's novels are full of the exploits of the highwayman. "Rob Roy" deals with the theme. Dickens has not neglected it, as witness "A Tale of Two Cities." Bulwer is crowded with it, one instance being "The Last of the Barons." R. D. Blackmore's great novel, "Lorna Doone," is practically based upon it. The same strain stands forth prominently in Jeffery Farnol's delightful latter-day novel, "The Broad Highway." One of Lord Dunsany's sketches, printed in the collection which carries the name, "The Sword of Welleran," deals with the same theme. Nearly all of these romantic tales depict graphically the manner in which the highway robber did his work, and several of them paint the picture of his summary punishment upon the gibbets of the roadside—a picture different only in degree from that painted by Psalmanazar in his account of conditions in France following the Peace of Ryswick. And the few tales mentioned are but a minor fraction of the vast number which load the shelves of English and American libraries.

In our quest it is not amiss to turn to the modern lexicographer. The Encyclopedic Dictionary disposes of the term "highway robber" thus: "The same as highwayman." Highway robbery is defined in that work as: "Robbery committed on or near the public highway." The definition of "highway robber" as given in the work calls for the accompanying definitional rendition of "highwayman." It is: "One who robs passengers on the public highway; a highway robber." Neither "highway robber" nor "highway robbery" is defined in any of the other dictionaries which lie before us. March's Thesaurus Dictionary thus defines "highwayman": "A robber who plunders on public roads." The Standard Dictionary renders the same word thus: "One who practices, commits, or attempts to commit highway robbery; one who robs in public places, or lurks for the purpose of robbery." Webster defines "highwayman": "One who robs on the public road; a highway robber." The Century Dictionary gives this definition of that word: "A robber on the highway; one who robs passengers in public roads or places."

We may now safely state the mental picture formed by the composite citizen—and it is his view that we endeavor to ascertain—when he reads or hears of a highway robber or a highwayman. What does he see? There can be no doubt of the answer. History, literature, tradition, and conversation based upon them, have given him a definite conception of the two terms, for, in truth, the two are one. He sees a determined individual, whether masked or unmasked, who appears before the wayfarer with pointed weapon or uplifted bludgeon and rifles the pockets of his victim. He sees no secret plunderer, no sneak thief, no pickpocket. He could see no highway robber, no highwayman, in the individual who despoiled Mrs. Anderson of her treasured bar pin. If we grant that the crime through which she suffered was robbery, under the technical rules of the criminal law, we are convinced that it was not highway robbery within the meaning of the insurance policy before us.

We are not concerned, in reaching this conclusion, with the question whether the waters of San Pedro harbor or the decks of the battleship Texas are a highway in the sense that a highway robbery might have been committed upon them. Such a question would have arisen if Mrs. Anderson's despoiler had made her the victim of a "holdup" in some dark and secluded spot upon the decks of the ship—if he had boldly confronted her, put her in terror, and by such a means had deprived her of her property. Even under such circumstances a respectable brief could have been written in derogation of the right of appellants to recover under the policy. Under the actual circumstances of the case, the necessity for such a brief does not exist.

If we admit, for the sake of argument, in approaching a new angle of the case, that there is doubt as to the general meaning we have ascribed to the expression "highway robbery," there is yet an objection to the right of appellants to recover. There is enough in the rider attached to the policy to show that the parties intended the term as employed in their contract to have some such meaning, as we, in an attempt to ascertain its usual import, have fastened upon it. By the terms of the rider appellants were insured against "highway robbery by force and violence." In the commission of every robbery either force is exerted or violence is committed. These are necessary elements of the crime, and they distinguish it from larceny. They are therefore embraced within the meaning of the word "robbery." Here, however, the words "force" and "violence" are expressed accompaniments to the word "robbery." Would it not be a curb upon the intention of the parties to determine that by the addition of the accompanying words they intended merely a reference to the slight degree of force which, under some of the decided cases, will serve to raise the crime of larceny to that of robbery, and which is implied in the latter word itself? Under some of the cases, undoubtedly, and considering now only the crime of robbery and not what the parties here have called highway robbery, the tearing of Mrs. Anderson's dress and the separating of the "valuable part" of the brooch from the pin which held it, would constitute a sufficient force to make the crime a robbery. We think the parties meant much beyond that by the employment of the expression "with force and violence." And there is more in the rider to indicate that they did. We have seen that it contained this negative provision:

"Mere disappearance of property from the person of the assured, unless accompanied by force or violence and unless also within his or her knowledge at the time, is not a risk covered by this rider."

In the pursuit of our present purpose this language does not require dissection. To us it seems plain as it stands. When added to the phrase "with force and violence," where that expression is inserted after the words "highway robbery," it appears to us to show that the parties intended the latter term in their contract to have the meaning we have ascribed to it as a result of our search for the sense in which it is generally accepted. The parties intended that there should be no recovery under the rider unless one of the assured was the victim of a "holdup" and thereby lost an article described in the rider.

[3] There is, however, one clause of the rider which requires a more minute consideration. Appellants were not insured unless a loss suffered by one of them was "within his or her knowledge at the time." This language plainly imports a knowledge of loss at the time—that is, at the very moment—of the robbery which occasioned it. The clause has already operated strongly as an aid to our determination that the rider insured appellants only against “holdups.” But let us now investigate more narrowly the question whether Mrs. Anderson knew “at the time” of the robbery that she had been despoiled of her brooch. According to the findings of the trial court, based upon the stipulation between the parties:

“She distinctly felt a hand against her chest as it grabbed her bar pin. The hand was there just an instant. She did not see the hand or any suspicious move of any one, but at once looked down to see her pin. It was gone. She looked on the floor and on her dress, but it was not there.”

The only part of the finding which tends in any degree to warrant a recovery under the policy is the recital—for it is nothing more—“as it [the hand] grabbed her bar pin.” There is here no showing that she was conscious that any hand had “grabbed” the pin and had actually asported it, or even that she was conscious that it had been “grabbed” at all. The recital, too, must be considered with the context of the portion of the finding in which it occurs. So considered, the strongest view that can be taken of the finding is that it shows that Mrs. Anderson suspected that an attempt had been made to rob her. What is there in the finding to limit it to that potency, granting that it is so strong? The victim of the crime, after she felt the hand on her chest, looked down to see her brooch. She looked on the floor and on her dress, but it was not there. There is no finding that she knew, until after she endeavored to find the brooch, that her dress had been torn or that the pin had been broken from the valuable part of the ornament. There was plainly an expectation or hope on her part that she would find the ornament either on her person or on the ship's deck. She therefore, we repeat, merely suspected that an attempt had been made to rob her. Surely there was here no “disappearance” of the brooch which was “within * * * her knowledge at the time” when it was taken. This circumstance alone precludes a recovery in this action.

We do not find it necessary here to consider specially the portion of the negative clause of the rider to the effect that the policy was not intended “to cover pocket picking.” The authorities upon the question whether the despoiler who filched Mrs. Anderson's brooch was a mere pickpocket are at variance. We do not feel compelled to attempt to reconcile or to distinguish them.

The negative clause of the rider furnishes an aid to the construction of the policy which we have not yet mentioned. The policy as originally issued appears to have protected the assured against all forms of larceny and robbery occurring within their household. If it be argued from this that the rider should be construed in such a manner as to protect the parties to the same extent when abroad “anywhere in the United States and Canada,” the argument falls to the ground upon a mere perusal of the negative clause mentioned. It plainly shows that the protection of the rider was not afforded as to all classes of robbery. It is more than plain from all that we have said that the rider covered no kind of larceny. Judgment affirmed.

I concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.

CRAIG, J. I dissent. The important facts in this action are that the plaintiff was robbed of a diamond taken from a pin which she was wearing while on board the battleship Texas, then anchored in the Los Angeles harbor. It was stipulated that she “distinctly felt a person's hand grasp the pin.” Recovery is sought upon a contract of insurance; the body of the policy is one insuring against burglary of the assured's dwelling, and a rider attached thereto purports to further protect from “loss from highway robbery by force or violence.” The pin was fastened to the waist worn by the assured, and the robber separated the diamond from the clasp, leaving the latter attached to the waist. It was also provided in the rider that “mere disappearance of property from the person of the assured, unless accompanied by force or violence, and unless also within his or her knowledge at the time, is not a risk covered by this rider.”

Upon the theory maintained by the respondent, because of the fact that the robbery was committed on the Texas, it was not highway robbery, and therefore the loss was not covered by the policy. The taking of the diamond constituted robbery. Pen. Code § 311; Rex v. Maron, R. & R. C. C. 419. Under the stipulation, the assured had knowledge of the robbery. The Los Angeles harbor is within the jurisdiction of Los Angeles county. Manley v. People, 7 N. Y. 295, 304; People v. Wilson, 3 Park. Cr. R. (N. Y.) 199; Haskins v. People, 16 N. Y. 350. It is navigable, and hence is a public highway. Gunter v. Geary, 1 Cal. 462. Innumerable other authorities could be cited to the last point, but it is not necessary. The Encyclopædic Dictionary defines a highway robbery as a robbery committed on or near the public highway. Many other works of the same character announce substantially the following definition of a highway robber: “One who robs in public places.” Under these authorities, and in the absence of any statutory definition of the term, it is clear that the loss sustained by the plaintiff was through a highway robbery, accomplished by force, and with her knowledge.

In so far as the respondent's single argument is concerned, no further discussion is necessary, but, since I am constrained to dissent from the foregoing opinion, the discharge of a full measure of service seems to require that the reasons inducing that conclusion be set forth in greater detail.

Of course, the intent of the parties constitutes the contract. Our object is to discover that intent. However, they are presumed to have contracted with the law in mind, and to have used words in the meaning which they possess as a matter of law. Hence, it is important here to determine the meaning of the term "highway robbery." While the definition of "highway robbery" in this action involves the determination of civil rights only, it is a term usually found in the realm of criminal law, and we must seek there for light upon its true meaning. Macgillivray on Insurance (1912) p. 964.

To my mind, little of value is to be gained by consideration of the occurrences, conditions, and classes of highways described in early English history. In the first place, if it be accepted without challenge that about the year 1200 A. D., and for some centuries thereafter, "highway robbery" was a term which as then used was applicable only to robbery of a type intended to inspire terror in the bravest hearts, and committed on a via, as distinguished from an iter or actus of that period, these facts furnish no aid to a determination of the question here presented, to wit, Did the parties to this insurance contract intend the company to insure against a loss to the assured such as that shown to have been sustained in the instant case? This is so, first, because nothing in the foregoing opinion indicates that waterways did not sometimes form a part of the vias or king's highways. Blackstone has well said, "Law is the soul of reason." A law would surely fail miserably to measure up to this standard, which would denounce a certain act as a felony without benefit of clergy if committed on the king's highway built upon land approaching a river, but wholly omit to condemn the same act on a boat crossing the river. History tells us that the king's highway led from London to the Thames, at Staines; there the king and his subjects, who might be desirous of traveling to Worcester, were transported by boats across the river, or might go by bridge; there the via on land resumed, and by it they might pass on to their destination. We are informed that one purpose of the law at that time making robbery a more serious offense when committed on the king's highway than when perpetrated upon or near the actus or iter, was that all of the king's subjects were at liberty and were often required to pass and re-pass upon the former, and hence greater protection should be extended against the taking of articles of value from them there by robbers. Again, robbery on the king's highway was more severely punished, out of respect and consideration for the rights and prerogatives of royalty and nobility, who principally traveled thereon and who usually used the via rather than the iter or actus. The carriages for whose use the vias were constructed were the property of nobility and of the few rich among the untitled. The poor had not much of value which might be the subject of plunder. The vias were few in number, but the nobility and the rich perforce crossed the Thames, the Trent, and other rivers. They traveled up and down these highways in boats before vias were constructed or carriages were built, and navigable waterways were recognized as highways, and from the earliest times formed a part of the same system of transportation and travel as did the vias. Who will deny the unreasonableness of a law which would ordain one rule and one punishment for robbery done in a via, and none, or an entirely different rule and punishment, for the same depredation by the same robbers against the same travelers, on a boat crossing from one shore of the Thames to the other? Every consideration of logic and reason would require the same act to be denounced as the same crime in each instance, and there is absolutely nothing in either the law quoted or the references to history and literature contained in my Associates' opinion to justify the conclusion that the law made any distinction in that behalf. On the other hand, there is substantial reason and authority for the contrary conclusion, to which attention will be called later.

Again, the conditions formerly existing ceased centuries ago, and the reasons which may have resulted in the robbery upon the via being denied benefit of clergy, while the same outlaw who worked on the iter and the actus had that consideration allowed him, never had any application in America. Of royalty and nobility we have none. The poorest citizen has the same protection afforded him as the richest, and highways far superior to the ancient vias form a network over our state and nation.

The mere fact that Scott and Blackmore, in their inimitable imagery and fiction, have painted pictures of highwaymen three-fourths hero and one-fourth outlaw, would hardly be taken as proof that such was the character of all highwaymen then. These and other authors visioned ideals not the inferiors, or even the average robbers, of that time; and their tragic descriptions of the deeds of robbery done with dash and daredevil bravery upon the vias is no indication that even at that time the taking of property from the person of another by a cowardly thief who snatched a watch, broke the chain which attached it to the clothing of the owner, and ran, would not have been called a robbery then as much as it would to-day, and a highway robbery also, if it took place on or near a via, or on a navigable waterway. But, if we were to assume that highway robbery could not have been committed on an actus or iter, but might upon a via, and because of this we further assume the fact to be that highway robbery could not be committed on a water highway (which of course does not follow) there exists a further reason why we are not assisted in construing the insurance policy in question by the facts and fiction of those olden times. It is common knowledge that the meaning of many, if not of most, terms used in the year 1200, or even 1500, A. D., have substantially changed, some being used in a radically different sense, some falling into almost disuse, and others so evolving as to be vastly broader in their scope. Without definite continuity of the ancient distinctions between the various classes of highways, we are left in the position of accepting precedent hundreds of years old, without any indication that the reason for its origin still exists. While a proper respect for precedent is essential to security of property and of rights of every character, I apprehend that instances are rare indeed among the reported cases where a definition established by statute or judicial decree rendered in the shadow of the Dark Ages has been accepted, although the reason upon which it was based is but a memory. Such procedure would furnish justification for the common criticism of courts, usually mistakenly and ignorantly made, that they are hide-bound, and listen to the voices of the dead rather than to those of the living, in a blind adherence to precedent, however old and lacking in logic.

Suppose a suit be brought on a contract in which the term "landlord" is used, and a dispute arises concerning the meaning of that word and the rights of the landlord. Should we go back even as far as Blackstone and base our decision upon his discussion of the subject, we would find ourselves holding that a landlord has jurisdiction over dependent landholders, with power to redress misdemeanors, and nuisances, to settle their disputes, etc. Blackstone's definition of a tenement has no application to that term as used in America to-day. The constant forward march of civilization has resulted in complete abandonment of the early definition of the term "debtor" as a felon. Nothing would be gained in construing modern statutes or contracts by tracing the term "debtor" back to the days of fettered felons, and imprisonment for debt, or in reflecting upon the former use of chains, and execution blocks, and the discovery of pieces of dead debtors, in quest of a modern definition of a market place. Difficult, indeed, would be the task of writing a thesis upon commercial law, or any of its branches, if the slightest recognition were afforded the terms and principles denounced by the Twelve Tables.

So, in this instance, I cannot bring myself to take into serious consideration that part of the foregoing opinion which deals with conditions, statutes and literature of the Middle Ages and early modern era. It is not my contention that these should never be given attention, but that their worth is negligible unless it can be shown that the conditions and causes are the same as those existing to-day.

To my mind it is elementary that every thoroughfare over which all the public have a right to pass and repass and use for transportation and travel is a highway, and that this definition applies to waterways as well as those on land; also that one who robs on or near a highway is a highwayman. This being so, little authority need be cited to support these propositions. However, serious challenge, I think, justifies a more extended reference to authorities.

To secure uniformity in legal rights and law enforcement, it is essential that no different consequences should follow the performance of an act in one place in the same sovereignty than in another. There is no apparent reason why per se an act of any character should be classified differently when committed on water than on land, or when it is done on a boat traveling the state highways of navigable waters than on a bus traveling the state highways constructed on the solid earth. The route of travel on which the ship was at the time the act was committed was a state highway, and it was within the sovereign jurisdiction of the state of California as unconditionally as any point in the system of public boulevards in this state. U. S. v. Bevens, 3 Wheat. 336, 4 L. Ed. 404; Comm. v. Peters, 53 Mass. (12 Metc.) 387. In Hargrave's Tracts, at page 8, it is said:

"For as the common highway on the land be for the common land passage, so these kind of rivers, whether fresh or salt, that bear boats or barges, are highways by water."

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in deciding the case of Attorney General v. Woods, 108 Mass. 436, 11 Am. Rep. 380, used the following language:

"Navigable streams are highways; and a traveler for pleasure is as fully entitled to protection in using a public way, whether by land or by water, as a traveler for business."

"Where water is navigable in law, whether or not within the ebb and flow of the tide, the public have a common right to use it for navigation as a public highway." 29 Cyc. 304.

In Gunter v. Geary, 1 Cal. 462, the Supreme Court of this state said:

"It is well settled that all that part of a bay or river below low water at low tide, is a public highway. * * *"

In many other jurisdictions the same rule exists, and has been applied, in both civil and criminal cases involving obstructions of public highways, and kindred questions. In American Steamboat Co. v. Chace, 16 Wall. 522, 21 L. Ed. 369, it was said that the waters of Narragansett bay constituted "one of the public highways within the state" of Rhode Island. In State v. Narrows Island Club, 100 N. C. 477, 5 S. E. 411, 6 Am. St. Rep. 618, it was said with reference to Big Narrows, in Currituck Sound.

"If the water referred to was thus navigable, the public had the right to use the same for the purposes of a highway and navigation. * * * Navigable waters are natural highways—so recognized by government and the people—and hence it seems to be accepted as a part of the common law of this country, arising out of public necessity, convenience, and common consent, that the public have the right to use rivers, lakes, sounds, and parts of them, though not strictly public waters, if they be navigable, in fact, for the purposes of a highway and navigation, employed in travel, trade, and commerce."

Other authorities of the same import are numerous. Bigelow v. Nickerson, 70 F. 113, 117, 17 C. C. A. 1, 30 L. R. A. 336; Robinson v. Chamberlain, 34 N. Y. 389, 90 Am. Dec. 713, quoted with approval in German Alliance Ins. Co. v. Home Water Supply Co., 174 F. 764, 768, 99 C. C. A. 258, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1005; Comm. v. Coombs, 2 Mass. 489, 492; Moore v. Day, 199 App. Div. 76, 191 N. Y. S. 731; Smart v. Aroostook Lumber Co., 103 Me. 37, 68 A. 527, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1083; Dwinel v. Veazie, 50 Me. 479, 484; Mashburn v. St. Joe Impr. Co., 19 Idaho, 30, 113 P. 92, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 824; C. R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Williams (C. C.) 148 F. 442, 447; B. & M. R. Co. v. Lowell & L. R. Co., 124 Mass. 368; Hutchinson v. Watson Slough Ditch Co., 16 Idaho, 484, 101 P. 1059, 133 Am. St. Rep. 125; State v. Portland Gen. Elec. Co., 52 Or. 502, 95 P. 722, 98 P. 160; 2 Chitty's Crim. Law. 382.

A case which illustrates the fact that waterways and land thoroughfares are not to be distinguished as highways is French v. Camp, 18 Me. 433, 36 Am. Dec. 728, involving the Penobscot river, which had frozen over, and a hole had been cut in the ice by the defendant for the purpose of watering stock. The opinion of the court reads, in part:

"The waters of the Penobscot are, of common right, a public highway, for the use of all the citizens. This right is generally exercised, when they are in a fluid state; but, when congealed, the citizens have still a right to traverse their surface at pleasure."

Any distinction, therefore, must necessarily be of a technical character, based only upon the fact that water is water, and land is land. It should not be the purpose of courts to base their decisions upon such inconsequential distinctions, nor should it be presumed that the parties to a contract believed the laws to be so framed, or intended their contracts to recognize such unessential differences.

In addition to the definition of a highway robber given in the Encyclopædic Dictionary, Funk & Wagnalls' International Dictionary defines a highwayman as "one who robs in public places." In 29 Cyc. at page 364, it is said that "'highway' is a name for all kinds of public ways, whether by land or by water," and many cases are there cited to the effect that navigable waters are highways.

It is well established that, when the language used in a contract of insurance is ambiguous, or when a doubt arises in respect to its application, or as to limitations of liability thereunder, it must be interpreted most favorably to the insured. Clark v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co., 180 Cal. 76, 179 P. 195; Bayley v. Employers', etc., Corp., 125 Cal. 345, 58 P. 7; Welch v. British American Assurance Co., 148 Cal. 223, 82 P. 964, 113 Am. St. Rep. 223; 7 Ann. Cas. 396; Coniglio v. Conn. F. Ins. Co., 180 Cal. 596, 182 P. 275, 5 A. L. R. 805; Wells Fargo & Co. v. Pacific Ins. Co., 44 Cal. 397; Mah See v. N. American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 26 A. L. R. 123. I do not think it necessary that this rule be exclusively relied upon in the case at bar to maintain the company's liability, since we deem a navigable harbor a highway to all intents and purposes, nor do I feel impelled to limit insurance against highway robbery to robbery committed on a highway technically established as such for all municipal purposes. It is generally understood, and is said in Webster's New International Dictionary, that a "holdup" is a "highway robbery," and I think the appellants contemplated insuring themselves against loss from robbery by force and violence in the open, as distinguished from, or in addition to, thefts from their domicile.

This suggests another consideration which points to the same conclusion as above indicated, namely, that the parties intended the clause being construed to have a wide scope. This is the fact that the principal part of the insurance contract constitutes one against the unlawful taking of personal property from within the premises described, and it is followed by the provision in question, intended to afford protection against results from highway robbery. Surely the insured as well as the insurer had in mind, not so much the exact spot or route in which the robbery should take place, as the nature of the act to be insured against. It would appear quite certain that they contemplated insurance against the taking of personal property from the person by means of force or violence, committed anywhere in the open, not covered by the preceding provisions of the policy, and it can hardly be thought that the parties at the time considered making a distinction between such acts, whether done in a field, or on water, or within the confines of a boulevard. Suppose bandits commit a robbery of a horseman or pedestrian upon one of the bridle paths of the parks, or among the hills of California. Would any one doubt the propriety of describing the occurrence as a highway robbery, or those who committed it as highwaymen? Yet these bridle paths are substantially the same "ways" as were the acts of history. Having contracted for reimbursement for losses occasioned by similar classes of acts than from the home, without doubt the idea of the parties was to insure against all other such robberies committed by force and violence, with knowledge of the assured. Viewed from every standpoint, the wording of the contract of insurance points to this conclusion. It is to be noted that the rider did not insure against loss from all highway robbery, but only "loss from highway robbery by force or violence," etc. Clearly, the addition of the words "by force or violence," after "highway robbery" indicates a limitation upon the class of highway robbery, loss from which it is intended to insure. There might be highway robbery where the taking was by putting in fear. This is evidently the purpose which the parties had in mind in adding the words "by force or violence," rather than as indicating that they believed the content of the term "highway robbery" to necessarily involve excessive force or violence.

Again, the further limitation upon the liability of the insurer points inevitably to the correctness of the construction above indicated. The additional words prove, if nothing else does, that the meaning ascribed by the foregoing opinion to the term "highway robbery" could not have been in the minds of the parties to this contract. If they pictured a determined individual, perhaps masked, appearing before a wayfarer, with uplifted bludgeon, or pointed firearm, rifling the pockets of his victim, who surrenders in abject terror, can any one reasonably suppose that they would have regarded it as necessary to have inserted the stipulation that "mere disappearance of property from the person of the assured, unless accompanied by force or violence and unless also within his or her knowledge at the time, is not a risk covered by this rider"? Could any one conceive of the victim of a highway robbery committed in the manner so graphically portrayed in "Lorna Doone," or "A Tale of Two Cities," or "George Psalmanazar's Account of the State of the South of France," not having "knowledge at the time" that he was being robbed? The fact that the rider contains this added restriction upon the insurer's liability seems to exclude the idea that the parties contemplated only insurance against the type of tragedy occurring upon some via in the days of Robin Hood, and Little John, when such robbers were often regarded as heroes, sometimes occupying a position in the respect and affection of the common people almost on a par with the nobility.

I think that, instead of proof that the parties intended to include in the policy insurance only where the one insured had been a victim of a typical Wild West holdup, this language demonstrates conclusively that the contrary is true, and that they intended to protect against any form of robbery, provided it be committed in the open, and by force or violence, and with knowledge of the victim. If the parties had intended to limit the liability otherwise, it may reasonably be expected that apt language would have been used to express such intent.

It seems clear, also, that the picture of a highway robbery existing in the minds of the parties must have been such that they anticipated a claim might be made that the taking of property from the person even without his knowledge would be included within the term; that it might be said that taking property from the person, though not by force or violence, but only through cunning or artifice, is highway robbery. Otherwise, why should they have added the proviso against such taking being covered by the term? The effect of this language, to my mind, is exactly the same as though the contract had read, "All loss by robbery in the open, if accomplished by force or violence, and if the assured at the time of being robbed has knowledge of the fact, is covered by this policy." Under such a statement the appellant would, hardly deny liability.

Again, I cannot agree with the narrowly restricted view that the provision, "unless also within his or her knowledge at the time," should be so construed as to require that the person robbed must have had a consciousness of the result of the acts of the robber, and an appreciation of the fact that such acts would result in a particular article of value being separated from the person and possession of the assured and falling under the control of the robber. The absurdity of such construction is apparent, if we consider where it would, of necessity, lead. Robbers not infrequently operate on crowded streets and well-traveled roads. Should A., in one of these places, approach B. from behind and strike him unconscious with a blackjack, rifle his pockets of money, and strip him of jewelry, under the construction suggested and accepted by the foregoing opinion, no recovery could be had by the insured, because this taking was not within his "knowledge at the time." Or, suppose A., at the point of a pistol, attempts to rob B., B. resists, and A. uses his pistol for a club, and in a struggle which ensues, B. believes he has defended his possession, but, upon A. desisting and taking flight, investigates, and finds his watch is gone. If the clause in question should be so narrowly construed as to require a consciousness of every move that was made in the combat and its effect in the matter of the extraction of property from the assured, there could be no recovery.

That appellant was forcibly robbed to her then knowledge seems to be conceded, and is clear. Having been robbed on the navigable waters of Los Angeles harbor, used at the time for navigation, it follows that the loss was one suffered through highway robbery within the obvious intention of the contract.

77 Cal. App. 681

CRAIG v. DINWIDDIE. (Civ. 3071.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 30, 1926.)

1. Quieting title ⇨43—Under complaint to quiet title and answer that defendant's mortgage constituted prior lien, all facts tending to prove defendant's priority held admissible.

Under complaint to quiet title and answer alleging that defendant's mortgage constituted prior lien, antedating plaintiff's acquisition of property, all facts and circumstances tending to establish priority of defendant's lien, including facts as to prior mortgage of which that set up was renewal, were admissible.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨244.

Evidence held to show that subsequent purchasers had actual notice of prior unrecorded mortgage executed by vendor.

3. Mortgages ⇨178 — Execution of renewal note and renewal mortgage continued mortgagee's right to same priority as under original mortgage.

Where owner executed to mortgagee new note and mortgage in renewal of prior note and mortgage, payment of old note was suspended until maturity of new note, and mortgagee was entitled to same priority as before mortgage was renewed.

4. Equity ⇨56—Equity looks to substance, not form, in determining nature of transaction.

Equity looks to substance, not to form, in determining whether second note and mortgage were given in payment of prior note and mortgage or merely in renewal.

5. Limitation of actions ⇨164.

Mortgage lien is not extinguished by lapse of time while debt is kept alive.

6. Limitation of actions ⇨151(2).

Promise to pay debt, made before limitation statute runs, keeps obligation alive, and suit, if brought, must be upon original promise.

7. Limitation of actions ⇨164—Where renewal note and mortgage were executed, subsequent grantee held to take title subject to mortgagee's lien, though new mortgage was not recorded until after conveyance by mortgagor (Civ. Code, §§ 19, 1214).

Where owner executed new note and mortgage in renewal of prior note and mortgage, subsequent purchaser of property held to take subject to mortgagee's lien, in view of Civ. Code, § 19, though new mortgage was not recorded until after conveyance by mortgagor, and original note was long overdue, where all parties had actual notice of second mortgage, notwithstanding section 1214, providing that conveyance is void as against later conveyance first recorded.

8. Limitation of actions ⇨165—Mortgagor's grantee cannot quiet title until debt is paid, where there were extensions of which he had notice, notwithstanding mortgage lien has been extinguished by time.

Notwithstanding lien of mortgagee has been extinguished by lapse of time, mortgagor's grantee cannot quiet title without paying debt due, where extensions of time had been granted to mortgagor of which grantee had notice.

9. Mortgages ⇨305—Mortgage is not discharged by change in form of debt.

No change in form of evidence of debt will discharge mortgage, since mortgage secures the debt, and is not discharged until debt it was given to secure is satisfied.

10. Mortgages ⇨316—Where renewal mortgage was executed, and subsequent grantee, though he had actual notice, claimed it was void because not recorded at proper time, equity would, if necessary, set aside release of original mortgage.

Where owner executed note and mortgage in renewal of prior note and mortgage, and, after original mortgage had been released, subsequent grantee of property, though he had actual notice of latter mortgage, claimed it was void because not recorded at proper time, equity would, if necessary to protect mortgagee, set aside release and award foreclosure.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action to quiet title by H. S. Craig against Nellie Dinwiddie. From an insufficient judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. H. Chamberlain, Jr., of Oakland, for appellant.

A. M. Pence, of Covina, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff to quiet title to sixty and a fraction acres of land situate in Madera county, state of California. Defendant pleaded a mortgage lien on the premises involved. Plaintiff had judgment subject to the mortgage, and appeals from that part of the judgment establishing defendant's lien.

The complaint alleges that on the 7th day of February, 1924, plaintiff became and ever since has been the owner of the tract of land above referred to, and further that defendants (there being some fictitious persons named as defendants) claim to have some estate, right, title, or interest in, to or against said property, or some portion thereof, but that such claims of defendants, and each of them, are without any right whatever and are subject and subordinate to the rights and claims of the plaintiff. The answer of the defendant, Nellie Dinwiddie, sets up a certain mortgage on the premises described in the complaint, said mortgage being dated September 22, 1920, for the sum of $6,565, payable 3 years after date, interest at 7 per cent. per annum, said mortgage being executed by Andrew McKibben and Nancy J. McKibben, alleged to be the owners of the premises referred to in plaintiff's complaint at the date of the execution of said mortgage, and that said mortgage constituted a first lien on said real estate, and that plaintiff's interest in said land is subsequent and subject to the lien of said mortgage. The answer also denies that the claim and interest of the said Nellie Dinwiddie is subordinate or subject to the plaintiff's claims.

The transcript shows that on or about the 22d day of September, 1916, E. I. Voorheis and Sarah E. Voorheis, his wife, then being the owners of the real estate referred to in plaintiff's complaint, executed a note and mortgage for the sum of $6,565, payable 3 years after date. This mortgage covered the lands and premises described in plaintiff's complaint. This mortgage was duly recorded, and thereafter, and on or about the 5th day of December, 1917, assigned to Amanda E. Dinwiddie and Nellie Dinwiddie, and by them assigned to one Sherman Gail, and by the said Sherman Gail reassigned to Amanda E. Dinwiddie and Nellie Dinwiddie as joint tenants. After the execution of the mortgage just mentioned, known as the "Voorheis mortgage," the real estate referred to was sold and conveyed to Andrew McKibben and Nancy J. McKibben, his wife, who, on or about the 22d day of September, 1920, executed to Nellie Dinwiddie a mortgage on the lands described in the first mortgage and the premises involved in this case, to secure a note in the sum of $6,565, payable 3 years after date; the "Voorheis mortgage" herein referred to being past due and unpaid. This mortgage, called the "McKibben mortgage," was not recorded until on or about the 15th day of November, 1922. In the meantime, and on or about the 16th day of March, 1921, Andrew McKibben, the mortgagor, conveyed the land in question to Margaret P. Van Hoosear. Thereafter, and after the recording of the McKibben mortgage, Margaret P. Van Hoosear and William S. Van Hoosear, by deed of gift, conveyed the property in question to their son, Burr S. Van Hoosear, who, on or about February 7, 1924, conveyed the land to the appellant, H. S. Craig. The Voorheis mortgage referred to herein was not satisfied of record until on or about the 5th day of March, 1924, a date subsequent to the time when the plaintiff and appellant took title to the property. The Voorheis mortgage was satisfied of record at the request of William S. Van Hoosear on behalf of appellant. After the satisfaction of the Voorheis mortgage had been entered of record, the plaintiff instituted this action to quiet title. The satisfaction of mortgage recites that "the Voorheis mortgage has been fully paid by renewal thereof"; the renewal being by way of the mortgage executed by the McKibbens and set up in the answer of the defendant, Dinwiddie.

[1, 2] Plaintiff's claim is based principally upon the provisions of section 1214 of the Civil Code, which reads:

"Every conveyance of real property, other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year, is void as against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee of the same property, or any part thereof, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first duly recorded, and as against any judgment affecting the title, unless such conveyance shall have been duly recorded prior to the record of notice of action."

Respondent's answer is based upon the principle set forth in section 19 of the Civil Code, which reads:

"Every person who has had actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, has constructive notice of the fact itself in all cases in which, by prosecuting such inquiry, he might have learned such fact."

Objection is also made by the appellant that the court admitted proof of the transactions recited showing the execution of the Voorheis mortgage, the fact of its renewal by the McKibbens' mortgage, and that the Voorheis mortgage was never otherwise paid on the ground that such questions were not tendered by the pleadings. The answer itself, however, alleges that the McKibben mortgage constituted a prior lien upon the premises, the lien which antedated the acquisition of the property by the plaintiff. The plaintiff's complaint alleged that the claim of the defendant, Dinwiddie, was subordinate to the rights of the plaintiff. This allegation was denied by the defendant. Under this state of the pleadings we think the court was correct in admitting proof of all of the facts and circumstances tending to establish the priority of defendant's lien. At the time the plaintiff took title, both the Voorheis and McKibben mortgages were of record and of which record the plaintiff must be held to have had constructive notice, and under the record we think had actual notice. The record shows that the plaintiff acted as the attorney for the Van Hoosears in the transactions had by them in relation to the property. William S. Van Hoosear testified as to his knowledge of the circumstances of the Voorheis mortgage for $6,565 on the premises at the time he paid the same through the McKibbens. His testimony, by question and answer, is as follows:

"Q. At the time you bought the property in question here from the McKibbens, there was a mortgage on it belonging to Miss Dinwiddie and her mother for $6,500, wasn't there? A. It shows $6,565.

"Q. The same amount? A. That is what was told us; that is what we found of record, known as the Voorheis mortgage.

"Q. In other words, there was a mortgage indebtedness when you bought it, of $6,565? A. Two of them, two mortgages.

"Q. But there was a mortgage which Miss Dinwiddie owned of $6,500? A. $6,565, known as the Voorheis mortgage.

"Q. And, during all the time that you owned this property and before you deeded it to your son, that mortgage was on the property? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. It was on the property when you deeded it to your son? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And, during all the time that you owned the property and your son owned the property, you paid the interest on that mortgage? A. I sent the money; yes, sir.

"Q. And wrote letters to Miss Dinwiddie, requesting time to pay the interest? A. Sometimes, when my wife was sick; yes, sir.

"Q. You did that? A. Yes, sir; I admit that.

"Q. And, at the time you deeded this property to your son, you have said that first mortgage was still on the property? A. The Voorheis and the other mortgage was still on the property.

"Q. Never was paid? A. No, sir.

"Q. As far as you know, never has been paid? A. No, sir."

The deed from Margaret P. Van Hoosear and William S. Van Hoosear to Burr S. Van Hoosear bears date of the 18th day of November, 1922; notwithstanding this deed of gift, William S. Van Hoosear testified that he continued to pay interest on what he called the Voorheis mortgage to the defendant, Dinwiddie, until to and including September, 1923. Upon cross-examination, the witness, William S. Van Hoosear testified that he first had knowledge of what is called the McKibben mortgage in October, 1923, and that, when he suggested the release of the Voorheis mortgage of record, he was referring to what he called the outlawed mortgage, and that the Voorheis mortgage, by its terms, became outlawed in September, 1923. Without setting forth the entire evidence from which we think the court was justified in concluding that all parties concerned were well aware of all the proceedings, we content ourselves with quoting from the opinion of the trial court, which clearly indicates the character of the whole transaction:

"The court has well in mind the testimony; I want to say frankly this is a most unusual set of circumstances; without commenting on my ideas of the evidence, I am satisfied that the existence of this mortgage is well within the knowledge of all the parties; therefore it is the judgment and decree that title be vested in H. S. Craig as prayed, subject to the lien and incumbrance of the mortgage of Miss Dinwiddie."

Any inquiry on the part of the plaintiff would have elicited the information that the Dinwiddie mortgage was given simply as a renewal of the Voorheis mortgage. It was not given in payment, and no release or satisfaction of the Voorheis mortgage was ever entered other than that solicited by the plaintiff and the Van Hoosears which was obtained in the language we have quoted, which was followed immediately by this action to quiet title. Any reasonable or prudent man would have made inquiry to ascertain the facts concerning the two mortgages, and, under such circumstances, we think section 19 of the Civil Code has direct application.

[3-6] The debt in this case was at all times kept alive. There is no pretense that the McKibben note and mortgage was given as an additional note and mortgage or other than as claimed by the respondent. The form or procedure followed perhaps differs somewhat from the usual method of renewing notes, but the substance was exactly the same, and, by the execution of the new note and mortgage, payment of the old note was suspended until the maturity of the new note, and thus leaving the respondent standing precisely where she stood before the mortgage was renewed, as far as priority is concerned. Tolman v. Smith, 85 Cal. 288, 24 P. 743. Equity will look at the substance of the transaction and not merely the form characterizing the procedure. Tolman v. Smith, supra; Swift v. Kraemer, 13 Cal. 526, 73 Am. Dec. 603. While the debt remains, the lien is not extinguished. Worth v. Worth, 155 Cal. 599, 102 P. 663. This is not a case of a new promise, but simply a continuation of the old obligation, as pointed out in Weinberger v. Weidman, 134 Cal. 599, 66 P. 869, where the distinction is drawn between one made before and one made after the statute has run:

"The one keeps alive the first obligation, and, if suit is brought, it must be upon the original promise, and, so long as the debt is kept alive, the lien of the mortgage continues."

In Newhall v. Hatch, 134 Cal. 269, 66 P. 266, 55 L. R. A. 673, the court, in considering the effect of the renewal of a note secured by mortgage, thus states its views:

"At the time the note was renewed, Hatch was the owner of the land, and the plaintiff was the owner of the debt. They were the only parties interested in the transaction, or that would be affected thereby, and the effect of this renewal of the obligation could not be impaired by any subsequent acts of others. The renewal had the same effect with reference to persons thereafter dealing with the land as if Hatch had then executed a mortgage for that amount."

The court then holds that the renewal of a note works a continuation of the mortgage lien. In Lent v. Morrill, 25 Cal. 492, the court holds that, if the maker of a note secures the same by a mortgage on lands, and while still the owner of the mortgaged property extends the time of payment of the note, a purchaser from the mortgagor of the premises mortgaged takes the same subject to the lien of the mortgage until the note is barred by the statute of limitations, although at the time of his purchase he did not know that the time of payment of the note had been extended. The language of the court is as follows:

"It is a matter of no moment that Chambers, when he took his conveyance of the land in 1862, had no knowledge that the note and mortgage had been extended. Lent was not delinquent in any known common-law or statute duty or requirement. He was not bound to serve personal notice of the acknowledgment of February, 1859, upon any one, nor to publish the fact in the gazettes; and, if he had caused the acknowledgment to be recorded in the recorder's office, it would have been followed by no legal consequences. Chambers, on the other hand, knew, at least when he bought and paid his money, that the mortgage had not been discharged of record. He further knew, as matter of law, that under the statute of limitations a renewal of the note was a possible event. He might, and as a prudent man he ought, before concluding his purchase, to have sought out Lent and inquired of him as to whether the note had been renewed in fact. If on such application Lent had told him that there had been no renewal, and if thereupon Chambers, on the faith of the statement, had closed the trade and paid his money for the land, Lent would have been estopped from setting up the mortgage against the man whom his own false suggestions had misled. Not having pursued that course, however, Chambers must be understood to have bought and taken his conveyance subject to all hazards."

[7] Had the plaintiff made any inquiries as to the mortgages covering the land in question which were on record, as he should have done under the terms of section 19 of the Civil Code, he could have ascertained the facts from the respondent, the owner of the mortgage indebtedness, and, had he been misinformed by her as to any such facts, he could have pleaded the same by way of estoppel, but, instead of so doing, he chose the course of attempting to defeat an honest indebtedness and an equitable lien to secure the payment of the same by an alleged flaw in the respondent's claim, and, having so done, the plaintiff must be held to have taken the land subject to all hazards. Again, as said in Tolman v. Smith, supra:

"As long as the statute of limitations has not run, a renewal or extension of the mortgages is not required; they are alive, though 'suspended.' And, in the second place, the substituted mortgage was executed with the requisite formalities, and, as shown by the cases cited below, it will be treated by a court of equity as an extension of the old mortgages to the extent of the debt secured by them."

This was a case where additional mortgages were given. The court further said:

"The effect of conditional payment of one mortgage by another is to suspend the remedy on the old mortgage until the maturity of the new one. Until such maturity the old mortgage cannot be foreclosed. But if the debt be not paid at maturity, the old mortgages revive and have priority over an intervening mortgage to a third person."

[8, 9] This principle carries the lien of the respondent back to the date of the execution of the Voorhels mortgage, which was long prior to the inception of any rights acquired by the plaintiff. To the same effect is the case of Chapman v. Hicks, 41 Cal. App. 158, 182 P. 336, where it was held that a judgment quieting title could not be entered until the debt was paid; there having been extensions of time, of which the grantee had notice. In the case at bar the testimony shows the non-payment of the debt and its renewal by second mortgage. Under such circumstances, we also think the language of the Supreme Court, quoted in Bank of Suisun v. Fiske, 65 Cal. App. 776, 225 P. 8, applicable:

"A mortgage secures the debt and not the note or bond or other evidence of it. No change in the form of the evidence or the mode or time or times—nothing short of actual payment of the debt, or an express release—will operate to discharge the mortgage. The mortgage remains a lien until the debt it was given to secure is satisfied, and is not affected by a change of the note or giving a different instrument as an evidence of the debt, or by a judgment at law on the note merging the original evidence of indebtedness."

[10] The giving of the second note in this case, as we have stated, did not change the indebtedness. It only postponed the time when action might be had to foreclose the mortgage given to secure its payment, and in this case, so long as the debt remained alive, if necessary to protect the rights of the mortgagee, equity would set aside the release procured in the manner and under the conditions disclosed by the record and award foreclosure. 19 R. C. L. § 236; Kern v. Hotaling Co., 27 Or. 205, 40 P. 168, 50 Am. St. Rep. 710.

ORANGE COUNTY v. BACKS, County Clerk. (Civ. 5305.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 3, 1926.)

Mandamus $\S$ 74(2)—Writ lies to compel county clerk, as ex officio clerk of board of supervisors, to attest ordinance calling special bond election (Pol. Code, § 4038, subd. 8).

County clerk's duty under Pol. Code, § 4038, subd. 8, as ex officio clerk of board of supervisors, to authenticate published proceedings of board, is purely ministerial, so that mandamus lies to compel him to attest ordinance calling special election to authorize bond issue, legality of which he cannot dispute.

Petition by the County of Orange, by T. B. Talbert, Chairman of the Board of Supervisors, for writ of mandate to J. M. Backs, County Clerk, and ex officio clerk of the Board. Writ granted.

Alex P. Nelson and Clyde Bishop, both of Santa Ana, for petitioner.

L. A. West, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The petitioner prays for a writ of mandate directing the county clerk, as ex officio clerk of the board of supervisors of Orange county, to attest an ordinance calling a special election for the purpose of determining whether or not certain bonds shall be issued for harbor improvements. This he has refused to do, upon a number of grounds involving the constitutionality and legality of the issuance of the bonds if they should be voted.

Section 4038, subd. 8, of the Political Code makes it the duty of the clerk to authenticate with his signature and the seal of the board proceedings of the board whenever they shall have been ordered published. This is purely a ministerial duty, the performance of which can be made contingent upon no other consideration than the order of the board of which he is ex officio clerk. He cannot dispute the legality of the actions which they have taken upon constitutional or other legal grounds. Marin Municipal Water Dist. v. Dolge, 172 Cal. 724, 158 P. 187; City of Los Angeles v. Lefande, 157 Cal. 30, 106 P. 218; Thoits v. Byrbee, 34 Cal. App. 226, 167 P. 166.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Dora Adelstein against Isaac Greenberg and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harry K. Wolff, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sylvain Lazarus, Eugene H. O'Donnell, and Gillogley, Crofton & Payne, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. This is plaintiff's appeal from a judgment in defendants' favor in an action in unlawful detainer.

For more than three years prior to the month of April, 1923, respondents Isaac Greenberg and Solomon Lipschitz, as copartners, were engaged in the millinery business, operating three stores in San Francisco and two in Oakland. One of their San Francisco stores was located on Fillmore street in premises owned by appellant. On April 26, 1923, appellant entered into a written lease with respondents for the continued use of said premises for a term of six years and nine months, commencing on May 1, 1923, the total rental being $26,775, payable in monthly installments ranging from $275 to $375 during the period of the lease. The terms of the lease recited that respondents had paid appellant the sum of $1,125 "as a bonus for obtaining" the lease, and it was agreed that, in consideration of the full performance by respondents of the terms, covenants, and conditions of said lease, appellant would pay to respondents at the expiration of said lease the sum of $1,125, otherwise they were to receive nothing.

The copartnership continued to conduct the business in the premises leased from appellant until December 31, 1923, at which time a partial dissolution of copartnership was effected; the written agreement between the partners in this respect providing "that said copartnership shall be dissolved except as to the extent of the reservations herein-after excepted as and of the date January 1, 1924." Under this agreement four of the places of business belonging to the copartnership were divided; two being assigned and transferred to each partner, together with the merchandise and fixtures belonging thereto. The Fillmore street establishment was set apart to Lipschitz. Said agreement further provided that each partner was vested with sole ownership in the property thus assigned and transferred to him; that the rental of the respective stores should thereafter be paid by the parties occupying the same; and that "each of said stores may, subsequent to the date of said dissolution, operate under the trade name which same now bears and said several trade names shall be considered a part of said several businesses." The leases to three of the stores were expressly assigned by the terms of the agreement to the parties to whom those particular stores were transferred, but no mention whatever was made therein of the lease to the Fillmore street premises more than to provide that Greenberg's interest in the deposit for the security of the performance of the terms of that lease was assigned to Lipschitz. It was agreed that the fifth store, located in Oakland, should continue to be the property of, and conducted by, the copartnership until the lease of those premises expired on September 30, 1924, and that thereafter the business should be "closed out, and the said partial partnership as to said business terminated."

On December 19, 1923, about two weeks previous to the execution of the so-called agreement of partial dissolution, appellant mailed to respondents a letter stating that she had been informed by Mr. Lipschitz that respondents were contemplating a change in the firm; that one partner was about to dispose of his interest in the business to the other, and advising respondents "to read the third paragraph on page 10 of your lease." The letter concluded: "This is to notify you that no change can be made without my written consent first had and obtained thereto." On January 1, 1924, pursuant to said agreement, Lipschitz assumed ownership of the Fillmore street store, and paid the January rental in advance. On January 9, 1924, appellant served on respondents a notice of termination of the lease, and demanded the surrender of the premises upon the ground that respondents had violated the following covenant in said lease:

"The lessees further covenant and agree that neither this lease nor any interest therein whether legal or equitable, shall be assigned, alienated, pledged or hypothecated voluntarily or by operation of law, nor shall said demised premises be sub-let in whole or in part without the written consent of the lessor having previously thereto been obtained."

Respondents refused to vacate said premises and on January 14, 1924, appellant commenced this action.

The trial court found, in effect, that no transfer or assignment of said lease had ever been made by respondents, or either of them, and accordingly rendered judgment in their favor. The main contention of appellant is that this finding is not supported by the evidence, claiming in this regard that the terms of said agreement, as well as the circumstances surrounding the taking over and operation of the Fillmore street place of business by Lipschitz, established an assignment of the lease; and, basing her next point on such assumed assignment, appellant urges as a proposition of law that the assignment of the lease from one partner to the other without her consent as lessor operated as a forfeiture of the lease and to the money paid as security for the performance of its conditions and covenants.

[1, 2] So far as the record discloses, there was no express assignment of said lease either by the terms of said agreement or otherwise, and we believe that the transactions involving the transfer of the Fillmore street place of business to Lipschitz did not carry with it such assignment. After having received appellant's letter of December 19, 1923, respondents evidently concluded that in the settlement of their copartnership affairs they would reserve as copartners ownership of the lease to the Fillmore street premises, and their agreement was apparently drafted and signed with that end in view. It will be noted from a reading of the entire instrument that the intention of the parties was, not to bring about an immediate and complete dissolution of the copartnership at that time, but merely to divide the assets which were specifically enumerated in the agreement, and that as to those remaining, some of which were expressly mentioned in the agreement, the copartnership relation was to continue. Among the properties thus reserved to the copartnership were the assets belonging to the Oakland store and the leasehold interest in the Fillmore street premises. As between themselves, respondents doubtless had the legal right to make this kind of an adjustment of their copartnership property, for the reason that the leasehold interest in the Fillmore street premises was a species of property separable from the merchandise, fixtures, and other assets belonging to the store, and consequently could be legally reserved by the copartnership from the transfer and assignment of the assets belonging to the store. Johnson v. Levy, 3 Cal. App. 591, 86 P. 810. The statement of counsel for respondents made before the trial court during the course of the argument on demurrer indicating that there had been an assignment of the lease, to which appellant calls attention, is unimportant, being merely the statement of a legal conclusion, and, even if it could be regarded as a matter of fact, was not binding on respondents because it was not made during the trial of the action on the merits as an admission or stipulation of fact.

[3] If, as the trial court found, and as we believe to be the case, there was no assignment of the leasehold interest to Lipschitz, appellant is wholly without ground for complaint, because the tenancy created by the lease continues unbroken, and the duties and obligations of respondents and the rights of appellant thereunder, as original parties to the lease, remain unchanged and unimpaired. The lease provided, it is true, that the lessees should not sublet the premises, and that the same should be used "for the conduct of millinery and millinery supply business only, and for no other business whatever," but neither of those provisions has been violated. It is not claimed that the premises have been sublet, and the quoted provision of the lease does not require that the business mentioned shall be owned or conducted jointly by the lessees. For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that the finding of the trial court to the effect that an assignment of said lease had not been established is supported by the evidence, and therefore said finding cannot be disturbed on appeal.

[4, 5] It has been held generally in this state and in other jurisdictions that, where the leasehold interest is owned jointly, as by copartners, it is not a violation of the covenant against assignment for one colessee to acquire the interest of the other. Randol v. Scott, 110 Cal. 590, 42 P. 976; Spangler v. Spangler, 11 Cal. App. 321, 104 P. 995; Ruppe v. Utter (Cal. App.) 243 P. 715; Swartz v. Bixler, 261 Pa. 282, 104 A. 501; Bristol v. Westcott, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 461. Where strangers are brought into the lease, a different situation is presented. De Angeles v. Cotta, 62 Cal. App. 691, 217 P. 821. In Randol v. Scott, supra, the rule is stated as follows:

"A condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created, and to prevent the restraint from going beyond the express stipulation; and a covenant by the lessees not to assign the lease must be presumed to mean that the lease should not be assigned by the joint act of the lessees."

In the case of Spangler v. Spangler, supra, one colessee assigned to the other, and the landlord claimed a forfeiture. The court said:

"The covenant is that the lessees shall not assign, and only one of them has done so. It does not provide that neither of the lessees shall assign, nor that one may not assign to the other; and, construing this covenant strictly against the lessor, as the law requires us to do, it should be presumed to mean that the lease shall not be assigned by both. As the assignment was by one only of the lessees, there was no breach of the covenant, and therefore there was not forfeiture."

In Bristol v. Westcott, supra, the lease to a copartnership contained a covenant against assignment without lessor's consent, and it was held that there was no breach, where one of the lessees, on dissolution of the firm, agreed to assign to the other his interest in the lease, if the consent of the lessor could be obtained, but had already signed further memorandum reciting that he had already given sole possession of the premises to the other. The covenant in that lease was construed as inhibiting only the parting with possession to any person other than one of those two to whom possession was originally given.

[6, 7] It would therefore appear in the instant case that, even though there were an express or implied assignment from one colessee to the other without the lessor's consent, a forfeiture would not result. Under such circumstances, the assignment being made without the consent of the lessor, the relations between the lessor and the lessees would remain unaffected by the transaction between the lessees, both lessees continuing to be jointly and severally liable to the lessor for any breach occurring. Wood v. Longyear (Cal. Sup.) 242 P. 932. Appellant does not question the correctness of the rule adhered to in the cases cited, but endeavors to distinguish the instant one from them upon the ground that the covenant here against assignment contained the additional words "nor any interest therein." As already pointed out in the cases of Randol v. Scott, supra, and Spangler v. Spangler, supra, the covenant against assignment must be presumed to mean that the lease shall not be assigned "by the act of the joining lessees," and it would seem to follow therefrom in the case at bar that the additional words mentioned mean simply that neither the entire leasehold interest nor any less interest included therein shall be assigned "by the joint act of the lessees," the result of which would be, for instance, to bring in with respondents one or more strangers to the lease, as was done in the case of De Angeles v. Cotta, supra. If the intention had been to preclude an assignment from one colessee to the other, a clause to that effect could easily have been inserted in the covenant in question.

"A forfeiture can be enforced only when there is 'such a breach shown as it was the clear and manifest intention of the parties to provide for.' Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, 8th Ed. § 489, and cases cited. * * * Of course it is unnecessary to cite authorities to the points that covenants in restraint of alienation are barely tolerated, and that contracts looking to penalties and forfeitures must be strictly construed. * * * Our own Code provides that 'a condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created.' Civ. Code, § 1442. As to the power of re-entry for the forfeiture of a lease it was said by Justice Miller: 'It has always been considered that it was necessary to restrain it to the most technical limits of the terms and conditions upon which the right is to be exercised.' 'Elevator Case' [C. C.] 17 F. 201. 'Covenants of this description are construed by courts of law with the utmost jealousy to prevent the restraint from going beyond the express stipulation.' Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, § 403." Randol v. Scott, supra.

The covenant in the lease here, as already shown, contained no clause against assignment by one colessee to the other. That being so, it is not within the power of the courts to revise the lease so as to insert such a clause. However, if, as we believe, the evidence supports the finding of the trial court to the effect that there has been no express or implied assignment of said leasehold interest, the question of the effect of such an assignment becomes immaterial.

The judgment is affirmed.

In proceeding for writ of mandate to compel county treasurer to pay salary of justice of peace, stipulation conceding respondent's title to office held conclusive of right to salary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Petition by Charles J. Elliott for a writ of mandate against H. R. Van Delinder, as County Treasurer of the County of Ventura, directing payment of salary. From a judgment granting the writ, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward Henderson, Dist. Atty., and James C. Hollingsworth, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Ventura, for appellant.

Durley & Downes, of Oxnard, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Petitioner is a township justice of the peace. During his incumbency of that office he also held an employment with the department of engineering of the state, under which employment his duties were to obtain rights of way for the construction and installation of certain state highways. He has been engaged in the discharge of the duties of the employment, and has received for his labors in that behalf a certain salary from the state treasury. The auditor of the county in which petitioner holds his office as justice of the peace issued to him a warrant for his salary as justice for a month during which he had exercised his employment under the department of engineering, and for which he had been paid his salary by the state. Petitioner presented the warrant to defendant, the county treasurer of the county, and defendant refused to pay it. Petitioner then filed in the superior court his petition for a writ of mandate requiring defendant to make the payment. An alternative writ issued, defendant answered, and the proceeding came on for trial on an agreed statement of facts. Judgment was rendered directing the issuance of a peremptory writ, and defendant appeals.

[1] Section 1 of article 3 of the Constitution of the state reads:

"The powers of the government of the State of California shall be divided into three separate departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial; and no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except as in this Constitution expressly directed or permitted."

It is contended by appellant that respondent comes within the inhibition of this section in his attempt to discharge the duties of both his judicial position and his employment above mentioned, and that, as he has received his salary for the month under the employment, he is not entitled to the salary for that period as justice of the peace. We cannot perceive how this question is to be considered in the present proceeding. It is too plain for argument that the Constitution, in its provision that no person "charged with the exercise of powers" under one of the departments of government "shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others," affects the title to offices. The inhibition means that no person shall hold offices under different departments of the government at the same time, and it exists for the purpose of aiding in the preservation of the barriers which under the American system have been erected between the three departments. The truth that the section deals with the titles to offices permeates the opinion of the Supreme Court in the leading case of People v. Provines, 34 Cal. 520.

[2-4] The facts of the present proceeding appear in a stipulation entered into by the parties, which recites that, during the time covered by the salary warrant issued to respondent by the county auditor, he was "the duly qualified justice of the peace" of a certain township. The stipulation therefore fixes his title to the office. If, however, that question were not settled as a matter of fact, and if appellant were contending in this proceeding that respondent had forfeited the office of justice of the peace by discharging the duties of his employment under the department of engineering of the state, the feat could not be accomplished. "The statutory procedure in the nature of quo warranto is the proper remedy by which directly to test the title to all public offices" (22 Cal. Jur. 206), and it has been declared frequently that the question cannot be tried collaterally (People v. Sassovich, 29 Cal. 480; People v. Provines, supra; Matter of Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 108 P. 322). It has been decided, specifically, that the title to an office cannot be tested in a proceeding for the writ of mandate. Turner v. Melony, 13 Cal. 621.

[5-7] It is contended that the office of justice of the peace, held by respondent, is incompatible with the employment exercised by him under the engineering department of the state, and that therefore he cannot hold the office. There are several reasons why this point is not available to appellant. In the first place, an alleged incompatibility of offices raises the question of title (People v. Garrett [Cal. App.] 237 P. 829), and that question, as based upon such a claim, can no more be tried in this proceeding than can the question sought to be presented under section 1 of article 3 of the Constitution. Further, under the doctrine of incompatibility of offices, an office first held by an individual becomes vacant by an acceptance by him of a second office the duties of which are incompatible with those of the first (People v. Garrett, supra), but the petitioner here fails to allege whether or not respondent's acceptance of the employment under the engineering department came after his acquisition of the office of justice of the peace. Other reasons why the question of incompatibility of offices cannot be urged by appellant need not be stated.

The right to receive the salary attached to an office is an incident to the title to the office, and not to the exercise of its duties. 21 Cal. Jur. 942. Therefore, the title of respondent to the office of justice of the peace being conceded by the stipulation of the parties, and, even if it were not, the title not being impeachable in the present proceeding, it follows that respondent is entitled to the payment of the installment of his salary as justice of the peace which is in question here.

Judgment affirmed.

Petitioner for reinstatement as attorney after disbarment for conviction of crime has burden of showing both moral and mental qualifications.

In the matter of the application of James D. La Motte for reinstatement as an attorney and counselor at law. Application granted.

Gilligan & Cobb, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

WORKS, J. This is an application for the reinstatement of an attorney at law after disbarment. The rules governing such matters and the procedure to be followed in disposing of them in this particular division of the District Court of Appeal are defined and laid down in the opinion In re Stevens (Cal. Sup.) 241 P. 88, and in our opinion In re Cate, 247 P. 231.

[1] Under these decisions it becomes our duty, in the present proceeding, to determine two questions: (1) What are the moral qualifications of petitioner, as touching his fitness to resume the work of the legal profession? (2) What are his mental qualifications, as affecting the same matter? We are able to answer these questions without making the reference which we found necessary in each of the three proceedings that were dealt with in the opinion In re Cate, supra.

[2] Petitioner was disbarred pursuant to that portion of the statute which provides for the removal of an attorney upon his "conviction of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, in which case the record of conviction shall be conclusive evidence." Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 1. The crime that resulted in the disbarment was not one which in any way concerned petitioner's duty as a lawyer, nor was it in any way connected with his law practice. His moral character, therefore, has not been tainted with any turpitude involving loss or damage to any of that large class who find it necessary to employ the services of members of the legal profession. At the time of his disbarment, petitioner had been engaged in the practice of the profession principally in the county of Riverside, in which jurisdiction he had maintained his law office and in which he resided. Some time before the filing of petitioner's application for reinstatement he requested the Riverside County Bar Association to appoint a committee to investigate his "activities and conduct" with a view of obtaining from the association a recommendation for his reinstatement. The committee was appointed, and the investigation was made, with the result that the committee recommended to the association that it further the desire of petitioner to procure a reinstatement at the bar. Accordingly, at a regular meeting of the association held thereafter a resolution was adopted, by a unanimous vote, which recites that the investigation conducted by the committee was thorough and painstaking, that it covered "the past and present activities and conduct" of petitioner, and that it appears to the association that petitioner, by his exemplary conduct, has proven his fitness to be reinstated as a lawyer. The resolution then recommends to this court that the reinstatement be made.

Following petitioner's disbarment, and after his release from the imprisonment in the county jail which was imposed upon him as a punishment for his crime, which was a misdemeanor, he has engaged in several employments. There are before us affidavits from petitioner's superiors in some of the employments which he has exercised since his disbarment, and he gives ample reason for his inability to present affidavits relating to all of them. His reasons for leaving particular employments and taking up others are highly creditable to him. In each of the affidavits referred to it is shown that petitioner frankly disclosed to his prospective employer, in seeking the position, the fact of his disbarment and all of the occurrences which led to it. These affidavits exhibit also, by specific statements of fact, the thorough diligence, ability, honesty, and fidelity with which petitioner has discharged the duties of his various employments. One of petitioner's superiors, the city manager of the city of Glendale, frequently invited petitioner to his home because of his apparent worth, and gives satisfactory evidence of his conduct in those surroundings. Another of petitioner's superiors has been in petitioner's home and gives evidence of the fine conditions which prevail there. The affidavit of petitioner's present superior shows that the corporation of which he is an officer will employ petitioner as counsel in important matters in the event of his reinstatement.

The offense which caused petitioner's disbarment was committed while he was in a state of intoxication from the excessive use of liquors. While this circumstance was no defense to the charge made against him, we can readily perceive from the nature of the offense that it probably would not have been committed if petitioner had not been in a state of inebriety. It is pertinent to remark here that he pleaded guilty to the charge. The record contains ample evidence that petitioner has never indulged in the use of intoxicants since the offense was committed.

Petitioner has shown the possession of the moral qualifications which are necessary to every individual who would serve the public as a lawyer.

We turn now to the question of petitioner's mental qualifications. He is of the age of 34 years. He was admitted to the bar in 1914, after an examination in open court which covered a part of two days; that time being consumed in the examination of a rather large class of which he was one. The nature of the examination is indicated to some extent by the fact that about 28 per cent. of the class was denied admission. In preparation for his work as a lawyer, petitioner attended the law school of a university for one year and read law with a practicing lawyer for a period the length of which is not shown. He was in the army for 18 months, and, with the exception of that time, he practiced law continuously from his admission to his disbarment. A period of a few days more than 3 years has elapsed between the date of the disbarment and the filing of the present application. During that time petitioner has engaged in three employments that made necessary the exercise of mental activity not greatly different from that required in some of the work of a practicing lawyer. For a little more than 3 months he was an adjuster for a credit association. The duties of this position required, as a part of his work, that he conduct the examination of judgment debtors on proceedings supplementary to execution, and on that account he resigned the employment for the reason, as he alleges, that he did not desire to violate the order under which he had been disbarred. Petitioner was for about 9 months the escrow clerk of a bank. His present employment is as a claim adjuster for an automobile insurance corporation, and in it he has been engaged for nearly 2 years. We have already observed that this corporation intends to employ petitioner's services as a lawyer in the event of his reinstatement. It is averred in the affidavit of an officer of the insurance company:

"That said James D. La Motte is given absolute authority to settle and adjust claims, and in this capacity he very frequently is entrusted with the disposition of large sums of the company's money; that said James D. La Motte has worked diligently, hard, and faithfully during the time he has been employed by your affiant, and that his record and ability in the capacity in which he serves his employer is excellent; that he has at all times used sound discretion and good judgment in his work, and has always performed his said duties loyally to his said employer, and fairly to claimants."

Petitioner has been examined by us in open court upon some of the matters which are involved in this proceeding. He presents a good appearance and is mentally alert. Through information gathered during the examination we have had an opportunity to inspect pleadings, a brief and other papers prepared by petitioner while he was a member of the bar. We find from such inspection that the work done by him in those matters was satisfactorily performed.

We find, to quote the language of the Supreme Court in the opinion In re Stevens, supra, that of petitioner's "grasp of the law there is no question."

[3] In our opinion In re Cate, supra, we declared the rule to be that the burden is upon a petitioner for reinstatement to show both the moral and mental qualifications without which such an application cannot be granted. In our opinion the present petitioner has met the test which is by that rule required.

Petition granted.

SALENEEK v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5595.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 7, 1926.)

1. Master and servant §419.

Evidence held to sustain award denying additional compensation for rupture because of new and further disability.

2. Master and servant §417(7).

Court of Appeals is without power to interfere with award of Industrial Accident Commission, made on conflicting evidence, with weight in favor of award.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by August M. Saleneek, claimant, opposed by Graff & Son, employer. An order of the Industrial Accident Commission denied additional compensation, and claimant brings certiorari. Affirmed.

George Rosen, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury and G. C. Faulkner, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in denying petitioner additional compensation for an alleged new and further disability resulting from an original injury.

[1] The record discloses that petitioner, while at work on December 1, 1921, sustained a ventral hernia, or rupture. An application was filed with respondent commission on February 24th of the following year, as a result of which the commission awarded him certain compensation. Being dissatisfied with the amount of the award, petitioner filed a writ of review in this court for the purpose of having the award annulled. This petition was denied September 5, 1922. Thereafter he applied to the commission for a permanent disability allowance for his hernia, and on March 21, 1924, the commission allowed him compensation for a permanent partial disability of 10 per cent., amounting to the sum of $833.20. He claimed that the allowance was inadequate, and again petitioned this court for a writ of review. This petition was denied on October 17, 1924. A petition for rehearing in the Supreme Court was then filed. This petition was also denied by that court. On June 3, 1924, Saleneek again applied to respondent commission for further compensation. This proceeding was predicated upon the claim that the hernia had increased in size, and that certain back trouble had developed as a result thereof. A hearing was had by the commission. Upon such hearing, three of the physicians who had previously examined petitioner filed reports. One of them in his report stated in effect that the hernia was larger, but the other two found no material change in the condition thereof; one reporting that he could hardly find the hernia at all. With this conflict before it, the commission called two other physicians to examine petitioner. Their reports are to the effect that there had been no increase in the size of the hernia since the previous award. The commission, in accordance with this testimony, found that the evidence was insufficient to establish as a fact that the applicant's ventral hernia was any worse than it was at the time of the decision as to the extent of his disability on March 21, 1924, and he had not, therefore, suffered any new and further disability. It further found upon sufficient testimony that the alleged painful condition of Saleneek's back was not in anywise caused or aggravated by his injury or the treatment thereof. It is apparent that these findings are not only based upon conflicting testimony, but that such testimony preponderates in favor thereof. Saleneek applied for a rehearing, and this petition was denied on November 12, 1925. The present petition followed.

[2] A further review or analysis of the medical testimony would answer no useful purpose. There is a decided conflict therein, and, moreover, the weight of the testimony is in favor of the award. This being so, we are without power to interfere therewith.

The award is affirmed.

9. Mandamus — 100—Financial benefit to county does not justify writ of mandate requiring county auditor to transfer money from county highway improvement fund to state treasury for use by state highway commission, without authority under County Highway Act 1907 (St. 1907, p. 666; Pol. Application by the California Highway Commission for writ of mandate to T. H. Ballard, as Auditor of Modoc County. Writ denied.

Paul F. Fratessa, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Reuel A. Laird, of Alturas, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This cause is before us upon a petition filed by the California highway commission seeking a writ of mandate directing and commanding the respondent, T. H. Ballard, as the auditor of the county of Modoc, to draw his warrant upon a special fund of the county of Modoc, designated as the highway improvement fund of said county, for the transfer from said fund of the sum of $40,000 to be deposited in the proper funds of the state treasury, to be used by the California highway commission in improvement of a certain 3.7 miles of highway in the county of Modoc.

On the 1st day of July, 1919, an election was held in the county of Modoc, state of California, and at said election, held pursuant to appropriate notices given therefor, the issuance of $400,000 in bonds for the improvement of highways in the county of Modoc was authorized. The election was held under and in pursuance of an act of the Legislature known as the County Highway Commission Act, approved March 19, 1907, and acts amendatory thereof (Stats. 1907, p. 666). Pursuant to said election the board of supervisors of the county of Modoc duly appointed T. A. Walls, H. B. Stephens, and A. G. Loomis highway commissioners of the county of Modoc for the purpose of constructing the roads for which the bonds were issued. The record also shows that, pursuant to the election, bonds were issued and sold in the said sum of $400,000, and out of the funds derived from the sale of said bonds there still remains in the highway improvement fund of the county of Modoc at least the sum of $40,000. The record also shows that in the proceedings leading up to the bond election it was specified that a portion of the money to be raised from the issuance and sale of said bonds should be expended in the improvement of the 3.7 miles of highway referred to in this action.

It further appears from the record that on or about the 10th day of September, 1925, the highway commission of the county of Modoc adopted a resolution addressed to the board of supervisors of the county of Modoc, wherein they recommended that the board of supervisors of the county of Modoc request and authorize the California highway commission to take over the improvement, realignment, and construction of the said 3.7 miles of highway, and also that the said board of supervisors deposit, or cause to be deposited, to the credit of the California highway commission the sum of $40,000 derived from the sale of said bonds voted by the electors of Modoc county under the act of 1907, as above stated, transferring the same from the highway improvement fund of the county of Modoc to the treasury of the state of California, there to be deposited to the credit of the California highway commission, the same to be used by said highway commission in making the improvements contemplated on the said 3.7 miles of highway in Modoc county, returning the surplus, if any, to the county of Modoc. That on the same day, to wit, on the 10th day of September, 1925, the board of supervisors of the county of Modoc adopted a resolution purporting to transfer such funds in the following language, to wit:

"And be it further resolved, that the county of Modoc do deliver and deposit with said California highway commission the sum of $40,000 now derived from the sale of bonds voted by the electors of Modoc county under the act approved March 19, 1907, above mentioned, to pay for the construction of said repairs and improvements and incidental expenses; the balance of said sum, if any, remaining after the completion of said repairs and improvements to be returned to Modoc county."

That thereafter, and on the 6th day of January, 1926, the board of supervisors of the county of Modoc adopted a further resolution reciting the adoption of the resolution of September 10, 1925, and including therein the following:

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, in accordance with said resolution above referred to, that the Auditor of Modoc County, be and he is hereby authorized, empowered and directed to draw his warrant on the Treasurer of Modoc County payable to the California Highway Commission in the sum of $40,000.00, the same to be paid from funds derived from the sale of bonds under the Act above referred to, as provided for in said resolution adopted by this Board on the 10th day of September, 1925."

It further appears from the record that the auditor of Modoc county declined to make the transfer of funds as directed in the resolutions adopted by the board of supervisors on the ground that said transfer was unauthorized. This proceeding is prosecuted to compel the respondent, as auditor of the county of Modoc, to issue his warrant for the transfer of said funds.

The authority for said transfer is based upon the following language which appears in subdivision (d) of section 365h of the act of the Legislature approved May 19, 1925 (Stats. 1925, p. 385), to wit:

"And, further, the governing board of any county, permanent road division, or road or boulevard district or division may pay into the state treasury, as provided herein, for the purposes hereof, any funds under its jurisdiction and control subject to use for bridge, road or boulevard purposes, created by tax levy or issuance of the bonds of any such political subdivision or otherwise."

The act of 1907 providing for the improvement of highways and the issuance of bonds therefor by the several counties is a special act dealing with the construction of highways and the issuance of bonds by the several counties of the state. It provides first for the filing of a petition with the board of supervisors signed by at least 10 per cent. of freeholders who are electors of the county, praying for an election to determine the question of issuing bonds for the improvement of highways, etc.; that thereupon the board of supervisors may appoint a highway commission for the county. This highway commission is to consist of three members. What is meant by main highways is next defined in the statute. The act then specifies that immediately upon their appointment the commission shall proceed with all diligence to investigate the main public highways, determine which ones shall be improved by the issuance of bonds, the kind of improvements to be made thereon, and the estimated cost thereof, also to investigate carefully the question of laying out and constructing new public highways and to have a map showing said proposed new public highways, and the kind of improvements to be made thereon, estimated costs, etc. The act further provides for the employment of a competent engineer or engineers, and other experts to make the necessary surveys and assist the commission in determining the best material to be used and the best manner of making such improvement and the cost thereof. After these preliminaries have been completed, the commission must report to the board of supervisors, setting forth the highways proposed to be improved, describing generally the kind of improvements to be made thereon and the estimated cost of the work to be done and the amount to be raised by bonds therefor, and praying the said board of supervisors to call an election for the issuance of bonds of the county to defray the estimated costs. The statute then specifies that, if this report is adopted, the board of supervisors shall without delay call an election to determine whether bonds of the county shall be issued, and the amount recommended by the commission for the purposes stated in the report, said election to be called and held and bonds issued and sold in accordance with the provisions of law relating to the issuance, sale, and payment of county bonds. The act then provides that the proceeds of the sale of bonds shall be placed in a special fund to be known as the highway improvement fund of the county, and shall be used solely for the purposes set forth in said report; also that no moneys shall be paid out of said funds, except upon a warrant of the auditor of said county issued upon the order of the highway commission, duly allowed by the board of supervisors. Following these provisions the act contains a full and complete procedure of carrying on the improvement, giving of notices, letting of contracts, requiring of bonds for the faithful performance of contracts, that the improvements to be made shall be durable, and further general provisions not necessary to be further specified herein.

Respondent contends that the words which we have quoted from subdivision (d) of section 365h of the act approved May 19, 1925, are unconstitutional and void, as applied to any of the provisions of the County Highway Act of 1907 for the reason that the submission to the voters of the question of issuing bonds and the approval thereof by the electors carries into the proceedings all of the several provisions of the act of 1907, including the officers who may be intrusted with the expenditure of the moneys so voted as well as other provisions, and constitutes a contract with the voters which cannot be changed, altered, or modified by any subsequent act of the Legislature. Other constitutional questions have been considered which will be set forth later on in this opinion. Respondent also contends that the act of 1907 is special, is an act relating to a particular subject, and that it is not altered, amended, or changed by the general language found in the act of 1925, which we have hereinabove set forth. It is further objected that the Legislature cannot by a later act change the terms or authorize the performance different than that provided for in the original act.

[1] Section 6 of the County Highway Act of 1907, as we have seen, provides that, before the question of issuing bonds is submitted to the electors, the highway commission of the county must submit a report to the board of supervisors describing generally the kind of improvements to be made and the estimated cost thereof. By the terms of section 7 of the same act the board of supervisors must base their call for a bond election upon the report of the highway commission and for the purposes therein specified. The various provisions of the sections of the act of 1907 preceding the power given to call an election for the issuance of bonds set forth the procedure necessary to be taken, the purposes for which the bonds are to be issued, and constitute the jurisdictional basis upon which the bond issue must rest. These purposes as we shall presently see, cannot be changed.

[2] The petition filed in this matter sets forth that, in accordance with the provisions of subdivision (d) of section 365h of the Political Code, as amended in 1925, the board of supervisors of Modoc county and the highway commission of Modoc county did request the California highway commission to accept the said sum of $40,000, and to deposit the same in the state treasury, and to use and expend said funds so deposited for the construction of said 3.7 miles of road in Modoc county in accordance with the plans, specifications, and regulations for the construction, realignment, repair, and improvement of said road as set forth in said proceeding for the sale of said bonds, etc. This statement in the petition would be sufficient to show that the money is proposed to be used for the same purposes by the California highway commission, as voted by the electors of Modoc county, were it not for the fact that immediately following this statement the petitioner sets forth the resolutions adopted both by the highway commission and the board of supervisors of the county of Modoc, which fails so to provide. The resolution of the highway commission reads:

"That your honorable board request and authorize the California highway commission to cause such plans, specifications, estimates, surveys, and maps to be prepared as may be necessary for the repair and improvement of said road, and that said board further request and authorize said California highway commission to take full charge of said repairs and improvements, to call for bids, etc., to do all things which the said California highway commission may deem necessary for the early and full completion of said repairs and improvements proposed to said road," etc.

The resolution described the road as follows:

"Beginning where said survey leaves the present travelled road at Station 428+00 near what is known as the Surprise Valley Station, and continuing to the point where said survey enters the said present traveled road at Station 673+50 near what is known as the Bowers Ranch on Joseph Creek, in Modoc county, Cal., a total distance of 3.7 miles."

The resolution adopted by the board of supervisors uses the same general language, and leaves the question of the kind of improvement to be made wholly and entirely to the California highway commission. So far as the resolutions adopted by the county highway commission and the board of supervisors of the county of Modoc are concerned, there is nothing which indicates or requires the California highway commission to make the kind of improvement upon the road in question which constitutes the basis of the bond issue submitted to the voters of Modoc county. It may be true that the California highway commission would make the same kind of improvement, but there is nothing in the procedure taken requiring such to be done. These resolutions were undoubtedly drafted and adopted by the respective boards in conformity with the language of subdivision (d) of section 365h of the Political Code, as amended in 1925. Said subdivision empowers the highway commission to cause plans, specifications, and estimates to be prepared for the repair and improvement of highways, etc., and, after providing for the acceptance of funds, further provides:

"And the California highway commission shall use and expend the funds so deposited for the construction of bridges, roads or boulevards situated within such political subdivision, in accordance with the plans and specifications and other terms as are mutually agreed upon by said commission, on behalf of the state of California, and such governing board."

Whether the same kind of improvement shall be made as that submitted to the electors upon the bond election is an unmentioned matter, and appears to be left wholly to the mutual agreement of the California highway commission and the governing board of the county or road district, as the case may be.

[3] The law is well settled that, where by special taxes, bond issue, or the like, a special fund is raised for a particular purpose, it cannot be used for a different purpose. Ann. County of So- noma, 189 Cal. 343, and cases cited on page 348, 208 P. 117.

[4] The objection that the proviso found in subdivision (d) of section 365h of the Political Code, as amended in 1925, if applied to proceedings taken and had under the County Highway Act of 1907, would work a prohibited violation of contract by the Constitution, in changing the personnel of the officers, or changing the officers by whom the money is to be expended, seems to us untenable. The language of the Supreme Court, in deciding the case of In re Wetmore, 99 Cal. 146, 33 P. 769, is based upon this point. The court there said:

"The indebtedness is not to be incurred, nor are the bonds to be issued until after the voters of the municipality have so directed, but as it is the vote of the electors which determines that they shall be issued, it is immaterial to them what officers of the city carry out this vote."

The question there presented was as to what officers should carry out the purposes for which bonds of the city of Oakland were issued; the purpose being to erect certain school buildings. So long as the school buildings were erected according to the provisions of the bond election, the purpose of the election would be accomplished, which was the real contract, and the agency by which the work was to be carried on was an immaterial matter. The same principle was recognized in the case of Conlin v. Board of Supervisors, 99 Cal. 17, 33 P. 753, 21 L. R. A. 474, 37 Am. St. Rep. 17. See, also, Blanding v. Burr, 13 Cal. 343; Creighton v. San Francisco, 42 Cal. 446; Beals v. Amador County, 35 Cal. 624.

[5] We will next consider the objections which are fundamental in their character and do not affect merely the legal sufficiency of the proceedings had and taken by the various boards of the county of Modoc in attempting to make the transfer of funds. As we have seen, the act of 1907 deals with the special subject of the improvement of highways by the several counties of the state. A complete scheme for such improvement is contained within the various sections of the act covering the inception to the completion of both proceedings and the work contemplated. It sets forth how the legal machinery shall be set in operation, how the money shall be raised, how it shall be expended, and the manner in which the expenditure of the money shall be accounted for, the requirement of security for the faithful expenditure of the money by the giving of bonds, etc. The words quoted from subdivision (d) of section 365h of the Political Code, as amended, and as well the entire wording of the section, are general in terms, and do not purport to be an amendment of any of the provisions and requirements of the County Highway Act of 1907. Again, the language of the act of 1907 is mandatory in most of its provisions, and especially in all of its provisions affecting the issuance of bonds, the carrying on of the work, the expenditure of the money and accounting therefor. The proviso in subdivision (d) of section 365h of the Political Code, as amended in 1925, urged as authority for the transfer of said funds, is purely permissive in its terms, and does not purport to modify, amend, or repeal any of the provisions of the County Highway Act of 1907.

[6, 7] It is only by implication that the proviso contained in the section referred to of the act of 1925 can be held to be a repeal or amendment or modification of any portion of the act of 1907, and we do not need to cite authorities supporting the rule, that repeals by implication are not favored. Again, as we have said, the act of 1907 is a special act relating to the improvement of highways by the issuance of bonds, and is complete in itself, while the proviso in the amended subdivision of section 365h of the Political Code is general in its terms. In such cases, the rule is that they should first, if possible, be so construed as to maintain the integrity of both, but, if there is an irreconcilable conflict, the special act prevails. If there were not other valid objections, we think the proviso in the section of the Political Code referred to could be given effect as to money not raised in accordance with the provisions of the act of 1907. In the case of People v. Pacific Imp. Co., 130 Cal. 442, 62 P. 739, in speaking of general and special acts, the court said:

"Where a special and a general statute treat of the same subject, the special act will control as to its special provisions, and will not be deemed repealed by implication by a later general statute, although the terms of the general statute, taken strictly, would include the terms of the special statute, if they are not irreconcilably inconsistent, and if there is no manifest intention of the Legislature to repeal or alter the special statute."

It may be here stated that there is nothing in the act approved May 19, 1925, indicating an intention on the part of the Legislature to repeal or amend any of the provisions of the County Highway Act of 1907. In the case of Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 648, 128 P. 9, 18, in passing upon the subject of repeals by implication, this court quoted from the case of People v. Pacific Imp. Co., supra, and followed the rule set forth by Commissioner Cooper, which we think applicable here:

"It is the established rule of construction that the law does not favor a repeal by implication, but that where there are two or more provisions relating to the same subject-matter they must, if possible, be construed so as to maintain the integrity of both. It is also the rule that where two statutes treat of the same subject, one being special and the other general, unless they are irreconcilably inconsistent, the latter, although latest in date, will not be held to have repealed the former, but the special act will prevail in its application to the subject matter as far as coming within its particular provisions."

Therein is quoted Judge Cooley (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations [6th Ed.] 182), wherein he said:

"The repugnancy between two statutes should be very clear to warrant a court holding that the one later in time repeals the other, when it does not in terms purport to do so. This rule has peculiar force in the case of laws of special and local application, which are never to be deemed repealed by general legislation except upon the most unequivocal manifestation of intent to that effect."

See, also, Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 274, and Miller v. Engle, 3 Cal. App. 330, 85 P. 159.

It is submitted that no intention was actually manifested by the Legislature, in the said amendment of 1925, to repeal section 1254 or 1257, Political Code, and, in the light of the foregoing familiar rule of construction, it should be held that no repeal by implication was effected.

[8] The same rule is adopted in the case of Cohn v. Isensee, 45 Cal. App. 531, 188 P. 279. Section 24 of article 4 of the state Constitution requires that every act shall embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, etc., setting forth further that, if part of an act is not embraced in the title, such act shall be held void only as to the part thereof not expressed in the title. The title of the Act of May, 1925, reads as follows:

"An act to amend section three hundred sixty-five c of the Political Code of the state of California and to add sections three hundred sixty-five d, three hundred sixty-five e, three hundred sixty-five f, three hundred sixty-five g, three hundred sixty-five h, three hundred sixty-five i, three hundred sixty-five j, three hundred sixty-five k, three hundred sixty-five l, three hundred sixty-five m, three hundred sixty-five n, three hundred sixty-five o and three hundred sixty-five p to the said Code, all referring to the powers and duties of the California highway commission."

[9] There is nothing in the title relating to the Highway Act of 1907 purporting to be an amendment or repeal of any of the provisions thereof, nor is there anything in the title which we have just quoted referring to the powers and duties of boards of supervisors or governing board of any county, permanent road division, or road or boulevard district. There is nothing in the title which we have set forth which calls attention to the fact that the Legislature is providing for a different disposition of the funds raised by bond elections held under and in accordance with the County Highway Act of 1907, or that any amendment of that act is contemplated, or that any officer is to be relieved of the duty and obligation to account for the expenditure of funds raised at such bond election. The title of the Act of May 19, 1925, expressly sets forth that the amendments contemplated are all referring to the powers and duties of the California highway commission, thus limiting the scope of the act. Under such conditions we do not readily see how it can be held that the proviso found in subdivision (d) of section 365h of the Political Code, as amended in 1925, can be held to amend by implication the County Highway Act of 1907 specifically dealing with the construction of highways by counties. That it would financially benefit the county of Modoc by enhancing general government aid, however commendable, does not justify the issuance of the writ in the face of want of authority which we have considered and the objections which we think valid.

The petition for the writ is denied.

PEOPLE v. RODWAY. (Cr. 1268.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 3, 1926.)

1. Criminal law §563—Elements of "corpus delicti" are certain facts forming its basis and existence of criminal agency as to cause of them.

Elements of "corpus delicti" are certain facts forming its basis and existence of criminal agency as to cause of them, and it is not essential to show that crime charged was committed by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Corpus Delicti.]

2. Burglary §31—Evidence in prosecution for burglary of an apartment held sufficient to prove corpus delicti.

In prosecution for burglary of an apartment, evidence showing that there was a burglarious entry, and that articles were removed through a criminal agency, held sufficient to prove corpus delicti.

3. Burglary §31—Evidence in prosecution for burglary of a store held sufficient to prove corpus delicti.

In prosecution for burglary of a store, evidence showing that store had been entered, and that owner had given no one permission to do so, or to remove any of property taken therefrom, held sufficient proof of corpus delicti.

4. Criminal law §722½—Remarks of prosecuting attorney acquiescing in proper admonition of court that defendant's prior conviction for highway robbery went only to his credibility as a witness, and then stating his view of effect of evidence under charges on which defendant was on trial, held not misconduct.

Prosecuting attorney, who, in referring to defendant's prior conviction for highway robbery, bery, was properly instructed by court to confine reference solely as going to credibility of defendant as a witness, held not guilty of misconduct by thereafter asking jury to consider prior conviction solely as going to defendant's credibility, and then stating his view of effect of the evidence under charges on which defendant was on trial, especially where no exception was taken, and no objection made, or court requested to admonish jury concerning such remarks.

5. Criminal law ⚡442—Court properly admitted contents of check taken and filled in by defendant charged with burglary, and cashed by payee, and evidence sufficiently connected him therewith to show that it had passed through his hands.

In prosecution for burglary, in which defendant had taken a blank numbered check and filled it out, and had it cashed by payee, allowing contents of check to go to jury, held not error, in view of identification of check by owner, and that defendant first told payee that he had mailed a check to her, and was told by payee that she had received check and had cashed it, and that he accepted from her proceeds thereof after deduction by her, sufficiently connecting him with check to show that it had passed through his hands.

6. Criminal law ⚡442—Permitting payee of check taken by defendant and filled out by him to testify to contents of letter which came with check held not erroneous, where evidence showed that check had passed through defendant's hands, though it was not shown that payee was acquainted with defendant's handwriting.

In prosecution for burglary, in which defendant had taken a blank numbered check, and filled it out, and cashed it through payee, permitting payee to testify to contents of letter which came to her with check held not error, where evidence sufficiently connected defendant with check to show that it had passed through his hands, although it was not shown that payee was acquainted with defendant's handwriting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliott Craig, Judge.

Allan Rodway was convicted under separate counts of burglary in the first and second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. C. Hunting, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendant was charged, in two counts, with the crimes of burglary. Under the first count he was convicted of burglary in the second degree. Under the second count he was convicted of burglary in the first degree. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Appellant made a confession of his guilt of each of the crimes with which he was charged. He contends as to each count that the corpus delicti was not proven, by evidence aside from that contained in the confession, in that there was a failure to prove that he was connected with the commission of the crime. Such a showing, however, is not a necessary item in the proof of the corpus delicti.

"The two elements of corpus delicti are: (1) Certain facts forming its basis; and (2) the existence of criminal agency as the cause of them. To establish the corpus delicti it is not essential to show that the crime charged was committed by the defendant." People v. Flores, 34 Cal App. 393, 167 P. 413.

See, also, People v. Britt, 62 Cal. App. 674, 217 P. 767.

[2] We are not certain that, irrespective of the question just mentioned, appellant intends to present the point that the evidence was insufficient, aside from the confession, to prove the corpus delicti. We shall assume, however, that he does. The evidence under the first count, excluding that embraced in the confession, showed, according to appellant's brief, that one McCaleb and his wife resided in a certain apartment; that they both left the apartment at 8 o'clock on a given morning, after having locked the doors of the place; that they could not remember whether or not they locked their bathroom window before their departure; that they returned to the apartment at 6 o'clock on the evening of the same day; that on their return there were missing from the apartment certain canceled checks and insurance papers, a cape and a coat, a black handbag, certain articles of old jewelry, two or three pairs of shoes, and two tie pins; that on their return their bathroom window "had been pulled down even with the bottom section, and was still open"; and that on their return "there were finger prints and foot prints on the bathroom window in dust on the top of the window." In addition to this showing in appellant's brief, respondent directs our attention to evidence to the effect that the missing articles were in the apartment when the McCalebs departed in the morning; that the old jewelry consisted of some rings and a lavalliere; that one of the articles which were missed was a fur; that Mrs. McCaleb saw the fur in the apartment on the morning when she and her husband left the apartment; that she saw the coat and the cape there on the preceding evening; and that neither of the McCalebs had given permission to any one to enter the apartment or remove any of the missing articles therefrom. This evidence was sufficient to prove the corpus delicti, as it tended to show that there was a burglarious entry of the apartment, and that the articles were removed through a criminal agency. There is nothing in People v. Vertrees, 169 Cal. 404, 146 P. 890, which precludes such a view.

[3] In proof of the corpus delicti under the second count of the charge, there was evidence which tended to show that the complaining witness, one Gloege, was a storekeeper; that he closed and locked his place of business at 6:30 o'clock on a certain evening; and that he reopened it at 7:30 the following morning; that, when he entered the store in the morning and went to his desk, he found his cash drawer partly open, and his cash boxes gone from it; that he had locked the drawer on leaving the night before, but that on his return he found it pried open; that the glass in the back door to his premises was broken; and that the door was unlocked and unbolted, having been fastened from the inside by means of a key and a bolt; that the glass was broken in such a manner that it "gave him just room enough to reach on the inside and unlock and unbolt the door"; that Gloege, on his return to the store in the morning, missed several articles of small personal property, some checks, one of which was for the sum of $110, and cash in the amount of about $114.65; and that he had given no one permission to enter his place of business or to remove therefrom any of the property mentioned. This evidence furnished complete proof of the corpus delicti.

[4] During the trial appellant testified that he had been convicted of a felony, and that the felony was highway robbery. In the course of the argument the following occurred:

"A Deputy District Attorney: Now, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, you are dealing here with a self-confessed felon, a man who has taken the stand and admitted he has been convicted of highway robbery. He has been caught here in two burglaries committed in this county.

"Counsel for Defendant: I think that is improper argument, if it please the court. That is only relevant as to his credibility as a witness, and so forth.

"The Court: Counsel is correct in his statement. Confine the remarks about prior conviction of a felony to merely the force and effect of impeaching the defendant's own testimony. * * * It only goes to the credibility of the witness, and the jurors are so instructed.

"The Deputy: Very well, then, ladies and gentlemen. Let's merely consider the question of the fact that he is a highway robber as going to the credibility of his testimony. Nevertheless, he has been caught at the present time in the commission of two burglaries."

It is now contended that the deputy district attorney, in what he said in his argument after the remarks of the court, was guilty of misconduct. In that portion of his argument, however, the officer merely acquiesced in the very proper admonition of the court, and then, in the last sentence of the excerpt from the record, stated his view of the effect of the evidence under the charges upon which appellant was on trial. There was here no misconduct. It is not amiss to observe, also, that no exception was taken to that part of the argument to which objection is now made, nor was any request presented to the court to admonish the jury concerning it.

One of the checks which was missed by the complaining witness Gloege, when he arrived at his place of business on the morning after it was burglarized, bore the rubber-stamped number 120. The number had been stamped on the check by Gloege himself, but at the time it was abstracted from his place of business it was otherwise blank. While he was on the witness stand, Gloege was shown a check bearing a rubber-stamped number 120, but which, in addition, had been otherwise filled out. It was then dated December 18, 1924, which was a date two weeks later than that on which Gloege's store was burglarized, it was payable to Mrs. M. Moyer, was drawn for $75, and bore a signature, "A. Gloege." The complaining witness testified that this signature was not in his handwriting, but the check as filled out was identified by him as the same check, numbered 120, which he had missed from his premises, although he testified on cross-examination that the rubber stamp with which he had stamped the number 120 was of an ordinary kind, not specially made for him, and bought by him on the open market. He also testified, however, that the number on the filled-out check was of the same size and appearance as the one which he had placed on the blank check which was stolen from him. The check, as filled out, was marked for identification in connection with Gloege's testimony. It should be remarked that, in addition to the matters above stated, the check bore the indorsements, "Mrs. M. Moyer" and "Mrs. W. A. Moyer."

Mrs. Mary Moyer was examined as a witness for the prosecution. She testified that the indorsements on the check numbered 120 were in her handwriting; that the check came to her through the mail on December 21, 1924; that she had a conversation with appellant the day before the check was received by her, in which he asked her if she had then received "the check," and she told him she had not; that the envelope which contained the check when it came to her also contained a letter, but that she had destroyed the letter; that on the next day after she got the check she had a second conversation with appellant, during which he again asked if she had received the "check," and she told him that she had, and that she had cashed it; that in the letter which came to her with the check, "He just stated he had sent me the check and told me to get it cashed and keep from the amount of the check when I got it cashed what he owed me, and he would meet me over at the Pacific Electric Station, and I should give him the rest of the money, which I did"; that her second conversation with appellant occurred at the Pacific Electric Station; and that the check identified by Gloege was the same check that she received through the mail. This testimony went in over the objections of appellant. The check was received in evidence; also over appellant's objection.

[5] Appellant contends that the trial court erred in allowing the contents of the check to go to the jury. We think not. The identification of the paper by Gloege, the fact that appellant first told Mrs. Moyer that he had mailed a check to her, the fact that he asked her later if she had received it, and was told that she had and that she had cashed it, the fact that he accepted from her the proceeds of the particular check she had received after she had deducted "what he owed" her—all these circumstances, we think, sufficiently connected him with the paper, and showed that it had passed through his hands.

[6] It is also contended that the court erred in permitting Mrs. Moyer to testify to the contents of the letter which came to her with the check. We think the chain of circumstances just mentioned is sufficient to uphold the action of the court in this regard, although it was not shown that Mrs. Moyer was acquainted with appellant's handwriting.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliott Craig, Judge.

Allan Rodway was convicted of forgery under two counts, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. C. Hunting, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendant was charged in two counts with the crimes of forgery. The first count related to a check signed "J. A. McCaleb," payable to S. De Giric and indorsed "S. De Giric." The second count concerned a check signed "J. A. McCaleb," payable to H. Foley and indorsed "H. Foley." Defendant was found guilty on both counts. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] It is contended that, aside from certain extrajudicial statements made by appellant, the evidence was insufficient to prove the corpus delicti under either count. Excluding the extrajudicial admissions of appellant, there was evidence under each count which tended to prove that an individual named J. A. McCaleb had known appellant for more than a year prior to the dates upon which the crimes charged against him were alleged to have been committed; that at one time appellant had resided "next door" to McCaleb; that the latter did not make the signature appended to either of the checks involved in the charges; and that he had authorized no one to make either of them. This evidence was sufficient to prove the corpus delicti under each count. People v. Flores, 34 Cal. App. 393, 167 P. 413; People v. Lundin, 120 Cal. 308, 52 P. 807; People v. McGlade, 139 Cal. 66, 72 P. 600.

[2, 3] For the purpose of showing guilty knowledge, the trial court admitted in evidence a check signed "A. Gloege," and made payable to Mrs. M. Moyer. It is insisted that in this respect the trial court erred, for the reason that, aside from the extrajudicial admissions of appellant, there was no sufficient evidence that the check was a forgery. But the admissions of appellant are not properly to be laid aside in determining whether the check was admissible. The corpus delicti having been proven under each of the charges made in the respective counts, by independent evidence, the extrajudicial statements of appellant were proper to be considered by the jury in determining any questions arising in the case, and to which the statements had an application (8 Cal. Jur. tit. "Criminal Law," §§ 248, 249, and cases cited); and there was evidence that appellant admitted that he had "written a check on Mr. Gloege's account, forging Mr. Gloege's name." In addition to this admission, however, there was evidence that an individual named A. Gloege had not affixed the signature to the check now in question; that he had not authorized any one to affix it; that he had an account in the bank on which the check was drawn; that the payee of the check, Mrs. Moyer, received it from appellant; and that she cashed it and gave appellant a part of the proceeds. The Gloege check was properly received in evidence.

[4] It is alleged in the second count of the charge against appellant that he uttered, passed, and published the check therein mentioned. It is now contended that the evidence was insufficient to prove this allegation. There was testimony that appellant presented the check to a teller at a bank for payment; that he then said his name was H. Foley; that, upon being asked to identify himself, he fled; and that he was pursued several blocks, and was then caught and arrested. This evidence proved the allegation in question (12 Cal. Jur. 655, 656, and cases cited), although we do not decide whether it was necessary to be proven, in view of the fact that it was alleged and proven that appellant was guilty of forgery in affixing the name "J. A. McCaleb" as a signature to the instrument in question.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc., against C. Emerzian and another for materials furnished, labor performed, and for commissions. Judgment for defendants on the original cause of action and on their cross-complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. Savage, of Fresno, and Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck and Morrison, Hohfeld, Foerster, Shuman & Clark, all of San Francisco (H. A. Judy, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

L. L. Cory and W. H. Stammer, both of Fresno, for respondents.

HART, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover from defendants the total sum of $20,110.96, alleged to be due and owing to plaintiff for shock and other material furnished defendants and for labor performed in connection therewith by plaintiff and for commissions on the sale of a certain specified quantity of grapes and certain labor performed and materials furnished necessary to the handling of said fruit for the purposes of shipment and sale.

The issues were made by the complaint, the answer thereto, the cross-complaint of defendants, asking for affirmative relief and the answer of plaintiff to the cross-complaint. Findings were in favor of defendants, and, accordingly, judgment was rendered and entered that "plaintiff take nothing by its complaint, and that defendants do have and recover judgment against said plaintiff * * * for the sum of $10,635.22," which sum includes interest on the sum of $10,204.50 (the principal sum found by the court to be due defendants from plaintiff) at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from December 1, 1922, to the date of the entry of the judgment. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, on a bill of exceptions.

The plaintiff is and had been for many years prior to the time of the commencement of this action engaged in the business of buying and selling fruit of all kinds and also handling fruit for growers on consignment—that is, receiving fruit from fruit growers and selling the same for the latter on a commission basis. The defendants were, and had been, for a considerable time prior to the date of the filing of the complaint herein, engaged in the business of growing grapes of many varieties in what is designated as the "Modesto district," near the town of Sexton, Stanislaus county.

The following extract from the opening brief of counsel for the plaintiff embraces in part an accurate general statement of the facts of this controversy:

"During the grape season of 1922 there was in plaintiff's employ one Charles Boysen, who was the local manager of the plaintiff in the Modesto district—the district within which defendants' farm was located. Prior to May 10, 1922, Mr. Boysen had interviewed C. Emerzian with reference to the purchase of the grapes then growing upon the Sexton farm. Mr. Boysen was acting under instructions from R. Krasnow, president of the plaintiff corporation, with reference to price, and his negotiations with C. Emerzian did not come to a successful conclusion for the reason that a mutually satisfactory price could not be agreed upon. At Mr. Boysen's suggestion, Mr. C. Emerzian went with him to the Fresno main office of the plaintiff on May 10, 1922, for the purpose of interviewing Mr. R. Krasnow with reference to the proposed purchase of grapes. Accordingly, an interview was had in plaintiff's Fresno office on May 10, 1922, there being present Mr. R. Krasnow, C. Emerzian, Charles Boysen, and James Krasnow, a son of R. Krasnow. At such conference prices were agreed upon, and a written contract of purchase and sale was entered into between plaintiff and defendants. Said contract was partly in writing, and it was in part a printed form that had been prepared for plaintiff's general uses without reference to any particular transaction."

Such of the provisions of said contract as are necessary to have before us in considering and passing upon the legal propositions by which it is sought to support the appeal herein read as follows:

"May 10, 1922.

"In consideration of the price herein specified C. & G. Emerzian, the seller, has sold, and R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc., the buyer, have bought all of the fruit crops hereinafter specified that the buyer shall find suitable for eastern markets, produced during the year 1922 on the following described premises, 1 mile south of Sexton:

Quantity, Tons.	Variety.	Price Per Ton.
225	Alicantes	125.00
250	Zinfandel	70.00
250	Tokays and Black Prince	70.00

"The seller agrees to pick and deliver all of the said fruit at his own expense in good condition, entirely free from mildew, honeydew, rain, or sand damage, or any damage whatsoever, and at the times and place or places directed by the buyer, and not later than No. 15, 1922. * * *

"This contract is understood by the parties hereto to constitute an immediate sale, transferring title to buyer, but until delivery has been completed seller agrees to, and does, assume all risk of loss, depreciation or damage, of whatsoever nature, to any undelivered part of said crop.

"Seller declares he is the sole and absolute owner of the crops herein sold, and the sale of the real property shall not affect the right of the buyer herein.

"The buyer agrees to pay for said fruit upon the completion of delivery thereof and presentation of weight tags therefor, and subject to the following written conditions, which is hereby made a part of this contract:

"Advance of $8,000 on said crop. If cars loaded other points buyer agrees to pay for hauling.

"Delivery to be made on board cars at Sexton. Cash on delivery $8,000. Advance apply on last delivery. To start picking Tokay as soon as pass inspection. Buyer agrees to furnish boxes.

"To start picking wine grapes between 5 and 15 of Sept., 1922. Time is the essence of this contract.

"Executed in triplicate. [Signed] C. Emerzian, A. G. Emerzian, Seller. Address: 3211 Tulare St., Fresno. R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc., Buyer, by Boysen. No. 766. Original."

The defendants, in the months of September, October, and November, 1922, delivered to the local office of the plaintiff at Sexton, Stanislaus county, and the latter received and accepted, a total of 1,020 tons of grapes of the varieties specified in the contract, or approximately 300 tons of such grapes in excess of the tonnages specified in the above contract. The controversy between the parties to this action relates to or involves the excess quantity of grapes of the varieties specified in the written contract delivered to and received and accepted by plaintiff.

The complaint is in two counts. In the first it is alleged that defendants are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $5,317.49, for shock and other material furnished by the plaintiff to the defendants, in the months of September and October, 1922, at the special instance and request of the latter, and for work and labor performed by the plaintiff in the same months for the defendants, said sum, it is further alleged, representing the reasonable value of the materials so furnished and the labor so performed.

The second cause of action (set forth in paragraph 2 of the second count of the complaint) is founded on an alleged oral agreement, in pursuance of the terms of which the defendants delivered to the plaintiff approximately 619,545 pounds of Tokay and Alicante grapes on consignment, to be and which were by plaintiff packed, loaded and shipped to Eastern markets and sold for and on account of defendants, upon the agreement and understanding that plaintiff should, from the proceeds of the sales so made, deduct and retain for itself, in addition to costs and expenses necessarily incident to the shipping of said grapes to Eastern markets and selling the same therein, 7 per cent. of the gross amount received for said grapes as a commission for the services of plaintiff so rendered. The total net sum received by plaintiff on account of the sale of said grapes (so the complaint alleged) was $2,474.71, which sum, it is further alleged, the plaintiff applied to the partial payment of an indebtedness of defendants to plaintiff in the sum of $17,268.18, which sum, upon the completion of the arrangements between plaintiff and defendants for the sale of said grapes on consignment or a commission basis, and prior to the shipment and sale of said grapes, was loaned to defendants by plaintiff and repayable on demand. There was left remaining due plaintiff on account of said loan, the complaint further alleges, the sum of $14,793.47, making the total indebtedness of defendants to plaintiff on account of the claims set up in both causes of action the sum of $20,110.46, for which, as above stated, judgment is prayed.

The defendants filed an answer and a cross-complaint. By the first named pleading, and answering the first count thereof, it is admitted that plaintiff, at the times mentioned in the complaint, furnished defendants with the materials mentioned in the complaint and performed the labor therein alleged to have been by it performed for defendants, but denies that the reasonable value of said materials and labor was the sum of $5,317.49, as alleged in the complaint, but alleges that the reasonable value of said materials and labor was the sum of $4,534.77, and no sum in excess thereof. The answer denies the averment of the complaint that plaintiff demanded of defendants payment of the sum of $5,317.49, the amount claimed by plaintiff as the sum due it from defendants for shook and other materials, labor, etc., or any other sum, denies that defendants are indebted to plaintiff in any sum whatsoever, but alleges that, at the time of the commencement of this action, there was, "and now is, due, owing, and unpaid to these defendants from the plaintiff" the total net sum of $10,017.90.

The second count or cause of action set up by the complaint is met by the answer as follows:

"These defendants deny that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendants, or either of them, during the fall of 1922, or at any other time, or at all, accepted from the defendants, or either of them, any Tokay or Alicante grapes on consignment, to be packed, loaded, or shipped to any Eastern market, or otherwise, or at all, or sold for or on account of these defendants, or either of them, or that any arrangement was ever entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants, or either of them, to deduct from the proceeds of any grapes whatsoever, handled on consignment, the cost of any shook, materials or labor for packing, or otherwise, or at all, or the cost of loading, freight, refrigeration, or any cost whatsoever, of delivering any grapes to any Eastern or other market, or to any buyer, or buyers, anywhere, or that the plaintiff was to deduct any per cent. of any gross or other amount received for any grapes for handling the same, as commission, or otherwise, or at all, for plaintiff's services, or to deduct any sums whatsoever owing by the defendants or either of them to the plaintiff.

"And these defendants further deny that the plaintiff, after any arrangement or arrangements for handling any grapes had been made, as alleged in said second cause of action, or otherwise, or at all, at the special or other instance or request of the defendants, or either of them, loaned to the defendants, or either of them, repayable at any time, any sum whatsoever, or that the net or other amount received from any grapes, in any manner handled under commission by the plaintiff for the defendants, or either of them, after deducting any costs or commissions, was or is the sum of $2,474.71, or any sum at all, or that any such sum, or any sum at all, has been applied by the plaintiff on account of any indebtedness whatsoever due, owing or unpaid from these defendants, or either of them, for any goods or grapes handled on commission, or that there is any sum whatsoever due, owing or unpaid to the plaintiff from the defendants, or either of them in any manner whatsoever."

The cross-complaint alleges that defendants delivered to plaintiff a certain quantity of grapes at the agreed price of $92,536.15, that of said amount the plaintiff paid defendants the sum of $82,518.25, and that "there is now due, owing and unpaid from the plaintiff to these defendants the sum of $10,017.90, with interest," etc. Judgment is asked for the last-named sum.

Answering the cross-complaint, the plaintiff denies that defendants sold and delivered grapes to it at the agreed price of $92,536.15, but alleges that it agreed to buy of defendants 725 tons of grapes, for which it agreed to pay defendants the sum of $63,125, "which said grapes plaintiff did receive, accept and pay for in full, in accordance with said contract"; that, other than the grapes so purchased and received, plaintiff did not at any time purchase from defendants any grapes; denies that it is indebted to defendants in the sum of $10,017.90, but alleges that defendants are indebted to it as set forth in its complaint.

The court found, among other things, "that the allegations of paragraph 2 of the second cause of action set forth and described in plaintiff's amended complaint are not true, and that the allegations and denials in defendant's answer to said second cause of action are true." It was further found that the defendants sold to plaintiff at the time mentioned in the pleadings certain grapes at the agreed price of $92,536.15, of which sum the plaintiff paid defendants the sum of $78,000 cash and the sum of $5,407.69, "a credit due the plaintiff from the defendants" on account of the claim set forth in the first count of the amended complaint for shook and other materials, work and labor, furnished to and performed for defendants by plaintiff. It was also found that another item of $1,076.04 was due defendants from plaintiff on account of the sale of certain "Carrigan" grapes by plaintiff for defendants on consignment, and which item is included in the total sum alleged in the answer to be due from plaintiff to defendants.

The appeal, as may readily be discerned from the issues as made by the several pleadings, presents two major points for decision

The first arises upon the position of defendants at the trial that the written contract of sale and purchase covered and was intended by the parties to cover or include all the grapes of the varieties specified in said instrument produced by the defendants on the premises described therein during the year 1922. The second point arises from the contention of the defendants that, conceding, as plaintiff contends is true, that the specification in the contract of the tonnage of each of the varieties of grapes therein mentioned definitely fixed and was understood and intended by the parties to fix and limit the quantity of each kind of such grapes that the plaintiff obligated itself to purchase, the latter, having accepted several hundred tons of the grapes of the designated varieties grown on the premises described in the contract in excess of the tonnages specified therein, without any other agreement or contract as to the terms or conditions upon which it was to receive and accept such excess tonnages than the written contract of May 10, 1922, it is, nevertheless, bound, under a familiar principle of law, to pay defendants for such excess at the prices specified in said contract.

The first point was raised in the court below upon objections by plaintiff to parol testimony offered by defendants and allowed by the court, upon the theory that the language of the contract was ambiguous in that respect, to the effect that it was expressly agreed and understood by and between the parties, and that they intended that the written contract should so provide, that the whole of the crops of grapes of the varieties designated in the contract grown by defendants upon the land described therein during the year 1922 should be covered by said contract of sale; or, in other words, that the plaintiff, by said contract, purchased all the grapes of the varieties specified which might be produced by defendants on said premises during said year at the prices stated in the contract. The objections by plaintiff to the testimony so offered were, manifestly, grounded upon the proposition that, as to the quantities of the grapes of the kinds specified which the plaintiff agreed to purchase, the language of the contract was clear, unambiguous, and definite, in that therein the amount of each variety of grapes so purchased and intended to be purchased was expressly limited to the tonnages specifically set forth in said contract; that therefore the effect of the allowance of parol testimony to show that plaintiff agreed to purchase any amount of each of the specified varieties of grapes in excess of the tonnages so specifically stated would be to vary or change the terms of the written contract in a vital particular, and thus set at defiance the inhibitions of section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 1625 of the Civil Code.

We feel no reluctance in declaring that there is much force, apparently, in the contention of defendants that the written contract, in so far as it attempts to express the intention of the parties as to the quantity or amount of grapes of the varieties therein specified to be covered thereby—whether it was intended that the quantity sold should be limited to the tonnages definitely stated in the instrument or to embrace all the grapes of the varieties named produced by defendants on the premises described during the year 1922—is ambiguous, and that it was necessary to remove or clear up the ambiguity by means of parol testimony. Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, subd. 2. Further consideration of this point, however, may be waived, inasmuch as we have arrived at the conclusion that, upon the evidence and the findings, the point secondly made and urged by defendants is sound and well taken, and that, upon the theory of the case thus afforded, the judgment must be sustained.

[1-3] Obviously, a purchaser of a commodity under a contract definitely fixing the exact maximum amount or quantity of such commodity which the purchaser thereby agrees to buy cannot be compelled to accept from the seller any amount or quantity of such commodity in excess of that specified and fixed by the contract. Of course, in simple terms this only means that a party to a contract is not legally obligated to do or perform more than his contract requires of him. The proposition is trite. But it is equally true that, where a purchaser under such a contract does accept a larger amount or quantity of the commodity than that definitely fixed by and specified in the contract as the maximum amount or quantity thereby agreed to be purchased, in the absence of a specific agreement to the contrary or one providing for other prices or arrangements as to the prices to be received by the seller, he is legally bound and may be held liable to the seller for all excess amount or quantity of such commodity so accepted at the prices fixed and stipulated in the original contract. The rule is in effect and substance thus formulated by the authorities and the decisions: That the offer or delivery by the seller to the purchaser of a larger quantity of the commodity than that expressly and specifically contracted for must be regarded as a new offer by the seller, and, while the buyer may, of course, reject such offer, if he accepts the excess quantity, then such acceptance is to be regarded as sufficient evidence of his assent to the offer at the price or prices stipulated in the original contract. "Taking the goods when he knew, or ought to have known, that they exceeded in amount what were ordered or contracted for, is sufficient evidence of assent. The obligation is, therefore, contractual, not quasi contractual. If, by the terms of the original contract or order, the price of the goods was based on their number, weight, or measure, the same rate must be paid for the larger quantity." 2 Williston on

Sales, p. 1159. See, also, Bedell v. Kowalsky, 99 Cal. 236, 237, 33 P. 904; Inman v. L. E. White L. Co., 14 Cal. App. 551, 554, 555, 112 P. 560, 561; Fleming v. Law, 28 Cal. App. 110, 117, 151 P. 385; Linger v. Wilson, 73 W. Va. 669, 80 S. E. 1108; Levino v. Moore Co., 97 App. Div. 109, 89 N. Y. S. 573; Randall v. National Ice Co., 64 Hun, 636, 19 N. Y. S. 633.¹ The last-named case was concerned with a contract for the delivery of 800 or 900 tons of ice. The party delivered 1,314 tons, and the action was for the amount in excess of that named in the contract at the price fixed therein, there being no agreement that the excess amount should be delivered at a price different from that specified in the contract. The court said:

"Having received this ice in excess of the amount called for by the contract, the law would hold the defendant liable to pay for the same, and, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, at the price stipulated in the contract."

This case was appealed to the Court of Appeals and the decision affirmed, 138 N. Y. 644, 34 N. E. 513.

In Linger v. Wilson, supra, the defendant ordered a certain quantity of grain by weight. The plaintiffs delivered a larger amount than that ordered or contracted for. After receiving the grain, defendant refused to honor a draft for the grain unless plaintiffs made a new draft allowing a claim which defendant insisted plaintiffs owed him on a previous contract between them. Plaintiffs rejected the claim on the ground that it was not based on any debt or obligation due from him to defendant. About a week after the arrival of the car containing the grain at the delivery point, and a longer time after the receipt by defendant of the invoice showing the quantity shipped, the defendant made the objection that the quantity of grain shipped was in excess of the quantity contracted for. After some controversy between the parties regarding the matter, plaintiffs proposed that defendant should take from the car the quantity actually ordered and that they would dispose of the remainder or excess amount of the grain shipped. Defendant refused to do this. Plaintiffs thereafter sold the entire quantity of grain to the best advantage, and brought an action against defendant to recover the difference between the amount received for the grain and the amount that it was worth at the contract price with defendant. Judgment passed for plaintiffs. On appeal, the Supreme Court, after declaring that the objection by defendant to receiving the grain because of failure of plaintiffs to comply with a former contract between them having no relation to the contract in suit "is no ground upon which defendant can excuse himself from complying with this latter distinct contract of purchase," said:

"Though a purchaser of goods does not order the quantity delivered to him, a sale of the whole will be implied where on receiving the goods the purchaser does not, within a reasonable time, repel the implication by returning the goods or notifying the seller that he will not accept them because of the excess of quantity. Failure to return, or to give notice of nonacceptance, amounts to an acceptance."

The same principle is applied in cases where there is an employment of the personal services of a party for a definite or stated term at an agreed and fixed rate of compensation, and the servant continues to render the same character of service which the contract calls for after the expiration of the term specified therein, and there is no new agreement. Hermann v. Littlefield, 109 Cal. 430, was such a case, and therein at page 432, 42 P. 443, it is said that:

"It is elementary that when a person performing labor at an agreed price and for a stated time continues in the same employment after the expiration of the term, without a new agreement, it is presumed by the law, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that the terms of the original contract are continued."

[4] "But," as is said in Inman v. L. E. White L. Co., supra, referring to the rule above considered, "if this were not so, plaintiffs could at least recover the reasonable value of the ties in question. No inquiry was made as to the reasonable value, but the contract itself is evidence of this and controlling in the absence of all other evidence"—citing Adams v. Burbank, 103 Cal. 646, 37 P. 640; Hermann v. Littlefield, 109 Cal. 430, 42 P. 443, supra; Donagan v. Houston, 5 Cal. App. 626, 90 P. 1073.

The findings herein bring this case clearly within the principles announced and invoked in the cases above reviewed upon either theory therein suggested, according to the nature of the action or remedy resorted to to recover for the excess quantities of grapes delivered to and accepted by the buyer—that is, whether the action was upon the contract itself or upon a quantum meruit for the recovery of the reasonable market value of the excess at the time the sale was made, of which the prices agreed upon and fixed in the contract would stand as sufficient evidence as to reasonable market value in the absence of all other evidence on that question.

[5, 6] As pointed out above, upon the question whether the parties did or did not enter into an agreement whereby the defendants were to and did deliver the excess quantities of Alicante and Tokay grapes to plaintiff on consignment to be shipped and sold by the latter on a commission basis, a direct and clean-cut issue was made and tendered by the pleadings, and, as likewise further pointed out, the court expressly and specifically found, in effect, that the statement in paragraph 2 of the second cause of action set out in the complaint that such an agreement had been made as to said excess quantities was devoid of evidentiary support, and further expressly found that, to the contrary, the denials of the answer of the allegations of the second paragraph of the second cause of action were true. The findings as to the alleged consignment agreement are amply supported by the evidence, or, to state the proposition in a different and equally as accurate a form, the findings necessarily imply that the plaintiff failed to sustain the burden cast upon it, or which it of necessity assumed, of proving by the requisite degree of evidence that as to the varieties of grapes named in the contract any other agreement or understanding than that evidenced by said contract was at any time entered into or had between the parties.

The contract between the parties, which was committed to writing and executed on the 10th day of May, 1922, was, as seen, negotiated on behalf of plaintiff by Boysen, the latter's agent in the Modesto district. R. Krasnow, manager of plaintiff's business, testified that, after the making of the written contract of May 10, 1922, he had three different conversations with the defendant C. Emerzian, in which they discussed various matters relative to the sale of the grapes of defendants; that in one of these conversations, held in the month of August, 1922, said defendant said to said Krasnow that "he would like to sell the balance of the stuff. I told him," continued said Krasnow, "conditions in the East looked bad. It looked as if there would be serious car shortage. I told him I could not use any grapes because I had all I needed. I said if I had cars I would take his grapes on consignment and charge him so much for loading, so much for commission back East." In the month of September, 1922, said Krasnow further testified, he stated to said Emerzian that he (Krasnow) would take the crop of Muscat grapes produced by defendants on consignment, on the basis of certain specified commissions and necessary expenses connected with the handling, shipping and selling of the said crops, and that said Emerzian agreed to that proposition. While this conversation was going on, the witness said, his bookkeeper was present. There was in all these conversations, the witness stated, more or less said about shook and other materials which plaintiff was to furnish defendants and the prices thereof and for labor in handling the grapes received from the former by the latter on consignment.

James Krasnow, son of the Krasnow whose testimony is referred to above, was, he stated, the "outside utility man" for plaintiff, and that his "activities extended in a general way to the receiving of grapes to be handled" by plaintiff. He testified that, at the time the written contract of May 10, 1922, was signed, he, Mr. Boysen, agent of plaintiff, Mr. Krasnow, Sr., and defendant C. Emerzian were present; that there was nothing said on that occasion as to the handling of defendants' grapes on consignment; that he was frequently in Modesto during the months of September and October, 1922, and in that period of time talked with C. Emerzian "with reference to the handling of defendants' grapes on a consignment basis"; that "Mr. Emerzian said that he would give plaintiff a portion of their grapes on consignment; that he would give over to us to handle on consignment such of the grapes as were not covered by the contract"; that he was at Modesto at the time that grapes were being received from defendants, "and Muscats and Carrigans were received from them as well as Alicantes, Zinfandels, Tokays, and Black Prince." He further stated that "Mr. Emerzian spoke also concerning the handling of Carrigans"; that "he would give us a chance to handle them"; that "we did handle on consignment approximately 10 cars of Carrigans and 14 cars of Muscats."

Harold Hain, son-in-law of Krasnow, Sr., and the bookkeeper of plaintiff at the Fresno office during the months of August, September, and November, 1922, exhibited a number of sheets containing what purported to be a record of the grape transactions between plaintiff and defendants during the year 1922. This record indicated sales at divers times by plaintiff on commission of certain quantities of grapes of the several varieties named in the contract, and also certain quantities of the Carrigan grapes delivered by defendants to the former. The reports of the sales, he stated, were received from the points in the East where the sales were made from 40 to 60 days after such sales, and he would then make a record of the reports, showing prices received, expenses, and net returns, if any, on sheets of paper. On cross-examination, however, he stated that these records were made a very short time prior to the commencement of this action. He further admitted on cross-examination that in another book he preserved a record of the number of tons delivered at points in the Modesto district, as reported by Boysen, the plaintiff's agent in said district, together with the contract prices per ton. In that book there was no notation indicating that any of the contract grapes so delivered, either the quantities coextensive with the limit fixed by the contract or the quantities in excess of those so specifically fixed, were received or accepted by plaintiff on consignment or on any other terms as to prices than those stipulated in the written agreement. The witness admitted that that book—the one just referred to—constituted or embraced the original records of all the grapes of the contract varieties delivered by defendants to plaintiff during the year 1922.

Other than the testimony above synoptically given, there was no proof offered by plaintiff tending to show that any agreement or understanding was had between the parties that the excess quantities of grapes of the contract varieties delivered by defendants to plaintiff were to be handled by the latter on consignment or a commission basis. It is worthy of special note, in considering said testimony, that, while the Krasnows each expressly testified that an agreement was had between plaintiff and the defendants for the handling by plaintiff on a commission basis of certain grapes produced by defendants in the year 1922 other than those of the varieties named in the contract, neither likewise stated that any such agreement or arrangement was had as to the excess quantities. In other words, neither of the Krasnows directly or specifically stated that the agreement which they testified was made by the plaintiff and the defendants for the handling of grapes grown by the latter on their premises in 1922 on a commission basis were of the contract varieties. James Krasnow's testimony that C. Emerzian, either in September or October, 1922, said to him (said Krasnow) "that he (Emerzian) would give over to us to handle on consignment such of the grapes as were not covered by the contract" involved the nearest approach to the declaration that an agreement was had for the handling by plaintiff on commission of the excess quantities of the contract quality of grapes delivered by defendants to plaintiff during 1922 that was made by any of the witnesses for plaintiff, and yet that testimony is so ambiguous that it is difficult to determine therefrom whether the witness intended to say that Emerzian told him that plaintiff could handle on consignment the grapes of all kinds produced by defendants in 1922, including those of the contract varieties over and above the quantities limited by the contract, or those grapes only which were not of the varieties mentioned in the contract. Thus it is manifest that the trial court, as the trier of the questions of fact, was at liberty, in the exercise of its discretion in the appraisal of the value and weight of the evidence, to interpret said statement in the witness' testimony, and it is to be assumed did so interpret it, to mean that Emerzian's proposition as so stated to said Krasnow was that the defendants would deliver to plaintiff, to be by it disposed of on commission, all grapes produced on their premises in the year 1922 other than those grapes likewise produced of the varieties mentioned in the contract. Indeed, assuming, as it is proper to assume, that the language of Emerzian, in making said proposition to Krasnow, was exactly as it was given by the latter in his testimony, the trial court was justified in concluding, as doubtless it did conclude, that said Emerzian then referred to grapes of varieties other than those named in the contract. The admitted fact that the defendants did make an agreement with plaintiff to deliver other varieties of 1922 grapes to it on consignment supports that conclusion.

The foregoing review of the testimony presented by plaintiff upon the question whether any agreement was entered into or any understanding had between the parties that the excess quantities of the grapes of the varieties named in the contract were to be delivered to and received and disposed of by plaintiff on a commission basis clearly shows, as it was and is intended to show, that, if no other testimony addressed to the establishment of such an agreement had been presented than that thus shown to have been presented by plaintiff, the finding by the trial court that no such agreement or understanding was made or had between the parties, or that the burden resting upon plaintiff to show that the excess quantities were disposed of on a commission basis under a special agreement to that effect was not sustained by it, would stand immune from just disturbance by this court. Assuming, though, that the plaintiff's testimony upon that proposition is such that the trial court could properly have deduced therefrom a finding that such a special agreement was made by the parties, we then arrive at the same result under the familiar rule of substantial evidentiary conflicts upon the issues to be determined.

C. Emerzian testified, as did Boysen, plaintiff's agent, that negotiations for the purchase of the grapes of the defendants produced by them in the year 1922 were conducted by him on behalf of defendants, and by Boysen, on behalf of plaintiff; that these negotiations led to the execution of the written contract of May 10, 1922; that, up to the time said contract was executed, he never at any time talked with either of the Krasnows on the subject of the sale to plaintiff of their 1922 crops of grapes; that neither on the occasion of the execution of the written contract nor on any other or subsequent occasion was anything ever said by him to either of the Krasnows or by either of the latter to him about the acceptance and the handling by the plaintiff of the excess quantities of grapes of the contract varieties over the quantities specifically mentioned in the contract on consignment or a commission basis; that no such agreement was at any time ever entered into or understanding had between or by the plaintiff and defendants or either of the latter; that it was the understanding between him and Boysen (and this testimony is referred to as in support only of the position of defendants that no such agreement was made) that plaintiff was to purchase and did by the contract purchase the entire crops of grapes of those named in the contract grown by defendants on their land in the year 1922; and that the statement of the tonnages in the contract was intended only as estimates of the minimum amount of the grapes so sold and purchased.

Boysen testified that he had never heard or understood that the excess quantities were to be handled by plaintiff on consignment; that he knew of no such agreement or understanding having been at any time made or had between the parties; that the excess quantities were, upon being delivered by defendants, handled just as the other grapes of the same varieties were handled—weighed and then loaded in the cars, and weight tags or receipts prepared and issued, one delivered to the defendants, one retained at the office of appellant in Modesto, and one sent to appellant's main office.

R. W. Fithian, bookkeeper at plaintiff's Modesto office, testified that he prepared on sheets of paper copies of the original records compiled in the Modesto office of deliveries by the defendants of the contract varieties of grapes. "The plaintiff's practice with reference to these records," he testified, "was to make an original which was transmitted to the Fresno office, a duplicate of which was transmitted to the grower, and a triplicate retained in the Modesto office until the close of the season and then sent to Fresno. * * * I did all this under instructions from Mr. Boysen." He further testified that Boysen instructed him that the prices to be noted in the records thus made up were the prices specified in the contract for the varieties therein named. The sheets referred to by the witness as being copies of the original records of the Modesto office of the deliveries made by defendants were introduced in evidence. In this connection, we may, without departing from an orderly consideration of the testimony as presented by defendants, refer to the testimony of C. Emerzian that, subsequent to the delivery of the entire crop of the grapes of the kinds named in the contract, and after he had received the statements referred to by the witness Fithian, he (said Emerzian), in comparing the weights with the weight receipts and the computations of prices with the contract, discovered an error in computation to the extent of $1,500 against the defendants; that he thereupon visited the Fresno office and called the attention of the bookkeeper in said office (Hain) to the error; that the latter immediately informed him (said Emerzian) that the error had already been corrected in the copy of the statement on file in the Fresno office; that he (Emerzian) then directed the attention of the bookkeeper at the Modesto office to the error, and the former there made the correction. This testimony was not contradicted. It also may here properly be noted that said Emerzian further testified that, after the controversy arose between the parties regarding the excess quantities delivered by defendants to plaintiff, the latter through its officers offered to settle their differences if the latter would agree to a discount on the total sum which the excess quantities came to on the basis of the contract prices, to which proposition the defendants refused to agree.

Further consideration of the evidence herein is not required. From the above review thereof it is patent that the court was clearly warranted in finding that no agreement or understanding was had between the parties that the tonnages delivered to and accepted by plaintiff in excess of the named quantities should be received by plaintiff and by it disposed of on commission; that, having in the absence of such an agreement accepted all the grapes delivered without protest or an offer to return the excess quantities, the necessary implication was that the plaintiff accepted them on the terms and at the prices specified in the written contract.

The defendants make no point here that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding in favor of plaintiff on the claim constituting the basis of the first cause of action set forth in the complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Theodora H. Mertens against Charles Keene and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion to quash service of summons, defendants appeal. Judgment reversed, and appeal from the order dismissed.

Cunningham & Blackburn, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

George S. Dennison, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action of unlawful detainer. The complaint alleges two causes of action, and judgment went for plaintiff under the allegations of the second of these. It is alleged in that count that on a certain day "plaintiff, as seller, and defendants, as purchasers, entered into an agreement for the sale of "certain described real property; that on the same date "defendants entered into possession of said premises, and ever since have been, and now are, in possession of said premises"; that "plaintiff has executed and performed all of the conditions precedent recited in said agreement by her to be performed"; that "on the 1st day of October, 1924, a payment in the sum of $50, by defendants to plaintiff, became due under said agreement, but that defendants failed, refused, and neglected, and now fail, refuse, and neglect, to make said payment to plaintiff, although repeated demands for the payment thereof have been made by plaintiff of defendants; and that subsequent to said 1st day of October, 1924, additional payments, in the total sum of $425, by defendants to plaintiff, became due under said agreement, but that defendants have failed, refused, and neglected, and now fail, refuse, and neglect to make said additional payments to plaintiff, although repeated demands for the payment thereof have been made by plaintiff of defendants"; that "defendants, by virtue of their failure, refusal and neglect to perform the covenants of said agreement," as alleged in the language immediately preceding the present clause, "did, on the 1st day of October, 1924, abandon said agreement"; that "a reasonable rental value of said premises is the sum of $50 per month"; and that "plaintiff has frequently, since said 1st day of October, 1924, demanded of defendants to quit and surrender to plaintiff said premises, but that defendants have failed, refused, and neglected to so quit and surrender to plaintiff said premises." The prayer of the complaint is for "the restitution of said premises"; for judgment for a certain sum "as damages for the unlawful detainer of said premises"; that "said damages be trebled"; and for costs. Upon this count of the complaint the clerk of the trial court issued a summons requiring defendants to answer within 3 days after the service thereof. The summons was served and defendants moved the court to quash the service, on the ground that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in unlawful detainer and that, therefore, defendants were entitled to 10 days within which to answer under the provisions of the statute regulating the matter of service of summons in ordinary civil actions. The motion was by the court denied. Defendants not having appeared in response to the summons, within the time limited thereby, their default was entered, and, pursuant thereto, judgment was rendered against them, ordering a restitution of the premises described in the complaint, ordering the issuance of a writ of restitution, and giving judgment for damages for the detention of the premises. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from the order of the trial court denying their motion to quash the service of summons.

[1, 2] Several questions are made by appellants, but they may all be answered by a solution of this query: Does the second count of the complaint state a cause of action in unlawful detainer? Except for a point made by respondent and hereafter to be mentioned, this question has been answered by the Supreme Court:

"A vendee in possession is not a tenant in any sense of the word, and only a tenant may be sued under the first subdivision of section 1161 [of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the action of unlawful detainer]. The proceeding is purely statutory and is restricted in its operation to those persons specified in the statute. * * * Failure of performance of his part of the contract of sale by the vendee in possession does not make him a tenant. * * * Even a vendee who has defaulted in his promised payments is entitled to an opportunity of showing his equities and presenting his defenses." Francis v. West Virginia Oil Co., 174 Cal. 168, 162 P. 394.

Respondent would evade the rule stated in the cited case by pointing to the allegation of the second count of her complaint to the effect that appellants abandoned their contract by their "failure, refusal, and neglect" to perform the covenants of the contract of sale mentioned in the pleading. Respondent says she inserted the allegation of abandonment in an endeavor to avoid the rule stated. We cannot regard the attempt as successful. The Supreme Court having said that the existence of a certain state of facts does not make a vendee in possession a tenant, we cannot sanction the view that an allegation of the mere conclusion that an abandonment arose from the same state of facts, in a given case, can make such a vendee a tenant.

The judgment is reversed. The appeal from the order denying motion to quash service of summons is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. SCHAFER. (Cr. 2838.)(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1926.
Rehearing Denied July 15, 1926.)1. Homicide ⇨236(1).

In murder prosecution, under Pen. Code, § 274, for causing miscarriage which resulted in death, evidence held sufficient to establish death as caused by unlawful means.

2. Homicide ⇨268.

Evidence held for jury as to whether accused procured abortion which caused death, in violation of Pen. Code, § 274.

3. Criminal law ⇨1159(2).

Appellate court will not attempt to determine weight of evidence, but will only determine whether on face of record there is sufficient evidence to warrant jury in inferring guilt.

4. Criminal law ⇨1160.

To set aside, because of insufficiency of evidence, verdict of conviction approved on motion for new trial, it must appear that on no hypothesis is there sufficient substantial evidence to support conviction.

5. Criminal law ⇨761(7)—Instructions assuming miscarriage was caused in particular way properly refused, when jury could find it was caused by different means.

In prosecution for murder in producing miscarriage by criminal means, instructions based on assumption that miscarriage was caused by administration of a douche were properly refused, where evidence warranted jury in believing it was caused by different means.

Tillie Schafer was convicted of murder in the second degree, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, C. J. Appellant was charged with the crime of murder. It was the claim of the prosecution at the trial that the decedent, a woman about 31 years of age, died as the result of a miscarriage produced by criminal means forbidden by section 274 of the Penal Code, and that the unlawful means were chargeable against appellant. From the judgment of conviction of murder in the second degree, and from the order denying a motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken.

[1] Some time in the early part of 1924 the decedent, being in serious trouble, consulted the appellant, who refused to assist her. On the night of April 23, following, the decedent again went to the home of appellant, remaining all night. Police officers called to the house the next morning found the decedent lying on a couch dead. The autopsy surgeon testified that he examined the body at the city morgue. He found that death had been caused by hemorrhage of the uterine cavity as the result of an abortion which had been performed within a few hours before the death of the woman, and in his opinion she had been dead but two or three hours at the time he made the examination. He testified that, while he could not state by what means the abortion was actually caused, the entire foetus had been removed; there was no clotting of blood; the tissues were freshly bleeding; and only a bit of the membrane of pregnancy was left. Prior to death there had been a considerable amount of blood lost, which left the body pallid. This evidence was sufficient to establish the corpus delicti, viz. that the woman was dead, and that her death had been caused by unlawful means. People v. Wright, 167 Cal. 1, 3, 138 P. 349. It is contended that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the verdict for the reason, it is claimed, that it does not establish that the unlawful means which occasioned the decedent's death were chargeable against appellant.

[2-4] The police officers who were called to the house on the morning of decedent's death described the condition of the body when found, and told of the blood on the decedent's clothing and on the couch on which she lay. They testified that the kitchen of the flat had "been lately scrubbed up and it was still wet," and in the stove were what appeared to be ashes of rolled cloth, which had been recently burned. On being taken to the police station to be interrogated concerning the death of the decedent, appellant signed two written statements. In them she stated that she did not perform an operation upon the decedent and that she did not know who did. In the first statement the appellant related that the decedent came to her house some time before her death, seeking her help, and "said that she understood that I would perform an abortion on her, but I told her I was not doing that any more since I got in trouble." In the other statement the appellant told how the decedent came to her home the night before her death, and she (appellant) gave the decedent a douche "composed of a solution made out of Indian weed boiled up in a tea and a little camphor added. This tea was given for the purpose of bringing her around." Appellant and decedent slept that night in the same bed. The decedent remained in bed until about 9 o'clock the next morning, when she went to the bathroom, where she fell. Appellant assisted her to a couch, and, after endeavoring to call a physician, notified the emergency hospital. When the ambulance arrived the woman was dead. One of the policemen testified that on the afternoon of April 24th the appellant was taken to her home, where "she produced a douche bag with a nozzle on it which she said had been used in performing the abortion." There was also found, according to this witness, some Indian weed used by the appellant in cooking the preparation to be used as a douche. There was more of the same kind of testimony, but the foregoing, in substance, is what the prosecution relies on to support the judgment of conviction. The appellant took the stand and denied certain statements made by the police officers, and gave an account of the occurrence differing somewhat from the signed statements.

It is the contention of the appellant that the evidence fails to show that she had any hand in the commission of the abortion, which, it is claimed, caused the death of the decedent, but, in view of all of the circumstances brought out by the testimony in the case, we are of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence to support the finding of the jury. There was evidence that the decedent had consulted the appellant with regard to her condition. When the condition became more serious, she again visited appellant. Apparently no one other than appellant saw the decedent from that time until the woman died. Prior to the visit, decedent appeared to be in her usual health. Death was caused by hemorrhage following an unlawful practice. During the night, according to appellant, the decedent did not require any attention. Appellant and decedent were alone in the house after 7 o'clock in the morning. Appellant placed the time of the death around 9 o'clock. The autopsy physician testified that in his opinion the criminal operation had been performed within a period of two or three hours prior to the death. Appellant admitted that after decedent's death she burned bloody rags in the stove. From these, and the other facts established in the case, it seems only reasonable to conclude that a jury would be warranted in believing that the appellant not only performed the criminal operation, but destroyed the evidence of the crime. Other facts deducible from the record may tend to establish the innocence of appellant, but this court will not attempt to determine the weight of evidence. It is only called upon to decide whether, on the face of the record, it can be held that sufficient facts could not have been found by the jury to warrant the inference of guilt. It is the function of the jury in the first instance to determine what facts are established, and, before a verdict which has been accepted by the trial court, and subsequently approved on motion for a new trial, can be set aside on appeal upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, it must be made to appear that upon no hypothesis is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached in the court below. People v. Erno, 195 Cal. 272, 282, 232 P. 710; People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 326, 184 P. 389; People v. Fitzgerald, 138 Cal. 39, 41, 70 P. 1014.

[5] Appellant's further contention is that the court erred in refusing to give three instructions proposed by her, which were based upon the assumption that the miscarriage was caused by the administration of the douche containing the solution of Indian weed. In view of the fact that the evidence warranted the jury in believing that the miscarriage may have been caused by means other than the administration of the douche, the instructions in the form in which they were proposed were properly refused. The substance of at least one of them appears to have been covered by other portions of the charge.

The judgment is affirmed.

John L. Murphy, of Los Angeles (James A. Himmel, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

NOURSE, Justice pro tem. [1] This is an appeal from an order admitting to probate a certain document purporting to be the last will of Joseph Devlin, deceased, and granting letters testamentary to Katie O'Reilly. The document which was admitted to probate was entirely written by the deceased and reads, in part, as follows:

"San Francisco, August 15th, 1921—I Joseph Devlin have lived at 229 Ellsworth St. San Francisco, Cal at the above date I am the owner of this will as it was myself who write it up I will appoint my cousin Mrs. James O'Reilly as my respective Trustee. * * * Dear Katie first of all it is my wish that you take charge of my funeral and see that I will be buried respectfully in every way. * * * there is another request I wish to ask of you * * * it is my wish and request that you will pay * * * the sum of $500.00 * * * for Masses * * * You will find in this Will two separate letters * * * You will read those two letters carefully and then you will know how I wish those Masses said. * * * I bequeath to my sister Isabella Devlin in Ireland $500.00 also to my Brother Mark Devlin (and other special bequests making a total of $1500.00) * * * I hope I will be able to leave you a little present for your trouble. * * *

"Dear Katie I have about $2600.00 Dollars in two different banks * * * besides other papers * * * and last Dear Katie the money in Banks and on hand will about pay all expenses then the little place where I lived is worth about 12 or 1400.00 Dollars when you sell it I bequeath $500.00 Dollars out of it as a little token of friendship to you I will state to you later what I would wish you to do with the balance I have some other little interests besides I am tired writing Goodnight" (End of document but without period or other mark.)

This document was found after the death of the deceased inclosed in an envelope upon the face of which was written entirely in the hand of the deceased the following:

"This Envelope Contains the Late Joseph Devlin's Will Please Deliver This Will to Mrs. James O'Reilly 558-25 Ave Richmond Dist. San Francisco."

The appellant, who is a brother and heir of the deceased, filed written grounds of opposition to the probate of the purported will and prosecutes this appeal from the order admitting it to probate. The basis of the attack upon the order is that the will was not signed by the deceased and that it does not therefore meet the demands of section 1277. Civil Code, that "An (h)olographic will is one that is entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator himself." In support of the appeal the appellant relies upon Estate of Manchester, 174 Cal. 417, 163 P. 358, L. R. A. 1917D, 629, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 227; Estate of

Hurley, 178 Cal. 713, 174 P. 669; Estate of Streeton, 183 Cal. 284, 191 P. 16; and Estate of Bernard (Cal. Sup.) 239 P. 404. In reply the respondent insists that under the rule of the Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 423, 163 P. 669, L. R. A. 1917D, 778, the court must hold in this case that the use of the expression, "I am the owner of this will as it was myself that write it up," was an adoption by the deceased of the precedent name as his executing signature. In the Estate of Manchester, supra, the document offered for probate began as follows:

"January 14th, 1914. I, Matilda Manchester leave & bequeath all my estate & effects, after payment of legal, funeral & certain foreign shipment expenses (as directed) to the following legatees. * * *

Then followed a statement of devises and bequests to divers persons. It ended as follows: "Whereunto I hereby set my hand this fourteenth day of January, 1914." The document was folded and inclosed in an envelope which was indorsed by the testator as follows: "My will, Ida Matilda Manchester." In reversing the order admitting the purported will to probate, this court held that—

"It was not 'signed' according to the meaning of that word in ordinary usage. To sign, as applied to a document, is defined as follows: 'To affix a signature thereto; to ratify by hand or seal; to subscribe in one's own handwriting.' (Webster's Dictionary.) Unquestionably, as used in the above-quoted section, it means the signature of the testator in his own handwriting written somewhere in or upon the document, with the intention by so writing it to authenticate the document. The name written at another place than the end of the document, and not for the purpose of authenticating it and indicating its completion, but merely to identify the person who is making the will, cannot be deemed to be a name 'signed' to the document, unless that word is given a meaning entirely different from that which it is generally understood to have."

Again in the same case (page 421 [163 P. 360]), the court said:

"The true rule, as we conceive it to be, is that, wherever placed, the fact that it was intended as an executing signature must satisfactorily appear on the face of the document itself. If it is at the end of the document, the universal custom of mankind forces the conclusion that it was appended as an execution, if nothing to the contrary appears."

In the Estate of Hurley, supra, this court, in reversing an order refusing to revoke a previous order admitting a purported olographic will to probate, quoted with approval the language last quoted from the Manchester Case. In the Hurley Case, the document opened with the following words:

"San Francisco, June 6th, 1902—I Margaret E. Hurley being of sound mind and body do make this my last will and testament."

A number of bequests followed, and the document ended, "to Mrs. Skelly of Alameda five hundred dollars to Lillian and Bertha Morris five hundred each." In holding that the document was not a valid holographic will, the court said (page 715 [174 P. 670]):

"In the present case the signature appears in the opening statement of the paper, but there is nothing in the document or in the closing paragraph to indicate that the testatrix intended to adopt that signature as the executing signature of the will. Indeed, the contrary may be inferred from the fact that the will terminates without even a punctuation mark, thereby indicating that the testatrix ceased writing before she had completed declaring her intention and that she did not regard the document as a completed will. But the contrary inference need not appear. In the absence of anything on the face of the will to raise the inference that the name in the exordium was intended as a signature in execution, the holographic document cannot be deemed a valid will."

In Estate of Streeton, supra, the document offered for probate had in the upper left-hand corner the name, "Harry Streeton." Then followed:

"Los Angeles, May 3, 1918. My last request if I should pass away in this sickness that everything that belongs to me and is under my name will be given to Mrs. Nellie Williams.
* * *

The will was admitted to probate, and in affirming an order denying a revocation of the will this court reaffirmed the rule in the Manchester and Hurley Cases and held:

"In the document now under consideration, there is no space at the end of the writing in which a signature could have been placed. The name of the testator appears in a blank space, disconnected from the rest of the written matter both as to location and meaning. Had the name appeared in the exordium, the logical inference from the context would probably have been that it was intended merely to identify the person making the will, and additional facts might have been necessary to raise the inference that it was also intended as a signature in execution of the will. (Estate of Hurley, 178 Cal. 713, 174 P. 669; Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 423, 163 P. 669, L. R. A. 1917D, 778.) But, as above stated, the name of decedent appears entirely separate from the rest of the writing and by itself. It must be assumed that it was placed on the document for some purpose, and the only apparent and reasonable purpose under the circumstances would seem to be the signing of the instrument with the intention of authenticating the same. This conclusion becomes the more compelling when we consider that the name is written in a blank space at the beginning of the instrument, for such a space is the most natural one in which to place a signature when the usual place at the end of the document is unavailable. The fact that the end of the page was torn off, whatever its importance in a determination of the question of revocation, if of any weight in a consideration of the sufficiency of the signature, tends to support, rather than defeat, the inference that the name was written at the top of the page with the intention of authenticating the instrument."

In the Estate of Bernard, supra, the document offered for probate read in part as follows:

"The following 4 sheets of paper included, Long Beach, California, Oct. 12, 1918. 'I, Josephine Bernard of the City and County of Denver, Colo. do hereby declare this to be my last will and testament.'"

The document terminated near the middle of the last page, "To her husband Herbert Donahue ruby and diamond stick pin." In affirming an order revoking probate of the alleged will the court analyzed and approved all the cases heretofore referred to, together with the Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 423, 163 P. 669, L. R. A. 1917D, 778. The following language appearing in that decision is particularly appropriate (239 P. 405):

"The signature of the decedent appears only in the exordium, and there is nothing in any other part of the alleged will to indicate affirmatively or by necessary implication that the signature was intended to be or was adopted as the final executing signature in authentication of or in execution of the document as a completed testamentary act. The obvious and natural inference to be drawn from the position of the name of the decedent in the alleged will is that it was intended merely as descriptive personae, and, in the absence of anything affirmatively appearing on the face of the will itself tending to show that such signature was intended to authenticate it, this conclusion is inevitable."

We have referred to the language of the decisions relating to the appearance of the name of the decedent in the exordium alone, but Estate of Hurley and Estate of Bernard are both applicable here for the additional reason that the documents offered for probate in each of those cases appeared to have been uncompleted, as is the case with the document here under consideration. Commenting on this circumstance, the court in the Estate of Bernard (p. 405) said:

"The abrupt termination of the document near the middle of the last page is a strong indication of decedent's intent to do something more in order to make it a complete will. The last clause being, in all general respects, similar to the preceding dispositive clauses manifests that the writer did not intend to terminate the document finally and definitely at that particular point, but, rather, indicates that something additional was to be done, and necessarily compels the conclusion that decedent had no intention of adopting the name written in the opening clause of the will as the executing signature to her final testamentary act."

[2] In support of the order the respondent relies upon Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 423, 163 P. 669, L. R. A. 1917D, 778, where the purported will read, in part: "This is the last will and testament of Elizabeth R. McMahon." Then followed certain specific bequests and devises, concluding with:

"I do hereby publish and declare the foregoing, entirely written, dated and signed by my own hand, to be my last will and testament, this second day of January, 1912." (Emphasis ours.)

No signature followed this declaration, and no signature appeared in any other place upon the document than in the opening clause. The document was admitted to probate as an olographic will, and this order was, on appeal, affirmed on the ground that the declaration of the testatrix that she had signed the document by her own hand was an adoption by her of her signature as written in the body of the will as her signature in execution of it. The McMahon Case has been cited and followed in the later cases which we have just referred to, but the court has been particular to point out that the case rested upon the peculiar language of the will, from which it was inferred that the name in the exordium was adopted as the executing signature of the testatrix. The language of the McMahon will was materially different from that under consideration in the case before us. There the writer expressly declared that the foregoing will was signed by her. This was in effect a declaration that she had signed the will when she inscribed her name in the opening clause, and that she then adopted that signature as the executing signature to the will. Here the deceased merely stated in the opening clause that he wrote the will and that he was the owner of it. Now, the writing of the will and the signing of it are two different things. Section 1277, Civil Code, requires that an olographic will must be entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator. There are three things, therefore, which must be done by the testator to constitute an olographic will within the section. If he has merely written it in his own hand and has failed to date or sign it, it is not a valid olographic will, and from the declaration that he has written it in his own hand there is nothing from which the inference can be drawn that he has signed it or that he has intended to adopt as his executing signature the name which he has inserted in the exordium.

Order reversed.

PEOPLE v. MILLIGAN. (Cr. 1326.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 5, 1926.)

1. Criminal law §401.

In trial for making and uttering fictitious note, secured by mortgage on property not owned by person whose name was subscribed to note, admission of owner's testimony as to legal description of property was not reversible error.

2. Criminal law §400(7).

Legal or other description of definitely located realty may be given in evidence by any one in possession of facts.

3. Indictment and information §161(3).

Under Pen. Code, § 1008, information may be amended so as to state cause of action after evidence is closed, if defendant's substantial rights are not prejudiced, and amended information shows offense under evidence at preliminary examination.

4. Criminal law §1144(1).

Where it is not questioned that information, as amended after evidence was closed, charged offense shown by evidence taken at preliminary examination, it must be presumed that all necessary elements of offense were shown by evidence adduced thereon.

5. Criminal law §1144(1).

Commitment, on which information was based, must be presumed sufficient on appeal from conviction.

6. Indictment and information §161(3)—Permitting amendment of information for making and uttering fictitious note after evidence was closed by adding allegation of intent to defraud held not error (Pen. Code, §§ 476, 1008).

Since information, as amended after evidence was closed, so as to state cause of action, under Pen. Code, § 476, for making and uttering fictitious note, by adding charge of intention to defraud, charged no different offense than was attempted in original information, but charged offense shown by evidence on preliminary examination, and amendment was without prejudice to substantial rights of defendant, who declined opportunity afforded to disprove facts tending to establish such intent, court did not err in permitting amendment, in view of section 1008.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

S. W. Milligan was convicted of uttering, publishing, possessing, and attempting to pass as genuine a fictitious note, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Mathonihah Thomas, of Long Beach, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney and John W. Maltman, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime inhibited by section 476 of the Penal Code, which makes punishable the fraudulent act of making, passing, uttering, or publishing a fictitious bill, note, or check.

More particularly the information herein charged in substance that at a designated time and place defendant did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously utter, publish, and have in his possession a certain false and fictitious promissory note which he attempted to pass as true and genuine.

[1, 2] The first point urged by appellant as a reason for reversal of the judgment is that, over defendant's objection and to the prejudice of defendant's substantial rights in the premises, the trial court erred in permitting a witness to testify to the legal description of certain real property which was security for said alleged fictitious note.

It appears that, without objection, the witness testified that she was the owner of the real property in question, which, as described by the witness, was identical with the street and number thereon stated by defendant in the negotiations by him for the sale of the note, as representing the property upon which the mortgage was given to secure the note in question.

Appellant suggests that the testimony of the witness as to the legal description of the property which she claimed to own was secondary and, consequently, inadmissible. It would seem, however, that the ownership of the real property which purported to be the security for the alleged fictitious promissory note was but incidental to the issue in the case. Defendant was accused, not with any crime affecting the execution of a mortgage, but with the offense of feloniously making and uttering a promissory note. The evidence being that the property upon which the mortgage was given to secure the alleged fictitious note was not owned by the person whose name was subscribed to the note, the description of the particular piece of property which was mortgaged as security for the note, while perhaps not wholly immaterial, was nevertheless of comparative unimportance. Besides, it having been established that the witness was the owner of a definitely located piece of real property, we see no reason why a legal or other description thereof should not be given in evidence by any person in possession of the facts.

[3] It is also contended by appellant that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in permitting, over defendant's objection, an amendment to the information after the evidence was closed.

It is admitted that as originally drawn the information against defendant contained each of the necessary allegations constituting the offense, with the exception that, in the language of the statute (Pen. Code, § 476), no "intention to defraud" was charged. Such omission having been directed to the attention of the district attorney, he moved the court for leave to amend the information by adding thereto the necessary allegation. Over defendant's objection, the motion was granted by the court and the information was amended accordingly—at the same time leave being granted to defendant to reopen the case for the purpose of submitting additional evidence. Defendant claimed to have been taken by surprise and "stood on the record." Appellant now insists that, because the information upon which defendant went to trial failed to completely charge the commission of a public offense, no power existed in the trial court to grant the motion to amend the information so that it would state a cause of action; and in support thereof cites several authorities to the effect that, where an information or indictment is fatally defective, in that it fails to state facts sufficient to constitute the crime charged, a judgment of conviction thereof will not be permitted to stand, even though the insufficiency of the formal accusation against the defendant be not raised until after trial. But the question which this court is called upon to consider is whether in the course of the trial, after the evidence has been introduced, a defective information may be amended so that it will state a cause of action in accordance with evidence taken at the preliminary examination. The only authority bearing directly on the point submitted by appellant is that of People v. Webber, 44 Cal. App. 120, 186 P. 406, in which it was conceded that if an indictment as originally filed did not state a public offense, it could not be amended so to do at the trial of the action. That statement of the law, however, loses some of its force because of the fact that the court held that the indictment under consideration did charge an indictable offense. On the other hand, section 1008 of the Penal Code provides in part that:

"An indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment may be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. An indictment cannot be amended so as to change the offense charged, nor an information so as to charge an offense not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination."

[4] The language of the statute, while stated negatively, would seem to warrant an amendment such as is here involved, provided that the substantial rights of the defendant were not prejudiced thereby and that the charge preferred by the information as amended constitutes an offense shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination. People v. Foster (Cal. Sup.) 243 P. 667. As to the latter prerequisite no question is raised. It must therefore be presumed that all the necessary elements constituting the commission of the offense by the defendant including the "intention to defraud," were contained within the evidence adduced on defendant's preliminary examination. The only question, therefore, to be determined, is whether the incorporation into the defective information at the close of the evidence on the trial in the superior court of the omitted allegation, to wit, that the alleged acts of defendant "were done with the intention to defraud," was "without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant." Pen. Code, § 1008.

[5, 6] No claim is made by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, nor was any evidence introduced by either side after the amendment to the information was made; from which it follows that the intention of defendant to defraud (which was the substance of the amendment to the information) had been established at the time the amendment was made. Furthermore, the record shows that defendant was offered full opportunity to introduce any additional evidence bearing upon the transaction which was the foundation for the charge against him, but that he declined to avail himself of the courtesy which was thus extended.

In the case of People v. Rippe, 32 Cal. App. 514, 163 P. 506, the information charged that the defendant by means of false representations induced certain parties to sign a promissory note and that they were thereby "defrauded, damaged, and prejudiced." The information contained no allegation that the promissory note had been delivered to the payee thereof. When the case came on for trial the district attorney was permitted to amend the information by an allegation to the effect that the note, when signed, was delivered to the defendant and by him delivered to the payee therein named. In discussing the question, the appellate court said, in part:

"While the information as originally filed did not state facts sufficient to constitute an offense known to the law [citing authority], nevertheless it did attempt to charge the crime of 'obtaining property by false pretenses,' and the amended information did no more than show by a proper allegation that the note which was the subject-matter of the false pretenses had become 'property' within the meaning of section 532 of the Penal Code, which defines the offense of obtaining property by false pretenses [citing authority]. Obviously, therefore, the amended information did not charge an offense different from that attempted to be charged in the original information, which was admittedly founded upon the evidence taken at the preliminary examination, and consequently the filing of the amended information neither prejudiced the defendant nor contravened the provisions of section 1008 of the Penal Code."

The facts in the case of People v. Miller, 34 Cal. App. 641, 168 P. 574, are not stated—the entire discussion of the point involved being as follows:

"It is only necessary to say in this case that the original information purported to charge a public offense, and that the amended information as filed, after the request of the district attorney and upon the permission of the court being given, did not charge an offense different from that attempted to be stated in the original information. Consequently the filing of the amended complaint neither prejudiced the defendant nor contravened the provisions of section 1008 of the Penal Code. See People v. Rippe, 32 Cal. App. 514 [163 P. 506]."

The appeal in the case of People v. Foster, recently decided by the Supreme Court of this state (243 P. 667), involved, among other things, the question of the right during the course of the trial of amending an information in which the crime of robbery was charged by changing the name of the person whom it was alleged that the defendant had robbed. In the course of the opinion the following language is found:

"We think the amendment as made to section 1008, Penal Code, in 1911, is quite persuasive, if not entirely convincing, as to the intention of the Legislature to permit, in the discretion of the trial court, the amendment of informations where it can be done without substantial prejudice to the rights of the defendant, so as to correctly state the offense shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination."

See, also, People v. Shope (Cal. App.) 245 P. 998.

So far as the record discloses in the instant case, the complaint, which was the basis for the preliminary examination of defendant, may have contained each and every allegation necessary to a complete statement of a cause of action. At any rate, as hereinbefore herein indicated, it must be assumed that the evidence adduced on such preliminary examination was sufficient to justify the commitment of defendant. The information based upon such commitment (which commitment is likewise necessarily presumed sufficient) attempted to charge the identical offense for the commission of which defendant went to trial. That with one exception all the acts constituting such offense were adequately set forth in the information is impliedly conceded, as is the fact that the evidence on the trial supported the verdict of conviction. After the information had been amended, defendant declined the opportunity afforded him by the trial court to disprove any of the facts theretofore introduced by the prosecution tending to establish the allegation that the alleged acts of defendant were done by him with the intention to defraud. For the reason that the amended information did not charge an offense different from that attempted to be charged in the original information (People v. Rippe, 32 Cal. App. 514, 516, 163 P. 506), but accused the defendant of the offense shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination, and because of the fact that such amendment was "without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant" (Pen. Code, § 1008), we are constrained to hold that no error was committed by the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

MORRIS v. STANDARD OIL CO. et al.
(Civ. 5320.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 3, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 1, 1926.)

1. Master and servant $\Rightarrow$ 389—Compensation insurer for both employer and tort-feasor sued by employee held not entitled to lien against judgment for medical expenditures not in issue (Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 26, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, § 8).

Where employer's insurer was also insurer of party injuring employee, and in employee's action against such party issues as to hospital and medical expenses were not submitted and employee did not recover therefor, insurer held not entitled to lien against judgment, under Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 26, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, § 8, for such expenditures paid by it.

2. Master and servant $\Rightarrow$ 389—Compensation insurer failing to furnish items of medical expenses held to have waived right to lien therefor (Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3; Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 26, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, § 8).

Where employee's counsel in action against third party requested employer's insurer to furnish statement of medical and hospital expenses, and finally told insurer that unless it furnished such items it would be considered to have waived claim under Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 26, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, § 8, held that insurer by such failure waived right to lien, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by Milton Morris, by J. M. Morris, his guardian ad litem, against the Standard Oil Company for damages for personal injuries, wherein the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, of London, England, petitioned to establish a lien under the Workmen's Compensation Act, § 26, against a judgment. From an order allowing a lien for only a portion of the amount claimed, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Hubbell, of Calexico, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. The petitioner herein, the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, has appealed from an adverse order made in a proceeding instituted by it under section 26 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917, as amended in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 920, § 8), to establish a lien against a judgment for damages theretofore recovered by plaintiff, Milton Morris, against the defendant Standard Oil Company as a result of personal injuries sustained by plaintiff through the negligent acts of one of the defendant's employees. The lien sought was founded upon certain payments previously made by petitioner as insurance carrier for medical treatment of plaintiff.

The following facts are not disputed: In September, 1920, plaintiff, who was then 13 years of age, while performing duties as an employee of a newspaper publishing company in Calexico, Cal., was struck and injured by one of defendant's trucks. The petitioner was the compensation carrier for the publishing company, and also the insurance carrier for defendant, and as compensation carrier for the publishing company furnished plaintiff with the necessary medical, surgical, and hospital treatment and paid him compensation. In January of the following year plaintiff's attorney notified petitioner by letter of plaintiff's intention to commence a damage suit against defendant, and asking petitioner whether it desired to have included in the demand for damages the expenditures incurred by petitioner in caring for plaintiff amounting, as said attorney stated he had been informed, to $1,200 or $1,500. Petitioner replied that as insurer for defendant it intended to "take up the defense" of the proposed action against defendant, and as compensation carrier for the publishing company would be entitled to reimbursement under section 26 of the act above mentioned for all expenses incurred in connection with plaintiff's injuries. Petitioner further stated that in its opinion the driver of defendant's truck had not been negligent. About ten days after the receipt of that letter plaintiff's attorney again wrote to petitioner stating that he was familiar with the section of the act mentioned by petitioner, and that as soon as the defendant appeared in the action he would amend his complaint so as to include as additional elements of damages the expenditures incurred by the petitioner in caring for plaintiff, and he requested that petitioner advise him at once of the amount of those expenditures. He further stated that, inasmuch as petitioner would be liable for any judgment obtained against defendant, the situation regarding said expenditures would be simplified if plaintiff were released from any liability to his employer for such expenditures, and that thereby the issues which would be tried by the jury would be confined to the questions of negligence and the amount of damages "for physical suffering and mental anguish"; but that if petitioner was not inclined to execute such release, to "please furnish the figures asked for," so that the same might be included in the proposed amended complaint. Petitioner ignored this letter, and on April 5, 1921, said attorney again wrote as follows:

"On January 2, 1921, I made demand on you for expenses incurred or to be incurred in this matter that the same might be included in the pleadings, but you ignored the demand. The case is set for trial on April 14th, and if you intend to make any claim on the judgment obtained under section 26 of the Workmen's Compensation Act this is to demand that you furnish me figures and items at once for amended pleading, and that you have evidence at the trial to prove the items; otherwise it will be considered that you have waived any claim. * * *" (Italics ours.)

Petitioner made no reply to this letter, and therefore said attorney, evidently believing that petitioner had decided to waive all claim against any judgment plaintiff might obtain, did not plead in his demand for damages any of the expenses incurred by petitioner for plaintiff's medical or hospital treatment, nor did he offer any evidence to prove the same at the trial. As further indication of petitioner's waiver of its claim under the section of the act above mentioned, petitioner in defending said action proposed and caused to be given to the jury an instruction as follows:

"You are instructed that in determining the amount of damages to be awarded to plaintiff, if any, you must not consider or make any allowance for any medical treatment, care, or hospital expenses that may have been incurred or paid in caring for and treating the injuries claimed to have been sustained by the plaintiff. Such expense for care, medical treatment, and hospital expenses are no part of the plaintiff's case, and are matters to be adjusted in other and separate proceedings from this. You must allow plaintiff nothing on that account, and must limit your award entirely to compensation for physical injuries, detriment, and loss of capacity sustained by plaintiff without any allowance to him for any supposed or rendered medical treatment, hospital expenses, or care. You are instructed that the father is not a party to this action, but is guardian ad litem only, and you must not allow anything for medical or hospital treatment or care to the boy, Milton Morris, because the father's name appears in the title of this case."

A verdict was rendered for plaintiff for the sum of $25,000. Defendant appealed, and the judgment was affirmed as to the issue of negligence, but reversed and the cause remanded for new trial upon the question of damages, the court on appeal holding the damages to be excessive. Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 468, 205 P. 1073. The second trial resulted also in a verdict in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $25,000, but on motion for new trial the amount of the judgment was reduced by the trial court to $12,000. Upon appeal taken by defendant, the judgment was affirmed. Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 192 Cal. 343, 219 P. 998, 30 A. L. R. 1103. During the pendency of the second appeal the Industrial Accident Commission adjusted the compensation claim of plaintiff by awarding him the sum of $800.64, part of which had already been paid. Thereafter, and prior to the affirmation of the second judgment, petitioner instituted this proceeding to establish a lien against plaintiff's judgment to secure the payment of the sum of $2,309.79, part of which, to wit, the sum of $1,509.15 represented the total amount it had expended for plaintiff's medical, surgical and hospital expenses, and the remaining portion, $800.64, represented the amount paid to plaintiff as compensation. The order of the trial court was that the petition to establish the lien for the item of $1,509.15 be denied, but that the petitioner be allowed a lien to cover the amount paid for compensation upon the assignment to plaintiff by petitioner of the latter's cause of action against defendant for the amount of said compensation. Subsequently such assignment was executed, and it afterwards became the subject of a separate action and appeal between plaintiff and defendant. This appeal relates only to that portion of the trial court's order denying the lien for the amount paid for plaintiff's medical and hospital treatment.

Section 26 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, upon which appellant bases its claim for a lien, provides in part that where the employee alone prosecutes a suit for damages against the tort-feasor, evidence of the amount of the disability indemnity paid by the employer shall not be admissible in evidence, but that proof of all other expenditures on account of the injuries may be established and be deemed part of the damages suffered. It further provides that "the court shall, on application, allow as a first lien against any judgment recovered by the employee the amount of the employer's expenditures for compensation," which includes expenditures for doctors, nurses, medicines, hospital care, and other items connected with the treatment of the injured employee. Subdivision (f) of section 30 of said act (St. 1917, p. 860), provides that where the employer is insured against liability for compensation and the insurance carrier shall have paid said expenses, the insurance carrier shall be subrogated to the rights and duties of the employer and may enforce such rights in its own name.

[1] The provisions of the act mentioned were doubtless designed to enable the employer or the insurance carrier, as the case may be, who has paid the expenses connected with the treatment of an injured employee, to recover the same through the suit instituted and maintained by the employee against the party causing the injury, and to provide a method whereby the employer or the insurance carrier may be protected in the collection of those expenditures out of any judgment obtained by the employee. But the evidence here shows beyond question that, owing to the position taken by petitioner prior to and during the trial of the action, plainly indicating an intention to waive any right to afterwards collect said expenditures from any judgment which might be obtained by plaintiff, the matter of those expenditures was excluded entirely from the issues of the case and from the consideration of the jury. In fact petitioner concedes that the same were not sued for by plaintiff, nor were they included in the verdict or the judgment obtained by him. Under these circumstances it would be grossly unjust to require respondent to pay said expenses now out of a judgment, the entire amount of which was rendered as compensation for damages accruing exclusively to him; and any lien that would be allowed in view of the facts stated would be based manifestly upon a false claim against plaintiff. It may be fairly inferred from the situation confronting petitioner before trial that the reasons underlying petitioner's desire to exclude the matter of said expenditures from the case were that if a judgment were recovered by plaintiff, petitioner, to the extent of those expenses, would be in effect both judgment creditor and judgment debtor, and consequently would be required to satisfy, with its own money, a judgment in its favor obtained against itself, and after all be not reimbursed for the amount of said expenses. The peculiar situation brought about by the fact that petitioner was the insurer of both plaintiff's employer and the defendant serves as no reason why plaintiff as an insured employee should be charged with and required to pay the expenses of his injury, which petitioner, under its contract with plaintiff's employer, was obligated to assume.

[2] Moreover, we believe that under the circumstances shown by the evidence already narrated, petitioner by its acts and conduct must be held to have waived its right to any lien it may have otherwise been entitled to under the statute. Subdivision 3 of section 1962 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it."

The conceded facts here are that after two unsuccessful attempts by plaintiff to obtain from the petitioner the items and amounts of said expenditures for the declared purpose of recovering the same from the party causing the injury, petitioner was finally notified that unless it furnished said items it would be considered that it "waived any claim" which it might make against the judgment under said section 26 of said act. The omission of petitioner under those circumstances to reply to that letter may be reasonably said to have led plaintiff to believe that it would waive such claim, and thereupon plaintiff, acting upon such belief, made no demand in his pleading or in the presentation of his evidence for those expenditures; and, furthermore, in confirmation of such apparent waiver, petitioner caused instructions to be given to the jury which completely excluded the matter of those expenditures from any further consideration in the case. For these reasons stated, we are of the opinion that under the Code section last quoted appellant is now estopped from claiming such lien.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GRACE. (Cr. 1312.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 5, 1926.)

1. Criminal law § 101(5).

Judge in department of superior court to which case was transferred held bound by order directing trial as to defendant's sanity made by judge in department where prosecution was begun.

2. Criminal law § 114(9).

In absence of reporter's transcript of proceedings, it will be assumed that judge proceeded according to Pen. Code, § 1368, in ordering trial as to defendant's sanity.

3. Criminal law § 623—Defendant's right to trial as to his sanity held not waived by deputy district attorney's failure to remind court of order directing it.

Defendant's right to trial as to his sanity held not waived by deputy district attorney's failure to remind court of order directing it, since he was without authority to waive any right of defendant.

4. Criminal law § 623.

Deputy district attorney had duty to remind court of order for trial as to defendant's sanity, if he knew of its existence.

5. Criminal law § 623.

Defendant's right to trial as to sanity held not waived by silence of deputy public defender as to order directing it.

6. Criminal law § 623.

Judge in superior court held bound to know, as matter of law, that order had been made for trial as to defendant's sanity.

7. Criminal law § 623.

Most satisfactory evidence is required to show waiver of defendant's right to trial as to his sanity, which had been ordered under Pen. Code, § 1368, in view of sections 26, 1191, 1201, 1221, 1222, 1367, 1587.

8. Criminal law ⚡623—Postponement of trial and defendant's waiver of statutory period within which trial must be had held not to indicate waiver of right to trial as to sanity (Pen. Code, § 1382).

Court's minutes showing that "trial is continued to June 10, 1925. Defendants waive the 60-day statutory period," held not to indicate defendant's waiver of right to trial as to his sanity, since right waived was that secured by Pen. Code, § 1382, relative to time within which trial must be had.

9. Criminal law ⚡623.

Language of Pen. Code, § 1368, providing that, when trial as to sanity is ordered, "trial or the pronouncing of the judgment must be suspended," held mandatory, and self-executing.

10. Prohibition ⚡5(4).

Trial for robbery can be halted by writ of prohibition if had before trial as to sanity which had been ordered under Pen. Code, § 1368, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1102.

11. Criminal law ⚡623—Defendant's right to trial as to sanity held not waived, when deputy public defender failed to insist on it, but did insist that insanity at time of crime would preclude trial (Pen. Code, § 1368).

Defendant's right to trial as to sanity, ordered under Pen. Code, § 1368, held not waived when deputy public defender failed to insist on it, but did insist that defendant could not be tried because he was insane at time of crime.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

E. V. Grace, also known as Thomas Lacey, was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

John F. Groene, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WORKS, J. E. V. Grace, also known as Thomas Lacey, and Robert Newell were jointly charged with the crime of robbery. Newell finally pleaded guilty, and Grace pleaded not guilty. The trial of Grace then proceeded, and he was adjudged guilty. He appeals from the judgment and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

During the course of the proceedings leading to his conviction appellant was before several judges of the superior court. Both he and Newell were arraigned before Judge Keetch on April 20, 1925. Newell then entered a plea of not guilty, and his trial was set for May 22, 1925. The minutes of the court on that occasion show the following as to appellant:

"Defendant Earl B. Grace stands mute, and plea of 'not guilty' is ordered entered by the court and trial set for May 22, 1925. Defendant Earl B. Grace is granted trial as to his sanity, which trial is set for April 29, 1925."

The title of the cause preceding these minutes, and also the minutes recording Newell's plea and the setting of the day of his trial, is "The People of the State of California v. Robert Newell and Thomas Lacey." The next appearance of appellant was before Judges Keetch and Reeve, sitting together, on April 29, 1925. The minutes of the proceedings of that day are below the caption, "The People of the State of California v. Earl B. Grace," and show: "Trial is continued to May 22, 1925." At the next appearance, which occurred on the date last mentioned, the judge presiding was Judge Elliott Craig. The minutes entered on that occasion are under a caption showing the names of both Newell and Grace as defendants, and recite:

"At request of defendants, trial is continued to June 10, 1925. Defendants waive the 60-day statutory period."

Judge Keetch presided on the day of the next appearance, June 10, 1925, and the minutes of that day are under a caption showing the names of both Newell and Grace as defendants. They contain the following:

"Defendant Robert Newell is not present, being confined in the hospital. Trial is continued to July 15, 1925."

The next minutes appear under date June 23, 1925, Judge Reeve presiding, and they are preceded by a caption containing the names of both defendants. The minutes recite:

"This case is ordered transferred from Department 19 to Department 7 and put on calendar on original setting date, to wit, July 15, 1925."

Judge Crail presided at the next appearance on the date last mentioned. The caption shows the names of both defendants. The minutes recite that Newell withdrew his plea of not guilty and entered a plea of guilty, and they show further:

"On order of court, the following jury is impaneled to try the cause as to defendant, Earl B. Grace," —and the names of the jurors are stated. These minutes and the minutes of the next day show the progress and conclusion of the trial of appellant, not upon the issue as to his sanity, but upon the issue as to whether he committed the crime with which he was charged.

We now turn to the reporter's transcript of the proceedings at the trial. After the disposition of certain preliminary matters, and before any witness was called, the following occurred:

"A Deputy Public Defender, representing appellant: If your honor please, there is another matter which we might take up at the present time in regard to the defendant, Grace. At the time of his arrest on this charge he was under the disability of having been declared an insane person, and was at that time in Norwalk State Hospital. I am under the impression myself that after his arrest he was discharged; that is to say, a discharge was issued by the authorities of Norwalk State Hospital. * * * I looked through the files to see if that discharge was in the files, and I do not find it. When I saw it, it was in the possession of [a] deputy district attorney. The defendant, Grace, now states that he has never been discharged, and the authorities at Norwalk—I found from his mother that he was still carried on the rolls of that institution.

"The Court: That would have no bearing on this case, it would seem.

"The Deputy Defender: I think it would in this respect, that if he had been declared to be insane, and never has been restored to, or discharged from that disability, he could not be tried, and I am under the impression that he was discharged. I have proceeded all along upon the theory that he has been discharged, because the deputy district attorney showed me a letter of discharge from the superintendent at Norwalk.

"The Court: He is personally present. I assume the presumption would be, then, without a commitment, the man was sane. Whatever inference could be drawn from that—

"A Deputy District Attorney (interrupting): I might state, your honor, that I recently examined the law on that question. Your honor is absolutely correct on that. * * * (A jury was thereupon impaneled to try the case, after having been examined as to their qualifications, and were duly sworn. The clerk thereupon read the information, and stated the defendant's plea of not guilty.)"

The trial then proceeded to a conclusion; no evidence being taken, and nothing further being said upon the question as to the sanity or insanity of appellant.

Between the time when the trial was concluded and the time when appellant's motion for new trial was presented to the trial court, Mr. Groene, the present counsel for appellant, was substituted in the place of the public defender. The record made at the argument of the motion for a new trial shows the following:

"Mr. Groene: I would like at this time to have permission to file a written motion for a new trial. This, of course, will be only general grounds.

"The Court: Well, file that.

"Mr. Groene: That is an amendment. I think that in this amendment I mentioned the fact that the defendant is now an inmate of the state institution at Norwalk for the insane, having escaped from there, and that at the time of the perpetration of this crime, if he was present, he was incompetent to carry out a crime of that nature, and that he really should be sent back to that institution in order that he might be further treated until he is well of the ailment that is troubling him, which I understand that he is a dope fiend, but he escaped from there and a few days after this crime was committed which he denies that he had anything to do with. * * * Now, * * * it seems to me that, * * * he being an inmate now of an institution at Norwalk, he should be sent back there instead of being sent to a prison in this state, and on that ground I think that the trial should not have been held, as far as he is concerned.

"The Court: Have you got an affidavit to that effect?

"Mr. Groene: No, just merely a motion, but I can prepare an affidavit showing those facts. My intention was to go to Norwalk this afternoon and get the affidavit or certificate of the officers there showing that fact.

"The Court: The District Attorney said in open court that he was discharged from Norwalk.

"Mr. Groene: He had not been discharged before the perpetration of this crime. If a discharge has been granted, it was subsequent to that.

"The Court: Have you any evidence at all? You merely have the statement of the defendant to that effect. What does he know about it? By his own admission he has escaped from that institution.

"Mr. Groene: Yes, he escaped from that institution.

"The Court: The defendant says he was discharged; that was the escape.

"Mr. Groene: I expect to make a trip to Norwalk for that very purpose, to get the facts. Of course, what I am stating now is what the defendant states to me, and it looks to me that, if under the facts and the circumstances at the time this crime was committed he had not been discharged, it is a good defense for him in this case.

"The Court: Well, taking up that question now, my idea of the law is that that would not be a defense; that would merely be evidence from which an inference might be drawn that he was insane now, but it would not be conclusive, and the defendant was on the stand and testified, and showed to all of us that he was not insane, didn't claim he was insane. The court does not believe he is insane. There is no occasion to have a similar hearing on the question of his insanity, because there was nothing indicating that he was insane.

"Mr. Groene: But the fact I claim is, he was insane at the time of the perpetration of this crime. Now, if he was insane at that time, whether he is sane now or not, it looks to me that that is the element that should be considered—what was it at that time? It looks to me—

"The Court: His own attorney did not have any faith in it.

"Mr. Groene: Still he escaped from the prison. As I understand it, the district attorney did not show only the mere statement that he had been discharged; he didn't make it evidence.

"The Court: There wasn't any burden on the part of the people to prove he was insane; it was presumed that he was sane.

"Mr. Groene: That is true, too, but I think under all the circumstances he should be given an opportunity, and that that should be brought to the attention of the jury, that he was insane at that particular time when this crime was committed.

"The Court: That is not a plea, that he was not properly defendant; that wouldn't be a ground for a new trial.

"Mr. Groene: That is not the ground really, but it looks to me, the man having been there, it looks to me that there is something wrong with him mentally.

"The Court: We have talked about it quite a while.

"Mr. Groene: I had four or five talks with him. To tell you the truth, to my own mind, he is not sane to-day, and I think that he should be given an opportunity, and that a new trial should be granted, in order that he may have that fact appear, and that summary proceedings be had to test his mentality, and whether or not he is insane at this particular time or not. I was up in San Francisco and San Quentin for two or three days this week, and I got back late yesterday afternoon and I haven't had a chance to look into the matter or to go to Norwalk. That is all I can say in the matter, your honor.

"The Court: You may stand, Mr. Grace. The motion is denied. * * *

Appellant was then sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison.

Upon this state of the record three points are made by appellant: (1) That Judge Crail was bound by the order of Judge Keetch to the effect that appellant should have a preliminary trial upon the question whether he was insane; (2) that until the preliminary trial upon the issue of sanity was had appellant could not be tried upon the question whether he had committed the act out of which the charge against him arose; (3) that the right to a separate and preliminary trial as to appellant's sanity, under the order made by Judge Keetch, could not be waived by appellant's counsel. Disposition of these points will be made in their sequence as stated.

[1] Upon the first point it seems manifest that appellant's position is correct. In a recent case (People v. Moronati [Cal. App.] 232 P. 991) we decided practically the same question. In that action the defendant entered, in a certain department of the superior court, a plea of not guilty and a certain special plea. He was tried in that department, and the jury disagreed. The cause was later transferred to another department of the trial court, where a second trial was had. We determined that the special plea stood at the second trial, notwithstanding the transfer. It is plain to us that the same rule applies here. A superior court is but one tribunal, even if it be composed of numerous departments. A division into departments is made only for convenience in the disposition of the business of the court. An order made in one department during the progress of a cause can neither be ignored nor overlooked in another department in which the cause falls by transfer. The order made by Judge Keetch was as binding and effective in the department presided over by Judge Crail as if the latter judge had made it himself.

[2] Whether Judge Keetch's order remains effective at all is the next question to be considered, and that question is embraced in the second point made by appellant. Was the trial court in error in proceeding with the trial that was had, in the absence of a trial under the order of Judge Keetch? It is provided by section 1368 of the Penal Code:

"If at any time during the pendency of an action up to and including the time when defendant is brought up for judgment on conviction a doubt arises as to the sanity of the defendant, the court must order the question as to his sanity to be submitted to a jury; and the trial or the pronouncing of the judgment must be suspended until the question is determined by their verdict, and the trial jury may be discharged or retained, according to the discretion of the court, during the pendency of the issue of insanity."

The language of this section amply upholds the validity of Judge Keetch's order at the time when it was made. The record presents no showing as to the evidence upon which the order was based. Upon the score of appellant's condition of mind there is nothing in the record of the day upon which the order was made except the order itself. Particularly, there is no reporter's transcript of the proceedings of that day. Under such circumstances it is evident that we must assume that the judge did his duty in making the order. That assumption imports that he proceeded in accordance with the mandate of section 1368, and that, therefore, and upon sufficient evidence, a doubt was created in his mind as to the sanity of appellant. So the order stood as to Judge Keetch; so it also stands as to the judge who conducted the trial that was had, unless something has occurred since the order was made which operates to set it aside or abrogate it, or which amounts to a waiver of it.

[3-7] We have already seen that the order was not discharged by a compliance with its terms. No trial was had pursuant to its requirement. And the record furnishes no basis for a claim that it was abrogated or discharged in any other manner, except, possibly, by waiver. Was there a waiver of the right secured by the order? This question we proceed now to discuss. Not only did the judge who tried the cause overlook the fact that the order for a preliminary trial had been made by Judge Keetch, but both the deputy district attorney and the deputy public defender who were at the trial were in the same difficulty. It is evident that they both had overlooked Judge Keetch's order. If they had not, they would have reminded Judge Crail of the existence of the order, for it would have been their duty to do so. The right secured under the order was not waived by the failure of the deputy district attorney in this regard, although it was his duty to have made the reminder, if he knew of the existence of the order, for he was without authority to waive any right of appellant. Nor do we think there was a waiver because of the silence of the deputy public defender. Upon the score of waiver, and resolving the situation solely from the standpoint of the question of waiver, no more damage could result to the rights of appellant from the failure of the defender to remind Judge Crail of the existence of Judge Keetch's order, than from his failure to remind the former officer of a similar order which had been made by himself. And it seems obvious that a waiver could not have resulted under the circumstances last mentioned. If the order had been made by Judge Crail, he would doubtless have remembered it as a matter of fact, but, whether it was made by Judge Keetch or by himself, he was bound to know that it had been made, as a matter of law. A due regard for the preservation of the safeguards surrounding those charged with the commission of crime will permit no other conclusion. It is pertinent here to make a few observations which relate, not only to the particular point now under discussion, but to others which remain for consideration. The law abhors the punishment of insane persons for the commission of acts out of which charges of crime arise, whether the insanity exist at the time such acts are committed or only at the time the punishment is about to be inflicted, or even if the insanity be discovered while the punishment is in progress. Pen. Code §§ 26, 1191, 1201, 1221, 1222, 1367, 1368, 1587. With this just principle so firmly fixed, as, indeed, it must be among an enlightened people, it would require the most satisfactory evidence to convince us that one ordered to trial upon the question whether he were insane, as a preliminary to his trial on a criminal charge, had waived his rights under the order. We are abundantly satisfied that in the present instance there was no waiver because of the failure of the deputy public defender to remind the judge who conducted the trial that such an order had been made in the cause by another judge.

[8] In determining whether the benefits accruing to appellant under Judge Keetch's order were waived, it is necessary to examine another circumstance shown by the record. The minutes of May 22, 1925, with Judge Craig presiding, show this:

"At request of defendants, trial is continued to June 10, 1925. Defendants waive the 60-day statutory period."

The waiver contemplated, specifically, by the second sentence of this entry was, of course, a waiver of the right secured by section 1382 of the Penal Code, which provides, in part:

"The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed. * * * If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information."

[9, 10] The question now to be considered is whether, in making this express waiver, and in requesting that "the trial" be continued to June 10, 1925, appellant waived the right secured to him by the order of Judge Keetch granting him a preliminary trial as to his sanity. A determination of this question will be materially aided by an inspection of the minutes of the court from those of date April 20, 1925, containing the order of Judge Keetch, to those entered while Judge Craig was presiding, on May 22, 1925. It will be observed that the minutes of April 20th show that a plea of not guilty was entered for appellant, and that his trial was thereupon set for May 22d, but that immediately following this setting a preliminary trial as to his sanity was ordered, and that trial was set for April 29th. The effect of the order making this latter setting was to make inoperative the setting for May 22d until a trial was had on the preliminary question on April 29th or on a later date to which that trial might be continued. So much is evident from the terms of section 1368 of the Penal Code to the effect that whenever a trial as to sanity is ordered "the trial or the pronouncing of the judgment must be suspended." This section does not provide that an order must be made suspending "the trial," but that, upon the making of the order for a trial as to sanity, "the trial" must be suspended. This language of the section is mandatory, and it is self-executing. Moreover, it prescribes a positive duty not to proceed with "the trial" until the preliminary trial has been had, a duty, therefore, which is specially enjoined by law in the contemplation of section 1085 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the writ of mandate. Undoubtedly, therefore, "the trial" which was had before Judge Crail could have been halted by the writ of prohibition; no trial having been had under the order of Judge Keetch, unless that order had in the meantime been abrogated in some lawful manner, for the writ of prohibition is the counterpart of the writ of mandate. Section 1102, Code Civ. Proc. We advert to this state of the law for the purpose of showing how strongly the rights of appellant were entrenched under the order of Judge Keetch. We have already referred to the sacred character of the right which that order conferred upon him.

We return to the minutes of the court. Appellant was before Judges Keetch and Reeve on April 29th, the date set for the trial of the issue as to his sanity. The minutes of that day show: "Trial is continued to May 22, 1925." This entry related to the trial of the preliminary question as to sanity, for no other trial had been set for April 29th. This truth is so obvious as to require but the mere statement of it. When, therefore, May 22d was reached, the day upon which Judge Craig presided, this was the situation: The date had arrived through continuance, upon which the issue of sanity was to be tried. The date had also arrived, under the original setting, upon which "the trial" was to be had. But at the moment when Judge Craig took the bench, the right of appellant to a trial as to his sanity was alive and vigorous, while the right of the prosecution to demand that "the trial" should proceed was in a state of suspended animation. The minutes entered during Judge Craig's occupancy of the bench must be viewed in the light of these circumstances, and, so viewed, they appear clearly not to show a waiver of the right of appellant under Judge Keetch's order. The first sentence of the minutes shows that "trial is continued" at the request of defendants. So far as appellant is concerned, the request must be deemed to have related only to the trial which was originally set for April 29th, the trial as to sanity, for the plain reason that, up to the moment when Judge Craig made the order that went into the minutes, the trial set for April 29th was the only trial which the court had power to conduct. We need not be concerned over the question whether both "trials" were continued by the order until June 10th. If "the trial" originally set for May 22d was so continued, it was only postponed to a further continuance on June 10th, unless in the meantime the trial originally set for April 29th were had, or the order of Judge Keetch were discharged or abrogated in some other lawful manner. By the second sentence of Judge Craig's minutes "defendants" waived the requirement of section 1382 of the Penal Code. We see nothing inconsistent with the right of appellant under Judge Keetch's order in the making of this express waiver. There was no reason, even if the right to a trial as to sanity were pending, why the waiver as to the time of the main trial should not have been made, and it was doubtless proper for Judge Craig to insist upon the waiver that was expressly made as a condition annexed to the order for continuance, whatever was the effect of that order. It is clear to us that the minutes entered under Judge Craig show no waiver of appellant's right under the order for a trial as to sanity. We need not dwell upon the later minutes of the court, except to say that by them, through regular continuance, the date of the trial originally set for April 29th, the trial as to sanity, was carried forward to the day when appellant appeared before Judge Crail and was tried and convicted pursuant to the original setting of "the trial," to employ again the term used in section 1368 of the Penal Code for May 22d.

[11] When Judge Crail took the bench on July 15, 1925, the right of the prosecution to demand "the trial" was still in a state of suspension. Did anything occur before him to revive that right? Did anything occur before him that amounted to a waiver of appellant's right to a trial as to his sanity? For the purpose of answering these questions, we have above set forth the colloquy between the judge and the deputy public defender which took place at the commencement of the trial that Judge Crail conducted. Little more than a perusal of the remarks of the two is necessary to an answer to the questions just stated. The deputy public defender did not insist upon a trial as to sanity under the order of Judge Keetch, but he did insist that "the trial" could not proceed, for the reason that appellant had been confined in an institution for the insane, and that he had not been discharged from that custody up to the time of the commission of his alleged crime, although he stated that he was under the impression that such a discharge had been granted after appellant was arrested. It is true that the colloquy between the trial judge and the defender was colored by the incorrect belief, indulged in by both, that a discharge of appellant after his arrest could affect the question whether he was insane at the time when it is alleged that he committed the crime with which he was charged. Nevertheless, we think it sufficiently appears that the defender insisted that appellant could not be tried because he was insane, and that the judge held that the trial must proceed because appellant's sanity was to be presumed. On the whole, we are satisfied that the defender said nothing that worked a waiver of appellant's right under the order of Judge Keetch.

We have quoted the record made at the argument of the motion for a new trial, not as bearing on the question of waiver, but as showing that appellant insisted through his counsel in the trial court, to the last moment, that he was insane. That record is set forth for the purpose, also, of correcting certain erroneous statements made by the trial judge at the time, and which tend somewhat to obscure the circumstances surrounding the trial. The judge said: "The District Attorney said in open court that the [appellant] was discharged from Norwalk." This statement was made by the deputy public defender, and in the form already noticed. The judge also said that "the defendant was on the stand and testified, and showed to all of us that he was not insane, didn't claim he was insane. The court does not believe he is insane." Appellant did not take the witness stand. Before Newell withdrew his plea of not guilty, he insisted upon a continuance of the case on behalf of both appellant and himself. In the midst of Newell's remarks on this subject appellant interjected the statement: "I haven't had a chance." So far as the record discloses, this was his only utterance during the trial. The judge further said: "His own attorney did not have any faith in [the claim that appellant was insane]." The attitude of the deputy public defender on this subject is shown by what occurred at the commencement of the trial. It is to be observed here that the "written motion for a new trial," referred to in the remarks of Mr. Groene on the argument of motion for a new trial, is not to be found in the record.

Appellant's third point, as above stated, is that his counsel were without authority to waive his rights under the order of Judge Keetch. Because of the conclusions above reached, we find it unnecessary to decide that question. Appellant presents other points which arise, as he contends, under the record of the trial that ended in his conviction, but we need not pause to consider them.

The order of Judge Keetch has never been discharged or abrogated. The trial before Judge Crail was, therefore, a nullity. The cause must be remanded for a trial upon the question of appellant's sanity or insanity, as contemplated by the order of Judge Keetch. After that trial appellant will further be dealt with as required by law.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

In re HILL. (Civ. 5177.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 11, 1926.)

1. Infants $\S$ 16—Failure to make findings of fact in proceeding to declare minor ward of court held to require reversal (Juvenile Court Act [St. 1915, p. 1225] $\S$ 2).

In proceeding to make minor ward of juvenile court, failure to make findings of facts upon which court exercises jurisdiction, under Juvenile Court Act, $\S$ 2, as foundation for judgment declaring minor a ward, held to require reversal.

2. Infants $\S$ 16.

In proceeding to declare minor ward of juvenile court, parents are sufficiently "interested parties," under Juvenile Court Act, $\S$ 4, 15f, to entitle them to be present, to produce evidence, and be represented by counsel.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interest.]

3. Parent and child $\S$ 2(3).

State may remove child from parents' custody if its own best interests require.

4. Infants $\S$ 16—Technicalities of procedure, but not rules protecting substantial rights, will be disregarded in summary proceeding to declare minor ward of juvenile court.

Although, in proceeding to declare minor ward of juvenile court, technicalities of procedure should be disregarded, rules protecting substantial rights, such as regular processes of law provided to produce evidence, and to aid courts in testing and weighing it, will not be scrapped.

5. Infants $\S$ 16—Process of law is available to bring witnesses before hearing in juvenile court, and final order may not be based upon details privately whispered to judge in chambers.

In proceeding to declare infant ward of juvenile court, process of law is available to bring witnesses into court, and final order should not be based upon secret information whispered privately to judge in chambers without opportunity for test through cross-examination by interested parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

In the matter of Nadine Hill, a minor. From a judgment declaring the minor a ward of the juvenile court, its parents appeal. Reversed and remanded for rehearing.

George M. Cook, of Taft, for appellants.

H. E. Schmidt, Dist. Atty., and Dorsey & Campbell, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. It appears that a petition was filed in the superior court of Kern county sitting in special session as a juvenile court, which asked that Nadine Hill be declared a dependent child under subdivision 4 of section 1 of the Juvenile Court Act (St. 1915, p. 1225). Cruelty of the mother was alleged in the petition as the ground for the child being declared dependent. A hearing was held on June 22, 1925, and thereafter on the same day the following order was entered:

"* * * Hearing and examination closed and good cause appearing therefor, it is by the court ordered that said Nadine Hill be and she is hereby declared to be a ward of the juvenile court, and is remanded to the custody of C. P. Badger, probation officer of Kern county, until further order of the court."

A notice of appeal was filed by the father and mother of the child, purporting to be "from the order or judgment heretofore made and entered in said superior court on the 22d day of June, 1925, wherein the said Nadine Hill was adjudged to be a ward of the juvenile court, and from the whole thereof."

Counsel for respondent expresses doubt as to what action or order of the trial court the appeal is taken from, but we think it evident that the intention was to appeal from the order above quoted.

[1] One ground urged by the appellants involves error of such a character as to require a reversal. The record which is certified as contained "a full, true and correct transcript of all documents and minute orders with exception of subpoena writs," embraces no finding of fact. Section 2 of the Juvenile Court Act provides:

"When any person under the age of twenty-one years, alleged to come within the provisions of any of the subdivisions 1 to 13 inclusive of section 1 of this act, shall be found by said court or judge to come within the terms of any of said subdivisions as alleged, the court shall adjudge said person to be a ward of the juvenile court and shall in its judgment make a finding of the facts upon which the court exercises its jurisdiction over such person as a ward of the juvenile court; and the court shall thereupon make such order or orders, in accordance with said findings, as may be necessary for the care of said ward of the juvenile court. * * *

The law is clear and mandatory in its requirement that the findings of fact be made as a foundation for any judgment declaring a minor to be a ward of the juvenile court. Such was the holding in In re Brodie, 33 Cal. App. 751, 166 P. 605. The point there dealt with another section of the same law, but the same requirement is found therein as in section 2. For this error we think the judgment must be reversed.

[2] During the proceeding herein the court directed the sheriff to remove from the courtroom Mr. George M. Cook, who stated that he was present representing Ellsworth Hill, the father of the child, Nadine Hill. This occurred immediately after Hill had been sworn as a witness at the instance of the court, and had refused to answer questions, stating that he did so on the advice of counsel, because it might subject him to criminal prosecution. The court stated that this was a proceeding in which no attorney may appear as a matter of right, and said:

"I will thank you, Mr. Cook, never again to appear in any juvenile case before me, Mr. Cook."

Under the Juvenile Court Act, § 4, it is provided that upon the filing of the petition citation shall issue requiring the persons having the custody or control of the minor to produce the latter, and, further, that the parents shall be cited and required to attend the hearing. Section 4 makes the failure to comply with such citation a contempt of court. The act authorizes the court to make the minor a ward and to deprive the parents of its custody; also to require the parents to make such payments as may be necessary for its support, and to punish for contempt of court any disobedience or interference with enforcement of orders on the part of the parents. It authorizes the parents to require the hearing to be private, and the right of the parents to be present at the hearing is not only recognized, but special provision is made by which such attendance may be compelled. Being present at the hearing and in nearly all cases having unusual opportunity for knowledge of the issues involved, it may reasonably be assumed that they would be asked to be sworn as witnesses. We have no doubt that in a proceeding of this nature the parents are sufficiently interested parties to entitle them to be present to protect their interests as well as those of the child. To this end it is clear that they may produce evidence and cross-examine witnesses; may appeal from the final orders adversely affecting their claims; and may be advised and represented by counsel.

[3, 4] While the right of the state to remove the child from its parents' custody is unquestioned, as also is the proposition that in a proceeding for that purpose the most vital question is the child's own good and the best interests of the state as they are involved in the child's welfare, it must be remembered that the family and its relations have ever been recognized as the foundation of society. What a man may lawfully do in the protection of his own personal security and life he may, and indeed it is his duty to, do in the defense of his children. The common law has always upheld the sanctity of the home, the sacredness of parental rights, and the corresponding seriousness of parental obligations. When a parent is derelict in the performance of his duties toward his child, or abuses his trust as its guardian, he should undoubtedly forfeit such trust and be removed from the guardianship. But the charge that there has been an abuse of trust by the parent cannot be regarded lightly. No action affecting rights of property, personal liberty, or security involves issues more worthy of judicial consideration and entitled to judicial determination than a proceeding affecting the custody of a little child, involving as it may the molding of its character for good or for ill. No claims of the parent should stand in the way of his removal from its control, if such drastic action is for the welfare of the child. On the other hand, a normal parent's devotion, care, and guidance are invaluable, and can seldom be replaced. The relations of parent and child should not be severed or disturbed, unless the facts justify it, and the interests of all parties concerned require that these facts be shown by evidence whose verity has been carefully and legally tested. And so, while the exact truth should be searched out, and all mere technicalities of procedure as distinguished from rules which protect substantial rights should be disregarded, the regular processes of the law provided to produce evidence, and the ordinary rules established to aid courts in testing and weighing it, are not scrapped because the proceeding is a summary one.

[5] In the instant case the process of the law was available to bring witnesses into court, and it should have been used for that purpose. If persons secretly informed the judge that the parents' home was not a fit place for this child, and if their information was reliable and of any value, these persons must have known facts which would warrant that conclusion. It was their duty to come forward and in a manly or womanly fashion give their testimony, so that this helpless infant might be withdrawn from danger and cruelty. But details whispered privately to a judge in chambers cannot be the basis of a final order. The more serious the accusation the greater the need that it be carefully tested, and to that end that no one interested be denied the right of cross-examination.

If it be true, as some of the evidence included in the transcript indicates, and as the people who talked to the judge privately may have said, that Mrs. Hill shamefully abused Nadine, it is exceedingly unfortunate that a rehearing should be required. But consequences fraught with far greater evil would inevitably result from the sanction of judicial abuses of the character here presented; and, if witnesses were reticent about appearing and testifying, they could easily have been brought to the hearing upon citation, which process the law expressly authorizes the court to issue.

It may be added that we are not required to pass upon the question as to whether or not the law might authorize a final order making a minor a ward of the juvenile court, based upon hearsay evidence or statements made to the judge out of court, nor to say that the law might not deprive parents of the right to counsel. The authority of the Legislature to enact such laws is not involved, for the Juvenile Court Law of this state contains no such provision. It unmistakably recognizes that the parents have rights and are interested parties. It provides for the hearing and the reception of evidence, and contemplates an order based upon such evidence. It expressly preserves the right of appeal, and broadens the authority of the appellate court in reviewing the evidence on appeal, so that the weight of the evidence may be considered and the order sustained or reversed according to the preponderance of the evidence. The spirit of the entire law is exemplified by the language of section 15f, which reads as follows:

"On the return of the citation or other process, or as soon thereafter as may be, the court shall proceed to hear and dispose of the case, after full and careful consideration of all the evidence presented and with due regard to the legitimate rights and claims of the parent or parents of said person, and with due regard to any and all ties of blood or affection, but with the dominant purpose of serving the best interests of said persons."

We find no other points which require consideration. The judgment is reversed, and the matter remanded to the juvenile court for rehearing.

Evidence held to sustain conviction of burglary.

3. Criminal law §1144(16).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Alonzo W. Canyon was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

M. H. Broyles, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was convicted upon an information charging him with having on or about the 27th day of February, 1926, entered the dwelling house of a Mrs. M. Meyers, in the city of Los Angeles, with intent then and there to commit the crime of larceny. The jury returned a verdict of burglary in the first degree; a motion for new trial was presented, and denied; and he appeals from the ruling upon such motion and from the judgment.

[1, 2] It appears from the testimony of the complaining witness, Mrs. Meyers, that at about 1:30 a. m. of said date she awoke and discovered the defendant standing at the foot of her bed holding a portion of a broom handle; that she immediately jumped from her bed and commanded him to leave the house, whereupon the intruder ran into the kitchen and leaped out through the window; that a large electric light had been turned on in the kitchen, which enabled her to unmistakably identify the appellant as a man whom she had seen on an average of twice a week for a period of about two years at meetings of a society of which both were members. The witness testified that she then discovered that her pocketbook had been removed from her sewing machine and lay on the kitchen table; that her coin purse had been taken therefrom and all the money which she had left in the purse was gone; both the pocketbook and purse had been turned inside out; that a flashlight which she had placed on her dressing table was also in the kitchen beside the pocketbook. Other witnesses testified to having heard Mrs. Meyers' loud cries to "get out of here," and that there was a commotion and scuffling of feet at about the time in question in her apartment. Mrs. Meyers and a police officer both testified that she telephoned for the police on the same morning and that she stated that the name of the burglar was Canyon and that he lived on East Twentieth street, but that she did not know his first name, nor the number of his place of residence.

There are many alleged errors assigned as grounds for reversal, but they may all be summarized concisely under the following heads: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment; (2) errors of the trial court in its rulings during the trial; and (3) errors in instructing the jury.

Criticism of the evidence consists mainly in assertions that the only eyewitness to the occurrence which we have related was Mrs. Meyers, and that no other person saw the defendant in or near the house, or connected him with the offense, from which it is argued that her testimony was improbable. However, her testimony was positive and direct, and when asked whether or not she was sure that the defendant was the man whom she found in her apartment, she answered:

"I would swear it—I would swear if you brought out a thousand men, that he was there that night. I don't need to have anybody else to tell me that; I know it was him."

Canyun testified that he was not in Mrs. Meyers' house on the night in question, and from his testimony upon preliminary examination which was read to the jury pursuant to stipulation, it appears that he accounted for his whereabouts during the night, and swore that he did not arrive home until about 2 o'clock a. m. of February 27th, whereas his wife testified that he returned home at about 11:15 p. m. and did not leave the house thereafter. Other witnesses testified to the defendant's good reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity.

The most that can be said of the evidence offered on behalf of the appellant is that it conflicted in some respects with that of the prosecuting witness. It is too elementary to require the citation of authority that the credibility of witnesses, the weight to be given to their testimony, and conflicts among them as to questions of fact, are exclusively for the jury and the trial court to decide, and will not be reviewed upon appeal. Mrs. Meyers was not impeached, and her evidence was sufficient if believed by the jury to sustain the verdict and judgment. People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 303; People v. Lamb, 67 Cal. App. 263, 227 P. 969. It may also be added that the testimony of this witness was supported by many corroborating circumstances, and by the testimony of her neighbors.

It is contended that the trial court committed errors prejudicial to the defendant in its instructions to the jury, though none were requested in his behalf and our attention is not directed to any portion of the charge which appellant claims to have been erroneous. We have perused the instructions with care and are unable to coincide with such assertion.

[3] Also it is argued that the jury misconstrued the law as given them by the trial court, but there is no showing made which tends to support such conclusion. It will be presumed, in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, that the jury observed the instructions given them. People v. Dong Pok Yip, 164 Cal. 143, 127 P. 1031; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 207, 48 P. 75.

Other points attempted to be made are even less meritorious than some of the above, and a discussion of them is unnecessary.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In action to recover balance of purchase price, inconsistent findings to effect that one of defendants was trading under fictitious name, and that other defendants were not interested in business run under such name, but that goods were delivered to such other defendants, some of findings being outside of issues raised by pleading, held to require reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by the Dutton Dredge Company against Charles E. Goss and others, a co-partnership doing business under the firm name and style Charles E. Goss & Son, for money due. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Hankins & Hankins and Olin F. Nuckolls, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Edward J. Lynch, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover a judgment for $536.54, alleged to be the balance owing the plaintiff for hay purchased by defendants. In the first count the plaintiff pleaded an agreed price, in the second count it pleaded a common count as for a balance due on account, and in the third count it pleaded a sale for the reasonable value. The defendants appeared jointly, and as such interposed a demurrer to the complaint and a demurrer to each count. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendants jointly answered. In their answer to each count the defendants denied the allegations contained in each paragraph of each count contained in the complaint. The defendant H. E. Goss interposed a defense to the effect that he purchased one schooner load, consisting of 75 to 100 tons; that he received 85.41 tons and paid therefor, and that thereafter he purchased 128.55 tons for which he agreed to pay "the best price he could pay for said hay according to the quality of said hay and the market conditions at the time of handling the same"; that $930.54 was the amount of the second purchase. At the end of the trial the trial court found against the defense last stated, and it also made a finding that by reason of the conclusions reached no finding was necessary on the second count and third count contained in the plaintiff's complaint and the answers thereto. The defendant H. E. Goss also pleaded a counterclaim for $24.90. The first count of plaintiff's complaint was as follows:

"Complaint for Goods Sold and Delivered.

"Plaintiff above named complains of the above named defendants, and for cause of action alleges:

"I. That the plaintiff is a corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, and having its office and principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, in said state.

"II. That the defendant Chas. E. Goss & Son is a copartnership, consisting of Charles E. Goss, Mary A. Goss and H. E. Goss, having their office in said city and county of San Francisco.

"III. That on or about the 10th day of August, 1923, the defendants agreed to purchase from the plaintiff certain hay belonging to the plaintiff, situated on the landing of Green Island ranch, Napa county, and to pay plaintiff therefor at the rate of eleven and 50/100 ($11.50) dollars per ton f. o. b. said landing, said payment to be made upon delivery; that thereafter plaintiff delivered said hay to the defendants at said landing; that the total quantity of said hay so delivered by plaintiff to defendants was two hundred and thirteen and 96/100 (213.96) tons; that the total amount due for said hay, at the agreed purchase price, was the sum of two thousand four hundred and sixty and 54/100 ($2,460.54) dollars; that defendants have paid no part thereof, excepting the sum of nineteen hundred and twenty-four ($1,924.00) dollars, leaving a balance still due, owing and unpaid from defendants to plaintiff, of five hundred thirty-six and 54/100 ($536.54) dollars.

"IV. That although demand has been made upon defendants for the payment of said balance, the defendants have refused and still refuse to pay the same, and the entire amount of said sum of five hundred thirty-six and 54/100 ($536.54) dollars is now due, owing and unpaid from defendants to plaintiff."

As stated above, each paragraph was denied. The counterclaim pleaded by the defendant H. E. Goss was as follows:

"I. That within two years last past in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, said defendant H. E. Goss agreed to buy from plaintiff, and said plaintiff agreed to sell to said defendant, 24.90 tons, or thereabouts, of oats. That thereafter and prior to the commencement of this action, and at the request of said plaintiff, it was agreed by and between said defendant and said plaintiff that said contract or agreement of purchase of said oats should be rescinded and as a consideration for said rescission said plaintiff was to pay to said defendant the sum of $1 per ton, or the total sum of $24.90.

"II. That said contract for the purchase of said oats was by mutual consent of said plaintiff and said defendant rescinded and set aside, but said plaintiff did not, nor has not, paid to said defendant said sum of $24.90, and the same was at the time of the commencement of this action and now is wholly due, owing and payable from said plaintiff to said defendant H. E. Goss."

No other allegations were contained in the pleadings of either party.

Thereafter the trial court made findings as follows:

"(1) That the plaintiff is a corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, having its office and principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, in said state.

"That the defendant H. E. Goss, at all the times mentioned in the complaint, was transacting business under the fictitious name of Chas. E. Goss & Son; that the defendants Charles E. Goss and Mary A. Goss were not members of said firm of Chas. E. Goss & Son.

"(2) That on or about the 10th day of August, 1923, said defendant Charles E. Goss, doing business as Chas. E. Goss & Son, agreed to purchase from the plaintiff certain hay belonging to the plaintiff, situated on landing, Green Island ranch, Napa county, and to pay plaintiff therefor at the rate of $11.50 per ton f. o. b. landing, said payment to be made upon delivery; that plaintiff delivered to said Chas. E. Goss & Son 213.96 tons of said hay; that a portion of the hay received by said defendant H. E. Goss at destination was in a damaged condition; that part of said damage occurred prior to the delivery of said hay and that the defendant H. E. Goss was entitled to a credit of $160.00 on account of damage to hay prior to delivery; that the total amount which became due to plaintiff for the hay delivered by plaintiff to defendant was the sum of $2,460.54; that the defendant paid on account thereof the sum of $1,900; that defendant is entitled to a credit of $24.90 as set forth in the answer and second counterclaim to the first cause of action in plaintiff's complaint, and is also entitled to a credit of $160 on account of damage to hay, as above stated, making total credits of $2,084.90, and leaving a balance due plaintiff of $375.64; that defendant has not paid the balance due of $375.64, and said sum of $375.64 is still wholly due, owing and unpaid from said defendant H. E. Goss to plaintiff.

"That all the allegations contained in plaintiff's answer to the first cause of action contained in plaintiff's complaint, are untrue, excepting the following:

"(1) The allegations of paragraph II, denying that the defendant Chas. E. Goss & Son is a copartnership consisting of Charles E. Goss, Mary A. Goss and/or H. E. Goss; and the court finds that it is not true that said Chas. E. Goss & Son is a copartnership, consisting of said persons.

"(2) The allegation of paragraph I of the answer and first counterclaim to plaintiff's first cause of action, alleging that some time about the 20th day of August, 1923, plaintiff offered to sell to defendant H. E. Goss a certain lot of hay, consisting of about 200 tons, at the price of $11.50 per ton f. o. b. said land; the court finds that said last mentioned allegation is true.

"(3) That the allegation of paragraph VI of said answer and first counterclaim, alleging that defendant H. E. Goss advanced to plaintiff the sum of $1,900 to be applied on account of the purchase price of hay, is true.

"That all the allegations of the answer and second counterclaim to plaintiff's first cause of action are true."

As conclusions of law the court ordered "judgment against the defendant H. E. Goss doing business under the name of Chas. E. Goss & Son for the sum of $375.64." Thereafter, on March 20, 1925, a judgment was prepared, and the trial judge signed the same "that Dutton Dredge Company, a corporation, plaintiff, do have and recover from Charles E. Goss, Mary A. Goss and H. E. Goss, a copartnership doing business under the firm name and style of Chas. E. Goss & Son, and Chas. E. Goss & Son, said copartnership, defendants, the sum of $411.64." Thereafter, on April 10, 1925, all of the defendants served and filed a notice of appeal from said judgment and the whole thereof. Thereafter, on the 21st day of August, 1925, the trial court made an order reciting many of the foregoing facts, and made an amended judgment that the plaintiff "do have and recover from the defendant H. E. Goss doing business under the firm name and style of Chas. E. Goss & Son the sum of $375.64, together with the sum of $36 interest, dated March 20, 1925." Thereafter, on September 12, 1925, all of said defendants appealed from the amended judgment. Both of said appeals are submitted on the record before us.

[1, 2] The second appeal presents no serious question. The trial court had the inherent power to make its record speak the truth and to amend the judgment as entered to make it conform to the decision which the court had actually rendered (Goatman v. Fuller, 191

Cal. 245, 216 P. 35); although the judge had signed the original judgment (14 Cal. Jur. 1001, § 75); and the power to make the amendment that was made in the instant case was not divested by the appeal taken from the original judgment (Crawford v. Meadows, 55 Cal. App. 4, 10, 203 P. 428).

[3, 4] The first appeal presents errors that are more troublesome. It will be noted that the trial court in one finding found that H. E. Goss, at all times mentioned in the complaint, was transacting business under the fictitious name of Chas. E. Goss & Son. In the next finding it will be noticed that the trial court found that Charles E. Goss, doing business as Chas. E. Goss & Son, agreed to purchase the hay, and plaintiff delivered to said Chas. E. Goss & Son the said hay. Except as we have quoted there is no finding of sale or delivery by plaintiff to any one. Moreover, as the findings stand in one paragraph, the finding is that H. E. Goss was doing business under the fictitious name of Chas. E. Goss & Son, and in another paragraph the finding is that Charles E. Goss was doing business as Chas. E. Goss & Son. In connection with the two findings just referred to, it will be further noted that the expression, "was transacting business under the fictitious name of Chas. E. Goss & Son," is wholly without any issue made by the pleadings.

There is a finding "that all the allegations contained in plaintiff's answer to the first cause of action," etc., are untrue, except —. As the plaintiff had no answer on file, we are left to make a guess that the finding contained a word by mistake and that the finding was intended to be "that all the allegations contained in defendants' answer to the first cause of action" are untrue, except —. But if we take that view we are then confronted with another finding, which is "that all the allegations of the answer * * * to plaintiff's first cause of action are true." These two findings are meaningless or hopelessly conflicting.

Wherein the court found that Charles E. Goss was doing business as Chas. E. Goss & Son, the respondent asks us to hold that a typographical error was committed, and that the finding should read, H. E. Goss was doing business as Chas. E. Goss & Son. We think we have no power to go as far as the respondent requests, because in doing so we would be making a finding of fact. This court has no power to make findings.

Those portions of the findings printed in italics are each and all without the issues made by the pleadings. Other points presented by the appellants, addressed to such nugatory findings, need not be considered.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to allow the parties to amend their pleadings to conform to the proof, and thereupon the trial court will make such findings of fact, as, in its discretion, determine the issues and order judgment in accordance therewith. | Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 641, 659, 660, 58 P. 298, 60 P. 974, 66 P. 982. It is further ordered that the appellants recover their costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Butler-Veitch, Inc., against W. J. Barnard, wherein defendant interposed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff and order denying a new trial, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, and Thos. W. Forsyth, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ray Maxwell, of Marysville, and Roy A. Bronson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PULLEN, Justice pro tem. This action was brought by the respondent, as plaintiff, against the defendant and appellant for a specified sum, being the installment payments due it at the date of the commencement of the action under an executory contract of sale, wherein plaintiff had agreed to sell, and defendant had agreed to buy, a motor truck, the total price payable in installments.

Defendant answered, admitting the execution of the contract, but alleged that at the same time and place, and as a part of the same transaction, and at the instance of plaintiff, and as an inducement to the defendant to enter into said contract for the purchase of the truck, defendant entered into a hauling contract with respondent and one Mahoney. The answer further alleged that by agreement of the parties the balance of the purchase price of the truck was to be paid from the net earnings of the truck while in the service of Mahoney, and that, without fault of defendant, the net earnings of the truck were insufficient to pay the amounts specified in the contract. As a further answer defendant interposed a cross-complaint, in which it was alleged that defendant was induced to purchase the truck by the representations of plaintiff that plaintiff was interested with Mahoney, who had a contract for the hauling of a large quantity of cement, machinery, and other equipment, and also that, if defendant did purchase a truck from plaintiff, plaintiff would procure steady and profitable work for the truck during the season of 1923 with Mahoney, and that plaintiff would permit defendant to pay for the truck out of the net earnings from said hauling contract. Then followed the necessary and usual allegations that, relying thereon, defendant signed the agreement to purchase the truck, and as a part of the same transaction signed the hauling contract with Mahoney, and the allegations of tender to perform by defendant, refusal by Mahoney to furnish hauling, the falsity of the representations, and the damage sustained thereby.

Plaintiff, answering the cross-complaint, after specifically denying all the allegations thereof, alleged, after defendant purchased the truck, plaintiff introduced him to Mahoney and that thereafter defendant and Mahoney entered into a contract to do certain hauling, but that plaintiff was not interested in, and had nothing to do with, the contract whatsoever.

Upon the issues thus formed the cause was tried before a jury, and, after defendant had rested his case on his cross-complaint, plaintiff moved the court for a directed verdict on the ground of failure of proof of the allegations in the cross-complaint, and on the further ground that no connection had been shown nor evidence of privity adduced between plaintiff and Mahoney, and upon the further ground that any representations made by plaintiff to defendant were mere expressions of opinion of the persons making them.

The motion was granted by the trial court upon the ground that defendant had failed as a matter of law to show fraudulent misrepresentations, and instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of plaintiff, which was done, and upon that verdict judgment was entered accordingly, and this is an appeal from such judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for new trial.

In support of the allegations of his cross-complaint, defendant introduced evidence showing that he was a resident of San Francisco, an engineer by profession; that during the month of February, 1923, he called upon Butler-Veitch at their truck department, and there talked to a salesman who told appellant "at the present they (Butler-Veitch, Inc.) had a contract with Mr. R. H. Mahoney in Marysville for hauling cement; and I (appellant) made all the inquiries regarding it, and he said there would be all kinds of work this summer, and at the present R. H. Mahoney had a contract with the Yuba Development Company for hauling cement, and it was $7 a ton, and allowed six tons to the load, about, $42 for twelve hours, double shift $84 a day for all the work we could possibly do this season, not only that they had a contract out of Oroville, and when that was finished late this fall they also had another contract at Lost Creek, that is the one that was near Oroville and the other contract was Smartsville; that the road was a very good road, as soon as they got through the dam in 1923, they were going to start on the Smartsville job, and would be hauling all winter."

The day following defendant called at the office of Butler-Veitch, where he talked with the salesman who had the day before discussed the matter, and also with a Mr. Knuckey, the sales manager or manager of the truck department of Butler-Veitch, and "we went over the same grounds again in regard to buying the truck, and they told me they furnished work for the truck by which I would pay all the payments and a living besides." On the following day defendant testified he went to the office of Butler-Veitch, and the following occurred:

"I will ask you to look at this contract and ask you if you signed that? A. Yes, sir; also another contract I signed that day.

"Q. Who was present at the time you signed that contract? A. W. A. Knuckey.

"Q. Who else? A. Mr. D. O. Johnson.

"Q. When and where was that signed by you? A. This was signed by me at 1238 Market street.

"Q. Did Mr. Knuckey sign that contract in your presence? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. In the office of the Butler-Veitch Company in San Francisco? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. At the same time did you sign any other papers? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What papers, if any, did you sign? A. I signed a cement hauling contract by R. H. Mahoney.

"Q. Who signed that contract? A. W. A. Knuckey told me he had the power of attorney to sign for Mr. Mahoney.

"Q. I will ask you if you have seen that before? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Just look at the last page and tell us if your signature appears on that contract? A. My signature appears on that contract.

"Q. Who else? A. D. O. Johnson and Mr. Knuckey; D. O. Johnson was witness.

"Q. They signed that at that time? A. Yes, sir; same time.

"Q. What period of time elapsed between the signing of this contract for the purchase of the truck and the signing of that contract for the hauling—how long did it take? A. Maybe two or three minutes. Maybe one minute, not longer than that.

"Q. You were all together there? A. Yes, sir; we were all together there.

"Q. Both papers were signed at the same time? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. By all the parties present? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Mr. Knuckey signed the name of Mahoney? A. Yes, sir; he told me he had the power of attorney to sign for Mr. Mahoney.

"Q. R. H. Mahoney by W. A. Knuckey? A. Yes, sir."

"Q. Then you signed it? A. I signed it."

Appellant has cited some twenty-two specifications of error, but we do not deem it necessary to comment on all of the points urged by appellant for reversal, as an examination of the record convinces us that the judgment must be reversed upon two of the grounds urged, namely, the failure of the court to admit evidence of other transactions by plaintiff of a character similar to the agreement between plaintiff and defendant herein, and, secondly, the error of the court in directing the jury to return a verdict in favor of plaintiff.

To show intent and knowledge of plaintiff, evidence was tendered by defendant of other alleged fraudulent representations by plaintiff of like character to the deal entered into between plaintiff and defendant at or near the same time. F. W. Clark was called as a witness in support thereof, and testified he purchased a truck from plaintiff about the same time as did defendant, dealt with the same persons who made practically the same representations to him as to the hauling contract with Mahoney.

"Mr. Clark: I wanted to get more of the details of it, and he (Mr. Knuckey), manager of the truck department says, 'We have this contract.' I says, 'How do you get this contract.' He says, 'You have to buy a truck from Butler-Veitch Company to enter the hauling contract.' Then he says, 'Our Mr. Mahoney at Marysville takes care of the hauling contract.' I says, 'Who is Mr. Mahoney?' He says, 'He is the man who has charge of the cement hauling. You have to report to Mr. Mahoney after you buy the truck,' I says, 'Can I get on this job without buying a truck from Butler-Veitch,' and he says, 'Absolutely not.'"

Thereafter witness purchased a truck and proceeded to Marysville, where he reported to Mahoney. "Did you have any conversation with him (Mahoney)? Yes sir, I says, 'I am here to haul cement. W. A. Knuckey told me that the cement had been ordered and shipped, and would be ready to go to work on. Where is the cement?' He says, 'I don't know where in hell he got his information from.'" In about five months witness Clark testified he hauled one load only under his contract for Mahoney.

[1] The testimony of this witness was, on motion of plaintiff stricken out. Thereafter the testimony of William Cramer and D. K. Meade, witnesses called on behalf of defendant, was offered, which was substantially to the same effect as the testimony of Clark, and this testimony was, upon motion of plaintiff, also stricken out. This testimony should have been received and submitted to the jury for their consideration, for, if believed by them, it was sufficient, together with the other evidence on behalf of defendant, to establish palpable fraud.

[2] Evidence tending to show similar dealings with others should have been received, for fraud is an exception to the general rule that acts of others are not relevant to establish the fact, for, where fraud is charged, evidence of other frauds or fraudulent representations of like character committed by the same party at or near the same time is admissible to show intent or knowledge. J. B. Colt Co. v. Freitas (Cal. App.) 244 P. 916, and cases cited.

[3] It seldom happens that fraud can be proved by direct evidence, and no rigid rule can be applied to determine the admissibility of circumstances, so diversified are the conditions, relations, and conduct under which they arise.

"In the investigation of a question of fraud courts should be exceptionally liberal in the receipt of evidence tending to disclose the true nature of the transaction and at times very slight circumstances, apparently trivial in themselves, when joined with other facts may afford irrefragable proof of fraud." Bigelow on Fraud, p. 160.

From the fact of the identity of the parties making the representations, the similarity of the statements made, and the proximity of time, the testimony of the witnesses Clark, Cramer, and Meade should have been submitted to the jury, and it was their province to determine, as a matter of fact, the question of knowledge of plaintiff, the relationship between Mahoney, plaintiff, and Knuckey, as well as the broad question of intent.

[4] Appellant with merit complains of the action of the trial court in granting the motion of plaintiff for a directed verdict. Such a motion is in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, and is governed by practically the same rules, and concedes as true the evidence in behalf of the adverse party, with all fair and reasonable inferences to be deducted therefrom.

[5] A verdict should not be directed except in cases where the evidence is so conclusive that reasonable minds could not differ as to the result to be reached (Paolini v. Fresno Canal, etc., Co., 9 Cal. App. 1, 97 P. 1130), and an examination of the evidence submitted by defendant cannot be said to be so entirely devoid of fair and reasonable inferences as to warrant the granting of the motion. In fact, the jury, after receiving the direction of the trial court to find for the plaintiff, returned into court, and through their foreman declared that they (the jury) "voted unanimously against signing the verdict," whereupon they were again admonished by the court to follow the instructions, and were sent back, and thereafter returned into court with a verdict in accordance with the direction of the court finding for the plaintiff.

[6] Inasmuch, therefore, as the issues were joined on the question of fraud, and the case was tried upon that theory, a question of fact arose therefrom, and, as provided by section 1574 of the Civil Code, actual fraud is always a question of fact, and such question should, we believe, have been submitted to the jury. Bechtold v. Coney, 42 Cal. App. 563, 183 P. 841; Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 51 P. 630; Kearney v. Bell, 160 Cal. 661, 117 P. 925.

[7] "A direction to the jury to render a verdict on a question of fact submitted to it, where there is substantial evidence to justify a contrary decision thereon, is an invasion of the province of the jury and contrary to the constitutional provision that judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact." 24 Cal. Jur. 916, citing numerous authorities.

For the reasons stated in the foregoing, the judgment should be, and is hereby, reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BERKELEY HILLSIDE PROPERTIES CO.
v. KELLY. (Civ. 5155.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 13, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 8, 1926.)

1. Corporations ⇨175.

Only those in contractual relationship with corporation and who are registered on its books as stockholders are personally liable under a stock assessment.

2. Corporations ⇨174—Relation between stockholder and corporation is contractual.

Relation between stockholder and corporation is contractual, and can arise only when party has consented to become stockholder and corporation accepts him as such.

3. Corporations ⇨175—Sole legatee under will of stockholder who receipted for and retained stock without having it transferred on books held not personally liable as stockholder for unpaid assessment (Civ. Code, §§ 322, 324, 349).

Sole legatee under will of stockholder who receipted for and retained stock, but who had not complied with Civ. Code, § 324, requiring transfer on books of corporation, was not personally liable as stockholder for unpaid assessment under section 349, section 322 being inapplicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by the Berkeley Hillside Properties Company against Elizabeth Finley Kelly. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harrison S. Robinson, Harry L. Price, and R. W. Macdonald, all of Oakland, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This action was brought under the provisions of section 349 of the Civil Code to collect by personal judgment the amount of a stock assessment. The complaint alleges that the certificate was made out in the name of A. S. Kelly, and was fully paid for, though never delivered to him; that Kelly died, and after his death the stock came into the hands of his executor; that Elizabeth F. Kelly was the sole devisee and legatee of the estate of A. S. Kelly, and upon distribution thereof the executor of the estate delivered to her and she signed a receipt for all the property so distributed, including the stock in question; that at all times since said distribution defendant has been and still is the owner and holder thereof; that she has never demanded transfer of the certificate on the books of the corporation, and the stock still stands of record in the name of the original owner, A. S. Kelly. The complaint proceeding then recites that on March 16, 1922, and about two years after defendant acquired the stock in the manner mentioned, plaintiff corporation was and for more than six months prior thereto had been indebted in a certain sum, and was on said day unable to pay its said indebtedness, or any portion thereof, in the ordinary course of business, for which reason it levied an assessment of $10 per share on each of the shares of its capital stock. The complaint contains recitals of the steps taken under the statute relating to the levy, and the election by the plaintiff to proceed by suit rather than by sale of the stock to collect the amount. No question is raised as to the regularity of the proceedings leading up to the assessment.

A demurrer was interposed to the complaint on the ground that it did not state a cause of action. The trial court sustained the demurrer upon the theory that, as the stock had never been transferred to defendant, she could not become liable on a personal judgment for the amount of the assessment. We are of the opinion that the demurrer was properly sustained.

[1, 2] Only those who have entered into a contractual relationship with a corporation are personally liable under an assessment. Such relationship and the liability incident thereto are limited and confined to those who are registered on the books of the corporation as stockholders. The relation between stockholder and corporation is one of contract, and can arise only when a party has consented to become a stockholder. Welch v. Gillelen, 147 Cal. 571, 82 P. 248; Shattuck & Desmond Warehouse Co. v. Gillelen, 154 Cal. 778, 99 P. 348; California National Supply Co. v. O'Brien, 51 Cal. App. 606, 197 P. 414. It exists only when the party has either expressly consented to such relation or his conduct has been such that in law his consent will be implied.

[3] In California National Supply Co. v. O'Brien, supra, it is held that to establish the relation it must appear that the minds of the parties have met, that the one to whom the stock was issued agrees to be and become a stockholder in the corporation, with the privileges and responsibilities of that relation, and that the corporation accepts him as such. A transfer on the books therefore is essential to a novation of the contract of membership under section 324 of the Civil Code. Visalia Railroad Co. v. Hyde, 110 Cal. 632, 43 P. 10, 52 Am. St. Rep. 136; People's Home Savings Bank v. Stadtmuller, 150 Cal. 106, 88 P. 280; Geary St., etc., Railroad Co. v. Bradbury Estate Co., 179 Cal. 46, 175 P. 457; Morawetz on Private Corp. §§ 44, 163, 170.

The mere fact that defendant had the stock distributed to her as sole legatee under the will and receipted for and retained the same did not, as claimed, constitute her a stockholder. The precise question has been passed upon by our Supreme Court. In People's Home Savings Bank v. Stadtmuller, supra, it was alleged that the testator of the defendant had become a subscriber to a portion of the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation; that he had subsequently died and the stock had been distributed to defendant who had, as here, accepted and receipted for the certificate, though she never had caused the same to be transferred to her name upon the books of the corporation. It was contended there, as here, that the acceptance of the stock under the circumstances alleged was sufficient to establish a privity between herself and the corporation so that she became a stockholder subject to all the rights, duties, and liabilities as such. This contention was rejected by the court, and it upheld the judgment based on a general demurrer to the complaint upon the same theory as the trial judge in the instant case. It was there held that under the provisions of section 324 of the Civil Code a transferee is not a stockholder as between himself and the corporation until he secures a transfer on the books of the company; that up to that time, as between himself and the corporation, he acquires only an equitable title in the stock, but does not become a stockholder. See, also, People ex rel. Probert v. Robinson, 64 Cal. 373, 1 P. 156. It is there further held that such a relation cannot be forced on one who has done no act to establish such privity, and the mere fact that a distributee or legatee of an estate takes the paper certificate, and does nothing more, cannot be said to be a compliance with section 324 of the Code. This doctrine was reaffirmed and followed in the later case of Geary St., etc., Railroad Co. v. Bradbury Estate Co., supra.

We are cited by appellant to California cases which he claims hold a contrary doctrine. We do not consider a review of the authorities to be necessary, as they all deal with the question of a stockholder's liability. The liability of an unregistered transferee of stock to creditors of the corporation under section 322 of the Civil Code, and the liability to the corporation itself under section 349 of the same Code, is entirely distinct and rests upon different principles. This distinction is pointed out in Visalia Railroad Co. v. Hyde, supra. Section 322 of the Civil Code deals exclusively with the statutory liability of stockholders for their proportion of the corporate debts, and has nothing to do with an action by the corporation against its stockholders for the recovery of an assessment upon stock held by them. People's Home Sav. Bank v. Rauer, 2 Cal. App. 445, 84 P. 329; Union Savings Bank v. Willard, 4 Cal. App. 690, 88 P. 1098.

Defendant never having entered into any contractual relation with the corporation, it has no cause of action against her to enforce a personal liability for an unpaid assessment. The right of the corporation to proceed and sell the stock is an entirely separate and distinct right, and is not here involved.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FITZPATRICK et al. (Cr. 1330.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 14, 1926. Downs' Petition for Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 8, 1926.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 386—Witness may testify to conversation heard by him between defendant and bribe offeror, though unable to identify defendant where other testimony identified him.

Witness may testify to conversation heard by him between offeror of bribe and defendant, though he could not identify defendant, where other testimony identified him as participant in the conversation.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 696(7).

Motion to strike entire testimony of witness is properly denied, where part is admissible.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 507½—Undisputed evidence held to require finding that offeror of bribe to councilmen to influence votes was feigned accomplice.

Evidence that offeror of bribe to influence votes in city council subsequent to arrangements divulged plot to officials, and detectives, with knowledge thereof, waited outside when offeror paid money to defendants, held to require finding that offeror was a feigned accomplice.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 1186(4)—Refusal of instructions on whether bribe offeror was actual, or feigned, accomplice held harmless, since evidence required finding that he was a feigned accomplice (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

Refusal of requested instructions, in bribery prosecution of officers, on question whether offeror, being a witness, was an actual, or feigned, accomplice held harmless, if error, under Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, since undisputed evidence required finding that he was feigned accomplice.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 33—Rule that act done through ignorance or mistake of fact is not criminal held inapplicable in bribery prosecution under contradictory evidence that money was taken to influence official vote and as campaign contribution (Pen. Code, $\S$ 26).

Under conflicting evidence in bribery prosecution that money was taken to influence official vote, and that it was taken as campaign contribution, rule that act done through ignorance or mistake of fact, disproving intent, is not criminal (Pen. Code, $\S$ 26) is inapplicable, and case was for jury.

6. Criminal law — 829(1).

Refusal of requested instructions is correct, when covered by instruction that was given.

7. Criminal law — 772(6).

Instruction that, if action of bribe offeror and authorities was taken to detect crime, with reasonable ground to suspect accused officials of accepting bribes, and bribe was accepted, they are guilty, but, if taken to induce crime, they are not guilty, held sufficient charge on entrapment.

8. Bribery — 1(1)—Statute against receiving and agreeing to receive bribe held satisfied, if proven that defendant "agreed" and intended in his own mind to receive bribe (Pen. Code, § 165).

Defendant may be guilty of receiving and agreeing to receive a bribe, under Pen. Code, § 165, notwithstanding person who paid and agreed to pay did not act with criminal intent, if proven that he "agreed" or intended in his own mind to receive a bribe.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Joseph Fitzpatrick and Charles E. Downs were convicted of bribery, and defendant Downs appeals. Affirmed.

Jerry Giesler and Leon R. Yankwich, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendants were charged jointly with the crime of bribery, in that defendants Fitzpatrick and Downs received, and agreed to receive, from one William C. Hodges a bribe for the purpose of influencing their action as members of the city council of the city of Los Angeles in a certain matter pending before that body, and in that defendant Murphy aided and abetted his codefendants in the commission of the offense. Murphy was acquitted, and Fitzpatrick and Downs were convicted. The two latter defendants appealed from the judgment of conviction and from an order of the trial court denying their motion for a new trial, but the appeal of Fitzpatrick was later dismissed.

It was the theory of the prosecution that Murphy was a go-between, whose office in the commission of the crime was in bringing Hodges into direct communication with Fitzpatrick and Downs. Hodges testified to a conversation that he had with Murphy in a downtown office building; the evidence thus given being damaging not alone to Murphy but to his codefendants as well. Hodges also testified that one J. Howard Murphy was concealed in a closet opening from the room in which he had the conversation with defendant Murphy during the time when the conversation occurred. J. Howard Murphy will hereafter be referred to as the witness Murphy in order to distinguish him from the defendant

Murphy. The witness Murphy, when put upon the witness stand, corroborated Hodges as to the substance of the conversation between the latter and defendant Murphy. On his direct examination, also, the witness Murphy made it appear that from his hiding place he had seen both Hodges and defendant Murphy as the conversation proceeded between them. On cross-examination, however, it was clearly established that the witness Murphy saw only Hodges, as he was so placed in the closet as to be unable to see the other party to the conversation. Moreover, it was shown that the witness Murphy did not know defendant Murphy's voice, and that he possessed no other means of identifying the person from whom the voice proceeded. He could hear the man who, according to the testimony of Hodges, was defendant Murphy, but did not himself know that it was defendant Murphy who spoke. When this situation was developed upon the cross-examination, defendants moved that the entire testimony of the witness Murphy be stricken, and the motion was denied. It is now contended that the ruling was error.

[1, 2] In making this contention appellant cites abundant authority in support of the well-established rule that testimony may not be given of a conversation alleged to have been participated in by a particular person, unless the person first be identified as one of the parties to the conversation. There is no rule of evidence, however, which requires that every witness to a conversation shall himself identify the participants in it. Here Hodges swears that the conversation was between himself and defendant Murphy. Here Hodges also swears that the witness Murphy was concealed in the closet while the conversation progressed. Here the witness Murphy swears that at the time fixed by Hodges he was in the closet and heard a conversation between Hodges and some man to him unknown. These items of evidence would seem to lay a sufficient foundation upon which to permit the witness Murphy to detail the substance of the conversation. In a case decided in Illinois, one Mrs. Obert was permitted, as against a party for whom one Slyder was an agent, to testify to a conversation she had over the telephone with a man who said he was Slyder. She had no means of identifying the man as Slyder, as she had never heard his voice, but there was testimony from other witnesses which tended to show that it was probably Slyder with whom she talked. It was contended on appeal that the trial court erred in admitting Mrs. Obert's testimony. The appellate court said in disposing of the point:

"There being evidence Slyder desired to communicate with Heeren by telephone through Mrs. Obert, it was a question of fact for the jury from all the evidence before them whether he was the party or not." Rogers Grain Co. v. Tanton, 136 Ill. App. 533.

There is other authority which supports the rule thus stated (Wolfe v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 97 Mo. 473, 11 S. W. 49, 3 L. R. A. 539, 10 Am. St. Rep. 331; Godair v. Ham Nat. Bank, 225 Ill. 572, 80 N. E. 407, 116 Am. St. Rep. 172, 8 Ann. Cas. 447; Conkling v. Standard Oil Co., 138 Iowa, 596, 116 N. W. 822), and we think the rule is directly applicable here. It was not error to allow the witness Murphy to relate the conversation that he heard from his hiding place, and, as the motion to strike was directed at his entire testimony, it was properly denied. Nor do we decide whether the testimony of the witness on direct examination to the effect that he identified defendant Murphy as one of the parties to the conversation could have been stricken upon a more specific motion merely because the complexion of the testimony was changed on cross-examination.

[3, 4] As Hodges would have been chargeable with the same offense as that with which defendants were charged, if he were their accomplice in the commission of the acts out of which the charge against them arose, a question that naturally presented itself at the trial was whether Hodges was an actual accomplice with defendants, or merely a feigned accomplice. The trial court gave to the jury several instructions which were appropriate to such a question, but refused to give certain instructions requested by defendants upon the same subject. It is contended that in this refusal there was error. If we concede, without deciding, that the court erred in refusing the requested instructions, we must at once observe that the error was utterly harmless. The testimony at the trial showed without dispute that, after Hodges had his conversation with defendant Murphy, he also had a meeting with Fitzpatrick and Downs; that at that meeting arrangements were made for the payment to them by Hodges of money; that, after the meeting, Hodges disclosed the plot, as far as it had then progressed, to two men who were members of the city council along with Fitzpatrick and Downs; that thereupon these councilmen went with Hodges to the district attorney of Los Angeles county, when Hodges divulged the story of the plot to that official; that a parcel of paper money was then made up to be given Fitzpatrick and Downs, the district attorney taking note of the number of each of the bills which was placed in the parcel; that three detectives who were associated with the district attorney's office were made acquainted with the plot, were given the numbers of the bills, and were instructed to be, at a certain time, immediately outside a certain room in which Hodges had agreed to meet Fitzpatrick and Downs; that it was arranged that, after Hodges met the two men, he should emerge from the room with his hat in his hand as a signal to the detectives that he had passed the money to them; that the detectives went to the appointed place at the time set; that, while they were waiting outside the room, Hodges came from it with his hat in his hand; and that the detectives thereupon rushed into the room, found Fitzpatrick and Downs there, and found one-half of the marked bills in the possession of each of them. With this undisputed evidence in the record it was impossible for the jury to find that Hodges was an actual accomplice of defendants. Conversely, the jury could not have avoided a finding that he was a feigned accomplice. If then, it was error for the trial court not to give the requested instructions, the error cannot require a reversal under the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, to the effect that no error shall work a reversal of a judgment unless it has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. It is therefore unnecessary to decide whether the refusal to give the requested instructions was erroneous.

[5] Section 26 of the Penal Code reads, in part:

"All persons are capable of committing crimes except those belonging to the following classes:
* * * 4. Persons who committed the act or made the omission charged under an ignorance or mistake of fact, which disproves any criminal intent."

There is some evidence in the record here that Fitzpatrick and Downs intended to take the money which Hodges delivered to them as a contribution to their expenses incurred during an election campaign through which they had recently gone, and which resulted in their election as members of the city council, and that they believed that they had the right to take the money as such contribution. In view of this evidence, they requested the trial court to give to the jury the following instruction:

"If the jury should believe from the evidence or should entertain a reasonable doubt therefrom that the defendants received, or agreed to receive, the $2,000 alleged in the indictment under an ignorance or mistake of fact as to the purpose for which said sum was received, or agreed to be received, and, if you should further believe from the evidence or entertain a reasonable doubt therefrom that such ignorance or mistake of fact disproves any criminal intent upon the part of the defendants to receive, or agree to receive, said amount as a bribe as charged in the indictment, then it will be your duty to find the defendants not guilty."

The requested instruction was refused, and it is now contended that the refusal was error. We think it was not. The evidence upon which the instruction was based did not furnish room for the application of subdivision "4" of section 26 of the Penal Code. Appellant was charged with receiving, or agreeing to receive, a bribe for the purpose of influencing his official action as a member of the city council. If the jury believed from the evidence that the money which Hodges paid to appellant was not taken by him for such a purpose, but was taken solely as a contribution to his campaign expenses, the charge was not proven. In other words, appellant took the money with the intent that it should influence his official action, or he did not. There was ample evidence that he took it with that intent. There was some testimony that he took it as a contribution to his election expenses. As between these conflicting items of evidence the question was, simply, Which was the jury to believe? We can perceive no element of "ignorance or mistake of fact," within the contemplation of section 26, arising from either of these branches of the evidence, or from both of them when considered together. They presented to the jury merely a conflict upon which was to be answered the question, Is appellant guilty or is he innocent?

Appellant requested the trial court to give to the jury two certain instructions upon the law of entrapment, and both were refused. The first of the two read:

"The defense of entrapment is based upon public policy. In considering such defense, a clear distinction founded upon principle is to be observed between measures used to entrap a person into crime in order, by making him a criminal, to aid the instigator in the accomplishment of some corrupt private purpose of his own and artifice used to detect persons suspected of being engaged in criminal practices. If the jury should believe from the evidence, or entertain a reasonable doubt therefrom, that the entrapment was brought about by instigation to aid the instigator in the accomplishments of some corrupt private purpose of his own rather than for the purpose of apprehending and prosecuting persons reasonably suspected of crime, then it would be the duty of the jury to find the defendants not guilty of such offense."

The second refused instruction upon the same general subject was as follows:

"In cases where entrapment into crime is a defense, to warrant a conviction one of two conditions must be present: Either, first, there must have been reasonable suspicion and grounds therefor on the part of the authorities and those working with them that the defendants in the case were engaged in the commission of a crime or about to so engage; or, second, the original suggestion or initiative to commit the offense must have come from the defendants themselves. If, after a careful consideration of the case, the jury entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether or not either under the first plan there was not sufficient reasonable grounds upon which to base a suspicion that the defendants were committing or about to commit crime, or, under the second plan, that the original suggestion or initiative did not come from the defendants, but was implanted in their minds at the instigation and inducement of the authorities or those acting with them, then it will be their duty in either event to give the defendants the benefit of such reasonable doubt, and find such defense of entrapment to exist, and find the defendants not guilty."

[6, 7] It is contended that the refusal to give these requested instructions was error. We think the refusal was correct in each instance, for the reason that the court covered the subject involved in the two proposed instructions by one that was given. It read:

"If the witness Hodges and the authorities had reasonable grounds to suspect the defendants Downs and Fitzpatrick of committing or attempting to commit the crime of receiving or agreeing to receive a bribe, and the action of the authorities and that of the witness Hodges as testified to in this case was taken in an effort to detect crime and not to induce its commission, then such action on their part was lawful, and, if you should find from the evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants Downs and Fitzpatrick did commit the crime as charged in the indictment, they would be guilty. On the other hand, if you should find from the evidence, or entertain a reasonable doubt therefrom, that the action of the authorities and the witness Hodges, or either of them, was taken in bad faith, and for the purpose of inducing and enticing the defendants Downs and Fitzpatrick to commit the offense charged, and that they or either of them in fact induced the original intent on the part of the defendants to do the acts charged as a crime, then it will be your duty to find the defendants not guilty."

The rules of law stated in the refused instructions are but amplifications or expansions of those as to which the jury was informed in the instruction which was read to its members. We think that by the latter the jury was sufficiently charged concerning the defense of entrapment. It is the duty of a trial judge not to burden the jury with a useless multiplication of instructions upon a given subject. A restatement of a rule of law in different forms, instead of inducing clarity, often leads to confusion in the minds of the jurors. We think that danger was properly avoided in the present instance.

[8] Appellant insists that the trial court erred in its refusal to give the following requested instruction:

"Unless you should find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the witness Hodges acted with a criminal and corrupt intent, and that the defendants did likewise, then it will be your duty to find the defendants not guilty, for the reason that, to complete the offense charged against the defendants, both the parties agreeing to pay and paying over the alleged bribe and the parties receiving and agreeing to receive the same must act with corrupt intent, otherwise there does not exist such agreement or understanding which the law has established as an essential ingredient of the crime alleged in the indictment in the case before you."

This proposed instruction does not state the law. The agreement referred to in it and in section 165 of the Penal Code, under which appellants were charged, is not the kind of agreement contemplated by the civil law of contracts, under which there must be an actual meeting of the minds of contracting parties in order to form an agreement. So to hold would be to allow the escape from punishment of grossly corrupt public officials in those cases in which others might feign to be their accomplices, and in which no evidence against the defendants exists, except that to come from those feigned accomplices. The terms of the statute are met, if it is proven to the satisfaction of a jury that the defendants have "agreed" or intended in their own minds to receive a bribe. There is nothing inconsistent with this view in People v. Bunkers, 2 Cal. App. 197, 84 P. 364, 370; People v. Emmons, 7 Cal. App. 692, 95 P. 1032; and People v. Coffey, 161 Cal. 433, 119 P. 901, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 704, all of which are cited by appellants. In truth, the conviction which resulted in People v. Emmons was procured partially through the testimony of feigned accomplices.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by the Christian Church of Vacaville and others against E. C. Crystal and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

H. W. Brunk, of Berkeley, and J. E. Pemberton, of San Francisco, for appellants.

W. U. Goodman, of Fairfield, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiffs sued to quiet their alleged title to a certain parcel of land, together with a church building and a parsonage thereon, situated in the town of Vacaville. The defendants were given judgment, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

For more than 40 years before the commencement of the action, there was in the town of Vacaville a congregation of the Christian Church, or Disciples of Christ; the two names being used synonymously. Three tenets of that church are material to the questions raised by the appeal and are as follows: (1) That immersion is the only authorized baptism; (2) that the Lord's Supper should be observed on the first day of every week; (3) that the church government is congregational in form, every local congregation being strictly independent of all other ecclesiastical organizations and in no manner subject to control or supervision by any higher or superior church authority. On the 14th day of January, 1892, the land in dispute was conveyed to "J. R. Rogers and J. S. Cunningham, * * * trustees of the Christian Church of Vacaville, the parties of the second part, * * * to have and to hold * * * unto the said party of the second part, and to their successors in office forever in trust for the use and benefit of the Christian Church of Vacaville." It is admitted by the pleadings that such trustees were chosen "by the congregation of said church," and that the land was purchased and the church building and parsonage thereon were erected "with money donated solely for the purpose of procuring and having a building for religious worship according to the tenets" of the Christian Church and for a residence of the pastor thereof.

In the year 1912 the congregation decided only one member voting in the negative, to receive and give "a church home" to the "pious unimmersed" of other churches without requiring them to be immersed. One of the defendants testified:

"I did not look at it as a vote to join the church. I understand it was a vote to affiliate."

Another testified:

"We never voted to take anybody in by any other method, nor would any of us have stood for taking anybody in by any other method except by immersion, primarily."

A very few persons were received into the congregation, under this "open fellowship" doctrine, without immersion, but all who were so received ceased to be members prior to the division of the congregation into two bodies, in the manner hereinafter stated, and neither of such bodies thereafter admitted any person to membership who had not been immersed, nor is there any evidence that either division taught or advocated such a doctrine. It is deemed unnecessary, therefore, to give further consideration to the contention that the division which the defendants represent "has abandoned the distinctive feature of the church in regard to baptism by immersion."

On account of certain dissensions among the members and of the dissatisfaction of some of them with the pastor of the church, a meeting of the congregation was called by the official board to be held on the 5th day of December, 1920. Practically all of the members attended and participated in the meeting. By a vote of 44 ayes to 32 noes, a motion was adopted to discharge the pastor and "not to call a minister immediately, but until such time as a suitable one could be procured." Other motions were carried by about the same majority. The members of the minority group thereupon withdrew from the congregation and organized as a separate congregation under the name, "Disciples of Christ," and at all times since January, 1921, they have conducted regular services in accordance with the doctrines of the Christian Church, holding their meetings generally in the Methodist Church building in Vacaville, but sometimes in that of the Baptist Church. During that time they have regularly employed a pastor and have sent delegates to the annual state convention. The majority group remained in possession of the church buildings and conducted Sunday school and communion services therein regularly for about six months after the meeting of December 5, 1920, but did not employ a pastor. No religious services have been held in the Christian Church building since some time in June, 1921. Prior to that time the Presbyterian and Baptist churches of Vacaville had formed a federation and were holding joint services, each church, however, retaining its identity as a separate church organization. The majority group of the Christian Church was admitted to the federation upon presentation of a petition signed by the members of that group and reading as follows:

"We the undersigned members of the Christian Church of the Town of Vacaville favor the federation of our church with the federation of churches now existing in Vacaville, provided that our proposal of federation meets with their approval. And it is further provided that we retain our identity as an organization as the churches now federated retain theirs, that is in all missionary enterprises."

This petition was signed by 43 members of the Christian Church. The federation of the three churches is known as the Community Church. Defendant Crystal testified:

"We * * * celebrate the Lord's Supper regularly monthly. Sometimes the Presbyterian and sometimes the Baptist minister officiates. I have officiated as a member of the Christian Church, being an elder. I am not a minister of the church. * * * I am not an elder in that Community Church; I am an officer. We are still functioning as the Christian Church. * * * We still hold our identity, the same as the Presbyterians and the Baptists. We are simply worshipping as a matter of expediency, the three congregations together. * * * I am an officer of that Community Church. * * * It is served at present by a Presbyterian minister. * * * There was formal action taken by our congregation about affiliating with the Community Church * * * Notice was given to every member and we met and voted as a matter of expediency for a time to go there. No definite time, as long as we saw fit, thinking that sometime we would use our own church building when matters would get so we could. I am not sure anything was said about that in the resolution; that was the general understanding that we could do that as we saw fit."

The pastor of the Presbyterian Church testified as follows:

"The Baptist congregation and the Christian Church congregation affiliate in holding services with us at this time. * * * We just simply have agreed to worship and work together, keeping our identity. * * * We agreed not to interfere with any denominational creeds or differences, allowing each denomination to carry on just as it saw fit and our community efforts did not interfere with any church observance whatsoever. * * * The individuals contribute to the Community Church, and all the benevolences of the denominations are handled separately by the denomination. * * * The official board of the Community Church is made up of the officers of the three denominations. * * * We have no written constitution or articles of confederation. No writings. We just have agreed to worship together and work together as Christian brothers, and we agreed that anybody who is a member of the three denominations represented is a member of the Community Church, provided he so desires to be, and if anybody coming into the federation, if they desire to come in through either one of the three denominations represented, very well, that has been the agreement so far."

On the 1st day of July, 1921, the defendants leased the church building to the trustees of the high school district for a term of one year, reserving the right to use the building "for religious or other purposes upon Sundays and holidays, when same is not in use by the lessee, and during one night of each week of the said term." The lessee went into possession of the premises under the lease and used the same for high school purposes, and the premises were being so occupied and used at the time of the trial, which commenced October 4, 1923. The defendants have also leased the parsonage to a tenant who is not a minister. Defendant Crystal testified:

"On account of crowded condition of the schools we have let the church building for school purposes. No alterations made in it but the seats were removed. They are still in a part of the basement. * * * The parsonage has been rented and rent collected for it, $15 to $20 per month or something like that. The church building was rented for a like sum. The money has been put in the church treasury. We pay our taxes out of it and insurance and other things, upkeep and repairs."

The membership record of the minority group originally contained the names of 29 members. Four members were thereafter received into the congregation of that group; 2 members died and 5 moved to other localities, leaving a net membership of 26 at the time of the trial. May 12, 1922, the minority group organized the plaintiff corporation. June 24, 1922, the pastor thereof was directed by the plaintiff trustees to consult an attorney "about the recovery of the church property." The record does not show when the original complaint was filed herein, but the second amended complaint was filed December 12, 1922.

[1, 2] In Watson v. Jones, 13 Wall, 679, 20 L. Ed. 666, it is said:

"When the property is held by a religious congregation which, by the nature of its organization, is strictly independent of other ecclesiastical associations, and so far as church government is concerned, owes no fealty or obligation to any higher authority, * * * with no other specific trust attached to it in the hands of the church than that it is for the use of that congregation as a religious society," in the case of a "schism which leads to a separation into distinct and conflicting bodies, the rights of such bodies to the use of the property must be determined by the ordinary principles which govern voluntary associations. If the principle of government in such cases is that the majority rules, then the numerical majority of members must control the right to the use of the property. If there be within the congregation officers in whom are vested the powers of such control, then those who adhere to the acknowledged organism by which the body is governed are entitled to the use of the property. The minority in choosing to separate themselves into a distinct body, and refusing to recognize the authority of the governing body, can claim no rights in the property from the fact that they had once been members of the church or congregation. This ruling admits of no inquiry into the existing religious opinions of those who comprise the legal or regular organization; for, if such was permitted, a very small minority, without any officers of the church among them, might be found to be the only faithful supporters of the religious dogmas of the founders of the church. There being no such trust imposed upon the property when purchased or given, the court will not imply one for the purpose of expelling from its use those who by regular succession and order constitute the church, because they may have changed in some respect their views of religious truth."

[3] In Horsman v. Allen, 129 Cal. 131, 135, 61 P. 796, 797, it is said:

"The radical division of the church * * * had its origin in the secession of a small minority from the general conference—"The highest legislative and judicial body * * * in the church." In such a case the seceding body must, in general, be regarded as abandoning the church; nor is there any exception to this rule unless in the case of a usurpation of power in the governing body so revolutionary in its character as to result either in the creation of a new and essentially different organization, or in such a radical change of the articles of faith as to constitute an essentially different religion from that previously followed by the church."

The court referred to Watson v. Jones, supra, "as the leading case, and as such conclusive, upon the question."

[4] Since the local congregation involved in this case is supreme in governmental authority, the principles stated in the case last cited are controlling. Appellants rely upon the case of Christian Church v. Church of Christ, 219 Ill. 503, 76 N. E. 703, where it is said:

"When the members of a religious congregation divide and one faction breaks away from the congregation and forms a new organization, the title to the property of the congregation will remain in that part of the congregation which adheres to the tenets and doctrines originally taught by the congregation to whose use the property was originally dedicated."

The rule thus announced in no manner helps the appellants' case, because when they seceded from the congregation and refused to recognize its authority, both factions were adhering to "the tenets and doctrines originally taught by the congregation," and the old congregation continued to adhere strictly to such tenets and doctrines for at least six months thereafter. The separation of plaintiffs from the original congregation was as complete as if it had existed for many years, and it must be held that by such voluntary separation they abandoned, not only the congregation, but also any right which they theretofore had to the control or use of the property. Committee of Missions v. Pacific Synod, 157 Cal. 105, 127, 106 P. 395. They separated into a distinct body and refused to recognize the authority of the original congregation, not by reason of any change in doctrinal beliefs or practices on the part of the congregation, but because the congregation decided, by a majority vote of the entire membership, to discharge the pastor and "not to call a minister immediately, but until such time as a suitable one could be procured." They immediately ceased to attend the religious services thereafter regularly conducted during the succeeding six months by the old congregation at the usual place of worship and organized themselves into a separate congregation, having its own officers and pastor, and thenceforth regularly conducted religious services apart from the original congregation, and at a different place of worship. By their own voluntary acts they became as distinctly a separate congregation as if they had never been connected with the original congregation.

[5] The rights of the parties must be determined, therefore, upon principles which would apply if the two congregations had been separate and independent of each other from the beginning and the congregation represented by defendants had acquired the property for its own religious uses, without any assistance from the plaintiffs. If the plaintiffs have any standing to maintain this action it must be based upon some fact other than that their members were once members of the congregation represented by the defendants. If the members of the plaintiff organization had retained their membership in the original congregation, and thereby their interest in the property, they would now be in a position to insist, even though in the minority, that the property be devoted to the use for which it was acquired. Such a case was under consideration by the court in Baker v. Ducker, 79 Cal. 365, 374, 21 P. 764, 765, where it is said:

"The property in question was held by the Reformed Church in trust for its members, and the defendants, even though they constitute a majority of the members, had no right and no power to divert it to the use of another and different church organization."

No case has been cited or discovered, however, which holds that, where two independent and self-governing congregations of the same religious faith exist in the same community, one of the congregations can, by legal action, acquire the property of the other on the ground that such other congregation is not using the property for the purposes for which it was acquired. If such an action can ever be maintained, it must be based upon acts or omissions more radical and revolutionary in character than those shown by the evidence in this case.

[6] The defendants have not abandoned the property or permanently devoted it to uses other than those for which it was acquired. They certainly were not required to leave the property unoccupied during the time they were unable to use it for religious purposes. Where a small congregation separates into two smaller congregations, it is not unusual for them to experience financial difficulties in maintaining regular church services and activities. Appellants say that the minority group "represented the bulk of the working, active part of the congregation and those who were supporting the church financially." This may account for some of the difficulties which the majority experienced in maintaining themselves as an independent congregation. Under all the circumstances it cannot be said that the facts are such as to require a finding to the effect that the members of the majority group have forfeited their right to the use of the property by leasing it temporarily for other than religious uses and "as a matter of expediency for a time" uniting with the Presbyterians and the Baptists for the purposes of religious worship.

[7] The name "Community Church" does not signify a religious association which has distinctive doctrines and beliefs, but rather a federation of two or more churches, all retaining their separate identity and their distinctive doctrines. Such federations are not uncommon. It certainly cannot be held as a matter of law that, by temporarily becoming a member of such a federation, a congregation necessarily loses its original identity and forfeits its right to the use of its property, in the absence of any ecclesiastical law or regulation on the subject, especially where the federation is formed with the express understanding that each congregation shall retain its own identity as a separate organization.

Appellants rely upon certain cases involving the carrying out of the terms of express trusts created by the donors of property. Those cases are not applicable to the questions here involved. The distinction between the two classes of cases is clearly pointed out in Watson v. Jones, supra, and Committee of Missions v. Pacific Synod, supra, and need not be repeated here.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by E. J. Palmer and another against M. Emanuel and another, wherein Jennie L. Shannon intervened. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 247 P. 611.

T. John Butler and W. W. Watson, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

John J. Goldberg and David L. Livingston, both of San Francisco, for respondent Emanuel.

A. M. Marks and J. M. Thomas, both of San Francisco, for respondent R. T. Shannon.

E. J. Talbott, of San Francisco, for intervener J. L. Shannon.

STURTEVANT, J. Some time prior to 1913 the Ellis Landing & Dock Company was organized as a corporation, having 1,000 shares of the par value of $500 each. On June 26, 1914, the corporation was indebted to George E. Ellis and Selina Ellis in the sum of $150,000, evidenced by a promissory note and secured by a mortgage on lands at Richmond, Contra Costa county; said indebtedness being a part of the purchase price. The corporation was also indebted to Louis Saroni in the sum of $100,000, evidenced by a promissory note secured by a second mortgage. On June 26, 1914, E. J. Palmer, Daniel Corcoran, and R. T. Shannon were the owners of 499 shares of the capital stock of the Ellis Landing & Dock Company and each owned an undivided one-third interest. At the same time M. Emanuel owned 499 shares and two shares stood in the name of N. A. Eisner for the purpose of qualifying him to act as a director. On the date last mentioned E. J. Palmer, Daniel Corcoran, and R. T. Shannon, as vendors, entered into an executory contract to sell to the defendant M. Emanuel their stock. The contract provided for numerous partial payments. On the 20th day of November, 1918, E. J. Palmer and Daniel Corcoran commenced this action against M. Emanuel to recover certain installments, to wit, installments alleged as becoming due between October 1, 1916, and November 20, 1918, and which the plaintiffs alleged had not been paid. As R. T. Shannon refused to join the plaintiffs they made him a defendant. On the 9th day of August, 1920, the plaintiffs filed a supplemental complaint. The defendants answered separately. The record shows that other persons intervened, but no questions regarding the rights of such persons are involved on this appeal, and for the purpose of keeping the record clear no further mention of them will be made.

On October 26, 1920, the action came on for trial before the trial court sitting without a jury. During the trial it transpired that the defendants Shannon and Emanuel had so settled their own differences that the ratable amount payable to Shannon under the executory contract had been paid. The defendant Shannon, therefore, is not interested in this appeal.

In its judgment the trial court awarded to the plaintiffs all relief asked by them excepting an installment of $18,800. As to that installment the court ruled against the plaintiffs and in favor of the defendant M. Emanuel and made findings accordingly. All rulings and findings made on the specific subject of the allowance or disallowance of plaintiffs' claim to be entitled to judgment for the said $18,800 are presented on this appeal, but no other question.

The passage in the executory contract of purchase which is the subject of this controversy, is recited by the trial court in the second finding, as follows:

"That on or about June 26, 1914, plaintiffs and defendant R. T. Shannon on the one part made and entered into an agreement in writing with defendant M. Emanuel wherein and whereby plaintiffs and defendant R. T. Shannon sold to defendant M. Emanuel, and defendant M. Emanuel bought from plaintiffs and defendant R. T. Shannon four hundred ninety-nine (499) shares of the capital stock of the Ellis Landing & Dock Company, a corporation, for the consideration of forty thousand dollars ($40,000.00), and that it was provided in said agreement that defendant M. Emanuel should pay the said purchase price of forty thousand dollars ($40,000.00) as follows: * * * And the balance of said purchase price in the sum of eighteen thousand eight hundred dollars ($18,800.00) within six (6) months after the indebtedness of one hundred fifty thousand dollars ($150,000.00) and interest due to George E. Ellis and Selina E. Ellis on the first mortgage held by George E. Ellis and Selina E. Ellis against the real property of the Ellis Landing & Dock Company, and the indebtedness of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000.00) and interest due to Louis Saroni on the second mortgage held by said Louis Saroni against the real property of said the Ellis Landing & Dock Company, and all additional sums of money loaned said corporation by said Louis Saroni shall have been fully paid, satisfied, discharged and released. * * *

The eighth finding is as follows:

"It is provided in paragraph VIII of said agreement that in addition to the installment payments to be made by defendant M. Emanuel to parties of the first part aggregating the sum of twenty-one thousand two hundred dollars ($21,200.00), defendant M. Emanuel should pay to said parties of the first part the sum of eighteen thousand eight hundred dollars ($18,800.00) within six (6) months after the indebtedness of one hundred fifty thousand dollars ($150,000.00) and interest due to George E. Ellis and Selina E. Ellis on the first mortgage held by said George E. Ellis and Selina E. Ellis against the real property of said corporation, the The Ellis Landing & Dock Company, and the indebtedness of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000.00) and interest due to Louis Saroni on the second mortgage held by said Saroni against the real property of said corporation, the The Ellis Landing & Dock Company, and all additional sums of money loaned said corporation by said Louis Saroni shall have been fully paid, satisfied, discharged and released; said indebtednesses in this paragraph set forth have not been paid and the condition upon which the right of the parties of the first part to said eighteen thousand eight hundred dollars ($18,800.00) shall accrue has not yet occurred."

The court further found that the $18,800 had not been paid.

The appellants' case presents the question as to whether that portion of finding VIII which we have italicized is sustained by the evidence.

[1] The mortgage by the Ellis Landing & Dock Company to George E. Ellis and Selina E. Ellis for $150,000 was executed December 4, 1913. A release reciting that said mortgage, "together with the debt thereby secured is fully paid, satisfied and discharged," was recorded February 26, 1920, at 50 minutes past 11 o'clock a. m. The mortgage of $100,000 to Louis Saroni was executed on the 5th day of December, 1913. A release reciting that said mortgage, "together with the debt thereby secured, is fully paid, satisfied and discharged," was recorded December 3, 1919, at 2 minutes past 4 o'clock p. m. The record shows that a mortgage for $140,000 executed by the Ellis Landing & Dock Company to Selina E. Ellis individually and as executrix of the last will of George E. Ellis, was recorded February 26, 1920, at 48 minutes past 11 o'clock a. m. It also shows that a mortgage by the same company in favor of Louis Saroni to secure a promissory note of $29,700 was recorded February 26, 1920, at 52 minutes past 11 o'clock a. m. At the time of the trial of the case George E. Ellis was dead. Selina E. Ellis was not called as a witness. Louis Saroni was called as a witness, and testified that the mortgage executed to him in 1920 was a substitute for the mortgage executed to him in 1913 and that nothing was said and no agreement was had between the parties to the effect that the second mortgage was taken in payment of the first mortgage. M. Emanuel was called as a witness and gave the same testimony regarding the second mortgage executed to Saroni. He also testified that the second mortgage given to Selina E. Ellis was given as a substitute for the old mortgage and that nothing was said by the parties to the effect that the second mortgage was taken in payment of the earlier mortgage. No witness testified that the second mortgage to Selina E. Ellis or the second mortgage to Saroni was given in absolute payment of the prior mortgage. There was no evidence that the old notes or the mortgages executed to secure them were delivered or surrendered to the makers.

[2, 3] In Comptoir D'Escompte v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15, at page 20, 20 P. 28, 30, the court said:

"It has been repeatedly held by this court that the acceptance of a note for a debt does not discharge the debt unless expressly agreed to be payment; that in such case the right of action on the debt is suspended until the maturity of the note given, and suit may be brought on the original debt in case of the non-payment of the accepted note."

The burden of showing that an express agreement has been made rests on the party relying on it, and the presumption is that the later notes were not taken in absolute payment. Bridge v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 167 Cal. 774, 781, 141 P. 375. A receipt in full does not prove the existence of the agreement. Comptoir D'Escompte v. Dresbach, supra. Neither does a formal release. Tolman v. Smith, 85 Cal. 280, 290, 24 P. 743. Nor that the note was marked canceled. Steinhart v. National Bank, 94 Cal. 362, 367, 29 P. 717, 23 Am. St. Rep. 132. The foregoing rules were applied to a debt secured by mortgage. Van Sandt v. Alvis, 109 Cal. 165, 41 P. 1014, 50 Am. St. Rep. 25. In White v. Stevenson, 144 Cal. 104, at page 108, 77 P. 828, 830, the court said:

"The acceptance by the plaintiff of the note and mortgage of 1895 as a renewal of the note and mortgage of 1890, or in substitution therefor, did not of itself operate as an extinguishment or discharge of the latter. One executory agreement is not extinguished by the execution of another between the same parties; nor is a security for an obligation merged in another security of the same degree which is accepted for the same obligation. It is a well-settled rule that, in the absence of an agreement to that effect, a promissory note is not paid by the execution of another note, but that the time for its payment is thereby merely suspended until the maturity of the new note."

Miguel v. Miguel, 184 Cal. 311, 193 P. 935, is a parallel case. Commencing on page 313 (193 P. 936) the court said:

"The finding of the court, which was in effect that payment was not to be made to the plaintiff until the defendant had been able to remove the burden of the partnership debt which he assumed, is sustained by both the considerations mentioned. The manifest object of the arrangement was to give the defendant time to work out the two obligations, the one to Silva and the one to the plaintiff, by making the latter not payable until the first had been paid. The case was one of a sale of an interest in a business which was in debt. It was a very natural understanding that the purchase price of the interest should not be payable until the debt to which the interest was subject had been worked out. This object would not be accomplished if the purchase price should become payable upon the substitution merely of another as the creditor of the defendant on his obligation to Silva. The essence of the purpose of the understanding must have been that the burden of that debt should be removed from the defendant before he was required to pay the plaintiff."

In view of the foregoing authorities it is quite clear that the findings of the trial court in the instant case were supported by the evidence and that the findings support the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Pleading $\hookrightarrow$ 354(2)—If answer was sufficient to sustain any one of theories of defense, motion to strike out should have been denied.

If answer in action for purchase price of stock was sufficient to sustain any one of defenses that plaintiffs' right to recover was conditional on their performance of conditions subsequent, or that, on plaintiffs' breach, defendant was entitled to liquidated damages, or entitled to prove and recover actual damages, motion to strike out should have been denied.

2. Pleading $\hookrightarrow$ 355—Pleading, alleging breach of covenant not to assign contract, held improperly stricken out (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 453).

Pleading, alleging breach of agreement not to assign contract, held improperly stricken out, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 453, authorizing striking out of sham and irrelevant answers and irrelevant and redundant matter.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by E. J. Palmer and another against M. Emanuel and another, wherein Jennie L. Shannon intervened. From the judgment, the defendant named appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 247 P. 609.

John J. Goldberg and David L. Livingston, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

T. John Butler and W. W. Watson, both of San Francisco, for respondents Palmer and Corcoran.

A. M. Marks and J. M. Thomas, both of San Francisco, for respondent R. T. Shannon.

E. J. Talbott, of San Francisco, for intervener J. L. Shannon.

STURTEVANT, J. Plaintiffs commenced an action to recover moneys alleged to be due under the terms of an executory contract for the sale of shares of stock in a corporation. Attacks on some of defendant's pleadings were sustained. Later the defendant filed a second amended answer, and still later, with the consent of the court, he filed amendments thereto. The plaintiffs again demurred to the defendant's answer as amended and again interposed a motion to strike out parts thereof. The trial court overruled the demurrer and granted the motion to strike out. Thereafter the action went to trial and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant for a part of the relief prayed for by the plaintiffs. From so much of the judgment as was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs the defendant has appealed and has brought up bills of exception. In support of his appeal the appellant contends that the order striking out had the result of preventing the appellant from presenting any affirmative defense in the trial court. As the cause went to trial on the plaintiffs' complaint and supplemental complaint and the second amended answer, out of which parts had been stricken by virtue of the order hereinabove last mentioned, it is unnecessary to consider the order striking out parts of the original answer. There was a complaint in intervention, answer thereto, motion to strike out, order granted, etc., but as no affirmative relief was granted to the intervener against the appellant there is no necessity of passing on that ruling in any further detail than to state that in all respects the pleadings were the same and that this decision applies equally to the order striking out parts of appellant's answer to the complaint in intervention.

Prior to the 26th day of June, 1914, the Ellis Landing & Dock Company, a corporation, was engaged in subdividing, platting, and selling a tract of land located near Richmond, in Contra Costa county. The capital stock had all been issued. Of the total of 1,000 shares the appellant owned 499 shares, and E. J. Palmer, Daniel Corcoran, and R. T. Shannon owned 499 shares; each having an undivided one-third interest therein. On the said 26th day of June, 1914, the parties entered into an executory contract in writing, under the terms of which E. J. Palmer, Daniel Corcoran, and R. T. Shannon sold to the appellant, M. Emanuel, their 499 shares of stock for the sum of $40,000, without interest. The purchase price was payable $2,164.50 cash, the surrender by appellant of a promissory note held by him against one of the vendors, Palmer; the balance due thereon being $2,835.50; and the remaining amount being payable in installments. The appellant made payments down to and including the month of October, 1916, and then refused to make further payments. In their complaint and supplemental complaint the plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to judgment in the sum of all the remaining payments. The trial court refused to give them judgment for $18,800, holding that under the terms of the contract that amount was payable on the happening of a condition and that said condition had not yet occurred. That portion of the judgment was appealed from by the plaintiffs and has been affirmed in the case entitled Palmer v. Emanuel, No. 5524, this day filed. However, the trial court awarded judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for all of the remaining installments, together with interest, and it is of that ruling the appellant complains.

In his second amended answer, as amended by amendments subsequently filed, the defendant pleaded the entire contract in hæc verba. He also pleaded paragraphs 12, 13, and 16, according to their legal effect. Those paragraphs are as follows:

"(12) And it is further agreed by and between the said parties hereto that none of said parties hereto shall, directly or individually, do, commit, or cause to be done or committed, any act or injury to the detriment of the property or business of the said corporation, the Ellis Landing & Dock Company, or any of its officers or employees or agents, nor commit any act or deed, nor say or do anything detrimental to the character or reputation of any of the parties hereto, and that should the said E. J. Palmer, Daniel Corcoran or R. T. Shannon, or any of them, directly or indirectly do, say, write, print, indite or publish, or cause to be done or published, or in any other way cause damage or injury to the property of said corporation, or defame the character or reputation of the said M. Emanuel, and should they or any of them be found guilty thereof, by P. A. Bergerot, representing said Palmer, Corcoran and Shannon, and Henry H. Davis, representing said M. Emanuel and said corporation, the Ellis Landing & Dock Company, then the said Palmer, Corcoran and Shannon, or any of them, shall lose their and each of their right, title and interest to any part or portion of the unpaid purchase price of said forty thousand dollars ($40,000) which shall be considered and charged as liquidated damages suffered and sustained by the said corporation the Ellis Landing & Dock Company, or the said M. Emanuel, or both, by reason of such act or acts committed by the said Palmer or Corcoran or Shannon, or any of them; and should the said Bergerot and Davis fail to agree on a finding of guilt or innocence in said matters, then the said Louis Saroni shall be called in as umpire, and his decision shall be a final adjudication of said matter, without any right, power or authority of said Emanuel, Palmer, Corcoran or Shannon, or any of them to resort or appeal to any court or other tribunal for relief of any nature or kind whatsoever from the judgment of the said Bergerot and Davis, or in the event of their failure to agree, then from the judgment of the said umpire, Louis Saroni.

"(13) No part or portion of this agreement or any interest of any of the parties is assignable or transferable, except upon first obtaining the written consent of said Emanuel thereto; it being specially agreed that no assignments or transfers of any interest nor any incumbrance of any interest of said E. J. Palmer, Daniel Corcoran or R. T. Shannon, any or all, can be made or be valid without first obtaining the written consent of said M. Emanuel thereto. * * *

"(16) Should the said E. J. Palmer, Daniel Corcoran or R. T. Shannon, or any or all of them, commit any breach of this agreement on their part or by any of them, then such portion of the unpaid balance of said forty thousand dollars ($40,000) shall be considered and held by said M. Emanuel as liquidated damages sustained by said Emanuel by reason of such breach of this agreement."

He then pleaded what he claimed to be breaches of the covenants contained in paragraphs 12 and 13. The substance of the pleading may be stated as follows: On the 26th day of June, 1914, the date that the contract was made, the Ellis Landing & Dock Company was engaged in subdividing, platting, and selling a tract of land situated in the city of Richmond, in Contra Costa county. At the same time the Richmond East Shore Realty Company, a corporation, was likewise engaged in the sale of another tract of land located in the same city. The defendant was the president and active business manager of the Ellis Landing & Dock Company. E. J. Palmer, Daniel Corcoran, R. T. Shannon, and Jennie Shannon, his wife, were the sole owners and stockholders of the Richmond East Shore Realty Company and continued as such during the remainder of the existence of that company. That under and by virtue of the provisions of paragraph 12 of the contract the vendors agreed that neither of them should directly or indirectly commit or cause to be done or committed any act or injury to the detriment of the property or the business of the Ellis Landing & Dock Company, or any of its officers, or do anything detrimental to the character of the vendee. It is then pleaded that, notwithstanding the provisions of the contract, the vendors, and each of them, on numerous occasions, both before and after the 1st day of October, 1916, committed many breaches of said covenants. Said breaches were meticulously pleaded by the defendant. Then the defendant pleaded that said breaches damaged him "in a large sum of money in excess of $50,000, the exact amount of which it is not possible for this defendant to ascertain. * * *" Having so constructed his pleading, the defendant then pleaded facts showing or tending to show that he was entitled to rely on the covenant for liquidated damages; that is, that the plaintiffs had forfeited their right to further payments and that such unpaid payments should be treated as liquidated damages.

The defendant then pleaded another defense to the effect that by the provisions of paragraph 13 of the contract the vendors undertook not to assign. Thereafter he proceeded in the same full and complete manner to plead a breach of said covenant by the vendors on the 16th day of July, 1914. Connected with this second defense the defendant likewise pleaded the provisions of paragraph 16 relative to liquidated damages.

Continuing, the defendant pleaded the provisions contained in paragraph 12 which provide for an arbitration of any breaches of said paragraph 12. In this connection he pleaded the facts showing or tending to show that he had complied, or attempted to comply, with the provisions of the contract providing a procedure for the settlement of disputes between the parties by arbitration.

The motion as made by the plaintiffs, and the order of the trial court striking out, did not extend to all of the new matter set forth in the defendant's pleading. However, it did extend to those portions of the pleading which pleaded paragraphs 12, 13, and 16 of the contract, according to their legal effect, and to all allegations of the breaches of said paragraphs and to all of the allegations of the defendant regarding his acts looking toward an arbitration.

At this time the appellant concedes that the provision for arbitration as contained in the contract is unenforceable. The respondents contend that such provisions are void and unenforceable. It is therefore unnecessary for us to further consider the ruling striking out those passages dealing solely with the subject of arbitration.

[1] Regarding the other portions stricken out, the appellant contends that he was entitled to defend and present all of the facts, and to ask for relief on any one of three different theories: First, that the right of the plaintiffs to recover any payments was a right conditional on their performance of the conditions subsequent; second, if plaintiffs breached their contract, that the defendant was, under the terms of the contract, entitled to liquidated damages as provided in the contract; third, that, if the plaintiffs breached their contract, then the defendant was entitled to prove and recover such actual damages as he was able to prove. As the appeal presents a ruling on a motion to strike out, it is not necessary for us to consider each of the foregoing theories. If his pleading was sufficient to sustain any one of those theories, then the motion to strike out should have been denied and the judgment should be reversed.

[2] Taking up first the alleged breach of the covenant not to assign, we find no frailty in the pleading on its face. The power to strike out extends to sham and irrelevant answers and irrelevant and redundant matter. Code Civ. Proc. § 453. The respondents in their brief have given no reasons showing that such defense fell within any one of the categories designated in the Code section. The defense should have been allowed to stand and a hearing should have been had on the merits thereof.

[3] Passing to the other defense regarding the alleged breaches of the provisions of paragraph 12 of the contract, we find a similar condition. Commencing with the beginning of paragraph 12 of the contract and ending with the words "character or reputation of the said M. Emanuel," in about the middle of said paragraph, the respondents do not claim that any part or portion is illegal for any reason. Commencing with the words immediately following, "and should they or any of them be found guilty thereof by P. A. Bergerot," etc., down to the end of the paragraph, it may be conceded, as both parties contended, that the provisions regarding arbitration are illegal. We may further assume, for the purposes of this decision, and solely for such purposes, that the provisions regarding liquidated damages are also illegal. In that event the latter portion of paragraph 12 will all be treated as illegal. However, as the first portion above mentioned is entirely legal and separable from the rest of the paragraph, it was enforceable. Civ. Code, § 1599; 6 Cal. Jur. p. 149. We see no reason why the defense, founded thereon and claiming actual damages, may properly be said to be sham, or irrelevant or redundant matter.

[4, 5] The respondents contend that the part stricken cannot be identified. It is quoted in the order in hæc verba and there is no difficulty about identifying it. On the trial of the case, through an abundance of precaution, the appellant offered to prove the allegations which had been stricken out. He was under no duty to make that offer, and whether his offer was sufficient or insufficient need not be discussed. The respondents claim that the defendant overpleaded the provisions of the contract. It will suffice to state that a motion to strike was not the proper remedy if respondents were attempting to make any such contention. Regarding the contention of respondents that paragraph 12 contained provisions that were void, we have indicated our views above and we need not again take up those contentions of the respondents.

[6] Respondents make the further point that, if any court should find that the respondents have been guilty of violating the covenants contained in paragraph 12 and fix the damage therefor, such court would be making a new contract for the parties. When the Legislature enacted section 1599 of the Civil Code, it certainly did not think that it was conferring power on the courts to make contracts, but it undoubtedly thought it was providing that under certain circumstances the courts might proceed to exercise a jurisdiction that would exist where there was no valid contract on the subject executed by the parties.

[7] Taking up paragraph 12 item by item, the respondents contend that, if one of the vendors violated the covenants of the paragraph, the defendant's right of action would be against the guilty person only. But, under the uncontroverted facts, each of the vendors received a part of the consideration. Furthermore, the language of the covenants contained in paragraph 12 is clearly the language of joint and several promises. Moreover:

"Where all the parties who unite in a promise receive some benefit from the consideration, * * * their promise is presumed to be joint and several." Civ. Code, § 1659.

The respondents earnestly contend that the latter part of paragraph 12 attempts to preclude the vendees from giving testimony in court; that it also attempts to suppress evidence; and that it attempts to oust the courts of their jurisdiction, and is therefore void. Thereupon they proceed to contend that because of the invalidity of a part of the paragraph the defendant Emanuel should be, by the judgment of the courts, prevented from giving testimony in court; that the evidence of his witnesses should be suppressed; and that the courts should be ousted of their jurisdiction to hear the defense of the defendant. To state the contention is to answer it.

So much of the judgment as was appealed from is reversed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

7. Municipal corporations ⇨218(8).

Amendment to writing, stating reasons for removal of civil service employee, not changing cause of action, relates back to date of filing original writing.

If amendment to writing, stating reasons for removal of civil service employee introduces new cause of action, it relates back to date of filing amendment.

9. Municipal corporations ⇨185(7)—Where writing stated indictment as reason for dismissal of detective, amendment adding inefficiency and bribery may not be assumed to state new cause (National Prohibition Act [U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138¼ et seq.]).

Writing giving reasons for removing detective sergeant stating that he was removed because of indictment for felony and amendment stating also incompetency, inefficiency, and accepting bribes and money from persons unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors, held not so defective as to be void and as not to give civil service board jurisdiction under Fresno City Charter, art. 3, § 22.

15. Municipal corporations ⇨185(12).

Application by E. A. Nichols for writ of mandate to be directed to A. E. Sunderland, as Commissioner of Public Safety and Welfare of the City of Fresno, and another, requiring and directing them to pay petitioner's salary as police officer. Writ denied.

B. W. Gearhart and Lindsay & Gearhart, all of Fresno, for petitioner.

Loren A. Butts, City Atty., of Fresno, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The petitioner was a police officer of the city of Fresno. On or about the 7th day of November, 1925, the petitioner, together with eleven other police officers of the city of Fresno, was indicted by the federal grand jury, charged with the crime of conspiracy to violate the National Prohibition Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½ et seq.). On November 9, 1925, the respondent A. E. Sunderland, commissioner of public welfare and head of the police department, delivered to the petitioner a writing in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"Civil Service Board, City of Fresno, California.

"Dismissal.

"Date, November 9, 1925, 11:00 a. m.

"Mr. E. A. Nichols, Detective Sergeant, 2659 White Ave., Fresno, Calif.: For the reasons stated below, you are hereby dismissed from the position of detective sergeant in the department of police, effective immediately. Reasons for dismissal: Having been indicted by the federal grand jury charging you with a felony, to wit, conspiracy to violate the National Prohibition Enforcement Act; therefore, for the good of the service, and in harmony with the civil service rules, you are hereby dismissed as an employee of the Fresno police department, effective immediately.

"You will please deliver to the officer in charge at police headquarters, of the city of Fresno, all property of the said city now in your possession, and oblige.

"A. E. Sunderland, Head of Department.

"Note: Any person dismissed from the service may file a written answer and demand a hearing before the civil service board, providing such answer or demand is filed with the board within five (5) days after the serving of the notice of such dismissal. See rule XI, Ord. 972."

Since that date the petitioner has not been recognized by said respondent nor assigned to any duty whatsoever. Thereafter, on the 12th day of November, 1925, the petitioner served on said respondent a written answer, demanding a hearing, and thereupon both writings were delivered to the civil service commission of Fresno. The matter was set for hearing, and before the day appointed for the hearing the petitioner requested in writing that the matter be continued indefinitely by the civil service board. The request was granted. After petitioner's trial in the federal court was concluded about February 1, 1926, said respondent filed and served on the petitioner a writing in words and figures as follows:

"Civil Service Board, City of Fresno, California.

"Amended Notice of Dismissal.

"Date, February 1, 1926.

"Mr. E. A. Nichols, Detective Sergeant, 2659 White Ave. Fresno, Calif.: You are hereby notified that the notice of your dismissal as a member of the police department of the city of Fresno, effective November 9, 1925, a copy of which has been heretofore furnished you, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Having been indicted by the federal grand jury, charging you with a felony, to wit, conspiracy to violate the National Prohibition Act, and in addition thereto, during the last two years, you, as a police officer of the city of Fresno, have performed your duties in an incompetent and inefficient manner, and in addition thereto you have accepted bribes and money from persons known to you at the time to be engaged in the business of selling intoxicating liquors unlawfully, all of which was and is a violation of your oath of office as such police officer of the city of Fresno.

"In harmony with the civil service rules, and to promote efficiency of the public service, you were dismissed as a member of the police department and as an employee of the city of Fresno.

"A. E. Sunderland, Head of Department."

"Note: Any person dismissed from the service may file a written answer and demand a hearing before the civil service board, providing such answer or demand is filed with the board within five (5) days after the serving of the notice of such dismissal. See rule XI, Ord. 972."

Within five days thereafter the petitioner filed an answer thereto. The matter was set for hearing, but was continued for the reason that an action had been filed in the superior court of the county of Fresno by one Oliver P. Durr, who sought to permanently enjoin the civil service commission from taking any further step or proceeding in the matter of hearing said charges, which charges were identical with those in the above-entitled action now under consideration, and, pending the hearing of that action in the superior court, the civil service board was temporarily restrained from proceeding in the matter. Immediately after the termination of that action in the superior court, the petitioner applied to this court for a writ of mandate directed to the respondent A. E. Sunderland, as head of the police department of the city of Fresno, and directed to William Glass, as commissioner of finance of said city, requiring and directing respondents to cause to be paid to the petitioner his salary accruing subsequent to the 9th day of November, 1925. Both commissioners have appeared by filing demurrers and answers. As the respondent Glass is merely a formal party, in the interest of clarity we will hereinafter use the word respondent as designating and referring to the commissioner of public welfare.

The petitioner contends that the paper dated November 9, 1925, on its face purports to be an absolute dismissal; that, the respondent A. E. Sunderland, as commissioner of public safety and welfare, has no power under the charter of Fresno and the ordinances of said city to dismiss a police officer, and that said paper is a void act. The respondent replies that the paper was not a void act, and he cites section 22 of article 3 of the Charter of Fresno (Statutes of 1921, p. 1821). That section, among other things, provides:

"No officer or employee of the city may be removed except for reasons that will promote the efficiency of the public service; and after the lapse of the probationary period, except as in this charter otherwise provided, no officer or employee may be removed except for reasons given in writing by the appointing officer, and the person whose removal is sought shall be furnished with a copy of the reasons for his removal and of any charges preferred against him and be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing, and in such answer may demand a hearing upon the charges. If such demand is made, the appointing officer shall furnish the civil service board with the complaint or charges and answer, and the civil service board shall then fix a time and place for, and, according to such rules and regulations as it may adopt, shall conduct a hearing upon the charges and answer, and the party whose removal is sought shall attend such hearing and may be heard in person or by attorney and produce witnesses. The civil service board * * * shall not be bound by the technical rules of evidence and pleading, and upon said hearing the civil service board may order the charges to be dismissed, in which case the officer or employee shall be restored to duty without prejudice, but if the charges are sustained, the officer or employee shall by virtue of said findings be removed unless the finding in either case is set aside by the city commission. There shall be no appeal from the judgment of the civil service board as a matter of right on the part of * * * the officer or employee whose removal is sought, but the city commission shall have power in its discretion to hear and determine appeals from the decisions of the civil service board. * * * Pending the hearing of any charges, * * * the officer seeking to make the removal may suspend the officer or employee whose removal is sought, such suspension to be without pay, unless the charges are dismissed."

Respondent also cites section 19 of article 3, which provides:

"In addition to the foregoing matters, the civil service rules shall provide: * * * Subd. 6. For the regulation of removals from office subject to the provisions of this charter."

Respondent also cites parts of rule XI of the civil service board as enacted by Ordinance No. 972, as follows:

"Section 1. Removals or Reductions. (a) Removals * * * of a person in the classified service shall be made only after such person has been presented with the reasons for such removal or reduction, specifically stated in writing, by the appointing officer, but such person has the right to answer and demand a hearing, as provided by these rules. A removal or reduction has the same effect as to compensation as in case of suspension. A statement of the reasons and the reply must be forthwith filed, as a public record, with the board.

"(b) Nothing herein contained shall limit the power of any superior officer to suspend a subordinate for a reasonable period, not exceeding thirty days, pending hearing and decision. Every such suspension shall be without pay; provided, however, that the board shall have authority to investigate every such suspension, and in case of its disapproval, it shall have power to restore pay to the employee so suspended.

"(c) Nothing herein contained shall limit the power of any appointing officer to suspend or dismiss a subordinate for any cause which will promote the efficiency of the service, and within five days thereafter file with the board written reasons for such action, containing the charges preferred and order of removal, if any, and forthwith serve the person whose removal is sought with a copy thereof. * * * Such appointing officer shall certify to the said service and immediately file the same with the board. The person so served may personally in writing answer the charges preferred against him and file such answer with the board, also affidavits in support thereof, if he so desires, and may demand a hearing on the charges, and a failure to so file an answer or demand a hearing on the charges within said time shall be considered as a resignation of such person, in which case no trial shall be required, except at the request of the officer making or seeking the removal, and then only at the discretion of the board. The board may reinstate any officer or employee so removed after proper hearing. * * *

"Sec. 3. Suspensions. Pending action for removal or for disciplinary reasons, an employee may be suspended for a period not to exceed thirty days, without pay, but the reasons for suspension shall forthwith be furnished in writing to the civil service board. No employee in the classified service shall be suspended except for reasons which will promote the good of the service.

"Sec. 4. Procedure. Each hearing upon charges and answer shall be had as soon as practical after answer is filed. * * * and upon said hearing the board may order the charges dismissed, in which case the officer or employee shall be restored to duty without prejudice, but if the charges are sustained, the officer or employee shall by virtue of such findings be dismissed unless such findings be set aside by the city commission."

[1-3] Thereupon respondent contends that the writing dated November 9, 1925, although it uses the word "dismissal," does not use that word as a finality, but as a temporary deprivation of the petitioner from his office. There is force in the contention, otherwise the note appended at the end of the writing is given no force or effect, although that note advised the petitioner that he would be given a hearing as provided under rule XI if he filed an answer and demanded a hearing. Moreover, the petitioner so understood the paper. He promptly put in his answer and demanded a hearing. This act on his part finds no support in the charter and ordinance when a suspension or removal has become permanent—has ripened into an absolute dismissal. Stadler v. Detroit, 13 Mich. 346. The petitioner urges in this connection that the ordinance is unreasonable as being broader than the provisions of the charter. The point cannot be sustained because we do not find any language in the ordinance which purports to justify an absolute dismissal of a civil service employee until such individual has first been served with reasons in writing and has been given an opportunity to answer, and until a hearing has been had. True it is that the charter does not use the word "dismiss" and that the ordinance does, in some places use that word. However, taking the ordinance by its four corners, and reading the word "dismiss" together with the context, it is clear that the ordinance uses the word as synonymous with removal, temporary or permanent, in harmony with the context. It will be noted that the charter expressly confers the power to remove on the civil service board. It will also be noted that the charter expressly provides that the preliminary steps will be taken by the appointing power, but the function of actually removing is vested in the civil service board. It will also be noted that the charter expressly authorizes the appointing officer to suspend a subordinate pending the hearing before the civil service board. Again, a temporary removal is a suspension, and the charter impliedly recognizes a temporary removal because it is provided that, if the charges are not sustained, the employee "shall be restored to duty without prejudice." But, before one can be restored, he must have been displaced. Turning to rule XI, it will be observed that in subdivision (a) a permanent removal is provided for after hearing or opportunity for hearing; in subdivision (b) a suspension is provided for, provided the civil service board may investigate and approve or disapprove; in subdivision

(c) a suspension or dismissal is provided, for and the language used clearly indicates that the subordinate may, at the time the proceeding is initiated, be separated from his office, but that thereafter he is to be given a hearing if he demands it, and, if the charges are sustained, then he will be permanently removed—that is, dismissed. As against improper removals, the charter and the rules both enjoin on the civil service board the duty of protecting the subordinate. The charter enjoins on the superior office the duty of promoting "the efficiency of the public service." From all of these provisions it is clear that the charter and the rules enacted thereunder authorize (1) a permanent removal; (2) a suspension for disciplinary purposes; and (3) a suspension which will promote the efficiency of the service.

[4, 5] It is further contended that the writing dated November 9, 1925, is insufficient because it does not specifically designate acts of malfeasance or nonfeasance, but it will be noted from the charter provisions above quoted that the writing is sufficient if it states "the reasons" for the act of the superior officer. If we view the writing as made to "promote the efficiency of the service," it need not state acts of malfeasance or nonfeasance. It may state matters which tend to show a set of facts which may subsequently transpire as being without foundation, but, until met and explained, or avoided, would tend greatly to hamper "the efficiency of the service," and to greatly embarrass the subordinate official in the discharge of his duties. Certainly such a situation is of such importance that the civil service board should take jurisdiction, and, if a demand is made therefor, conduct a hearing and make and enter such a determination within the powers conferred on it as may be sustained by the facts, and which determination will result in wholly removing the embarrassment or perhaps in a permanent removal. Furthermore, a supposititious case can readily be conceived where the superior officer would not be justified in going any further than stating the rumor or information without alleging the facts therein to be true. However, the writing dated February 1st does designate specifically certain charges. Assuming that the attack on the writing dated November 9, 1925, is sufficient, no attack has been made on the sufficiency of the later writing. We know of none. A similar question was before the Supreme Court of Minnesota in the case entitled In re Mason, 147 Minn. 383, 181 N. W. 570. At page 572 (147 Minn. 386) the court said:

"It will be observed that the statute does not limit the time nor prescribe the manner in which charges shall be presented, but merely provides that the accused officer shall be furnished a copy of the charges and be afforded an opportunity to make his defense. This requires a hearing, the purpose of which is to determine whether the officer has been guilty of the alleged misconduct. The Governor, upon whom the statute imposes the duty to determine this question, is not a court, and is not bound by the strict rules which govern trials in court. State ex rel. v. Common Council, 53 Minn. 238, 55 N. W. 118, 39 Am. St. Rep. 595; State ex rel. v. Megaarden, 85 Minn. 41, 88 N. W. 412, 89 Am. St. Rep. 534; State ex rel. v. Eberhart, 116 Minn. 313, 133 N. W. 857, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 788, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 785. The statute is remedial rather than penal in its nature; it provides for the removal of an unfaithful officer to protect the public, secure the faithful performance of official duties, and keep the public service above reproach, not to punish the officer for his derelictions. 22 R. C. L. 573, § 284; Territory v. Sanches, 14 N. M. 493, 94 P. 954, and note appended to report of case in 20 Ann. Cas. 109; also note found in 135 Am. St. Rep. 250. The restrictions which hedge about a trial in court on an indictment and limit the power to amend the indictment do not apply; and we find no warrant in the statute for saying that only one charge or set of charges may be considered, and see no reason why additional charges may not be presented, either independently of the original charges, or by way of amendment to them. The question to be determined is whether the accused officer has so misconducted himself in respect to the performance of his official duties that the good of the public service requires his removal from office. And the officer, or special tribunal, charged with the duty to determine this question, may, in our opinion, in the proper exercise of his discretion, permit the presentation of further and additional charges setting forth facts which, if true, have a direct and material bearing upon the question to be determined. Of course, the accused officer must be given a proper opportunity to meet the additional charges after they have been furnished to him. In the present case, the relator was given ample opportunity to present all his evidence and make a full defense."

A similar contention was made in People v. Common Council, 85 Hun, 601, 33 N. Y. S. 165. At page 168 (85 Hun, 606) the court said:

"The relator attacks the jurisdiction of the common council, in this, that he had not received the notice required by statute, of 14 days, of the charges against him. This contention is not well founded, as the proof shows that he had the 14-day notice of the substance of the charges upon which he was ultimately convicted. The amendments of one or two of the charges, which occurred during the progress of the investigation, were but an amplification of the original charges, and made in his presence, and an adjournment of several days was taken by the common council to give him an opportunity to meet the amended charges, and the relator had every reasonable opportunity to do so."

[6-12] It thus appears that the decisions dealing with the subject of the removal of officers concede the power to allow amendments. Such power is further evidenced by the charter provision that "the civil service board * * * shall not be bound by the technical rules of evidence and pleading." When the amendment amplifies but does not change the cause of action, the amended pleading relates back to the date when the original pleading was filed. 31 Cyc. 464; Barber v. Reynolds, 33 Cal. 497, 501; Humphry v. Buena Vista Water Co., 2 Cal. App. 540, 542, 84 P. 296; Claussen v. Chapin, 69 Mont. 205, 221 P. 1073, 1075. If a new cause of action is introduced by the amendment, such new cause of action relates back to the date of filing the amendment. Anderson v. Mayers, 50 Cal. 525. From the record before us in this collateral attack we are not informed, and we may not assume that the new matter is otherwise than an amplification of the paper dated November 9, 1925. In this connection the petitioner contends that the writing of November 9, 1925, was so defective that there was nothing to amend and, that the right to amend implies that there is something to amend by. 31 Cyc. 362. In answer to that contention it must be said that a most casual reading of the writing referred to shows that it was an attempt by the writer to execute the initiatory paper mentioned in section 22 of article 3 of the Charter, which required that the superior officer should furnish to the person whose removal is sought "a copy of the reasons for his removal and of any charges preferred against him." The doctrine that there must be something to amend by has never obtained in an unlimited degree in this state. From an early date the power of the courts to allow amendments has existed, and the limit to such power was rested on the principle that the amendment should be allowed if it did not change the entire gravamen of the pleading. Baker v. Bartol, 6 Cal. 483; Nevada County & Sacramento Canal Co. v. Kidd, 28 Cal. 673. The statute does not contain any provisions to the effect that the powers of the civil service board are more restricted than the powers of the courts under similar circumstances.

[13] Except by his answer interposed, the petitioner did not question the sufficiency of the charges as stated in the paper dated November 9, 1925, or as stated in the paper dated February 1, 1926. The civil service board has never passed on either of those attacks. Unless the written charges are so defective as to be void, the attack may not be made in the courts for the first time. People ex rel. Gibson v. French, 49 Hun, 607, 1 N. Y. S. 638, 639; People ex rel. Brady v. Brookfield, 6 App. Div. 445, 39 N. Y. S. 677, 678; Joyce v. City of Chicago, 216 Ill. 466, 471, 75 N. E. 184; Sullivan v. Lower, 234 Ill. 21, 23, 84 N. E. 622; Schlauf v. City of Chicago, 170 Ill. App. 19, 23.

[14, 15] We are unable to hold that the papers purporting to state the reasons for removal, or charges, are void. It follows that the civil service board has not exceeded its jurisdiction. Having jurisdiction of the controver, all questions of fact are for the determination of that board. The state of Wisconsin has a statute that is very similar to the provisions quoted from the charter of the city of Fresno. That statute was before the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in the cases entitled State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl, 140 Wis. 301, 122 N. W. 748, and the companion cases State ex rel. Hayden v. Arnold, 151 Wis. 19, 138 N. W. 78, and State ex rel. Bannen v. Arnold, 151 Wis. 38, 138 N. W. 85. In the Dahl Case, at page 750 (140 Wis. 305) the court said:

"In State ex rel. v. Houser, supra [122 Wis. 534, 100 N. W. 964], the construction of section 35, St. 1898, was involved. In the event of two conventions of the same party being held, the secretary of state was required to give preference in designation on the official ballot to the nominees certified by the state central committee. The statute did not provide for any review of the action of such committee in making its certification. The right of the court to review the decision of the committee was combated, and it was held that, where a new right is created by statute and the statute provides a method by special tribunal for the enforcement or protection of such right, and makes no provision for a review of the decision of such tribunal, the remedy given is exclusive, provided the tribunal acts within its jurisdiction. Op. Justice Marshall, page 570 of 122 Wis. (100 N. W. 975), and of the present Chief Justice, page 595 of 122 Wis. (100 N. W. 984). Such is the law elsewhere generally. Miller v. Clark, 62 Kan. 278, 62 P. 664; Chapman v. Miller, 52 Ohio St. 166, 39 N. E. 24; People v. Roosevelt, 151 N. Y. 369, 45 N. E. 840; People v. District Court, 32 Colo. 15, 74 P. 896; State v. Abbey, 82 Miss. 559, 35 So. 153; State v. Crittenden, 164 Mo. 237, 64 S. W. 162. We have in this case a right created by statute by which certain state employes may not be discharged except for just cause, and the power of removal for such cause is vested in the appointing officer, with no provision in the law for reviewing his decision, so that the situation is similar to that before the court in State ex rel. v. Houser, supra."

And, in the case last cited the court said, commencing on page 85 (151 Wis. 39):

"This case, in the main, is ruled by the decision in State ex rel. Hayden v. Arnold [151 Wis. 19, 138 N. W. 78], mentioned in the statement. The only difference as to facts is that the cause assigned for removal did not exist. But we are constrained to hold that such circumstance cannot make any difference. Manifestly, the legislative purpose was that relief from any mistake of that sort should be sought by the specific means provided in the civil service law. The relator, in accepting office under it, submitted to its provisions, including those empowering the commissioner to remove him at pleasure, filing a statement of the reasons, to which, as indicated in the former case, the law gives opportunity to answer. * * * Applying the foregoing, in view of the fact, which satisfactorily appears, that the tax commissioner acted in the removal proceedings in the honest belief that the cause assigned for displacing relator existed, the latter's remedy, if such cause did not exist, was under the civil service law, not by ignoring it and appealing to the courts in a mandamus or other proceeding. If such were not the case then, every time an appointing authority under the civil service law acts under the correlative power to discharge or remove, he would do so in peril of having to justify his action in judicial proceedings by showing satisfactorily to some court of general jurisdiction within his judicial district, that the cause assigned exists and is sufficient. Certainly the Legislature did not contemplate any such thing. Nothing of the sort is suggested, expressly, in the language of the law. Nothing of the sort is suggested by it inferentially. The legislative policy, evidenced by the enactment, is repellant to any such thing. To ingraft upon it any such an incident by construction, would undermine the law by taking from it one of the most essential elements of the legislative plan, i. e., to give the appointing authority the largest practicable measure of discretionary power to act summarily, in all cases, respecting the incumbency of subordinate positions, with reasonable opportunity to correct mistakes upon the same being brought to attention in the manner specified; such course being supposed to be promotive of, if not actually necessary, to, the best attainable performance of subordinate duties."

[16] Finally, the petitioner asserts that he has been suspended more than 30 days, and that a suspension for more than 30 days is prohibited by the provisions of Ordinance No. 972. This contention rests on a confusion or intermingling of two separate provisions of the ordinance. It is provided that a subordinate may be disciplined by suspension. It is also provided that the superior may initiate removal proceedings, and, pending the hearing thereof before the civil service board, that the subordinate officer may be suspended. As a disciplinary measure, the ordinance provides that a suspension may not be for a period exceeding 30 days. As an ancillary measure in removal proceedings no limit is placed on the period of suspension. Whether the suspension is of the first class or the second class, the ordinance provides that the subordinate may, on demand, be given a speedy hearing and that the period of 30 days will not necessarily be consumed in either case. Moreover, the facts above recited show that any delays which have occurred in the instant case were the delays caused or requested by the petitioner and not by his superior officers. Under very similar provisions contained in the New York charter the Supreme Court of that state made the same ruling. Halpin v. City of New York, 54 Misc. Rep. 128, 105 N. Y. S. 520.

[17] For the reasons which we have recited, we therefore hold that the writing signed by the respondent A. E. Sunderland November 9, 1925, was, under the attack as made in this case, sufficient to initiate proceedings looking toward a removal, and that all other questions are to be addressed, in the first instance, to the civil service board. In view of what we have said, it is unnecessary to pass on the demurrers.

The respondents are entitled to judgment on the merits. It is so ordered.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

LANGENBERG v. GUY. (Civ. 4463.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 29, 1926. Rehearing Denied May 29, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court. June 28, 1926.)

1. Master and servant ☞23—Party agreeing not to disable himself from continuing employment for stipulated time is liable for breach by sale of business.

Where party to contract of employment obligates himself either expressly or impliedly not to disable himself from continuing employment for stipulated time, he is liable for damages for breach if, by sale of business before expiration of stipulated period, he voluntarily put it out of his power to continue employment to end of its term in manner agreed by him.

2. Master and servant ☞23.

One binding himself to employ another for definite period is liable for breach if disposition of his affairs renders it impossible to receive services.

3. Master and servant ☞23.

Where contract of employment for specified time "as our business warrants" contained no express agreement that hirer would not sell business, any claim for damages for breach after sale must be grounded on theory of implied undertaking.

4. Master and servant ☞23.

Under contract of employment for specified time as business warranted, hirer is not liable for breach on sale of business before expiration of period.

5. Contracts ☞143.

In every judicial controversy under contract, it, as well as law, must be interpreted.

6. Master and servant ☞23.

Where contract of employment did not imply undertaking that hirer would not sell business during specified time of contract, mere fact that there was consideration for promise would not bind hirer not to sell.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thos. O. Toland, Judge.

Action by G. O. Langenberg against George F. Guy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

G. C. DeGarmo and H. B. Cornell, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bordwell & Mathews and W. W. Hyams, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for the alleged breach of a contract. Judgment passed for plaintiff. Defendant, appealing from that judgment, claims among other things, that his conduct did not amount to a breach of his agreement. If this contention be well taken it is determinative of the case, and in that event it will not be necessary to consider any of the other points presented by the appeal.

Defendant offered in writing to employ plaintiff's truck and driver for the hauling of lumber for one year if plaintiff would purchase a certain Indiana truck outfit then owned by defendant's son-in-law, one Arthur L. Knudson. When he made the proposal, August 6, 1920, defendant was the sole owner of a lumber business carried on by him in the city of Los Angeles under the name of Pico Heights Lumber Company. The instrument which evidences the proposal, the italics being ours, is as follows:

"August 6, 1920. Mr. G. O. Langenberg, Los Angeles, Calif.—Dear Sir: In consideration of the purchase of the Indiana truck outfit from our Mr. Knudson, we will employ your truck and driver for lumber hauling for a period of one year from date of delivery of new truck, as our business warrants. This is based on city hauls, excluding the shoestring strip and San Fernando district, at $2 per M. board feet and the prevailing rate to outside points, and on loads of from 3,000 to 6,000 feet. [Signed.] Pico Heights Lumber Company, by Geo. F. Guy."

Plaintiff claims that some time prior to September 25, 1920, he purchased the truck of Knudson in accordance with defendant's offer; that such purchase became and was a sufficient executed consideration for defendant's promise; and that thereupon defendant immediately became legally obligated to perform his promise to employ plaintiff's truck and driver in the hauling of lumber for the one-year period mentioned in the written offer. Plaintiff commenced hauling lumber for defendant on September 25, 1920, under the terms of the written offer and continued to do so until November 12, 1920, on which day defendant sold his business to a third party, and thereupon notified plaintiff that, as he did not have any more business, he would have no more hauling for him to do. There is no suggestion that the sale of the business was not bona fide in every particular.

Respondent claims that appellant, by selling his business, voluntarily put it out of his power to perform his part of the contract, thus preventing performance by respondent, and that such prevention of performance constituted a breach of the contract by appellant, entitling respondent immediately to sue for damages. Appellant, on the other hand, claims that his contract contains neither an express nor an implied undertaking on his part not to sell his business, that therefore he could sell as he did without thereby violating his agreement, and that his sale of the business and his consequent inability to continue hiring respondent's truck and driver did not subject him to damages as for a breach of contract.

The case turns upon the proper interpretation to be put upon the contract as evidenced by appellant's written offer. As in most cases of the kind, but slight if any assistance can be derived from judicial decisions on other contracts, save in so far as the reasoning of the courts in other cases may prove helpful as guides to a correct interpretation of the particular contract under consideration. In the main each case must rest upon its own bottom.

The words of the contract which are of vital significance—the ones which we think are determinative of appellant's right to sell his business prior to the expiration of one year—are the words, "as our business warrants." With this language in the contract appellant's only undertaking was to employ the truck and its driver during the year as warranted by his business. Bearing in mind this provision, we now proceed to consider the nature of appellant's obligation in so far as his right to sell his business is concerned.

[1, 2] There is no basis for a contention that appellant has violated any express term of his contract. In no part of the instrument signed by him does he expressly covenant not to sell his business. Therefore, whether he could rightfully sell it during the year without breaching his contract with respondent depends entirely upon whether the contract imports an implied obligation on appellant's part not to sell the business prior to the year's expiration. That, in the last analysis, is the ultimate question presented for solution. If the contract does import such an implied undertaking on appellant's part, then upon selling the business before the end of the year he would become liable as for a breach of his agreement. For of course it must be conceded that where a party to a contract of employment obligates himself by either an express or an implied agreement not to disable himself from continuing the employment for a stipulated time, he will make himself liable in damages for breach of contract if, by a sale of his business before the expiration of the stipulated period, he voluntarily puts it out of his power to continue the employment to the end of its term in the manner agreed to by him. White v. Lumiere North American Co., 79 Vt. 206, 64 A. 1121, and notes to that case in 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 807 et seq. It may also be conceded that, in the absence of some provision in a contract of employment which tends to negative the implication that the employee will continue uninterruptedly during a specified term, one who has bound himself to employ another during a definite time for a compensation the amount whereof can be earned and determined only by an actual performance of the services over the whole of the stipulated period, will render himself liable for damages for breach of contract if he makes a disposition of his affairs which renders it impossible for him to receive the services in the manner contemplated by the contract. Note to Turner v. Sawdon & Co., 2 B. R. C. 774. In every such case the question in the last analysis is simply this: Do the terms of the contract—and, if the contract is ambiguous, do the circumstances under which it was made—necessitate the implication that the employer has undertaken not to dispose of his business during a fixed period of time?

[3] As we have pointed out, any claim that appellant breached his contract necessarily must be grounded upon the theory of an implied undertaking on his part not to sell his business before the expiration of the year, there being no express agreement on his part not to do so. The question then is this: Does an agreement to hire a truck and its driver to haul lumber for a year, as the business of the hirer warrants, carry an implied obligation on the hirer's part that he will not during the year put it out of his power to continue furnishing lumber for hauling? The words, "as our business warrants," give to the hirer of the truck a latitude and a freedom of action not often found in contracts of employment for a definite period. Their presence here makes this contract of employment somewhat analogous to those contracts of purchase and sale where the buyer agrees to take such an amount of goods as he may "require" in the course of his business. It seems to be generally held in actions to recover damages for the breach of such "requirement contracts," as they often are called, that if the buyer sells his business and thus reduces his requirements to the vanishing point, he does not thereby breach his contract. Thus in Drake v. Vorse, 52 Iowa, 417, 3 N. W. 465, the plaintiff, a manufacturer of castings, and the defendant, a manufacturer of school furniture, entered into a contract whereby the former was to furnish the latter with all the castings which the defendant "may want" during the year 1873. In May of that year the defendant formed a partnership with another, and thereafter the business was carried on by the firm, which refused to receive any castings from the plaintiff. It was held that the defendant had the right to discontinue his business at any time; that he did so when he formed the partnership; that the contract was not binding on the firm; and that the defendant was not liable for damages, though the plaintiff had incurred considerable expense in preparing for the manufacture of the castings and the defendant had made a general statement at the time of entering into the contract as to the amount he would probably want during the year. In that case the court says:

"But conceding that it [the contract] bound him [the defendant] to order and take of the plaintiff all the castings he should want, it could not, we think, have the effect to preclude him from entering into a partnership, nor would it become obligatory upon the firm. It was certainly the defendant's privilege to discontinue business at any time when it should appear to him that his interest demanded it, and that, too, without becoming liable to the plaintiff in damages. He did discontinue business upon his individual account. After that he did not individually want or need any castings, and as the firm was not bound to take any, we do not think that the defendant became liable."

The following cases are to the same effect: McKeever v. Canonsburg Iron Co., 138 Pa. 184, 16 A. 97, 20 A. 938; Kanaskat L. & S. Co. v. Cascade Timber Co., 80 Wash. 561, 142 P. 15; Hamlyn & Co. v. Wood & Co., [1891] 2 Q. B. 488; Pfann v. Turner, etc., L. Co., 194 F. 69, 114 C. C. A. 89. See, also, Kenan, etc., v. Yorkville, etc., Co., 260 F. 28, 171 C. C. A. 64. In a note to Diamond Alkali Co. v. Aetna Explosives Co., 7 A. L. R. at page 507, the annotator, speaking of these "requirement contracts," says:

"Where the buyer exercises good faith and is free from fraud in disposing of, or making a change in, his business, such change will have the effect of releasing him from the obligation of the contract to purchase his requirements of a certain commodity used in his certain business, to the extent that the change in the business does away with the necessity for the use of the commodity."

[4] But quite irrespective of whether this contract may or may not be regarded as akin to those contracts of sale where the buyer's agreement is to take such articles as the exigencies of his business may require during a fixed period of time, there are other considerations which point unerringly to the conclusion that appellant did not impliedly obligate himself not to sell his business during the one-year period. He did not bind himself to furnish respondent with any particular amount of lumber for hauling, nor did he agree to compensate respondent except for lumber hauled by the latter as and when warranted by the business. Respondent therefore assumed certain risks which were every whit as fatal to his right to haul lumber throughout the year as a sale of appellant's business would be. Those other risks were left altogether uncovered by the contract. They are risks against which it cannot be said that there was any protection by implication. For example, since appellant was obligated to employ the truck and its driver only so far as his "business warrants," it is clear that if, during any part of the year, the prices of lumber had declined to a point where the business could not be carried on with profit, he could have closed his establishment and could have held his lumber for better prices, even though respondent may have been left for the better part of the year without any lumber to haul.

Or appellant might have had labor troubles with his workers, such as strikes, which would have made it inexpedient for him to endeavor to move any lumber during the greater part of the year. Since risks of this character were indubitably assumed by respondent, the reasoning of the English court in Rhodes v. Forwood, 1 App. Cas. 256, 265, becomes pertinent. There Lord Cairns says:

"* * * There are really in this agreement several risks which are left altogether uncovered, and as to some of which it was very candidly admitted by the counsel for the respondents that no provision whatever was made, and that they could not say that there was even by implication any protection against those risks."

Then, after pointing out what these risks were, including, among others, the closing of the principal's colliery on account of low prices, strikes, etc., Lord Cairns proceeds:

"* * * If * * * it could not be contended that there is any provision in this contract against any of those risks, why is it to be assumed with regard to the other, the fourth risk, namely, the risk of the colliery owner, not selling his coal elsewhere piecemeal but selling the colliery itself to a purchaser, that there is an implied undertaking against that one risk, although it is admitted that there is no undertaking at all against any of the other risks? * * * The simple point here appears to me to be, as it is admitted that there is no express contract which has been violated, can your Lordships say that there is any implied contract which has been violated? I can find none. I cannot find any implied contract that the colliery owner would not sell his colliery entire."

This case was followed in Morris v. Dinick, 25 Ont. Rep. 291, where the court says:

"There is no undertaking [on the part of defendant] to manufacture any defined quantity of goods, or indeed to manufacture at all; and according to the class of cases applicable, no such term should be implied. * * * In brief, this plaintiff was to get commission on the sale of all goods manufactured by the defendants, but they did not say they would manufacture; and the continuance of the concern was, therefore, left at large to be determined by the interests of the principal."

Appellant, and not respondent, was the judge, and the sole judge, of how his lumber business should be conducted. As we have pointed out, there was no undertaking on appellant's part to furnish respondent with any definite quantity of lumber for hauling. Indeed, appellant was not bound to operate his business at all if it appeared that he could not do so except at a loss. And if he could altogether cease operating his business, he could sell it and get rid of it. Having the right to reduce his business to a minimum—and he unquestionably did have that right, since he was the sole judge of how the business should be managed to meet the varying exigencies arising from time to time—it follows that he had the right to reduce it to nothing, so far as respondent was concerned. What was said in Re English, etc., Ins. Co., L. R. 5 Chanc. 737, is in point. There a person entered into an agreement with an insurance company to act as the company's agent for five years at a fixed annual salary and a commission of 10 per cent. on the net profits of each year. Less than two years after the agreement was entered into the company was wound up voluntarily. It was held that the agent was not entitled to damages by reason of the company having put it out of his power to make profits. "I am of the opinion," says James, L. J., "that this was a contract which did not give the servant the right to determine what the extent of the business was to be. He could not call upon the directors to issue new policies, to accept new premiums, or to take new risks, if they were not minded to do it. He could not say, 'Such a person has brought in a policy of insurance, and you must accept that.' Because, if he had a right to say, 'You must carry on the business,' he would also have a right to say, 'You must carry on the business in the usual and proper manner,' and that would be giving a servant the right of controlling the master in the mode in which he chose to carry on his business. Now, I am quite satisfied that the meaning of the contract was nothing of the kind. It was never intended to give the servant the right of dictating as to the extent of business, whether more or less, or nothing, but he simply took the chance of the company finding it a profitable business and carrying it on. The company had a right to reduce the business to a minimum; and if they had a right to reduce it to a minimum, they had a right to reduce it to nothing—as far as he was concerned. (Italics ours.) I was referred to a case at common law, McIntyre v. Belcher, 14 C. B. (N. S.) 654, where this illustration was given: 'If I sell a man all the apples from my apple tree, I have no right to cut down that tree.' But that is essentially different from a man saying, 'I am going to buy and sell apples, and I will give you 10 per cent. upon the profits of the sale of them.' That must, of course, depend upon the amount of apples which the man who enters into the speculation will buy, and what price he will be able to sell them at. In such a case the other party could not say, 'You are not making profits, because you go to a wrong market and buy upon bad terms; you have not got sufficient capital, and you are selling at a loss in order to get money. Therefore I am entitled to damages for the improper mode in which you carry on your business.'"

What was said by Lord Esher in Hamlyn & Co. v. Wood & Co., supra, is pertinent here. There the defendants, who carried on business as brewers, entered into an agreement in writing by which they agreed to sell to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs agreed to buy, all the grain "made" by defendants from July 19, 1885, to September 30, 1895, at the average of the rates charged each year by certain specified firms. It will be noticed that the agreement was, not that defendants would sell the plaintiffs grain for ten years, but that they would sell, and the plaintiffs would buy, all grain made by the defendants for ten years. In 1890 the defendants sold their business, and in consequence ceased to supply grains to the plaintiffs. It was held that the contract did not contain any implied obligation on defendants' part not to prevent themselves from continuing the sale of grains to the plaintiffs for the ten-year period. In the course of his opinion Lord Esher says:

"It is admitted in the present case that there has been no breach of any express stipulation of the agreement, and therefore we are asked to imply a stipulation of which there has been a breach. The stipulation we are asked to imply is, not that the defendants contracted to carry on their business for ten years, but that they contracted that they would not during that period willfully do anything to prevent their so doing. If you cannot imply the first of these stipulations as a matter of business, I should think it would be very difficult to imply the second."

So here, the terms of the contract before us do not include an implied undertaking on appellant's part to carry on his lumber business during all of the year regardless of prices, strikes, or other contingencies affecting profits. And if we cannot imply an obligation on the part of appellant to carry on his business during the year, then, as was said in substance by Lord Esher, it would be very difficult to imply that he contracted that he would not during that period voluntarily do anything to prevent his carrying on his business.

Our conclusion from the foregoing is that the sale of appellant's business, though it put it out of his power to furnish respondent with any more lumber for hauling, did not violate any express or implied term of the contract.

[5] None of the cases relied upon by respondent conflicts with our conclusion. In Bagley v. Cohen, 121 Cal. 604, 53 P. 1117, cited by respondent, the court applied to the facts the unquestionably correct doctrine that one who voluntarily puts it out of his power to do what he has agreed to do, breaks his contract and is immediately liable to be sued thereon for damages, even though the time specified for full performance has not arrived. There the obligor, Gould, had expressly agreed to pay out of the profits to be realized by him in his business a debt which he owed the plaintiff. The contract before the court in that case clearly showed that Gould had impliedly undertaken not voluntarily to disable himself from realizing profits in his business; for only out of such profits could the debt, a fixed and definite sum of money, be paid in the manner in which he had expressly agreed it should be paid. In every judicial controversy under a contract it, as well as the law, must be interpreted. The interpreted contract is what the law enforces. Therefore, to ascertain whether there has been a breach, the agreement must first be interpreted. It of course is freely conceded by us that if appellant had expressly or impliedly obligated himself to carry on his business during all of the one-year period, in order that lumber might be furnished by him to be hauled by respondent's truck and driver, he would have been guilty of a breach of his contract. But, for the reasons which we have stated, no such obligation on appellant's part can be implied. What we have said of the Bagley Case applies with equal force and for substantially the same reason to Wolf v. Marsh, 54 Cal. 228, and Carter v. Rhodes, 135 Cal. 46, 66 P. 985. In the only other case cited by respondent—Alderson v. Houston 154 Cal. 1, 96 P. 884—the defendant had expressly agreed to do the very thing which he later put it out of his power to do. That is to say, in that case the defendant had expressly agreed to furnish certificates of title which, had they been furnished by him as he had agreed, would have shown the properties to be clear of the assessment liens which he later permitted to accrue. There was no question there as to whether the defendant had impliedly undertaken to do that which he subsequently put it out of his power to do. Whereas in the instant case the question is, should the court read into appellant's contract an implied undertaking to carry on his business in such a manner throughout the year that there would be deliveries of lumber to be hauled by respondent's truck and driver? We think the terms of this contract do not warrant any such implication.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: WORKS, J.; CRAIG, J.

PER CURIAM. [6] The petition for rehearing is denied.

It is urged in the petition that in construing the contract we overlooked the fact that appellant received a consideration for his promise to hire respondent's truck and driver for one year. That consideration, as stated in the opinion, consisted of the purchase by respondent of the Indiana truck owned by appellant's son-in-law. This element was not overlooked by us when construing the contract in question. We thought then, as we do now, that the mere fact that appellant received a consideration for his promise is not necessarily determinative of the scope of his contractual obligations—that the receipt by him of the consideration agreed upon should not be given the force which appellant now claims for it. Obviously, in every binding contract the promise of the promisor must be supported by a legal consideration of some kind. In many of the contracts involved in actions such as this the consideration received by the defendant for his promise to employ the plaintiff is the executory promise of the latter to perform his part of the mutual covenants. And while it is true that here respondent's promise to purchase the son-in-law's truck ceased to be executory and became an executed promise when he made the purchase, it does not therefore follow, as a necessary conclusion or as a matter of law, that appellant's agreement imports an implied obligation not to sell his business prior to the expiration of the year.

If the terms of appellant's express obligations are such that an undertaking on his part not to sell his business during the year cannot be implied, then the mere fact that he received a consideration for his promise would not bind him not to sell. The consideration received by him was given in return for his promise to do something. The question therefore is: What was it that he promised to do? The nature of that promise and of the implications incident to it are not necessarily controlled by the consideration which he received. Obviously, it could not be held that appellant breached his contract if he had neglected to do something which he had not obligated himself to do, merely because he received a consideration for doing what he did agree to do; and, conversely, it cannot be held that he breached his contract if he has done something which he has not obligated himself to refrain from doing, merely because he received a consideration for doing what he agreed to do. The sole question is: What is the scope and content of appellant's obligation? In seeking the answer to this question each and every part of the agreement, including the consideration agreed to be given to appellant, its nature and its value, should be taken into account. But the consideration for appellant's promise is only one of the elements to be considered. There may be, and, as we think, there is, another and a determining factor—one which warrants the inference that appellant did not obligate himself not to sell his business. That factor, as we pointed out in the opinion, is found in the provision that appellant agrees to hire respondent's truck and its driver only "as our business warrants."

While we agree with respondent that the fact that appellant has received his consideration is an element to be considered in arriving at the intention of the parties, we do not agree with his claim that the receipt of that consideration, regardless of its nature or of its value, conclusively evidences an intention that appellant was not to sell his business during the term of the employment or hiring. We think we should take counsel of the character of the consideration and of its value. It may be that if respondent had parted with a large pecuniary consideration for the privilege of hauling the lumber for one year, it should in that case be held that it was the intention of the parties that appellant was not to discontinue his business within the year because of the great hardship which would befall respondent if he should lose the opportunity to haul the lumber for the full period agreed upon, after having paid dearly for the privilege. But here, in view of the nature of the consideration received by appellant, the hardship would fall upon the latter if an implied obligation not to sell the business were imported into the contract. It may be presumed that the truck which respondent purchased from appellant's son-in-law had some value, and that respondent, when he purchased it, received value for his money. Indeed, if we may assume that respondent exercised ordinary business prudence in the purchase of the truck it may be inferred that in the vehicle itself he received full value for the money paid by him for it. Unless, therefore, the other terms of the contract warrant the court in spelling out or implying a covenant on appellant's part not to sell his business, we would not be warranted in holding that an agreement not to sell should be imported into the contract merely because respondent bought a truck at appellant's request. In such a transaction appellant receives nothing of any substantial pecuniary value. "A right so important as that of one to sell his own property," says the court in Pfann & Co. v. Turner Cypress L. Co., 194 F. 69, 114 C. C. A. 89 (cited in the opinion), "should not be denied him unless the language employed clearly conveys that intention."

What we have said is not without support in the decisions of other courts. Thus, in Kanaskat Lumber, etc., Co. v. Cascade Timber Co., 80 Wash. 561, 142 P. 15 (cited in the opinion), defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff's assignor, whom for brevity we shall refer to as the plaintiff, all logs cut by it. At the same time plaintiff undertook, as a part of the consideration moving to the defendant, to erect and maintain a shingle mill adjacent to defendant's railroad tracks. This executory promise to erect a shingle mill must have become an executed promise long before the expiration of the ten-year period mentioned in the contract, for the opinion states that for six years there was a mutual performance of the contract by the parties thereto. The court held that the defendant was not liable in damages in consequence of its failure to continue to deliver logs, for the reason that its obligation under the contract was no more than a promise to deliver such logs as it might cut while in pursuit of its own logging operations. In the course of its opinion the court says:

"We need go no further than the contract. Its terms do not warrant us in holding that respondent is bound to deliver except as it conducts its own logging operations. A contract to so deliver on the one hand, and a contract to build a mill at a certain place and take the logs under such conditions as are stipulated in the contract, is not in contravention of any public policy, nor can we say, as a matter of law, that it involves a hardship and would not have been entered into had appellant appreciated the force of the language employed. We would have the same right to imply into the contract an understanding that appellant was mindful of the fact that the business of logging is in a sense uncertain and subject to market fluctuations and that a logger would not bind himself to deliver excepting as he could operate at a profit, as we would have to imply that appellant would not have entered into the contract unless upon an understanding that respondent would keep it in material for the continuous operation of its mill. To so imply, would lead us into difficulties which could not be measured by any rule. * * * Counsel puts great reliance upon the words 'the party of the second part [plaintiff] agrees to erect and keep said mill adjacent to the track of the first party.' They ask, Why was appellant thus bound if respondent could log and deliver at will? Respondent meets this argument, saying that it is no more than a stipulation to protect it from a call to deliver at some point away from its own tracks. Another answer might be that the words relied on are not to be singled out as the essence of the contract, but they are to be construed along with the agreement to deliver cedar logs 'as they are reached in logging operations of the party of the first part.'" (Italics ours.)

It is further claimed in the petition for rehearing that respondent, as a reasonable man, could not have intended that appellant, in the short space of three months, should put it out of his power to furnish lumber for hauling. It is said that a construction of the contract which might lead to such a result would place respondent at the mercy of appellant. It may have been respondent's expectation that the business would be carried on by appellant throughout the year; but, even so, he cannot complain if he entered into a contract which did not obligate appellant to refrain from frustrating that expectation. What was said by the New York Court of Appeals in Jugla v. Troutet, 120 N. Y. 21, 23 N. E. 1066, is pertinent. There the plaintiffs, glove manufacturers in Paris, sold to defendant their New York business, at the same time agreeing to furnish him with gloves manufactured by them so long as he should continue the business so purchased. This provision of the contract was a part of the consideration moving to the defendant for the total sum which he agreed to pay to plaintiffs upon his purchase of their business. About a year after the contract was entered into plaintiffs discontinued the manufacture of gloves. Meanwhile they had been paid a considerable part of the purchase price. The action was brought by plaintiffs to recover the balance due them on the purchase price. Defendant claimed that plaintiffs had undertaken to continue to manufacture gloves and to furnish him with them for his trade, and that when they ceased to manufacture any more gloves they were chargeable with a breach of the contract. It was held that plaintiffs' undertaking to furnish gloves to defendant was dependent upon their continuing to manufacture them. In the course of its opinion the court says:

"The terms of the agreement fairly import the intent of the parties, which is deemed within its covenants, that so long as the defendant should continue the business so purchased by him of the plaintiffs, the latter should sell to him and he should purchase of them gloves for his trade, provided the plaintiffs continued to manufacture gloves. This qualification quite clearly appears by the provisions of the contract, and there is no opportunity to spell out or imply a covenant on the part of the plaintiffs to continue in the business of manufacturing, or which denied to them the right at their pleasure to discontinue the production of gloves. It may have been assumed by the parties that the making of gloves and the sale to and purchase by the defendant, would be continued as long as the latter desired to carry on, in New York, the business so purchased by him; and that such expectation on his part was a leading inducement to him to make the purchase. It is in that view that the defendant's counsel urges that the intent to accomplish such purpose should be treated as within the covenants, and that any other view would render the contract unreasonable and place him at the mercy of the plaintiffs. * * * In the present case the contract appears to have been carefully prepared, its provisions are without doubtful import, and although the defendant took by his purchase the good will of the business, one essential element of which may have been the reputation of the 'D. Jugla' gloves, the undertaking of the plaintiffs to furnish them to the defendant was plainly made dependent upon their continuance to manufacture them, and such was manifestly the qualification of their covenant in that respect."

harmony. But whether the decisions which have construed such contracts are or are not in accord is immaterial here. For, as is said in the opinion, quite irrespective of whether this contract is or is not analogous to the so-called "requirement contracts," there are other reasons, detailed in the opinion, which lead to the conclusion that appellant's contract did not imply an obligation not to sell his business.

In his petition for a rehearing respondent calls attention to certain authorities which, like some of those cited in his brief, are cases where the defendant, being indebted to the plaintiff, promised to pay his debt out of profits to be realized by him in some business venture. In that class of cases the defendant owes a debt which he must pay. He makes a contract which accords him the privilege of paying his debt in a certain way, but pay the debt in some manner he must. If he pays it out of the profits as he agreed to, well and good; if he does not pay his debt in the manner agreed upon—if he sells the business so that he cannot pay the debt as contemplated by his contract—then he must be made to pay it out of any assets which can be reached on execution. The debt is his, and he cannot escape paying it in some manner. Obviously those cases have no application here.

Finally, our attention is called to certain cases which respondent claims give to the so-called "requirement contracts" a construction different from that which is given them in the cases cited by us in the opinion filed herein. It is possible that the decisions which deal with that class of contracts are not in entire

1. Homicide ⇨268—Genuineness of defendant's reason for refusal to tell what he knew about deceased and inferences to be drawn therefrom held questions for jury.

Whether reason assigned by defendant for his refusal to tell what he knew about whereabouts of deceased was subterfuge or genuine and inferences to be drawn from such refusal held questions for jury.

2. Homicide ⇨229.

Evidence held to warrant finding as to identity of deceased.

3. Homicide ⇨332(2).

Jury's finding as to identity of deceased, supported by evidence, is conclusive on Supreme Court.

4. Homicide ⇨234(1).

Evidence held to justify finding that defendant slew deceased.

5. Criminal law ⇨564(1).

Evidence as to place where body was found, and nearby pools of blood, held sufficient proof of venue in homicide case.

6. Homicide ⇨253(1).

Evidence held to warrant finding that homicide was murder in first degree.

7. Criminal law ⇨698(1).

Testimony of deputy coroner that hair found near decomposed body of deceased was human hair held properly admitted, where only objection was to one of the preliminary questions, which was unanswered.

8. Criminal law ⇨437.

In homicide case, map of county, in a desert place of which deceased's body was found, held properly admitted in evidence, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1936.

9. Criminal law ⇨433—Telegrams sent by deceased held competent and relevant in prosecution for murder.

In prosecution for murder of person with whom defendant had driven in automobile from Detroit to California, two telegrams and copy of a third, sent by deceased to Detroit bank from places at which defendant and he had stopped, held competent and relevant.

10. Criminal law ⇨1043(2).

Where objection to evidence was general only, party making it cannot on appeal successfully urge a particular objection which could have been cured had it been specifically stated at trial.

11. Criminal law ⇨695(5).

General objection that testimony is irrelevant and incompetent is insufficient to raise objection of want of proper foundation.

12. Criminal law ⇨1186(4)—Curtalement of defendant's cross-examination of witness, though improper, held not reversible error (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Curtalement of defendant's cross-examination of witness, affecting readiness with which he had identified defendant, though improper, held not reversible error, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

13. Criminal law ⇨1163(1).

Since adoption of Const. art. 6, § 4½, injury is not presumed from error.

Instruction in effect that jury should either find defendant guilty of murder in first degree or acquit him held not error, in view of evidence, or at least not reversible error, in view of instruction as to ingredients of crime of murder in first degree and instruction to acquit unless defendant was guilty of that offense.

15. Homicide ⇨309(5)—Refusal of instructions affecting lesser offenses is proper where evidence shows defendant guilty of murder in first degree if guilty at all.

Refusal of instructions as to offenses less than murder in first degree is not error where evidence shows murder in first degree if defendant is guilty at all, nor does such rule violate constitutional inhibition against charging juries on matters of fact.

16. Homicide ⇨307(3)—Rule obviating necessity for instruction on lesser offenses than murder in first degree is not limited to specific homicidal acts conclusively showing deliberation and premeditation.

Rule that court need not charge with respect to lesser offenses where evidence shows murder in first degree, if defendant is guilty at all, is not limited to specific homicidal acts enumerated in statutory definition of murder in first degree which carry with them conclusive evidence of deliberation and premeditation.

17. Homicide ⇨307(3)—Rule obviating necessity for instructions on lesser offenses than murder in first degree is not limited to cases where evidence is direct and positive.

Rule permitting refusal of instructions on lesser offenses where evidence shows murder in first degree if defendant is guilty at all is not confined to those cases where evidence is direct and positive.

18. Criminal law ⇨762(3)—Instruction on circumstantial evidence held not objectionable as intimating that court considered evidence to satisfactorily establish issues in case.

Instruction that ultimate facts enumerated might be established "as satisfactorily and as conclusively by circumstantial as by direct evidence" held not objectionable, as carrying intimation that court deemed evidence to satisfactorily or conclusively establish any issues in case.

Instruction that facts in issue might be established by circumstances specifically mentioned, if such circumstances were established to the satisfaction of the jury beyond reasonable doubt, and if the jury were satisfied from such circumstances of the existence of the ultimate facts, held not erroneous as assuming existence of circumstances mentioned.

22. Criminal law ⚡815(9)—Instruction held not erroneous as charge that jury could consider only probative facts established beyond a reasonable doubt.

Instruction that if specifically enumerated circumstances had been established beyond a reasonable doubt, jury could consider them "together with all other facts and circumstances, if any, shown by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt," held not erroneous as charge that jury could consider only probative facts established beyond a reasonable doubt.

23. Homicide ⚡308(1).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Joseph H. Watts was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 241 P. 886.

El. W. Bartlett, of Colton, Perky, McConnell & Hill, of Long Beach, and Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and George H. Johnson, Dist. Atty., of San Bernardino, for the People.

FINLAYSON, Justice pro tem. Defendant was charged with the murder of Wilfred Hey, alleged to have been committed in San Bernardino county on or about November 26, 1924. He was convicted of murder in the first degree, and was sentenced to suffer the extreme penalty. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial.

In the latter part of December, 1924, a body, that of a man who had been dead for some time, was found at a lonely spot on the desert in San Bernardino county. By its verdict the jury impliedly found that the body was that of Wilfred Hey, that he had been murdered, that defendant was the slayer, and that the homicide was murder in the first degree. No eyewitness to the tragedy came forward, the evidence being entirely circumstantial. Defendant did not take the witness stand, nor did any witness testify in his behalf. In addition to claiming that the trial court erred in the admission and exclusion of certain evidence and in the giving of certain instructions, appellant contends that the evidence was insufficient to identify the dead body as that of Wilfred Hey, to identify defendant as the slayer, to prove the venue as laid—I. e., that the crime was committed in San Bernardino county—or to show that the homicide was murder in the first degree.

The uncontradicted evidence for the people tended to establish a circumstantial case against the accused, the outstanding features of which are substantially these: Wilfred Hey was a young man having the appearance and speech of an Englishman. He was about 28 years of age, was approximately 5 feet 4 inches tall, weighed about 125 pounds, and had brown or reddish brown hair. He had lived at the Kalamazoo Apartments in Detroit, Mich., from July, 1924, to the latter part of the month of October following, when he left that city in company with defendant in defendant's automobile—a secondhand Overland touring car. Defendant had lived with Hey in the latter's apartment for some three or four weeks previous to their departure from Detroit. Through this association it may be inferred that he had an opportunity to acquire some knowledge of Hey's financial affairs. About two months before the two men left Detroit, Hey called upon the assistant manager of the People's State Bank at that city, and asked that the bank write to England regarding the sale of some British war bonds which he owned and which he desired to sell. The bonds, which were then with the Union Bank of Manchester, England, were worth about $1,500. In furtherance of Hey's wishes a letter, signed by him, was sent by the People's State Bank to its foreign correspondents requesting them to sell the bonds and to transfer the proceeds to the bank at Detroit. Later, and while Hey still was in Detroit, the People's State Bank sold for him, through a New York institution, some shares of stock, upon which a small sum of money was realized. The proceeds of this sale were received by the Detroit bank on October 22, 1924. From the sum realized by the sale, the bank, after deducting a few dollars to liquidate a small loan which it previously had made to Hey, placed $100 to his credit in a savings account and delivered the balance to him. Shortly thereafter defendant and Hey left Detroit to motor to Los Angeles. Up to that time the Detroit bank had not succeeded in selling the British war bonds.

Hey was not again heard of until November 7, 1924, when the Detroit bank received a telegram, purporting to have been sent by a bank at Rock Springs, Wyo., inquiring if a check drawn on Hey for $10 was good. On November 10, 1924, the Detroit bank received another telegram, purporting to have been sent by Hey from Ogden, Utah, asking that the balance of his savings account be transmitted to the Security State Bank at Ogden. On the next day the Detroit bank transmitted the money to the Ogden bank by telegram. On the same day that the Detroit bank received Hey's telegram from Ogden, the president of the Security State Bank at the latter city prepared and delivered to Hey the form of a telegram to the Detroit bank. This document was admitted in evidence as People's Exhibit 2. There was written on it the following, in the handwriting of the president of the Ogden bank:

"People's State Bank, Detroit, Michigan. Telegraph Security State Bank, Ogden, Utah, balance of my savings account. Waive identification. Will write you regarding sale of British war bonds and transfer of money when I reach my destination."

This paper was found on the clothing of the body discovered on the desert in San Bernardino county. It is a fair inference from the evidence that Hey kept the document, though he doubtless used it as a model from which to compose the telegram which he sent to the Detroit bank, for on the day that he received this bit of writing from the president of the Ogden bank he and defendant called at the office of the Western Union Telegraph Company at Ogden and there caused to be sent to the Detroit bank a message which was almost identical with the form which had been prepared by the Ogden banker.

Defendant and Hey arrived in Ogden about November 8, 1924. There they remained for about one week. Their automobile was in need of some repair when they reached that city, but neither had any money for that purpose. Indeed, they came to Ogden "stranded," and had not the wherewithal to buy their meals or to pay for lodgings. Defendant borrowed a small sum from a garage man at Ogden with whom he had left his car for needed repairs. The money which the Detroit bank remitted to the Ogden bank in response to Hey's telegram of November 10th was paid to Hey on November 15, 1924. Upon that occasion defendant accompanied Hey to the bank. Upon the payment of the money to Hey, defendant said, "Now that we can get out of town, we better go." At the same time defendant told the cashier that they had come from Detroit, that they were going to Los Angeles, and that they were traveling in an Overland automobile. On the preceding day defendant had called at the Security State Bank unaccompanied by Hey, and had then asked the cashier if the money had come from Detroit for Wilfred Hey, telling the bank officer that they had run out of money, that they were out of money when in Rock-Springs, Wyo., that they had to send for money while there, and that they had received $10, which paid their expenses to Ogden; adding that "the damned fool (referring to Hey) didn't know anything; that he only drew $10 when he ought to have drawn it all." Before the bank at Ogden paid Hey the money which the Detroit bank had remitted, the cashier asked him if he had anything that would indicate that he was Wilfred Hey. Whereupon the British war bonds were mentioned, defendant being present at the time. Hey, in defendant's presence, then produced a memorandum which had been given to him by the bank at Detroit and which referred to the authority that he had given that bank to sell the war bonds and to credit his account with the proceeds.

We next hear of defendant and Hey at Silver Lake, where the twain were seen together on the evening of November 25, 1924. Silver Lake is a small settlement in San Bernardino county, located many miles from any one of the county's exterior boundary lines. At that village, between 6 and 7 o'clock on the evening of November 25th, defendant procured some gasoline from B. Harrod, a mining man who was stopping at the village temporarily. Defendant and Harrod walked two blocks to the spot where defendant's car was parked, conversing as they walked. Defendant told Harrod that he was driving from Salt Lake City and was headed for Los Angeles. At the trial Harrod described the automobile as an Overland touring car. Sitting in the front seat of the car, when Harrod and defendant reached the vehicle, was a man whom Harrod, when testifying as a witness in the case, identified as Hey from some photographs which were shown him by the district attorney. Harrod described Hey as a "sandy-complected" man, who wore a dark suit of clothes and who had a light cap on his head. This is the last time Hey was seen alive.

About a month later, at a spot about 29 miles south or southwesterly from Silver Lake and in the heart of San Bernardino county, the body referred to in the early part of this opinion was found. It was that of a man approximately 5 feet 4 inches tall, weighing from 125 to 130 pounds. It lay on the surface of the ground about 92 feet south of a county road, in a region where the road passes through a dry wash 300 feet wide. The place of the gruesome find is several miles from any human habitation, in wild, desert country. The corpse was covered with canvas, which had been weighted down with rocks. The body was fully dressed, save that there was no collar, tie, hat, or cap on it. The trousers and coat were of a dark blue texture, with fine white stripes. Between the body and the county road were two small bushes. The corpse lay just beyond these bushes and behind a small rise in the bank of the wash. When found, the body was in an advanced stage of decomposition. Wild animals had so stripped the skull of flesh that there were no recognizable features. The skull was as white as a sheet of paper. The vertebrae from the collarbone up were exposed. On the top of the skull was an irregular, depressed fracture, triangular in shape, about an inch and a half long and three-quarters of an inch across. There was another large opening in the skull back of the left ear, in the occipital bone. This latter opening was large enough to permit the tips of four fingers to be inserted an inch or two. It extended in an oblique direction from above downward and backward from the ear, and was about an inch wide in its widest part and approximately three inches in length. In both instances the fractured portions of the skull were caved in. The superintendent of the county hospital, a regularly licensed and practicing physician, after describing the nature of the wounds, testified that he did not think that either one could have been self-inflicted. Each wound had the appearance of having been caused by the crushing blow of a heavy, blunt instrument, an inch or so in diameter, and hard enough to break the skull.

Extending from the edge of the road to the spot where the body was found was a track or depression in the desert sand, about eighteen inches in width, which looked as though a human body had been dragged over it. In this track, five feet from the road, was a blood-soaked spot in the sand about six inches in diameter. The evidence discloses that the blood was that of a human being. Seventeen feet farther, in the direction toward which the body lay, was another spot where the sand was soaked with human blood. Scattered about the body were bunches of hair of a reddish-brown color. The deputy coroner of San Bernardino county, who was present when the body was found, testified that in his opinion the hair was that of a human being.

On the clothing of the deceased, in the watch pocket, were found two ferry tickets, issued by the Detroit & Windsor Ferry Company, entitling the holder to passage by ferry between the city of Detroit and the nearby town of Windsor. There was also found in the same pocket three small slips of paper and the telegraphic form which the president of the Security State Bank at Ogden had delivered to Hey on the 10th of November, and which, as we have stated, was introduced in evidence as People's Exhibit No. 2.

[1] Coming now to defendant's actions subsequent to the time when he and Wilfred Hey were at Silver Lake on the evening of the 25th of November: Defendant arrived in Los Angeles in the latter part of that month. He told his brother, who resided in that city, that he had come from the east in his four-passenger touring car. On December 1, 1924, defendant, accompanied by his brother, visited the Bank of Italy in Los Angeles, and, representing himself to be Wilfred Hey, asked the person in charge of the telegraphic transfer department of that institution if there was any money there for him. It seems that prior to that date the Bank of Italy had received telegraph instructions from the People's State Bank at Detroit to pay to Wilfred Hey a certain sum of money—the proceeds of the sale of the British war bonds. This money had been received by the Detroit bank in the interim, and that institution had undertaken to remit it to the Bank of Italy at Los Angeles. The employee of the Bank of Italy with whom defendant had his dealings asked defendant to produce some evidence of his identity as Wilfred Hey. Thereupon defendant's brother, who was a customer of the bank, spoke up and told the banker that defendant was Wilfred Hey. The bank then issued to defendant, in the name of Wilfred Hey, a teller's exchange for the amount which it had been authorized to pay to Hey. Defendant, under the fictitious name of Wilfred Hey, then opened an account with the Bank of Italy. Later he drew out the money which he had deposited. We next hear of him in San Francisco, where he was taken into custody by the sheriff of San Bernardino county on February 7, 1925. The sheriff told defendant that he was charged with the murder of Wilfred Hey. Defendant admitted that he knew Hey, but upon being asked by the sheriff when it was that he last saw the man who had journeyed with him almost across the continent, he refused to tell, offering as an excuse for his reticence that he knew of a case where an accused had talked when placed under arrest and was "jobbed and convicted." We pause here to say that it was for the jury to determine whether the reason assigned by defendant for declining to tell the sheriff what he knew of Hey's whereabouts was a subterfuge, or whether, if genuine, it justified him in withholding from the authorities such information as he possessed, also whether his conduct was contrary to the ordinary behavior of a person charged with crime, and whether it evinced guilt or innocence. People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 487, 55 P. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50; People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 66 P. 794; People v. Swaile, 12 Cal. App. 192, 198, 107 P. 134; People v. Graney, 48 Cal. With this synoptical statement of the most important and controlling facts and circumstances shown by the people and upon which a conviction was sought, we proceed to a consideration of appellant's points in the order of their presentation.

[2, 3] The evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the body was that of Wilfred Hey. The fact that the corpse was found at a spot not more than an hour's ride by automobile from the place where Hey was last seen alive, the fact that the body was that of a man of about the same size and weight as Hey, having the same colored hair and clothed with outer garments of substantially the same general color as those worn by Hey when he was seen at Silver Lake, and that there was found in one of the pockets a ferry ticket entitling the holder to passage between Windsor and Detroit—the city where Hey had lived for some three or four months before embarking upon his fateful adventure—are pregnant circumstances, to say the least. It may be that they alone would not suffice to justify the jury in finding that the body was that of Wilfred Hey. But when to these circumstances we add the further fact that there was found in the vest pocket of the deceased the form of telegram which the president of the Security State Bank at Ogden had made out and delivered to Hey but a few weeks previously, the conclusion that the body was that of Wilfred Hey becomes well-nigh irresistible. But this is not all. In addition to these damning circumstances we have appellant's incriminating conduct after the disappearance of his traveling companion. His brazen effrontery in boldly representing himself as Wilfred Hey when he secured from the Bank of Italy the proceeds of the British war bonds clearly indicates an utter absence of that fear of detection which he must have felt did he not know that the body of the man he was impersonating lay rotting on the desert sands. In the light of these circumstances the determination of the jury is conclusive upon this court. People v. Peete, 54 Cal. App. 333, 347,

[4] There was sufficient evidence to justify the jury in finding that appellant was the slayer of Hey. He had been the dead man's traveling companion while the two were making their way across the continent with Los Angeles as their goal. He was the one who last was seen with the slain man at a small settlement not many miles from the spot on the vast stretch of uninhabited desert where the body was found. He had a mercenary and sordid motive for the commission of the crime, i. e., a desire to possess himself of the money to which his murdered companion was entitled. This motive was later exhibited by his false representation to the employees of the bank at Los Angeles that he was Wilfred Hey and that as such he was entitled to the proceeds from the sale of Hey's British war bonds. The confident assurance with which appellant enacted the imposter's rôle when posing as Wilfred Hey is explicable upon the theory that he was fully aware that the man whose name and character he was assuming could not rise up in any human tribunal and there call him to account for the money gained through his treachery and deceit. And then there is appellant's flat refusal to tell the sheriff when it was that he last saw the deceased. If appellant did not slay Hey he must have known who it was that did the deed, for it is a fair inference from all the circumstances in the case that he was with his companion when the latter was felled by the death-dealing blows. It does not seem reasonable, therefore, that appellant, if he were innocent, would have refused to tell what he knew of the whereabouts of his slain companion. The withholding of information, directly invited, upon a subject of such grave import and which so vitally concerned the welfare of the person with whom he had been so closely associated is a circumstance which betokens that fear of self-betrayal which grips the heart of one who knows himself as a blood-stained murderer. Who, if not appellant, was the person who so carefully covered the body with canvas and secreted it behind the bushes 92 feet from the highway? He was the person who last was seen with the unfortunate victim of the murderous assault, and he must have had some knowledge of what had befallen the man who for so long a time had been his boon companion.

The circumstances which we have recited point so directly to appellant as the guilty agent who was responsible for Hey's untimely taking off that we do not hesitate to hold the evidence sufficient to justify the verdict. It of course is possible that appellant did not murder Hey. But, as was said in Ausmus v. People, supra:

"* * * Until the faculties of man are unfolded and expanded so that all things are known, we must act on circumstances as they appear, logical deductions made and presumptive proof, or leave the worst crimes unpunished."

[5, 6] The venue was proved as laid. The remains were found at a place which is many miles from any one of the exterior boundaries of San Bernardino county. The pools of blood in the immediate vicinity of the body show that the slaying occurred not far from the spot where the corpse was discovered. The evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding the homicide to be murder in the first degree. The circumstances all indicate that the deceased was willfully and brutally slain for his money. There was no evidence of a combat or of a struggle. No circumstances of mitigation, justification, or excuse were shown. Two crushing blows on the head with a deadly weapon—some blunt instrument sufficiently hard and heavy to produce such lethal wounds—had evidently ended the life of Wilfred Hey. From the character of the weapon used, the nature of the wounds inflicted, and the acts and conduct of appellant subsequent to the slaying, the jury had the right to infer that it was willful murder, done with the fell purpose of acquiring the proceeds of the dead man's British war bonds by subsequently resorting to that form of deception which appellant later did practice upon the bank in Los Angeles. So inferring, the jury was warranted in returning a verdict of murder in the first degree. People v. Mahatch, 148 Cal. 200, 203, 82 P. 779; People v. Machuca, 158 Cal. 62, 109 P. 886; *People v. [7] No error was committed in permitting the deputy coroner, who was present when the strands of hair were found near the body of the deceased, to testify that, in his opinion, the hair was that of a human being. The district attorney asked the witness this question: "Could you tell whether or not it was human hair you saw there?" Defendant's counsel objected to the question upon the ground that it called for the opinion of one not shown to be an expert. The question was not answered. It seems that the district attorney, when arguing against the validity of the objection, stated to the court, in substance and effect, that his question did not call for the opinion of the witness, but that it merely asked him whether he was able to say that the hair was or was not from the head of a human being; and then, without waiting for the witness to give an answer, the prosecutor propounded another question as follows: "Do you know whether that was human hair?" To this question no objection was interposed. The witness answered by saying, in substance and effect, that he did know whether it was human hair. Then, in response to another question put to him by the district attorney, he testified that the hair which he saw was human hair. The two questions which preceded the one last mentioned had been propounded for the purpose of ascertaining whether the witness possessed that knowledge which would qualify him to testify as an expert to the character of the hair. The objection that he was not shown to be qualified should have been interposed to the last question—the one which asked him whether it was human hair. The preceding questions were of a preliminary character, and the only one to which objection was made went unanswered.

[8] There was no error in admitting in evidence a map of San Bernardino county. It was used in connection with the testimony of certain witnesses for the purpose of representing the relative location of the places testified to by them. It is proper for courts to admit in evidence illustrative charts and maps. Foley v. Northern California, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 107, 130 P. 1183; 22 C. J. 910. The map was a public document. It was a part of the files in the office of the county surveyor. A published map, made by persons indifferent between the parties, is prima facie evidence of facts of general notoriety and interest. Section 1936, Code Civ. Proc.

[9-11] No error was committed in admitting Exhibits 17, 18, and 20 in evidence. Exhibit 17 was the telegram from the Rock Springs bank to the Detroit bank, sent from Rock Springs, Wyo., on November 7, 1924. It reads: "Is check on Wilfred Hey for ten dollars good." Exhibit 18 is a copy of the telegram which the Detroit bank sent in reply to the telegraphic inquiry of the Rock Springs bank. The original of this reply was not in California at the time of the trial. Exhibit 20 was the telegram sent by Hey to the Detroit bank from Ogden on November 10, 1924. It reads: "Telegraph Security State Bank Ogden Utah balance in my account. Waive identification. Wilfred Hey." The only grounds of objection made in the lower court were these: Exhibit 17 was objected to on the ground that it was incompetent and irrelevant, Exhibit 18 on the ground that it was incompetent, and in presenting his objection to Exhibit 20 defendant's counsel merely said: "Same objection, your honor, as to the other telegram." None of these documents was objectionable upon the ground of irrelevancy. Any competent evidence which tended to show that Hey was journeying westward from Detroit toward the place where he was last seen alive was relevant and material. These telegrams, showing as they do that Hey was in Rock Springs on November 7th and that three days later he was in Ogden, tended to substantiate the theory that at the times when they were sent he was on his way from Detroit to the western side of the continent—that he was journeying in a direction which would bring him to the place where the dead body was found. Nor was the other ground of objection, incompetency, sufficient reason for the exclusion of these exhibits. In support of this objection it is claimed here that no foundation was laid for the introduction of the telegrams. It is well established that where the trial court has overruled a general objection to the admission of evidence, i. e., an objection that it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, the party against whom the ruling was made will not be permitted to urge in the appellate court a particular objection which could have been readily cured had it been openly urged in the trial court. People v. Louie Foo, 112 Cal. 17, 22, 44 P. 453; People v. Baird, 105 Cal. 126, 38 P. 633. In People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, this court held that a general objection to offered testimony that it is irrelevant and incompetent is not sufficient if the real ground of the objection is that no proper foundation has been laid for its introduction.

[12] The curtailment of defendant's cross-examination of the witness Harrod is not reversible error. It will be recalled that this witness testified that he saw defendant at Silver Lake on the evening of November 25, 1924. This was on his direct examination. On cross-examination Harrod testified that he did not see defendant again until March or April of 1925, when he saw him in a cell in the county jail at San Bernardino, that when he saw defendant in his cell he recognized him, and that no one pointed him out. The witness was then asked this question by defendant's counsel:

"Will you state that you did not testify at the preliminary hearing that you went up in the cell, and a man said, 'There he is,' and you turned around at this preliminary hearing and pointed out Fred Weaver as the man that pointed out Watts to you?"

[13] The court sustained an objection to the question upon the ground that it was not the proper way to impeach the witness. Impeachment was not necessarily the purpose of the question. Only as the witness answered might questions by way of direct impeachment have followed. The ruling was an improper restriction upon the right of cross-examination. People v. Jones, 160 Cal. 358, 365, 117 P. 176; People v. Hart, 153 Cal. 261, 266, 94 P. 1042. However, a survey of the entire record compels the conclusion that the error has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, and that it is a case for the application of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. Even if the question had been permitted and the witness had given it an affirmative answer, it is inconceivable that the jury could have rejected as incredible Harrod's positive testimony that he saw the defendant and Hey at Silver Lake. Harrod's testimony, like that of all the other witnesses for the prosecution, was not contradicted in any particular whatever. If, after having had his memory refreshed by the question asked of him on cross-examination, Harrod had admitted that at the preliminary examination he did testify that defendant was pointed out to him when he saw the latter in his cell, that fact would not necessarily have been inconsistent with the witness' testimony that he recognized defendant when he saw him in the cell. Had witnesses on behalf of the defendant been produced, and had they given testimony contradicting Harrod's testimony that he saw defendant with Hey at Silver Lake, an affirmative answer by Harrod to the question ruled out by the trial court might possibly have had sufficient weight to tip the scales in favor of the testimony of such opposing witnesses. But in the absence of any such contradictory testimony we do not perceive how appellant could possibly have been prejudiced by the court's ruling. Since the adoption of section 4½ it no longer is the rule in this state that injury is presumed from error. Before the reversal of a judgment of conviction may be had it must affirmatively appear to the satisfaction of this court, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, that the accused may well have been substantially injured by the error of which he complains. People v. Lapara, 181 Cal. 66, 72, 183 P. 545; People v. Mazzurco, 49 Cal. App. 275, 280, 193 P. 164. No such injury appears here.

[14] The court did not err in giving an instruction which, in effect, told the jurors that they should either find defendant guilty of murder in the first degree or acquit him of any offense whatever. After having carefully defined the crime of murder and each of the two degrees thereof, as well as manslaughter, and after having fully instructed the jury as to the essential elements of each of those offenses, the learned trial judge gave an instruction to the effect that the only degree of murder for the jurors to consider was murder in the first degree, and that they were not to consider any other degree of murder or manslaughter in their deliberations. In consonance with this instruction but three forms of verdict were handed to the jury, viz., murder in the first degree, murder in the first degree with the penalty of life imprisonment, and not guilty. Under the circumstances disclosed by all the evidence, the giving of the instruction was not error.

[15] In a criminal case instructions are always to be given with reference to the facts proved before the jury. Accordingly, it is the established rule that on the trial of a person charged with murder it is proper to refuse to give an instruction as to a lesser degree than that of murder in the first degree, or as to a lesser offense included within the crime charged, if the evidence is of such a nature as to warrant only a verdict of first degree murder, in the event that the accused is guilty at all. People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 482, 483, 126 P. 143; People v. Lapara, supra; People v. Byrnes, 30 Cal. 206; note to Bandy v. State, 21 A. L. R. 603 et seq. This rule does no violence to the constitutional inhibition against charging juries with respect to matters of fact. People v. Welch, 49 Cal. 174, 181. See, also, State v. Hopper, 71 Mo. 431.

In the cases cited by appellant (People v. Valencia, 43 Cal. 552; People v. Ah Lee, 60 Cal. 85, and People v. Chew Sing Wing, 88 Cal. 268, 25 P. 1099); the jury in effect was instructed that from the mere killing of the deceased the law presumes murder in the first degree. See People v. Bawden, 90 Cal. 197, 27 P. 204. Such an instruction obviously is erroneous, since it omits from the definition of murder in the first degree the essential elements of deliberation and premeditation. It is, of course, the peculiar province of the jury to say in each and every case whether the killing was perpetrated with that deliberation and premeditation which are necessary to constitute it murder of the first degree. There was no interference with that prerogative in the present case. Here the jurors were carefully and correctly advised by the court's instructions as to what constitutes murder in the first degree, and were told, in substance and effect, that, to justify a verdict of guilty, every essential element of the crime must be established beyond a reasonable doubt.

[16] The rule that the court need not charge with respect to a lower degree of murder or an included offense, where there is no evidence tending to show the commission of a lesser crime than murder in the first degree, is not confined to those specific homicidal acts particularly enumerated by the Legislature in its code definition of murder in the first degree, and which carry with them conclusive evidence of deliberation and premeditation. That is to say, the rule is not limited to cases where the killing was perpetrated by means of poison, lying in wait, etc., or where the slaying was committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate some one of the felonies enumerated in the statute, such as robbery, arson, etc. On the contrary, it extends to all cases where there is no evidence tending to show the commission of a lesser offense than murder in the first degree. In People v. Lapara, supra, this court sanctioned the application of the rule to a case, where the deceased was shot while driving a truck, and enmity was the apparent motive for the slaying. It may be, as is stated in substance by the Ohio court in Bandy v. State, supra (102 Ohio St. 384, 131 N. E. 499, 21 A. L. R. 594), that a refusal to charge upon the lesser degree should be the exception in those cases where the killing is not of the kind which the Legislature has taken upon itself the responsibility of saying shall be murder in the first degree, and that, conversely, the giving of a charge upon the lesser degree ordinarily would be the exception in those cases where the killing is of the kind which the Legislature has declared shall conclusively evidence deliberation and premeditation. But however this may be, we are satisfied that the rule is applicable to every case where there is no evidence tending to show the commission of a lesser offense than that of murder in the first degree.

[17] Nor is the rule confined to those cases where the evidence of the slaying is direct and positive. The mere fact that the evidence is circumstantial would not of itself require the trial court to charge on murder in the second degree. There are many cases which hold that, though there be no eyewitness to the killing and the evidence is entirely circumstantial, no instruction upon a lesser offense than that of murder in the first degree need be given where the circumstances disclosed by the evidence will not permit a reasonable inference that the defendant was guilty of a lesser grade of homicide. Monmouth v. State, 54 Tex. Cr. R. 407, 114 S. W. 114; Pearl v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 189, 63 S. W. 1013; State v. Grba, 196 Iowa, 241, 194 N. W. 250; Higgins v. Commonwealth, 142 Ky. 647, 134 S. W. 1135.

The instruction which was given in this case, limiting the jury to a verdict finding the accused guilty of the highest offense or not guilty of any crime whatever, was fully warranted by the facts disclosed by the evidence. The blows which caused the death were inflicted with a heavy, blunt instrument which, under the circumstances of its use, may well have been found to be a deadly weapon. There was, as we have said, nothing to show a struggle or a combat. On the contrary, the evidence shows that if the killing was done by defendant the deceased was put to death in furtherance of a base, mercenary motive. Under these circumstances we have no hesitancy in saying that if defendant was guilty of anything he was guilty of brutal and ruthless murder, done willfully, deliberately, and with premeditation. If there was a failure of proof as to any element necessary to the establishment of murder in the first degree, there was a like failure of proof as to any lesser grade of homicide. Either appellant is guilty of murder in the first degree or he is entirely innocent.

Moreover, even if the giving of the instruction were error, it could not have harmed appellant. As we have stated, the jurors, who were fully instructed as to the ingredients of the crime of murder in the first degree, were told in effect that if they were not satisfied that defendant was guilty of that offense they must acquit him altogether. It will be presumed that they heeded this instruction and performed their whole duty in accordance with it. If they were not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that appellant was guilty of first degree murder, under the instructions they would have acquitted him. The instruction therefore would not have justified a reversal even if it had been error to give it. People v. Lopez, 135 Cal. 25, 66 P. 965.

[18] There is no merit in the claim that the trial court erroneously instructed upon the weight of circumstantial evidence. The trial judge gave several long instructions dealing with the subject of circumstantial evidence. In one of them the jury was advised that no conviction could be had unless the people established beyond a reasonable doubt that the death of Hey was caused by homicidal means; by another the jury was told that a conviction could not be had unless the prosecution established beyond a reasonable doubt that the injuries causing the death were inflicted in San Bernardino county; and in still another instruction the court charged the jury that a verdict of guilty could not be returned unless the people had established beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is the person who committed the murder, if murder there was. In the course of these instructions the trial court told the jury, in substance and in effect, that though these ultimate facts—death by homicidal means, the infliction of the lethal injuries in San Bernardino county, and the identity of the defendant as the slayer—must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, still they need not be shown by direct evidence but “may be established as satisfactorily and as conclusively by circumstantial as by direct evidence.” This language did not carry an intimation to the jury that the court deemed that the evidence satisfactorily or conclusively established or tended to establish any of the issues in the case. The court’s statement that the facts referred to in the instructions might be established “as satisfactorily and as conclusively by circumstantial as by direct evidence,” when read in connection with the whole charge, amounted to no more than a statement that circumstantial evidence is legal and competent, and that if the jurors found it to be sufficient to prove defendant’s guilt beyond a reasonable doubt they might accept it and act upon it just as if it were direct evidence. So construed, the instructions state the law correctly. People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 331, 184 P. 389.

[19] No prejudicial error was committed in giving the instruction upon circumstantial evidence which substantially conforms with the one that was approved in People v. Morrow, 60 Cal. 142, and People v. Urquidas, 96 Cal. 239, 31 P. 52. The only portion of the instruction of which there can be any just criticism is the following: “There is nothing in the nature of circumstantial evidence that renders it any less reliable than any other class of evidence.” This language is more in the nature of an argument than a declaration of law, and it were better had it been omitted; but it is not prejudicially erroneous. People v. Wilder, 134 Cal. 182, 66 P. 228; People v. Howard, 135 Cal. 266, 67 P. 148; People v. Ung Sing, 171 Cal. 83, 151 P. 1145.

[20] The instruction upon the subject of “flight” was not harmful error. In substance it is such an instruction as was criticized in People v. Jones, supra. It failed to admonish the jury that the defendant must know that a crime has been perpetrated and that he is accused of its commission. This instruction, though frequently frowned upon by this court, never has been held to be ground for reversal, save in those cases where it appears that the defendant has been prejudiced by it. People v. Sainz, 162 Cal. 242, 121 P. 922; People v. Lee Nam Chin, 166 Cal. 570, 137 P. 917; People v. Erno, supra. No substantial injury appears here. In finding appellant guilty the jury necessarily must have found that the crime had been committed. And no other inference can reasonably be drawn from the evidence than that appellant knew that the crime had been perpetrated and that he would be charged with its commission. This being the case, we hold, for the reasons given in People v. Erno, supra, that the instruction was not prejudicially erroneous, although we again take occasion to say that it should never be given.

[21] There is no merit in the claim that the instructions assume the existence of certain incriminating circumstances. To support their contention in this regard, counsel have selected from the instructions on circumstantial evidence four or five detached passages. In the course of the instructions which charged the jury that it was incumbent upon the prosecution to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the body was that of Wilfred Hey, that the death was caused by homicidal means, that the injuries causing the death were inflicted in San Bernardino county, and that defendant is the person who murdered Hey, the trial court, after saying that each of these facts could be established by circumstantial evidence, told the jury, in substance and effect, that these major facts might be established by certain circumstances which the instructions specifically mentioned, if the circumstances so referred to by the court were established to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, and if the jurors were satisfied from such circumstances, to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, of the existence of such ultimate facts of identity, death by homicidal means, etc. This, in substance, is the purport of the instructions when the charge is considered as a whole. It is clear, therefore, that the instructions, when so considered, do not assume the existence of any of the circumstances mentioned in them.

[22] The court did not charge the jurors that they could take into consideration only such probative facts as were established beyond a reasonable doubt. In the course of the instructions to the effect that the identity of the dead body, death by homicidal means, etc., could be established by circumstantial evidence, the court advised the jurors that if they believed the specifically enumerated circumstances had been established beyond a reasonable doubt they could consider them, "together with all other facts and circumstances, if any, shown by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt." In criticism of the italicized part of this instruction, appellant says that, while it is necessary that the essential elements of the crime shall be established beyond a reasonable doubt, "it has never been the rule that only probative facts which are so established shall be considered by the jury." We find no merit in the point. The instructions, when considered in the light of the charge as a whole, could not have left the jury with the impression that in determining defendant's guilt or innocence they could take into consideration only such probative facts as were established to their satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt. In its instruction upon reasonable doubt the court was at pains to tell the jury that such a doubt "is that state of the case which, after an entire comparison and consideration of all the evidence, leaves the minds of the jurors in that condition that they cannot say they feel an abiding conviction to a moral certainty of the truth of the charge." In the instructions which are made the object of appellant's present attack, the trial judge was dealing with the subject of circumstantial evidence, which he correctly defined as "proof by testimony of a chain of circumstances pointing sufficiently strong to the commission of the crime by the defendant to warrant a conviction." In substance and effect, the instructions under attack simply told the jurors that it was for them to decide whether any particular circumstance, concerning which testimony had been given, was necessary to complete a chain of circumstances establishing to their satisfaction, beyond all reasonable doubt, the facts essential to guilt, and that, if they decided that such circumstance was a necessary link in such a chain, it must be proven beyond all reasonable doubt before they could act upon it. This is a correct declaration of the law. We know of no California case which states a different rule. It certainly is in accord with what is said in People v. Phipps, 39 Cal. 326, 333, People v. Ah Chung, 54 Cal. 398, People v. Ah Jake, 91 Cal. 98, 27 P. 595, and People v. Smith, 106 Cal. 73, 39 P. 40.

There is no merit in the claim that the court charged the jury that a particular fact or group of facts afforded sufficient proof of identity of the deceased, cause of death, etc. The learned trial judge was careful to advise the jury that, though the circumstances referred to in the instructions, if shown by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, might be taken into consideration, identification could be established only "if such evidence (i. e., the circumstances adverted to) is sufficient to convince the jury to a moral certainty as to the identity of the dead body." Nowhere in his charge did the trial judge undertake to tell the jury what should be the effect of any of the circumstances or chains of circumstance referred to hypothetically in the instructions. On the contrary, the jurors were specifically told, in each instance, that it was for them to determine, from all the circumstances established beyond a reasonable doubt, whether the identity of the body, cause of death by homicidal means, venue, etc., were or were not established beyond a reasonable doubt.

[23] There is no basis for the claim that the trial court charged that defendant could be found guilty of murder in the first degree without including in the charge the essential elements of deliberation and premeditation. From the body of those instructions which advised the jury that the identity of the deceased and death by homicidal means could be established by circumstantial evidence, appellant has wrenched the following detached passages: "* * * If you believe beyond a reasonable doubt that Wilfred Hey was unlawfully killed as alleged in the information, and * * * that defendant killed and murdered the said Wilfred Hey, as alleged in the information, then you will find the defendant guilty"; and, "If the jury further believe * * * beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant inflicted the wound or wounds, and thereby caused the death of Wilfred Hey, as alleged in the information, then you will find the defendant guilty"; also, "* * * If you believe * * * beyond a reasonable doubt that the dead body found was the body of Wilfred Hey, and that the defendant, at about the time and place alleged in the information, killed and murdered the said Hey, then you will find the defendant guilty as charged." It is claimed that, because the jury was instructed that the defendant, if guilty at all, could only be found guilty of murder in the first degree, these instructions are erroneous for the reason that they fail to state that the killing must be preceded by and be the result of the concurrence of deliberation and premeditation. In the two excerpts first above quoted the jurors were advised that they should return a verdict of guilty if they believed that the defendant murdered Hey and caused his death "as alleged in the information." The information charges that defendant murdered Hey "willfully * * * and with malice aforethought." The words "malice aforethought" are equivalent to an averment that the killing was committed with deliberation and premeditation. People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 661, 174 P. 892; Jolly v. Commonwealth, 110 Ky.

190, 61 S. W. 49, 96 Am. St. Rep. 429. When, therefore, the court told the jurors that they should find appellant guilty—which, under the charge, meant guilty of murder in the first degree—if they believed that he murdered Hey and caused his death as alleged in the information, it in effect told them that they should find him guilty if they believed, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he murdered Hey willfully and with deliberation and premeditation. If appellant desired an instruction defining the words of the information, "malice aforethought," he should have asked for it.

[24] From what we have said, It is clear that appellant was not prejudiced by either of the first two above-quoted excerpts from the court's instructions. Nor was he prejudiced by the third passage above quoted, even though it does omit the qualifying words "as alleged in the information." Before the court gave the instruction from which this excerpt is taken, it had carefully charged the jurors that to constitute murder in the first degree the killing must be preceded by and be the result of a concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer. They also were told that, to justify a conviction, every element of the crime must be established by the prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt. When, therefore, the jurors were told that they should return a verdict of guilty—i. e., guilty of murder in the first degree—if they believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant "murdered" Hey, they necessarily must have understood, as men of common understanding, that the court was referring to murder in the first degree, and that they could not return a verdict of guilty of that crime unless they believed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant murdered the slain man willfully, deliberately, and with premeditation. All the instructions, read and considered together as one charge, without straining the language, show a fair, harmonious, and correct statement of the law applicable to the facts of the case, and contain all the conditions and limitations which are omitted from the isolated excerpts selected by appellant for criticism. This has been held repeatedly to obviate such objections as are now made. People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 92; People v. Dennis, 39 Cal. 636; People v. Nelson, 56 Cal. 81; People v. Gray, 61 Cal. 182, 44 Am. Rep. 549; People v. Hurtado, 63 Cal. 288; People v. Tomlinson, 66 Cal. 346, 5 P. 509; People v. Clark, 84 Cal. 583, 24 P. 313.

We have examined the record with care, and we find no error which would justify a reversal.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

RAY WONG v. EARLE C. ANTHONY, Inc.
(Sac. 3715.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 29, 1926.)

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Ray Wong against Earle C. Anthony, Inc., for damages for malicious prosecution. From an order denying change of place of trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel M. Samter, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Geo. F. McNoble, Stanley M. Arndt, and Herbert C. Coblenz, all of Stockton, for respondent.

FINCH, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action in San Joaquin county to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution. The plaintiff alleges that the defendant caused a complaint to be filed in the police court of Sacramento, charging him with the crime of embezzlement; that a warrant of arrest was issued out of said court, and in obedience thereto the plaintiff was arrested in Stockton, and there placed in the county jail of San Joaquin county; that he was thereafter taken to Sacramento, and there imprisoned in the county jail of Sacramento county; that he was tried for the alleged crime in Sacramento county, and acquitted. The complaint alleges in appropriate language that the prosecution by defendant was malicious and without probable cause.

The defendant duly moved the court for a change of the place of trial to Los Angeles county, on the ground that its principal place of business is in that county, and not in San Joaquin county, and on the further ground that the alleged obligation or liability of the defendant did not arise in the latter county. The motion was supported by an affidavit to the effect that the defendant's principal place of business is, and at the time of the commencement of this action was, in Los Angeles county. The plaintiff introduced affidavits to the effect that, long prior to his arrest and at all times since, he has been a resident of Stockton, San Joaquin county. The court denied the motion, and the defendant has appealed.

[1, 2] Article 12, § 16, of the Constitution provides:

"A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs; or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases."

"This provision applies to torts as well as to matters of contract." Tingley v. Times-Mirror Co., 144 Cal. 205, 115 P. 318. It applies to the place of trial, and not merely to the place where an action may be commenced. Cook v. Ray Manufacturing Co., 159 Cal. 694, 696; Raphael v. People's Bank of Benicia, 45 Cal. App. 115, 116, 187 P. 53. Appellant does not contest the foregoing statements of the law applicable to the case, but contends that "it is the instituting of the criminal proceedings which lays the foundation for the subsequent action in malicious prosecution," and that therefore the suit was improperly brought in San Joaquin county, citing Hubbard v. Lord, 59 Tex. 384. That was a suit for malicious prosecution of a criminal action. The decision is based upon statutory provisions essentially different from ours. The court said:

"It is urged that the case comes within the eighth exception to article 1198 of the Revised Statutes. That exception provides that, when the foundation of the suit is some crime or offense or trespass, for which a civil action in damages may lie, suit may be brought in the county where such crime, offense or trespass was committed. By article 273 of our Criminal Code [Pen. Code 1879], it is made an offense to institute a criminal prosecution against any person for the purpose of vexing, harassing, or injuring him. The offense consists in instituting the prosecution, or causing it to be instituted. In this case, the criminal prosecution was commenced or instituted * * * in De Witt county. The arrest in Wilson county was not the institution of the prosecution, and hence the offense was not committed by making it, but was complete when the preliminary steps, including the issuance of the warrant, had been taken."

[3-8] The term "prosecution" is sufficiently comprehensive to include every step in an action from its commencement to its final determination. 32 Cyc. 727. "The reason for the action for malicious prosecution does not lie solely in the danger of punishment but in the disgraceful imputation, the injury caused by the arrest, and the inconvenience and expense incident to defending the proceedings." 16 Cal. Jur. 732; Harrington v. Tippet, 143 Cal. 78, 80, 76 P. 816; Cochran v. Bones, 1 Cal. App. 729, 732, 82 P. 970. In such an action, damages may be recovered for "loss of time, deprivation of liberty, * * * injury to fame, reputation, character, * * * mental suffering, general impairment of social and mercantile standing, injury to credit, * * * and all losses sustained to plain-tiff's business as the direct and natural result of the proceedings complained of." 33 C. J. 446. "The general rule of law is that whoever does an illegal or wrongful act is answerable for all the consequences that ensue in the ordinary and natural course of events, though those consequences be immediately brought about by intervening agents, provided such agents were set in motion by the primary wrongdoer, or provided those acts causing the damage were the necessary or legal and natural consequence of the wrongful act." Filer v. Smith, 96 Mich. 347, 55 N. W. 999, 35 Am. St. Rep. 603; Burke v. Watts, 188 Cal. 118, 128, 204 P. 578.

Since the defendant is liable, if at all, for the damage caused by every step regularly taken in the prosecution of the plaintiff, it is liable for the injury naturally resulting from the arrest and imprisonment of plaintiff in San Joaquin county. That liability, which is a part of the cause of action, arose in San Joaquin county. "Provision is sometimes made by statute that a suit shall be brought in the county wherein the cause of action arose. Under such a statute, it is not necessary that an injury for which suit is brought should have wholly occurred within the county in which suit is brought." 27 R. C. L. 805; Southern Ry. Co. v. Harrington, 166 Ala. 630, 52 So. 57, 139 Am. St. Rep. 59; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Powell, 127 Ga. 805, 56 S. E. 1006, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 769, 9 Ann. Cas. 553. In Evans v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co., 77 S. W. 708, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 1258, the plaintiff sued the defendant corporation in Greenup county for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment. The complaint alleged that the plaintiff was arrested in Mason county, and carried under arrest through Greenup county and into Bath county. Section 72 of the Civil Code of Practice of Kentucky provided that an action against a corporation for a tort might be brought in the county where the tort was committed. Other sections provided that actions for injury to the person of the plaintiff or his character might be brought in the county in which the injury was done. The court said:

"It matters not which of these sections of the Code is applicable to the case at bar. * * * Appellant's cause of action was for damages for the injuries alleged to have been done or inflicted upon him by appellees. The county in which the injury was inflicted did not affect his cause of action, but only affected the venue thereof. * * * It was one continued transaction. For this injury, if any, appellant has a cause of action, and he had the right to elect in which county he would institute it."

See, also, Santoro v. Trimble, 63 App. Div. 413, 71 N. Y. S. 785; Ellis v. Baker, 62 App. Div. 542, 71 N. Y. S. 88; Osborn v. Stephens, 74 Hun, 91, 26 N. Y. S. 160; Vennum v. Huston, 38 Neb. 293, 56 N. W. 970.

Generally the principal injury resulting from the malicious prosecution of a criminal action is to the feelings and reputation of the defendant therein, caused by the accusation and his arrest and imprisonment thereunder. In this respect the grounds for recovery are the same as for libel. Such injury is naturally greatest in the county wherein the defendant resides and is engaged in business. In Tingley v. Times-Mirror Co., 144 Cal. 205, 206, 77 P. 918, 919, the plaintiff, who resided in San Diego county, brought an action for libel in that county against the defendant, a corporation having its principal place of business in Los Angeles county. It was contended that "the wrong complained of consisted in printing, publishing and distributing the alleged libelous articles, which * * * was done in Los Angeles." The court said:

"The liability arises where the injury occurs, and the injury in the case of libel is peculiarly at the county in which the plaintiff resides, if, as is alleged, the plaintiff has published and circulated the libelous article there, and there it is that plaintiff is most injured by the publication. * * * In our opinion, libel may be maintained in the county in which the plaintiff resides, when the newspaper is circulated in that county, though published in another county, which latter is the principal place where defendant's business is located."

The principle announced in that case is equally applicable in this. Undoubtedly liability in that case arose first in Los Angeles county, where the newspaper containing the libelous article was printed and published, if the plaintiff was injured by its publication therein, but she was most injured by its publication in the county of her residence. The constitutional provision is that a corporation may be sued in the county "where the * * * liability arises," not necessarily where liability first arises. For the purposes of this discussion it may be conceded that liability in this case, if any, arose first in Sacramento county, just as in the Tingley Case it arose first in Los Angeles county; but the injury "is peculiarly at the county in which the plaintiff resides" and in which he was arrested and imprisoned. The fact that the defendant did not directly do anything in San Joaquin county of which complaint is made is wholly immaterial. The arrest and imprisonment in that county were the natural consequences of the accusation, ensuing in the regular course of the proceeding which the defendant set in motion.

The order denying a change of the place of trial is affirmed.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. HUNT, Los Angeles County Treasurer. (L. A. 9063.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1926, as Modified July 9, 1926.)

1. Constitutional law ⚡290(3)—Counties ⚡22—Acquisition and Improvement Act held to provide for sufficient notice to affected property owners, though indefinite as to period of publication of notice of intention (Acquisition and Improvement Act 1925 [St. 1925, p. 849] Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

Acquisition and Improvement Act of 1925 held to provide for sufficient notice to affected property owners to satisfy due process requirement, though the act was indefinite in relation to period of time required for publication of resolution of intention prior to date for first hearing at which property owners might appear.

2. Constitutional law ⚡60.

Acquisition and Improvement Act (St. 1925, p. 849), held not invalid because it delegated to subordinate legislative body function of fixing limits of assessment district and amount of assessments.

3. Constitutional law ⚡290(3)—Acquisition and Improvement Act held not violative of due process clause by reason of time provided for hearing of protesting property owners (St. 1925, p. 849).

Acquisition and Improvement Act is not violative of due process clause, though hearing for protesting property owners therein provided for is to take place in advance of doing of any work or awarding of any contract, in view of provisions and estimates before such meeting, of cost of work and proportionate share of burden to be imposed on particular zones.

4. Eminent domain ⚡71—Provisions of Acquisition and Improvement Act for raising of money to be deposited to obtain immediate possession of lands, subject of condemnation proceedings, held not contrary to intent or spirit of Constitution (Acquisition and Improvement Act, §§ 28-37 [St. 1925, pp. 876-886; Const. art. 1, § 14, as amended in 1918]).

Acquisition and Improvement Act, particularly sections 28-37, providing for issuance and sale of bonds against lands of district for purpose of raising money required to be deposited in order to obtain immediate possession of other lands, subject of pending condemnation proceedings, and providing further for notice and hearing of question of issuance of such bonds, held not contrary to spirit and intention of Const. art. 1, § 14, as amended in 1918.

5. Counties ⚡20.

Acquisition and Improvement Act (St. 1925, p. 849) must be interpreted liberally to effect beneficent public purpose contemplated.

6. Counties ⚡20—Statutes ⚡76(2).

Acquisition and Improvement Act (St. 1925, p. 855), § 5, authorizing exemption from assessment of lands belonging to certain public bodies, held not violative of Const. art. 1, § 2, or article 4, § 25, subd. 33.

7. Taxation ⚡25.

Legislature for public improvement may impose such burdens on property of public agencies as to it may seem just, and such agencies have no private or proprietary interest therein as against state.

8. Constitutional law ⚡48.

Every intendment is in favor of validity of legislative classification, and its classification will not be disturbed, unless it is palpably arbitrary.

9. Counties ⚡20½.

Acquisition and Improvement Act (St. 1925, p. 849), though it authorizes the county of Los Angeles to conduct work within city of Los Angeles, is not violative of Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8, or of provisions of charter of city of Los Angeles.

Application by the County of Los Angeles for writ of mandamus to be directed against John N. Hunt, County Treasurer of the County of Los Angeles, to compel him to sign and issue certain improvement bonds. Writ granted.

Edward T. Bishop, County Counsel, and Everett W. Mattoon, Chief Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner and plaintiff.

H. W. O'Melveny, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

Arthur M. Ellis, of Los Angeles, for defendant.

RICHARDS, J. The application herein is for a writ of mandate whereby the petitioner seeks to compel the respondent, as treasurer of the county of Los Angeles, to sign and issue certain bonds which had been ordered to be issued by the board of supervisors of said county under the provisions of an act of the Legislature known as the "Acquisition and Improvement Act of 1925" (Stats. 1925, p. 849), and under section 28 of said act. The questions presented upon said application and upon the demurrer of the respondent to the sufficiency thereof involve primarily the constitutionality of said act, and, secondarily, certain alleged irregularities of procedure thereunder appearing upon the face of said application, but which do not affect the validity of the act itself. An examination of the aforesaid act of 1925 discloses that the controlling purpose of those who framed it and of the Legislature in its adoption was to provide a simplified plan, and at the same time a comprehensive procedure for the acquisition and improvement of public ways, parks, and pleasure grounds, whether lying entirely within unincorporated territory of a county or within the territory of a municipality, or lying partly within such unincorporated territory and partly within one or more municipalities, or lying within two or more municipalities, or forming the exterior boundary of any municipality where the same joins unincorporated territory of a county or the territory of another municipality whether partly within or without such boundary, and for the payment of the costs and expenses of such acquisition and work of improvement and the issuance and payment of bonds therefor, and for such other purposes as may be necessary to carry into effect the main purposes and provisions of said act. It is asserted by the petitioner, and is not denied or questioned by the respondent, that the object of this act is to embrace and combine within its provisions and procedure the accomplishment of all of the various things relating to the acquisition and improvement of public ways, parks, and pleasure grounds, the accomplishment of which has heretofore been committed to a number of earlier statutory enactments, such as the Vrooman Act (Stats. 1885, p. 147) and its several amendments, the Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730), the Municipal District Improvement Act (Stats. 1915, p. 99), the City Boundary Street Act (Stats. 1911, p. 1018), the Road District Improvement Act (Stats. 1907, p. 806), the Drainage District Improvement Act (Stats. 1919, p. 731), the Street Opening Act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 70), the Opening and Widening Act of 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 376), the County Street Opening Act of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 308), and possibly certain other and earlier enactments. The provisions of the act, in so far as they come under review in this proceeding, may be briefly summarized as follows: Section 1 thereof purports to confer jurisdiction upon the several legislative bodies of those political subdivisions wherein public improvements of the kind above indicated are contemplated, with power to proceed according to the method provided in subsequent provisions of the act. Section 2 thereof provides that, whenever public convenience may require the acquisition or improvement, or both the acquisition and improvement, of the aforesaid public ways or properties, the legislative body of the political subdivision wherein the same are situate may order the said acquisition or improvement thereof, or, if both the acquisition and improvement are desired, may provide by such order that both may be included and consummated in a single proceeding, and that public ways already acquired, as well as the whole or any portion of such as are to be acquired under such proceeding, may be improved under such single proceeding, and that, in the course of such acquisition or improvement or both, authority, power, and jurisdiction are given to the legislative body or bodies thus proceeding to make the same to issue, sell, and dispose of bonds representing the costs and expenses of such acquisition and improvement, and to provide the funds for the payment of such bonds through the levy and collection of assessment taxes upon such districts and the property therein as may be established or in said act subsequently provided for as being affected by such improvement. The section proceeds at some length and with much detail to provide that the legislative body of a county shall have jurisdiction to acquire and improve public ways within the boundaries of such county, and in cases where such acquisition or improvement as thus contemplated includes or extends over, or connects with, or renders of greater use to the public, any public way or ways lying partly within such unincorporated territory of the county, and partly within one or more municipalities, the consent of the municipal bodies of such municipality or municipalities shall first be obtained thereto, and to the assessment of the property therein to be benefited thereby, the intent and meaning of this provision in said act being that the necessary jurisdiction and power for the consummation of such acquisitions and improvements shall be vested in, and that the proceedings therefor as provided in said act may be had and taken by, the legislative body either of the county or of any of such municipalities, the public interest and convenience of which is affected thereby, and that each of such legislative bodies shall have concurrent jurisdiction to initiate such proceedings, provided that the legislative body initiating the proceedings and adopting the resolution of intention therefor as in said act provided shall thereafter have exclusive jurisdiction of such proceeding or proceedings and of the acquisitions and improvements comprehended therein and to be consummated thereby. Section 3 of said act proceeds to define in detail the power and authority of the legislative body thus initiating and conducting such proceedings, which include the appointment of engineers and superintendents of work and of competent persons for the preparing and furnishing of such specifications, as is later in detail provided for in said act, and of attorneys and of such other persons as may be required during the progress of such work, and to provide for the compensation of such officers and employés. Section 4 of said act provides for the designation of a county or municipal officer or some other competent person to prepare and furnish specifications for the proposed acquisition or improvement or both of such properties as the legislative body initiating such proceeding or proceedings may desire to acquire or improve, and provides what such specifications shall include. The order, therefore, is to precede the resolution of intention to make such acquisitions and improvements, which said resolution is included in the terms of the succeeding section of said act. Section five of said act provides that, before ordering any such acquisitions or improvements or both, authorized by the terms of the act, the legislative body which initiates and is to conduct the proceedings shall adopt a resolution of intention so to do, which resolution shall refer to the public way acquired or improved or both, by its lawful or official name, or by the name by which it is commonly known, or, if the same is yet to be acquired, by a name by which the same is to be called upon its acquisition, which name is thereby fixed and established, and shall also briefly describe such public way or right of way, and, in case of acquisition, such resolution shall describe the property necessary or convenient to be taken therefor. It shall be determined in said resolution that the public interest and necessity require the acquisition of such public way or right of way and of the property necessary to be taken therefor; and in case of its improvement said resolution shall also determine that the public interest and necessity require such improvement as is set forth in the resolution, and shall briefly describe such improvement so as to state in general terms the class or kind of work contemplated, such as grading, paving, sewerage, or other work of improvement, and give in general the location of the proposed improvement, and refer to the plans and specifications therefor for a full and detailed description and location of such improvement and the grades to which said improvement is to be constructed. Said resolution shall specifically direct the notice of all persons affected by such improvement or improvements to the same and to the provisions of said act relating to grades, and shall also, in cases where the construction of the proposed improvement will result in a substantial change, considering existing physical conditions, with respect to the elevation of any abutting property to any public way as it will exist when thus improved to grade, particularly direct the attention of such owners of abutting properties to the fact of such substantial change in the elevation of their such properties in relation to such public way as it will exist when thus improved. If both acquisition and improvement are contemplated in the same proceeding, one resolution of intention shall be sufficient for both purposes.

The resolution of intention shall also contain a description of the district of the lands to be benefited by such proposed acquisition or improvement or both, which shall be known thereafter and be referred to in said act as "the assessment district." The description of the assessment district may be in general terms, referring to a plat or map approved by the legislative body conducting the proceeding, which shall be on file in the office of the clerk of such legislative body at the time of the adoption of such resolution of intention, and which shall indicate by a boundary line the extent of the territory to be included in the proposed assessment district, which said plat shall govern for all details as to the extent thereof. Said resolution shall also contain a statement that, for the expenses of the things therein proposed to be done, bonds will be issued for the full amount of the same, excepting the amount, if any, to be contributed thereto by the county or municipality in money or by the furnishing of materials therefor, said bonds to be specifically described therein as to the interest thereon and time of payment thereof, and as to the aggregate principal of said bonds and the time or times within which such bonds are to be redeemed, and the annual payments thereon to be made in the course of such redemption, and that a special fund shall be constituted for the payment of said bonds by the levy of special assessment taxes upon the lands within the assessment district, in accordance with the provisions of said act. Said section further provides for the exemption from such special assessment taxes of certain lands such as those belonging to the United States or the state of California or its political subdivisions or educational, penal, or other public institutions as are particularly set forth in the resolution of intention as thus to be exempted from such special assessment tax. It is further provided in said section of the act that, if, in the judgment of the legislative body conducting such proceeding varying benefits are to be derived from the different parcels of land lying within such assessment district, it may provide that the said district be divided into zones, according to benefits, such zones to be as many in number as may be deemed necessary so as to include in each zone lands within the district which will be benefited in like measure. Such legislative body shall also determine the percentage of the sum to be raised each year from such special assessment taxes which will be raised from the lands in each zone. These zones shall be designated by letters or numbers to be plainly shown upon the map or plat of the assessment district, and shall be referred to in the resolution of intention either by separate boundaries or by coloring or other convenient and graphic method, so that all persons interested may with accuracy ascertain within which zone any parcel of land is located.

It shall be sufficient in the resolution of intention in case of the division of the assessment district into such zones to refer to said plat or map for the boundaries and all details concerning the same. Said section further provides that said resolution of intention shall contain a notice of a day, hour, and place to be fixed therein when and where any and all persons having any objections to the proposed acquisition or improvement, or both, to the proposed grades to which such improvement is to be constructed, to the extent of the assessment district, to the zones, if any, into which the same is to be divided, to the percentages of assessment taxes to be raised from each of said zones, or to any or all of the matters to be contained in said resolution of intention, shall appear and be heard before the legislative body conducting such proceeding. Said time shall be not less than 15, nor more than 60, days from the date of the adoption of such resolution, and shall be caused by the clerk of said legislative body to be published by at least two insertions. Section 6 of said act provides that the legislative body, having power by its resolution of intention to establish the grades to which any improvements provided for therein shall conform, shall also have power to modify or change such adopted grades at the hearing provided for in such resolution of intention either with or without the objections of property owners included within said assessment district, and the failure to make such objections shall be deemed to be a waiver on the part of such property owners of all objections to such grades as originally established, or as thus modified or changed, and a bar to all claims for damages therefor or to any action looking to the prevention of such work or improvement or to the recovery of damages on account thereof. Section 7 of said act provides for the determination by the legislative body conducting such proceedings as to what, if any, part of the expenses of the acquisition or improvement, or both, of the properties required for such public purpose shall be paid out of the treasury of the county or municipality, as the case may be, and that such payment may be made out of the general fund of such county or municipality or from any other fund available for such purpose. In the event that the proposed acquisition or improvement or both under such proceeding includes any acquisition or improvement or both within the territory of a county or of any municipality or municipalities for which the legislative body conducting such proceeding does not function, the legislative body of such county or municipality may determine that any part of the expense of such acquisition or improvement, or both, provided for in such proceeding, shall be paid out of its treasury, or that any materials purchased therefor shall be paid therefrom or from any of its funds available therefor, which determination shall be expressed by the resolution of such legislative body, and shall be transmitted to the legislative body conducting such proceeding, and shall thereby create a liability on the part of the county or municipality so resolving to furnish such proportion of such expenses or materials as are provided for therein. The resolution of intention of the legislative body conducting such proceeding shall set forth the fact that such expenses or materials or both are to be thus furnished and paid for. Section 8 of said act provides that, after the adoption of the resolution of intention, the superintendent of work shall cause to be posted along the line of the contemplated acquisition or improvement notices of adoption of said resolution, at specified distances, and which shall be conspicuously entitled "Notice of Improvement," and which shall contain certain specified facts relating to the adoption and contents of said resolution of intention. Said notices shall also contain a statement of the hour, day, and place when and where any and all persons having any objections to the proposed acquisition or improvement, or both, or to any of the matters contained in said resolution of intention, may appear before said legislative body and be heard. Said legislative body may also, if it deems advisable, direct the clerk thereof to mail copies of such notices to the owners or reputed owners of property within such assessment district, but the failure to do so shall not in any way affect the validity of such proceedings. Section 9 of said act provides for the procedure before such legislative body at the time set for hearing such objections as are provided for in the preceding section and for such hearing thereon. Section 10 of said act provides that at the conclusion of such hearing such legislative body, as a determination of all questions arising thereat, shall by resolution declare its finding thereon, embodying such changes or modifications as may be made as a result of such hearing as to the extent and boundaries of the assessment district or as to the zones, if any, in which the same is divided, or as to the percentage of the amount to be paid by each zone of the special assessment taxes for such work and in the grades therein provided for. If any such modifications or changes are thus made, the plat or map of the assessment district shall be so amended as to show such modifications and changes in the boundaries of said district or the zones thereof or of the percentages of cost to be raised from each zone or in the grades provided for in the resolution of intention; and the boundaries, zones, percentages, and grades as thus finally determined shall be established and prevail throughout all the later stages of such proceeding, including the issuance and final payment of the bonds therefor, and such finding and determination of such legislative body thereon shall be final and conclusive.

Sections 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15 of said act provide for proceeding with such work or acquisition or improvement, or both, for the issuance of notice and the receipt of bids therefor, for the conditions of such bidding and of the award or awards of contracts therefor, and for the publication of notice of such award or awards by the clerk of the legislative body making the same. Section 16 provides that at any time within 10 days from the date of the first publication of such notice any property owner or any other person interested in any parcel of land within the boundaries of the assessment district who claims that any of the previous acts or proceedings relating to such acquisition or improvement are irregular, defective, erroneous, faulty, or invalid for any reason, may file with the clerk a written notice specifying in what respects such proceedings are thus erroneous, irregular, or invalid; the intent of the section being that any person failing to file such notice shall be deemed to have waived such objections, and shall be estopped from thereafter raising the same. Sections 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21 of said act provide for the execution by the superintendent of work of the contract or contracts to the awardee or awardees of the same, for the contents of such contract or contracts, and for the bond or bonds to be given by the latter for the faithful performance of the same, and for the time and manner of the progress and completion of the work to be done under such contract or contracts, and for the procedure in event of the filing and enforcement of liens of mechanics, materialmen, or laborers on account of such work, and for the duties of the officers of the said legislative body in respect to the same and the satisfaction thereof. Section 22 of said act provides that, as soon as the work so provided for to be done has been done in good faith, and there shall have been filed with the clerk of the legislative body conducting such proceeding a declaration signed and verified by the superintendent of work, that such work has been completed, such legislative body shall thereupon fix a day and hour and place for and direct notice to be given of a hearing for the purpose of determining whether or not such work or improvement shall be accepted as having been completed according to such contract or contracts, and of furnishing an opportunity for all persons interested in, or affected by, such work or improvement, or feeling aggrieved by any act or determination done or made in the course of such proceeding, or claiming any irregularities therein or in the progress thereof, which such persons may still be entitled to urge, to appear and set forth their said claims. Such hearing shall be known as the final hearing upon the improvement, and the notice thereof shall be phrased and published as set forth in detail in said section. Section 23 of said act provides for the procedure upon such hearing, and upon any objections which may be presented and urged thereat. Section 24 provides that, when such hearing shall have been concluded said legislative body shall then determine whether such work has been substantially completed and performed, and whether the same shall be accepted and paid for as provided in said contract or contracts therefor, and in the manner provided by the previous resolutions and orders of such body. The section further provides that such legislative body may thereupon remedy and correct any error or informality in the proceedings, and revise and correct any act or determination relative thereto or to the work or improvement performed thereunder, and that all decisions and determinations of such legislative body had upon notice and hearing as aforesaid shall be final and conclusive upon all persons entitled to be heard during the progress of the proceedings as to any errors, informalities, irregularities, omissions, and defects therein, and that no assessment taxes levied or bonds issued or to be issued for such work or improvement shall be held invalid by any court for any such errors or irregularities or other defects where the resolution of intention has been actually published as in this act provided before such legislative body shall have ordered such work or improvement performed. The remaining sections of said act up to section 47 thereof relate to the issue and reissue of bonds on account of such work and improvement and the collection by suit or otherwise of the payment due thereon, and to the condemnation of such properties as may be required for the acquisition or improvement provided for in said act, and for the issuance of bonds to provide for the payment therefor in the course of such condemnation proceedings. Sections 47, 48, and 49 of said act refer to the procedure of such legislative body, and to the method and detail for the making of such publications of the orders, notices, and other proceedings thereof as have theretofore been provided for in said act. Section 50 of said act refers to the definition of the words, terms, and phrases used therein, while sections 51 and 52 have reference to the effect and interpretation to be given to the provisions of the act as a whole. Section 53 gives the title by which the act shall be known and designated as "Acquisition and Improvement Act of 1925."

[1] We have thus summarized at considerable length the provisions of this act in order to aid in clarifying the discussion of the objections which are urged to its validity. It is conceded by the respondent herein that the various steps and proceedings required by the terms of the act to be taken in the course of the proceedings providing for such acquisition and improvement and of the condemnation proceedings preliminary thereto, in the course of which the bond issue involved in this proceeding has been ordered, were regularly taken in conformity with the requirements of said act. His main objection goes to the procedure provided for in said act for imposing the burden of paying for the acquisitions or improvements or both, for which provision is attempted to be made therein, upon the property owners within the district to be affected by the acquisition or improvement. His first objection to that procedure seems to be that the act is indefinite in relation to the period of time required for the publication of the resolution of intention prior to the date fixed for the first hearing thereon at which property owners may appear and be heard as to their objections to the making or cost or details of the proposed acquisition or improvement or both. The respondent cites no authority in support of this particular objection, nor are we referred to any cases holding that in the statute itself the precise length of time required for notice to those interested in the particular proceeding must be specified. All that is apparently required is that such persons shall be given such reasonable notice in the manner provided by the statute as to enable them to appear at the designated place and time of the hearing to make their objections, if any, to the acquisition or improvement contemplated in the resolution of intention, or to the form or substance of the resolution. Section 5 of the act in question provides that the time of such hearing shall be not less than 15, nor more than 60, days from the date of the adoption of such resolution, and that notice thereof shall be given by publication. Section 8 of the act provides also for posting notices of the adoption of the resolution, which may consist of printed copies thereof stating the day, hour, and place when and where such hearing is to be had and such objections, if any, considered. The statute evidently contemplates that these notices by both publication and posting shall be given by the clerk immediately upon the adoption of the resolution. In the instant case it is conceded that such notices were given on the day following the adoption of the resolution, viz, on November 9, 1925, and that the date of hearing was therein noticed for November 23, 1925. We are of the opinion that the statutory provisions for notice are adequate to satisfy the requirements of due process of law, and that the legislative body in question acquired by the notices actually given jurisdiction to proceed. Tarpey v. McClure, 190 Cal. 593, 213 P. 983; Huntley v. Board of Trustees, 165 Cal. 298, 131 P. 859.

[2] The next contention of the respondent is as to the mode of fixing the amount of assessments provided for in section 10 of the act. The gravamen of the respondent's contention seems to be that, while the Legislature itself might in the body of its act have laid down the rule for fixing the limits of the assessment district and the mode of arriving at the amount of the assessment, it could not delegate these functions to a subordinate legislative body as it has undertaken to do in this act. While it may be true that in the Road District Act of 1907 the former method was pursued, we are not pointed to any authority which holds that the latter method may not be availed of, provided the principles governing due process of law are adhered to. In the case of Thomas v. Pridham, 171 Cal. 98, 153 P. 933, wherein the provisions and validity of the Road District Improvement Act of 1907 were the subject of review, it being contended in that case that the said act was unconstitutional in permitting assessments of property within the districts to be formed under it to be made ad valorem instead of as to benefits, this court, however, basing its decision upon the very early case of Emery v. San Francisco Gas Co., 28 Cal. 372, as approved in the case of In re Madera

Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 325, 28 P. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106, and also upon the reasoning of the Supreme Court of the United States in Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 176, 17 S. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369, held that the Legislature was authorized to apportion the amount of money to be raised in order to meet the expenses of the improvement according to either the ad valorem or assessment according to benefits plan, or to adopt any principle of apportionment which might be devised under the sovereign power of taxation. In Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, supra, it was said, as quoted in Thomas v. Pridham, supra:

"Assume that the only theory of these assessments for local improvements upon which they can stand is that they are imposed on account of the benefits received, and that no land ought in justice to be assessed for a greater sum than the benefits received by it, yet it is plain that the fact of the amount of benefits is not susceptible of that accurate determination which appertains to a demonstration in geometry. Some means of arriving at this amount must be used, and the same method may be more or less accurate in different cases involving different facts. Some choice is to be made, and where the fact of some benefit accruing to all the lands has been legally found, can it be that the adoption of an ad valorem method of assessing the lands is to be held a violation of the federal Constitution? It seems to us clearly not. It is one of these matters of detail in arriving at the proper and fair amount and proportion of the tax that is to be levied on the land with regard to the benefits it has received, which is open to the discretion of the state legislature, and with which this court ought to have nothing to do. The way of arriving at the amount may be in some instances inequitable and unequal, but that is far from rising to the level of a constitutional problem and far from a case of taking property without due process of law."

If, as above stated, the matter of arriving at the proper basis of assessment is a mere matter of detail open to the discretion of the state Legislature itself, we can perceive no reason why it might not commit such discretion to local legislative bodies possessed with knowledge of the identical local situation and invested with power to proceed with the needed improvement.

[3] The chief objection which the respondent appears to make to the procedure provided in section 10 of this act, wherein the local legislative body is invested with power upon the hearing provided for in the preceding sections thereof, to determine the extent and boundaries of the assessment district, and to finally fix the zones into which such district is to be divided for purposes of assessment and the percentages to be raised therefrom, and establish the grades for the contemplated improvement, is that upon such hearing in advance of the doing of any actual work of improvement or of the awarding of any contract or contracts therefor it would be impossible for either the legislative body or the protesting property owner to know what burden each particular piece of property was to bear, and that, by the time the facts were ascertained by the actual completion of the work under contemplation, the time of the property owner to make an intelligent objection thereto would have long since expired. It is argued, therefore, that the requirements of due process of law are not complied with by such preliminary hearing and by the merely speculative determinations of the legislative body thereat. It is to be remembered, however, that the provisions of the act in its earlier sections contemplate the careful preparation of plans and specifications of the improvement to be entered upon, embracing and delineating the boundaries of the assessment district and the various zones thereof, and the grades upon the basis of which the work is to be done, the estimated cost of such work, the approximate portion of the burden of expense which shall be laid upon each particular zone, and the basis of the assessment taxes to be imposed for the purpose of meeting such burden. In its foregoing provisions the act in question follows generally, though more liberally, the similar plan provided for in the Road District Improvement Act of 1907, which was expressly upheld by this court in the case of Thomas v. Pridham, supra, and in which the Supreme Court of this state, both upon the main hearing and upon the rehearing, determined amounted to due process of law. The decision in that case has been followed in Dillingham v. Welch, 179 Cal. 656, 178 P. 512, and Swall v. Los Angeles County, 42 Cal. App. 758, 184 P. 406. That the plan of subdividing assessment districts into subdistricts or zones for the purpose of equitably distributing the burdens of the assessment has also been adopted and approved in other jurisdictions. See Embree v. Kansas City Road District, 240 U. S. 242, 36 S. Ct. 317, 60 L. Ed. 624; City of Denver v. Kennedy, 33 Colo. 80, 80 P. 122, 467. We are therefore of the opinion that section 10 of said act, providing for the determination of the matters to be inquired into at the hearing held in accordance therewith and with the notices of such hearing provided for in the preceding sections of the act, is not subject to the objections urged by the respondent, and that as to the matters thus determined its provisions sufficiently meet the legal requirements of due process of law.

[4, 5] The next contention of the respondent is that the provisions of the act with relation to the issuance and sale of bonds against lands of a district adjacent to the property to be condemned for the purpose of obtaining the money necessary to make the required deposit in court in order to obtain immediate possession of the lands to be condemned are contrary to the spirit and intent of the state Constitution. The sections of the act thus assailed are sections 28 to 37 thereof, which, in substance, provided that in cases where the condemnation of any property needed in the course of the contemplated acquisition or improvement or both has been determined upon and appropriate proceedings to accomplish such condemnation have been initiated and prosecuted to the point of an order for possession as is provided for in the Constitution and statutes relating to the exercise of eminent domain, upon the entry of such order for possession, providing, as it may, for the taking of immediate possession of the property sought to be condemned, upon the payment into court of the amount or amounts required by the terms of the Constitution and statutes to the owner and persons interested in the property thus to be taken, the legislative body conducting the proceeding shall fix a day, hour, and place for a hearing upon the matter of the issuance of bonds against the assessment district for the purpose of obtaining the amount or amounts set forth in said order for possession as thus required to be so deposited, of which hearing all persons owning property within the assessment district shall be given notice as provided in said sections of the act, and at which these may appear to urge whatever reasons they may have why such bonds should not be issued. The sufficiency of the notice thus required and given in the instant proceeding is not called in question by the respondent herein, but he argues that the provisions of article 1, § 14, of the state Constitution, as amended in the year 1918, which relate to the payment into court in condemnation proceedings of such amounts as the court may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owners of the property sought to be condemned immediate payment of just compensation for such taking, including damages and costs, have been in some manner violated. We look vainly through that article and section of the Constitution, however, for any limitation upon the ways or means to be adopted by the public or quasi public institution seeking such condemnation in providing the funds wherewith to make such payment, nor do we perceive any sufficient reason lying in any constitutional limitation why the legislative body, which is invested with power to proceed to make the acquisition or improvement in question, and to issue bonds for the expenses thereof, may not adopt any practical method open to it for obtaining the needed means to enable it to proceed with such acquisition or improvement required in advance thereof in order to obtain possession of the property to be taken in the course thereof. In point of fact, the provisions of said article and section of the Constitution, by its amendment in said year, providing for such immediate possession, implies that the municipality or other public body thus permitted to take such possession of property sought to be condemned must obtain from some source the means for making the required payments into court. Whether such means are to be drawn from the general or some specific fund of the public body seeking such condemnation, or from money to be borrowed by it in accordance with those methods which are provided by law for the creation of an indebtedness, is quite immaterial, since the property owners of the district to be benefited by such acquisition or improvement must eventually, in one form or other, bear the burden of the cost of such acquisition or improvement. The argument of the respondent seems to be that the spirit and intent of the constitutional provision is violated by virtue of the long delay which must occur in the course of carrying into effect the resolution of the legislative body condemning the property in question with relation to the issuance and sale of bonds until the consummation of which the payment into court of the sums provided for in the interlocutory decree cannot be made; but this does not appear to us to be vital, since until such payment into court has been made the owner thereof cannot be required to yield up its possession. It may be that some added burdens in the way of interest upon the adjudged amounts may by the act be laid upon the property owners of the district, but this consequence would seem to be inevitable, in view of the fact that the district has at the outset no money or the practical means of getting any with which to proceed with the work of acquisition or improvement except by the process of issuing bonds. Read by and large, and interpreted liberally, as we are required to do in respect to acts of this character, with a view to making effective the beneficent public purpose contemplated by their terms, we do not find that the provisions of this act thus brought into question are violative of the spirit and intent of the Constitution as to the plan provided therein for the condemnation of properties required in the course of the acquisition or improvement contemplated or for the payment and provision of means for payment of compensation for the properties thus to be taken. We find no merit, therefore, in the respondent's aforesaid contention.

[6] The next contention of the respondent is that the provisions of section 5 of said act, permitting the legislative body in charge of the acquisitions or improvements, or both, contemplated by said act, to assess or to exempt from assessment lands belonging to certain public bodies, are violative of the provisions of article 1, § 11, and article 4, § 25, subd. 33, of the state Constitution. These two provisions of the Constitution, however, only embody the requirements of the organic law that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation," and that special laws shall not be enacted "where a general law can be made applicable." In the case of City Street Improvement Co. v. Regents, etc., 153 Cal. 776, 96 P. 801, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 451, it was held that the general rule exempting the lands of public agencies from taxation applied only to general state, county, and municipal taxes, and did not extend to the exemption of such agencies from local assessment for street improvements. In the very recent case of the City of Fresno v. Fresno Irr. Dist. (Cal. App.) 237 P. 772, it was held that lands of a municipality lying within an irrigation district might be assessed for the special purpose for which the district was formed, in the absence of an express or implied exemption of such lands in the statute creating such district, and in that case it was held that there was such implied exemption. But section 5 of the act in question, instead of expressly or impliedly exempting the properties of public bodies or agencies designated therein from assessment for the purposes provided for in the act, expressly provides that such properties may, if in use in the performance of a public function, be omitted from such assessment, but that, in order that they may be so omitted, the resolution of intention of such legislative body shall so determine and declare. There is ample authority in other jurisdictions for the proposition that such provisions in statutes providing for special assessments for local improvements are valid. Adams County v. Quincy, 130 Ill. 566, 22 N. E. 624, 6 L. R. A. 155; McLean County v. Bloomington, 106 Ill. 209; Edwards, etc., v. Jasper County, 117 Iowa, 365, 90 N. W. 1006, 94 Am. St. Rep. 301; Board of Comm'rs, etc., v. Ottawa, 49 Kan. 747, 31 P. 788, 33 Am. St. Rep. 396; City of Kalispell v. School Dist., 45 Mont. 221, 122 P. 742, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1101; Seattle School Dist. v. City of Seattle, 44 Wash. 62, 86 P. 1117, 12 Ann. Cas. 417.

[7, 8] In the case of Reclamation District No. 1500 v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 672, 154 P. 845, the general subject of the power of the Legislature over the properties of public agencies was exhaustively considered, and the principle was therein deduced that the Legislature, for purposes of public improvement, may impose such burdens upon such properties as to it may seem just, and that such public agencies have no private or proprietary interest in such properties as against the state. The respondent, while apparently conceding the soundness of this principle, makes the contention that the inclusion of certain properties belonging to the school department in the assessment in question in the instant case was in the nature of special legislation on the part of the legislative body having the proceedings in question in charge. The answer made to this contention is that the legislative body having the particular acquisition and improvement in charge had power to classify the public properties within said assessment district according to their location and use, and also according to the benefits to be derived from such public improvement, and that the power to thus classify necessarily carried with it a wide discretion as to its exercise. Such was the ruling of this court in the case of Martin v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 93, 101, 227 P. 762, wherein it was held that, where the authority and duty to ascertain the facts which will justify a particular classification is vested in a legislative body, every intendment is in favor of the validity of its action, and the legislative classification will not therefore be disturbed, unless it is palpably arbitrary in its nature, and neither founded upon, nor supported by, reason. We are unable to say in the instant case that the inclusion of the school properties in question in the assessable property of the district was not properly responsive to its location, uses, or to the benefits to be derived by it from the making of the acquisition and improvement in question. It may be noted that under other provisions of the act this method of payment of the burdens laid upon such classes of public property as are to be subjected to this assessment is fully provided for, and that the same involves no loss of such properties to the public service or use to which they are devoted.

[9] The next contention on the part of the respondent is that the county of Los Angeles, through its legislative body in charge of said work, involving, as it does, the condemning of property, establishing street grades, making street improvements, and assessing property therefor within the city of Los Angeles, is violative of the provisions of article 11, §§ 6 and 8, of the Constitution, and also the provisions of the charter of the city of Los Angeles. This contention is predicated upon the proposition that the condemnation of property for street purposes and its improvement is a municipal affair, and that, when such property lies within the limits of the city of Los Angeles, its condemnation and improvement cannot be subjected to the control of general laws. This contention would seem to be quite fully answered in principle by the decision in the case of Gadd v. McGuire, recently decided by the District Court of Appeal, 69 Cal. App. 347, 231 P. 754, for, while it is true that in the instant case the city of Los Angeles was not, as in that case, an immediate actor in making the improvements in question, it is also true that the provisions of the Constitution and of the charter of Los Angeles, upon which the respondent relies herein, were fully considered therein. In so considering these, and applying them to the facts of that case, the court very aptly and correctly held that—

"It is true that the charter of the city of Los Angeles contains an express grant of power to make street improvements and to provide that the costs and expenses thereof shall be a lien upon the abutting property or on property in districts benefited thereby. But it also is expressly declared in that instrument that these powers shall be 'supplemental, additional and alternative powers to those conferred upon municipalities by the general laws of the state of California.' Subdivisions 13 and 19 of section 2, art. 1, of the charter; Stats. 1919, pp. 1432, 1433; St. 1921, pp. 1802-1804. By thus declaring that the powers granted by the charter with respect to street improvements are 'supplemental, additional and alternative' to such powers as may likewise be conferred upon municipalities by general laws, there is evidenced an unmistakable intention on the part of the charter-makers to confer upon the city authorities the right to elect either to exercise the powers which are expressly granted to the city by its organic law, and to proceed as therein provided, or to exercise those powers which are granted to all municipalities of the state by general laws, and to proceed as in those laws prescribed."

We can perceive no real distinction between the application of the foregoing reasoning to that case and to the case at bar, and we are further of the opinion, as was held in the foregoing case, that, when a general law of the state provides, as the act in question does, for a scheme of public improvement, the scope of which both intrudes upon and transcends the boundary of one or several municipalities, such contemplated improvement ceases to be a municipal affair, and comes within the proper domain and regulation of the general laws of the state.

The remaining contentions of the respondent, involving, as they do, objections to alleged defects in the particular proceeding under review, and not to the validity of the act itself, are, we think, sufficiently answered by the briefs of the petitioner, and do not require separate or further prolonged consideration.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; CASHIN, Justice pro tem.; CURTIS, J.; SEAWELL, J.

SHENK, J. I concur. Something further, however, should, in my opinion, be said concerning the practical operation of certain features of the act. First, as to the notice of presenting and hearing objections: Under section 5 the resolution of intention must contain a notice of the time and place when objections may be presented and heard. The time must not be less than 15, nor more than 60, days from the date of the adoption of the resolution—not from the publication of the notice. The resolution must be published by at least two insertions, and the publication may be made in a daily newspaper. It is thus made possible for the entire publication to be commenced and completed within 2 days before the time appointed for hearing objections. Obviously, a 2 days' notice would not constitute such a reasonable notice as would satisfy the requirements of due process. Again, at the time set for the hearing, the property owner must present his objections to the proposed acquisition or improvement, to the proposed grades to which the improvement is to be constructed, to the extent of the assessment district, to the zones into which the assessment district is to be divided, and to the percentages to be raised from each of said zones. If the property owner does not object at the time appointed, he is cut off from objecting to any of the proceedings taken under the act, including the right to object to the construction of the improvement to the official grade fixed by the legislative body. The construction of the improvement to the official grade may cause vast damage to him by reason of cuts or fills, or both, and there is no provision in the act for compensating him on account of thus taking or damaging his property for public use. The provisions of the statute in this respect would seem to be incomplete and inadequate. And, again, the legislative body may issue and sell bonds sufficient to make a required deposit in court in the event lands are to be condemned in the course of the proceeding. These bonds become an immediate charge on the property in the district, and the property owner is barred by the terms of the act from contesting any tax levy to pay for the same. Yet the property sought to be condemned may never be acquired by reason of the abandonment of the proceedings as authorized by the act. The property owner is then in the position, so far as the statute is concerned, of being required to pay off a bond issue for which no property has been acquired and no improvement constructed, since there is no provision in the act for retiring the bond issue in the event of the abandonment of proceedings. But, quite apart from the foregoing considerations, the 14 days' notice of the time and place to present objections, given in the present case, would seem to be sufficient, and the proceedings involved herein are not affected by the other provisions of the act to which I have referred.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action to recover upon a contract of guaranty by William H. Wallace and another, as executors of the estate of Justina P. Arnold, deceased, against W. E. Privett. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Eugene C. Campbell, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This action comes before this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, First district, Division 2, Presiding Justice Langdon having written the opinion. We are in accord with said opinion in many respects, and we adopt and approve the following portion thereof:

"Plaintiffs have appealed from a judgment against them in an action to recover upon a contract of guaranty. The findings present the following facts: The defendant was one of the promoters and principal stockholders of a corporation known as Oceanic Engineering Corporation. During the months of April, May, and June, 1916, he solicited a subscription to the capital stock of said corporation from plaintiffs' testatrix, and induced her to subscribe for 5,700 shares at $1 a share. As a consideration for said purchase, defendant guaranteed Justina P. Arnold against any loss on account of the purchase of said stock, and further guaranteed that it would pay her an income of not less than 8 per cent. per annum. This stock was owned by Justina P. Arnold at the time of her death. At the time she subscribed for the stock, defendant agreed to deliver to Mrs. Arnold a written memorandum of his agreement of guaranty, and on June 3, 1916, in fulfillment of said promise, he delivered to her a written agreement, which he reaffirmed and renewed in writing on May 29, 1920, in words and figures as follows:

"Whereas, Mrs. J. P. Arnold, of 229 West Anaheim street, Long Beach, Cal., has purchased five thousand seven hundred (5,700) shares of the capital stock of the Oceanic Engineering Corporation, at the price of one dollar per share:

"Now therefore, W. E. Privett, subject to the conditions hereinafter stated, guarantees to said Mrs. J. P. Arnold that said stock will pay her annually an income not less than 8 per cent. per annum; provided, however, that should W. E. Privett procure within one year a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy said stock at a price of not less than $2 per share, and who tenders her said sum for said stock, the liability of said W. E. Privett upon said guaranty aforesaid shall thereupon immediately cease and terminate, whether or not said Mrs. J. P. Arnold sells said stock to said purchaser.

"It is further agreed that said W. E. Privett guarantees Mrs. J. P. Arnold against any loss whatsoever on account of this investment, and that this guaranty shall inure only to the benefit of Mrs. J. P. Arnold, her heirs, and administrators.

"Witness our hands and seals this 3d day of June, 1916. W. E. Privett. [Seal.]

"Mrs. J. P. Arnold. [Seal.]

"The above contract of guaranty is hereby reaffirmed and renewed this 29th day of May, 1920. W. E. Privett."

"It was further found that at the time of the filing of this action said shares of stock were worthless and valueless by reason of the dissolution of the corporation; that Justina P. Arnold left a will which did not specifically bequeath the stock involved in this action, but contained a residuary clause, bequeathing all property not otherwise disposed of to certain named persons who were not her heirs at law; that her heir at law was a grandson, who was not a party to this action and not entitled, under the will, to the stock in question.

"The decision in favor of the defendant was based upon the technical ground that the action was not prosecuted for the benefit of the heir or heirs at law of Justina P. Arnold, and that the contract of guaranty did not inure to the benefit of legatees of deceased. It is purely a question of the construction of the foregoing instrument and it seems to us to present little difficulty. It is to 'inure to the benefit of Mrs. J. P. Arnold, her heirs and administrators.' This would indicate that, while the guaranty was not available to a transferee of Mrs. Arnold during her lifetime it was available to one who took either by descent or purchase upon her death."

If the stock were her property at the time of her death and she had died intestate, then upon her death the title thereto passed unto her heirs subject to administration. During administration the administrator of the estate would be entitled to the possession of said stock, and, as he was included in the express language of the contract of guaranty, he would be authorized, and it would be his duty, to institute and prosecute an action upon said contract for any breach thereof by the guarantor. The fact that Mrs. Arnold left a will, and therefore the stock went to her devisees instead of her legal heirs, we think, is immaterial. In this case her executors during administration are entitled to the possession of said stock, and their rights and duties as such executors with reference to said stock and the contract of guaranty are the same as those of an administrator had she left no will. It is true that her executors are not mentioned in said guaranty, but it was not necessary, for either the administrator or executor to be mentioned in said contract of guaranty, in order to enable either to protect the rights of her estate under said contract. The guaranty by express terms inured to the benefit of Mrs. Arnold. Upon her death her personal representative, be he either the executor of her will or the administrator of her estate, whichever may be acting in the premises, and without any mention of him being made in said contract of guaranty, would be entitled to enforce the same for the benefit of her estate. Besides, as was further said by the District Court of Appeal in the opinion above referred to:

"The two words (executor and administrator) are used indiscriminately by laymen. As was said in Re Murphy, 144 N. Y. 557, 39 N. E. 691: 'Although in name there is a difference between "executor" and "administrator," yet in fact and in law they are really the same, for each has control over the personal estate, and the distribution thereof.' In the case of Sheldon v. Smith, 97 Mass. 34, 35, it was said: 'An executor is, in one sense, an administrator, and in the only sense material to the prosecution of this suit.' So in the instant case, the executor is an administrator in the sense that he takes the place of the deceased with respect to her rights in personal property. As to the indiscriminate use of these two terms, see, also, Robins v. McClure, 100 N. Y. 328, 348, 3 N. E. 663, 53 Am. Rep. 184, and Finney v. Barnes, 97 Mass. 401.

"It is also true that the word 'heirs' is frequently used as a designation for those who succeed to property upon the death of the owner, whether the succession is by operation of law or by virtue of a will. Hascall v. Cox, 49 Mich. 435, 13 N. W. 807; Hoyt v. Hoyt, 85 N. Y. 142, 151; Swan v. Warren, 138 Mass. 11."

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. TRINIDAD. (Cr. 2848.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 21, 1926.)

1. Criminal law §706.

Persistence of district attorney in propounding questions and in making offers of certain testimony, and fact that he differed with court as to admissibility of testimony, held not conduct constituting error, where he acted in good faith.

2. Criminal law §730(5)—District attorney's comment to jury on law under which people could not call defendant's wife as witness held not error, in view of court's suggestion that he accept law without comment.

District attorney's comment, in argument to jury in prosecution for murder, on law under which people could not call defendant's wife as witness, held not error, where episode was closed by court's suggestion that he accept law without comment, notwithstanding defendant's wife had testified for defense.

3. Criminal law ☞729.

District attorney's comment on prevalence of crime and laxity of punishment held not error, where he withdrew it at suggestion of court.

4. Criminal law ☞808½—Instruction containing all of statute relative to impeachment of witnesses held not to imply that defendant had previously been convicted of felony (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051).

Instruction containing all of Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, relative to impeachment of witnesses, held not error on objection that it implied that defendant had previously been convicted of felony, though it was unnecessary to read that portion of section providing that it may be shown that a witness has been convicted of felony.

5. Criminal law ☞1172(2).

Instruction that evidence should be weighed with distrust if stronger evidence could have been given held not prejudicial, though defendant had not testified, where there was no doubt as to his guilt, but such instruction found in Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subds. 6, 7, should rarely be given in criminal cases.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Mauricio Trinidad was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Reese & Bagg, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., and George H. Johnson, Dist. Atty., of San Bernardino, for the People.

WASTE, O. J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to pay the extreme penalty. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is not denied that appellant shot Hernandez, the decedent. The defense in the court below was based upon the contention that the domestic happiness of the appellant and his wife was interfered with by Hernandez, and that an altercation arose between the two men, during which Hernandez attempted to assault Trinidad with a shoe knife, and that Trinidad, in self-defense, fired the shots which killed the decedent. The defendant did not take the stand, and the alleged facts on which his defense was based were related by other witnesses. Police officers and a newspaper reporter testified that after the shooting the appellant surrendered himself to the officers, and, on being interrogated, confessed that he went to the place of the shooting to kill the decedent, because he thought he was trying to make a "bad woman" out of his wife; that the decedent had no weapon; and that he (the defendant) killed him. Other testimony tended to further destroy the defense erected by the appellant. There was therefore sufficient evidence to support the conclusion of the jury that the defendant was guilty of murder as charged in the information. It is not contended here that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the conviction. The appeal is based upon alleged misconduct of the jury and errors of the trial court in giving certain instructions.

[1] It is first contended that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in the examination of witnesses, and in the insistent repetition of questions and interrogatories to which objections had been sustained by the court, after the district attorney had overstepped the bounds of propriety in comment as to the admissibility of testimony offered. Appellant contends that the conduct of the district attorney throughout the trial was calculated to and aroused the passion and prejudice of the jurors, and was such that the defendant did not have a fair and impartial trial. It cannot be denied that the district attorney showed considerable zeal in the presentation of the case for the people. Counsel for the defendant was equally zealous in the defense of his client, and overlooked no opportunity to save every point he felt would inure to the benefit of the appellant. Progress of the trial was tedious, and the defendant's counsel complained of the length of time the case was continued. The district attorney was, it is also to be admitted, persistent in the propounding of questions and in his offers of certain testimony. Objections interposed by appellant's counsel led to frequent and sometimes prolonged discussion between the court and counsel as to the admissibility of the evidence under consideration. The court and the district attorney frequently differed, but from our careful examination of all that occurred during the trial we have been unable to discover anything more than an earnest endeavor on the part of the prosecuting officer to present the case of the people in its best light. In none of the instances we are here called upon to review can we say with any assurance that the district attorney knew the questions to be improper or the evidence he sought to introduce to be inadmissible, or that any questions were asked by him without the expectation of answers directed to the point of his inquiry.

Judges and counsel will differ in opinion in such matters, and from time to time indulge in discussions which lead to a final disposition of the matter by the court. In this case the trial court promptly checked any undue examination by the district attorney and properly kept that official's zeal within due bounds. From time to time during the progress of the trial the jury was admonished that it would "be governed only by the testimony introduced," and the same point was fully covered in the final charge. We therefore find no error in the conduct of the prosecuting officer in the examination of witnesses.

[2, 3] It is next contended that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct during the argument to the jury, in that he made statements of facts to support which no evidence was offered, and that other statements made by him were direct appeals to the passion and prejudice of the jury. As in the case of the other assignments of misconduct on the part of the prosecution, we have carefully read the argument made by the district attorney and are not convinced that the appellant's contentions are correct. The wife of the appellant was not called by the prosecution, but testified for the defendant. During his argument the district attorney commented upon the law which places it without the power of the people under the rules of evidence to call a wife as a witness against her husband in such a case. On objection of appellant's counsel, the court suggested that the prosecuting officer accept the law without criticizing or without commenting upon it, and the episode appears to have been closed. At another time the district attorney commented upon the prevalence of crime and the apparent laxity of punishment in criminal cases. On objection of counsel and at the suggestion of the court, the district attorney withdrew that portion of his argument. We deem it unnecessary to notice other and similar assignments of misconduct.

[4] In the course of giving its instructions to the jury the court read section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing how a witness may be impeached by the party against whom he was called. Appellant contends that from the fact that the trial court read the section in its entirety, including the portion which provides that it may be shown by the examination of the witness or by the record of a judgment that he has been convicted of a felony, the instruction was accepted by the jury as a statement, or implication, that the defendant Trinidad had, as a matter of fact, been previously convicted of a felony. While it is apparent from the record that there was no occasion to read that portion of the section, the instruction considered as a whole was a correct statement of law, and in its greater portion a material and proper instruction to be given. We cannot see how it can be contended that it was or could have been given the construction which the appellant now says the jurors placed upon it. Consequently, no error resulted from the reading of the entire section.

[5] A more serious situation is presented in the last contention made by appellant. By another instruction the jurors were told:

"That evidence is to be estimated not only by its intrinsic weight, but also according to the evidence which it is in the power of one side to produce and the other to contradict; and therefore, if the weaker or less satisfactory evidence is offered when it appears that stronger and more satisfactory was within the power of the party, the evidence offered should be weighed with distrust."

Appellant contends that by the giving of this instruction the court told the jury that he (the appellant) had it within his power to explain the facts and circumstances surrounding the offense with which he was charged and to produce stronger evidence than that produced in his favor of the trial; that such a statement, coming with the force that such statements have when made by a court during a trial, carried with it a weight and influence that worked prejudicially in the minds of the jury, and necessitates the reversal of the verdict of conviction. It was held in People v. Cuff, 122 Cal. 589, 55 P. 407, that this instruction, which is found in subdivisions 6 and 7 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure, may be given by the court to the jury on all proper occasions, but that in criminal cases the proper occasions are so few and the improper occasions are so many that it were best it should be given rarely, if at all.

The conviction in the case just cited was reversed upon other grounds in addition to the giving of the instruction, and there is nothing in the case to show that the jury were elsewhere instructed upon the right of the defendant to remain silent. In the case now here the jury was fully instructed on the presumption of innocence attaching to the defendant "until [his] guilt [was] proven beyond a reasonable doubt," and of the duty of "the people by evidence to prove to [their] minds beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty" the truth of the charge. The jury was also instructed that the defendant had a right to testify, or not to testify, in the case as he elected, and that it must not consider the fact that he did not testify in his own behalf as evidence or as a circumstance against him. We find nothing in the record which makes this case a proper occasion for the giving of the instruction. The trial court should have obeyed the admonition given in People v. Cuff, supra. Were this a "close case," or one in which the minds of men might reasonably differ as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, it might be well argued that the giving of the instruction perhaps influenced the verdict. The facts in the case are few and simple, and there can be no doubt as to the guilt of the defendant. We cannot say, therefore, that the rights of the appellant were prejudiced by the giving of the instruction.

The judgment and the order of the trial court denying a motion for a new trial are, and each is, affirmed.

SOULES v. GLAFKIDAS. (S. F. 11538.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 22, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error —110—Order denying motion for new trial is not appealable (Code Civ. Proc. § 956).

Order denying motion for new trial is not appealable, in view of 1915 amendment relating to appeals (Code Civ. Proc. § 956), which provides such order may be reviewed on appeal from judgment.

2. Appeal and error —345(1)—Judgment is appealable until 30 days after entry of order determining pending proceedings on motion for new trial, or termination of proceedings (Code Civ. Proc. § 939).

If proceedings on motion for new trial are pending, time for appeal from judgment does not expire until 30 days after entry of order determining the motion, or termination in trial court of proceedings thereon, under Code Civ. Proc. § 939.

3. Appeal and error —110—Order refusing permission to amend notice of intention to move for new trial held not appealable, since reviewable on appeal from judgment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 939, 956, 963, subd. 2).

Order refusing permission to amend notice of intention to move for new trial, made in proceedings on motion for new trial, held not appealable, after appeal from judgment has been dismissed, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2, providing special order made after final judgment is appealable, since order was reviewable, under §§ 939, 956, on appeal from judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Minnie Soules against M. Glafkidas. On motion to dismiss defendant's appeal from an order denying leave to amend notice of intention to move for new trial. Motion granted.

Sloss & Ackerman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edwin V. McKenzie, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. The respondent makes a motion to dismiss an appeal from an order of the trial court denying leave to amend a notice of intention to move for a new trial. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for damages for personal injuries in the sum of $10,000, and judgment was duly entered. Defendant thereupon gave notice of intention to move for a new trial, to be made on the minutes of the court, upon specified statutory grounds. Newly discovered evidence was not one of these, but subsequently, and after the expiration of more than 10 days after the entry of judgment, the defendant gave notice of a motion for leave to amend his notice of intention to move for a new trial theretofore made, and to be relieved of default. In the proposed amended notice of intention, a copy of which was attached and served with the notice of motion to amend, it was specified that a further ground of the motion for a new trial would be newly discovered evidence, material to the defendant, which he could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced at the trial. It was further stated that, as to the additional ground, the motion for a new trial would be made upon affidavits to be filed.

The court denied the motion to amend on the sole ground that it was without jurisdiction, for the reason that the motion was made after the expiration of 10 days from the notice of entry of judgment. At the same time, and, we may assume, as part of the same proceeding, it denied the motion for a new trial. The defendant appealed from the judgment, and, by a separate appeal, from the order denying his motion for leave to amend. The appeal from the judgment was dismissed on the uncontested motion of respondent who now moves to dismiss the appeal from the order, on the ground that, since certain amendments were made to the Code sections relating to appeals, in 1915, no appeal lies from an order of a trial court refusing permission to amend a notice of intention to move for a new trial.

[1, 2] Appellant, in support of his appeal, and in opposition to the motion to dismiss, contends that the order is appealable under section 963, subd. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an appeal may be taken from a special order made after final judgment. He contends that such an order was appealable prior to 1915, and that its status as an appealable order was not changed by the amendments. We have followed with much interest appellant's argument, beginning with the assumption that such an order was appealable prior to the changes made in the law of 1915, but fail in our appreciation of the contention made by him. By the amendments in question, the Legislature abolished the right of appeal from orders denying motions for a new trial, and provided that such orders may be reviewed on appeals from the judgment. The court may now, on an appeal from the judgment, "review any order on motion for a new trial." Code Civ. Proc. § 956. If proceedings on motion for a new trial are pending, the time for appeal from the judgment does not expire until 30 days after entry of the order determining the motion, or the termination in the trial court of the proceedings thereon. Code Civ. Proc. § 939. The clear intention of the Legislature in making these amendments was to provide for a review, on appeal from the judgment, of matters that might theretofore be considered on a direct appeal from orders on motion for new trial. The plain purpose of the amendments was to give an opportunity for a review in any and every case, in lieu of the review which was previously afforded. Wilcox v. Hardisty, 177 Cal. 752, 753, 171 P. 947; Boole v. Union Marine Ins. Co., 52 Cal. App. 207, 208, 198 P. 416.

[3] This case seems to fall squarely within the provision made by the amendments. The motion for leave to amend the notice of intention to move for a new trial was heard and denied as part of the proceedings on motion for a new trial. Appellant had ample opportunity to have the action of the trial court, in refusing leave to amend, reviewed on the appeal from the judgment. That appeal having been dismissed, to permit another effort of review would be to do violence to the plain intention of the Legislature in making the vital amendments to the procedure relating to appeal to which we have referred.

The motion to dismiss is granted.

MAPPIN v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO.
(S. F. 11470.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 21, 1926.
Rehearing Denied and Opinion Modified
July 21, 1926.)

1. Master and servant §267(1)—Evidence of loading cars with interstate freight on day after injury held admissible on issue of employment in interstate commerce at time of injury (federal Employers' Liability Act [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665]).

In death action under federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), evidence of loading cars with interstate freight on day after decedent fell under empty car held admissible on issue whether they were definitely committed to interstate commerce and engaged in such use at time of injury.

2. Commerce §27(3).

If single car in train through movement of which employee receives fatal injuries, is devoted to interstate commerce, it gives its quality to entire train.

3. Commerce §27(3).

Empty foreign freight car is engaged in interstate commerce, even before being reloaded, when it begins movement back to point at which received by carrier, or is definitely designated and started on way to receive interstate freight.

4. Master and servant §284(1)—Whether empty foreign car, in terminal carrier's yards, has taken on quality of car engaged in interstate commerce is question for jury.

Whether foreign freight car, though still in terminal carrier's yards after unloading, has again taken on quality of car engaged in interstate commerce by beginning movement back to point where received, or being definitely designated to receive interstate freight, and immediately on way to loading place within such yards, is fact question for jury.

5. Master and servant §276(1).

Evidence held to sustain finding that at least one car in train was committed to interstate use, within federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), at time of injuries.

6. Commerce §27(3).

That destination of empty car was designated in switching foreman's list as way station near state line held not conclusive that it was not engaged in interstate commerce during movement, where name of such station was used merely for convenience to indicate route of travel along carrier's interstate lines.

7. Appeal and error §1001(1).

Jury's finding, implied from verdict for plaintiff, on sufficient evidence that defendant was engaged in interstate commerce at time of deceased's injury will not be disturbed on appeal.

8. Master and servant §265(13).

Burden of proving assumed risk is on employer.

9. Master and servant §288(1).

Assumption of risk is fact question for jury, unless evidence is clear, direct, and undisputed.

10. Master and servant §265(15).

It will not be presumed that deceased employee was negligent, or knowingly incurred risk of injury causing death.

11. Master and servant §288(5)—Switch foreman's assumption of risk in using place with knowledge of danger held for jury (federal Employers' Liability Act [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665]).

In death action under federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), evidence held not to show switch foreman's actual or imputed knowledge of defective, dangerous switch and switching place so as to require finding as matter of law that he assumed risk.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Gertrude Mappin, administratrix of the estate of Walter W. Mappin, deceased, against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. W. Camp and E. T. Lucey, both of Los Angeles, and Platt Kent, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. H. Sapiro and Edwin V. McKenzie, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco in favor of the plaintiff as administratrix of the estate of Walter W. Mappin, deceased, against the defendant for the sum of $25,000 damages arising out of injuries sustained by, and the death therefrom of, said W. W. Mappin, her husband, while an employee of said defendant and through its alleged negligence. The action was commenced and prosecuted in said court under the provisions of the so-called "federal Employers' Liability Act" (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), which act provides for the enforcement in the state courts of the liabilities of common carriers for injuries suffered by their employees while employed by such carriers in interstate commerce. The primary question presented upon this appeal is as to whether the evidence adduced at the trial of the cause was sufficient to uphold the implied finding of the jury that the deceased was employed by the defendant in interstate commerce at the time he received the injuries which resulted in his death. The secondary question, assuming the first above inquiry to be answered affirmatively, is as to whether the plaintiff had succeeded in showing a case of actionable negligence on the part of the defendant proximately causing the death of the deceased. There are certain undisputed facts presented by the pleadings and evidence in the case which have reference to the primary inquiry above referred to. These are as follows: The defendant Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company is a corporation and a common carrier engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce within the state of California, and as to the former beyond the boundaries of said state. The decedent, Walter W. Mappin, was, on November 1, 1923, and at the time of his aforesaid injuries, employed by the said defendant in its railroad freightyards in the city of San Francisco in the capacity of an engine foreman in charge of a switch crew in the main switchyard of the defendant, which is fully equipped with roundhouse, track scales, storage facilities, etc., and which adjoins its freighthouse, where all freight shipped from and consigned to San Francisco through its facilities is handled. There are shifts of working crews in this yard, each under its own foreman, each working eight hours a day, and handling in all an average of 100 cars daily. The hours of work of the particular crew of which the deceased was foreman were from 11 o'clock at night until 7 o'clock the next morning. It was the duty of this crew to take up the work of the crew which had preceded it with respect to the receipt and disposal of cars, and upon this particular occasion it became the duty of Mappin's crew to deal with an assemblage of 13 empty cars which the former switching crew had placed upon "track 9," and which were to be placed in their designated position for loading according to the requirements of the following day. These cars had already been selected by the yardmaster from the repair track and various other tracks in the yard with reference to their adaptability for such requirements. Some of these empty cars were to be weighed, and the first duty, apparently, of this switching crew was to have this line of cars pulled over No. 9 track and past No. 9 switch for the purpose of backing them down to the scale track, where those of them requiring weighing were to be weighed, upon the conclusion of which the several cars were to be switched to their respective places as indicated upon said list. There were in this aggregation of 13 cars which were thus to be handled that night 10 cars which at some time prior thereto had arrived in San Francisco upon the defendant's railway lines carrying merchandise originating as to its transportation in states other than California, while the remainder of said list of cars had come in with loads originating within the state of California. Of the former 10 cars 3 were cars belonging to railroad companies which had no tracks in California. These were a Chicago, Burlington & Quincy car, No. 130238, which had been received by the defendant at Denver, Colo., loaded with interstate freight destined for California points; New York Central car No. 336914, which had been received by the defendant at Streator, Ill., similarly loaded; R. I. car No. 42217, which had been received by the defendant at Amarillo, Tex., also similarly loaded. Each of these cars had been unloaded prior to November 1, 1923, and had been inspected, cleaned, and repaired so that they were ready for use. These three last-named cars had been selected for specific switching destination, viz. Chicago, Burlington & Quincy car No. 130238 was designated "to load lumber, berth 2"; New York Central car No. 336914 was to be spotted for derrick. This designation was explained by the testimony of the yard foreman immediately preceding Mappin on that evening to the effect that this car was to go to the "derrick" in connection with another car "Santa Fé No. 62219" which was to receive there a specific load, and there was some further evidence that New York Central car No. 336914 thus ordered spotted at the derrick left San Francisco on November 3, 1923, loaded with wrought iron pipe consigned to Las Vegas, N. M. Rock Island car No. 42217 was designated to be spotted at "block No. 6." The term "block" indicated the place in the freighthouse from which shipments of freight were to be loaded upon the cars for specific destinations, and "block 6" was the place where freight consigned to Arizona was to be loaded on the cars which had been "spotted" at that point. There is evidence that Rock Island car No. 42217, placed at that point immediately after the accident to Mappin, was, on the following day, loaded at "block 6" with freight destined for Arizona.

[1] There was also offered, and received in evidence, the rules of the defendant company in conformity with the like rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the effect that it was the duty of a railroad carrier receiving foreign cars from a forwarding railroad to return such cars when unloaded at their point of destination to the forwarding railroad at the point where the former received them. This point was designated by a card affixed to the side of the car. There was also evidence of a custom among carriers to place in such cars when thus turned homeward freight consigned to points inside or outside the state of California, provided these shipments of freight were to points of destination along the homeward route of the foreign car. With respect to the foregoing evidence, showing what was done in the way of loading these three cars with freight for interstate shipments on the day following the injuries to Mappin, and which evidence was offered and admitted over the defendant's objection, it is urged by the appellant that the trial court was in error in the admission of such evidence. We cannot agree with this contention. In the absence of any showing of a change of purpose as to the immediate destination of these cars within the defendant's freightyard or of any change of design that they, or some of them at least, should be presently loaded with freight destined for foreign points along the homeward route of the cars so to be loaded, we are of the opinion that evidence that certain of said cars were so presently loaded with such freight and at such predesignated spotting points was admissible as having an important bearing upon the question as to whether the cars had thus been definitely destined for use in interstate commerce and started on their homeward way in the course of such use prior to Mappin's injuries; and that they were engaged in such use at the time the latter received such injuries. Breske v. Minneapolis, etc., Railway Co., 115 Minn. 386, 132 N. W. 337.

[2, 3] The case of Chicago Junction Ry. Co. v. Industrial Board, etc., 277 Ill. 512, 115 N. E. 647, cited by the appellant upon this point, is distinguishable as to its facts both from the last above cited decision and from the case at bar in the respect that prior to, and up to and including, the time of the injury to the decedent in that case there was no showing of a predestination of the empty cars, which were being switched by his crew, to interstate uses. The appellant, however, contends that, even conceding the proper admission of the foregoing evidence as to the uses to which certain of said cars were put upon the day following the decedent's fatal injuries, the evidence as a whole was insufficient to justify the conclusion arrived at by the jury that the cars or any of them in the train which the deceased was occupied in switching were at the very time of his injuries engaged in interstate commerce so as to give the court jurisdiction of the case under the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission Act

(U. S. Comp. St. § 8563 et seq.). In support of this contention the appellant urges that the fact that certain, or even all, of the cars in question were the cars of foreign carriers having no railroad lines in California, or even that such cars had come into California loaded with interstate freight, is entirely immaterial to the present inquiry, since it is a well-established rule of railroad law that a car, whatever its ownership, or with whatever sort of freight it is loaded at the time of its entry into California, when once unloaded, and either standing empty, or being shifted about local freight yards, loses during such time its character as a car engaged in interstate commerce, and that such car does not again regain that character until it has again been definitely put to interstate uses. It may be conceded, for the purposes of this case only, that the authorities cited by the appellant upon this proposition sustain it, but it does not follow that this rule has application to the facts of the case at bar. It is conceded as being fully established by the authorities that, if a single car in the train of cars through the movement of which the deceased employee receives his injuries is devoted to interstate commerce it gives its quality to the entire train of cars of which it is an integral part. There are at least two ways, by either or both of which an empty car, especially if it is of foreign ownership, when it has lost its quality as engaged in interstate commerce by being emptied and remaining in carriers' freightyards, can regain that quality even before the time when it is actually loaded with interstate freightage. One of these ways is when such car, though empty, has actually begun its homeward movement in conformity with the rules and customs of carriers above referred to. The other is where such car has been definitely designated to receive interstate freight, and is immediately on its way to the place within the freight yards of the carrier where it is to be loaded with such freight.

[4-6] That the question as to whether by one or both of these ways a foreign car, though still in the carrier's freightyards, has again taken on the quality of a car engaged in interstate commerce is a question of fact for the jury is established by the authorities hereinafter to be referred to. We are satisfied that the evidence in this case was sufficient to sustain the implied finding of the jury that at least one of the units in the aggregation of empty cars during the course of the movement of which the deceased employee received his fatal injuries was as to both of the particular ways above referred to committed to interstate uses so as to give to the entire train the quality of being engaged in interstate commerce at the moment of the receipt by the decedent of his injuries. We refer to Rock Island car No. 42217. This was a foreign car both as to its ownership and as to the place at Amarillo, Tex., at which it had been received, loaded with interstate freight by the defendant herein, and to which, in accordance with both rule and custom, it was to be returned by it. It had been designated as such by a tag on the side of the car. It had been emptied of its original interstate load, and was in the freightyards of the defendant subject to reloading and return to the foreign point at which it had been received. It had been inspected, cleaned, repaired, and otherwise prepared for its return to said point. It was not one of the cars which required weighing before being "spotted" for the load which it was to receive upon the following day. It had been selected by the yardmaster for such loading, and had been designated for that purpose. Its designation was to "block 6" in the freighthouse of the defendant, which was the place from which freight destined to Arizona points was to be loaded upon cars. The instructions given to Mappin by his preceding yard foreman a few minutes before his injuries indicated that this particular car was to be spotted at or opposite "block 6"; and that it was so designated and destined for loading on the following morning with that particular kind of freight is sufficiently shown by the corroborating circumstance that it was so identically loaded on the morning of the following day. It was in course of movement to its thus designated place for its thus pre-designed purpose when the injuries to Mappin occurred. It is true that there were some cars in the aggregation of empty cars which were to be weighed before being placed at the designated spot for loading, but this was not one of such cars, and it cannot therefore be said that it had any such intermediate destination. In other words, so far as Rock Island car No. 42217 was concerned, it was a foreign car, which had been definitely started on its homeward interstate journey, and was in an immediate movement to the point in the defendant's freightyard, where it was presently to be loaded with its predestined cargo of interstate freight consigned to Arizona points. Some emphasis is laid by the appellant upon the fact that, while Rock Island car No. 42217 was designated to be "spotted" at "Block 6," its destination was Cadiz, Cal.; but this fact loses its significance when it appears from the evidence that "Cadiz" is merely a small way station on the border between California and Arizona, to which practically no freight is consigned, but the name of which is used for convenience as the last California station to indicate the route along which particular cars or trains are to travel on their journey eastward along the defendant's several interstate lines. While there has not heretofore been presented to the courts of California a case involving the foregoing identical facts, such cases have arisen in other jurisdictions, and the decisions there handed down are, we think, controlling in the case at bar. The most persuasive of these cases, because based upon practically identical facts, are the following: Christy v. Wabash R. Co., 195 Mo. App. 232, 191 S. W. 243; Breske v. Minneapolis, etc., Ry., 115 Minn. 386, 132 N. W. 337; Fayssoux v. Seaboard etc. Ry. Co., 109 S. C. 352, 96 S. E. 151; Hester v. East Tenn. etc. Co., 254 F. 787, 166 C. C. A. 233; Kinsella v. N. Y. C. R. Co., 186 App. Div. 856, 175 N. Y. S. 363; Geer v. St. Louis S. F. etc. Ry. Co., 109 Tex. 36, 194 S. W. 939; Aldread v. N. P. C. Ry. Co., 93 Wash. 209, 160 P. 429; Trobridge v. Ry. Co., 192 Mo. App. 52, 179 S. W. 777. This list of cases might be indefinitely extended were it necessary so to do in order to support and illustrate what we deem to be the well-established rule that the question is, under circumstances similar to those presented by the evidence in the instant case, a question of fact for the jury. The cases cited by the appellant herein touching this subject are, when their facts are considered, easily differentiated from those of the foregoing cases and of the case at bar. This distinction is well illustrated by the case of Chicago Junction Ry. Co. v. Industrial Board, 277 Ill. 512, 115 N. E. 647, which is one of the cases upon which the appellant herein most strongly relies. In that case the deceased employee was one of a switching crew moving 15 empty cars from the car shops to the storage tracks in the carrier's freightyards, and was injured in the course of such removal. Eleven of these cars, after the accident, were taken to the storage tracks, re-iced, and on the same day moved by another crew to the loading tracks where they were filled with interstate freight. The opinion of the court expressly recites that up to the time of the accident there had been no specific designation given as to where any particular car would ultimately go, and the court for that reason held that the cars were not at the time of the decedent's injury engaged in interstate commerce. In so holding the court said:

"It has been held that, if the object of a switching movement is the placing of an empty car in a position to receive a load to be carried out of the state, the car is engaged in moving interstate commerce from the moment the switching movement begins," citing Breske v. Minneapolis, etc., Ry. Co., supra.

[7-11] This may be said to be a typical case. The jury in the instant case, however, by its finding, implied from its verdict in the plaintiff's favor, has determined, from what we deem sufficient evidence, that the defendant was, at the time of the injuries received by its employee Mappin, and which caused his death, engaged in interstate commerce so as to give the trial court jurisdiction over the case before it. We do not feel justified in disturbing the finding of the jury in that regard. With respect to the immediate cause of the decedent Mappin's injuries which resulted in his death, the facts appear to be that, while acting in the capacity of a switching foreman, and engaged in disposing of the string of empty cars in the manner heretofore indicated in this opinion, the deceased, while attempting to board such train of cars, stumbled over a tie supporting a switch which, according to the plaintiff's claim, had been negligently maintained. We are not presented upon this appeal with any contention on behalf of the appellant that it was not negligent in the foregoing regard; the appellant's contention being merely that the decedent must be held to have assumed, as a matter of law, the risks of his employment, of which the defective condition of the switching place in question was one, under the undisputed facts of this case. It may be stated in limine that it is conceded that the defense of assumption of risk is one of the defenses which may be taken advantage of by a defendant carrier, where the action is brought under the provisions of the federal Employers' Liability Act; but it should also be said that upon the issue of assumption of risk the burden of proof is upon the employer (Kanawha R. Co. v. Kerse, 239 U. S. 576, 36 S. Ct. 174, 60 L. Ed. 448; 18 R. C. L. § 126, p. 631; 16 Cal. Juris. p. 1079, and cases cited); and that as a general rule the question of assumption of risk is a question of fact for the jury (16 Cal. Juris. p. 1080, and cases cited). The only exception to this rule is that, when the evidence in the case is clear, direct, and undisputed, the question of assumption of risk becomes a question of law for the court. The appellant herein contends that this case comes clearly within this exception, and recites at length the evidence in the case upon which it relies in support of its said contention, from which recital it appears that the particular defect in the switch and immediate switching place upon which the decedent stumbled when about to board one of the moving cars after throwing the switch was that the ties upon which the switch stand was bolted were sticking above the ground about three inches, and that there were rocks and oil about this spot on the ground; that the decedent had been employed in the defendant's freightyard as a member of its switching crew for a period of about two years prior to the accident which caused his death; that his duties were night duties of the kind he was performing at the time of his injuries; that in the course of these duties it was occasionally his function to throw this particular switch; and that he was thereby given a full opportunity to know the condition of this switch and switching place, and to be fully informed as to its defective and dangerous state; and that, these facts having been shown by undisputed evidence, the deceased must be held as a matter of law to have assumed the risk of his employment arising from the known defects and dangers of this particular appliance and place. This might be taken to be true if the foregoing were all of the facts which were by the court or jury to be taken into consideration upon this subject of assumption of risk. What the deceased actually knew as to these defects cannot be known. From the evidence in the case, however, it appears that, while the defective condition of this particular switch and switching place was one which had been in existence for a considerable period of time, it was one which was repairable and which it was the continuing duty incumbent upon the defendant to repair. It further appeared from the evidence that it was the general custom in freightyards to have the tracks ballasted and leveled off even with the tops of the ties, and especially the switch ties, and that it was true that this custom had been generally complied with in relation to the numerous switches and switching places in this particular yard, and even with relation to this particular switching place as to all of the ties on either side of the switch stand which, with the exception of the two ties to which the said switch stand was bolted, were ballasted up even with the top thereof. The reason for this required care in maintaining the ballasting of the ties in the freightyard even with the top of the ends thereof consisted in the fact that switchmen, especially those working at night, were required by the nature of their service to run along the track over these tie ends in boarding the moving cars during a switching movement, during which the eyes and attention of the switchman must be fixed upon the moving train and the particular car and its appliances which he is to lay hold of in the act of boarding it after throwing the switch. The evidence further shows that the members of a switching crew working thus at night were not assigned to particular switches, but that it was that one of them nearest to any particular switch at the moment whose duty it was to throw it in the course of the train movement. From these added facts, and from the further fact that in determining the question of assumption of risk the injured employee will not be presumed to be negligent or to knowingly incur risk or danger of injury, we arrive at the conclusion that the evidence in this case does not so indisputably and clearly show such actual or imputed knowledge on the part of this deceased employee as to the defective and dangerous state of this particular switch and switching place at the time of his injuries as to have required the trial court to determine as a matter of law that he had assumed this particular risk of his employment. We are aided in reaching this conclusion by a consideration of the following cases from our own court touching the application of the doctrine of assumption of risk to situations similar to that presented by the facts of the case at bar: Kreitzer v. S. P. Co., 38 Cal. App. 654, 177 P. 477; Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. M. Co., 168 Cal. 500; 143 P. 714; Hennesey v. Bingham, 125 Cal. 628, 58 P. 200; Smith v. Occidental, etc., Co., 99 Cal. 462, 34 P. 84. We are also especially aided in reaching the foregoing conclusion by the case of Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. Hines, 132 Ill. 161, 169, 23 N. E. 1021, 1023, 22 Am. St. Rep. 515, which presents a state of facts practically identical with those of the instant case, and wherein in the course of its opinion the Supreme Court of Illinois makes use of this significant language:

"And, necessarily, much more is the servant entitled to assume that his master has furnished him with suitable and safe materials, machinery, and surroundings, and relieved him of investigation and inquiry in that regard, where, as in the present instance, the performance of his duties requires constancy of attention to other matters. A man whose attention is constantly directed to moving cars, and their coupling and uncoupling, cannot possibly give much attention to the ties, switchbars, etc., over which he may from time to time have to pass."

The case of Chicago etc. Co. v. Dinius, 180 Ind. 612, 103 N. E. 658, is another case wherein the facts are much similar to those of the case at bar, and in discussing which the Supreme Court of Indiana says:

"The theory of the complaint seems to be that, in a measure, appellee was lulled into a sense of safety of footing by the fact that the tracks, generally, about which he was working were properly ballasted: that the discovery of a defect on the coupling apparatus of the standing car raised an emergency which required him to cross the track in advance of the slowly moving car and so to effect the coupling of that car to the standing one; that, to meet this emergency and make the coupling in the performance of his duty, appellee stepped into a hole in the track where it was unballasted. The facts averred sustain this theory, and under them it was a question of fact and not of law whether appellee knew of the defects in the track and the danger which might exist in attempting to cross. Manifestly there was little time for deliberation, and with due care to protect himself from being caught by the advancing car, appellee could not slowly and deliberately inspect the placing of every foot step and give no attention to the car. A due regard at once for his safety and the performance of his duty under these circumstances might well divide the exercise of his faculties, and it cannot be said as a matter of law that he must have seen the defective condition of the track before or when he entered upon it, and that he voluntarily encountered the risk."

The trial court in the instant case, in accord with the conclusions arrived at in the foregoing cases, committed the question of the assumption of risk by the decedent by its instructions to the jury, and, we think, did so properly, and for that reason we shall not disturb the finding of the jury favorable to the plaintiff thereon.

The appellant has also urged certain other defects in the instructions of the trial court, but as to these they consist in the main in alleged errors in respect to the matters which have heretofore been considered in this opinion. The instructions of the trial court were, taken as a whole, full and fair, and as to the questions of law involved require no further consideration than that which has already been given to these in this opinion.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FOLCEY. (Cr. 1332.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 17, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 15, 1926.)

False pretenses §11 — Statute provides no punishment for obtaining real property by false pretenses (Pen. Code, §§ 484-488, 502½, 532, 538; Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Acts 4194, 4195, and 5233, § 64, subd. 29).

No punishment is provided for obtaining real property by false pretenses, under Pen. Code, § 532, notwithstanding statute purports to impose punishment for so obtaining property, whether real or personal, as for larceny; larceny being inapplicable to real property, in view of Pen. Code, §§ 484-488, 502½, 538, and Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Acts 4194, 4195, and 5233, § 64, subd. 29.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

M. L. Folcey was convicted of obtaining real property by false pretenses, and he appeals. Reversed.

John A. Deweese and L. E. Dadmun, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

YORK, J. Appellant was tried by a jury and found guilty on both counts of an indictment charging the alleged crime of obtaining real property by false pretenses, and appeals from the judgment of the court and from its order denying his motion for a new trial.

The first point raised by the appellant is that section 532 of the Penal Code fails to provide that it is a crime to obtain real property by fraudulent representation or pretense, in that the only portion of said section which provides for any punishment for violation thereof is in the following words:

" * * * Is punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money or property so obtained."

The only definition of larceny contained in our Codes is that contained in Penal Code, §§ 484-488, 502½, 538, and in General Laws (Deering's 1923 Ed.) Acts 4194, 4195, and 5233, § 64, subd. 29, all of which are limited to personal property. Therefore we are forced to hold that the insertion in section 532 of the Penal Code of the words "whether real or personal" means nothing whatsoever, in so far as real property is concerned. The Legislature, after the decision in the case of People v. Cummings, 114 Cal. 437, 46 P. 284, amended section 532 by inserting the words "whether real or personal," and neglected entirely in said section to make any other amendment whatsoever. In People v. Cummings, supra, the Supreme Court stated directly that, since real estate is not the subject of larceny, the words "punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money or property so obtained" are meaningless in relation to real property.

This decision makes unnecessary any discussion of the other points raised.

Judgment reversed.

1. Criminal law § 1159(2).

As concerns facts presented on trial of criminal case, appellate court can only determine whether they sustain conviction.

2. Fines § 19—Recorder of sixth class city held to have duty to receive and to pay over fines, in absence of statutory provision for collection (Pen. Code, §§ 1457, 1570; Vehicle Act, § 160 [St. 1923, p. 570]; Municipal Corporation Act, §§ 882, 883, 885 [Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 5233]; Code Civ. Proc. § 187).

Recorder of city of sixth class, whose duties are prescribed by Municipal Corporation Act, §§ 882, 883, 885, and who had duty to assess fines for violations of the Vehicle Act, held to have duty to receive payment of fines and to pay same over to city treasury in absence of statutory provision for their collection, in view of Pen. Code, §§ 1457, 1570, Vehicle Act, § 160, and in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 187, providing that when jurisdiction was conferred on a judicial officer means to carry it into effect were given.

3. Criminal law § 429(1)—In prosecution for embezzlement, mutilation of and falsifying public records, falsified dockets kept by defendant held admissible, where substantially such as required by law.

In prosecution for embezzlement, mutilation of and falsifying public records, dockets held admissible where dockets were substantially such as required by law, and were falsified and were kept by defendant personally or under his direction, especially where defendant admitted necessary foundational facts.

4. Criminal law § 429(1).

In prosecution for embezzlement, mutilation of and falsifying public records, cash books kept by defendant held admissible, though not kept in pursuance of statutory requirement.

5. Criminal law § 406(2).

In prosecution for embezzlement, mutilation of and falsifying public records, private memoranda in official cash books and dockets kept by defendant containing statements or figures in nature of admissions against interest held admissible.

6. Criminal law § 400(3).

7. Criminal law § 93—Court held to have jurisdiction in prosecution against officer appropriating fines to own use, under statute making fraudulent and felonious appropriation of property not in execution of trust embezzlement, despite statute making refusal or neglect to pay over collected fine a misdemeanor (Pen. Code, §§ 427, 503, 504).

Court held to have jurisdiction over prosecution against officer appropriating funds to own use, under Pen. Code, § 504, making fraudulent appropriation of property not in execution of trust or secretion of property with fraudulent intent embezzlement, despite section 427, making refusal or neglect to pay over collected fine a misdemeanor, in view of section 503, since felonious intent and fraudulent appropriation were necessary only in former.

8. Embezzlement § 11(2).

Prosecution against officer collecting and appropriating fines and failing to pay them over to city treasurer held properly brought under Pen. Code, § 504, making officer's fraudulent appropriation of property embezzlement, rather than under section 424, subd. 7, making willful omission or refusal to pay over money received embezzlement.

9. Criminal law § 1168(2).

Failure to introduce in evidence mutilated docket, to admission of which no objection could have been raised and which was treated by all parties as properly introduced, held not reversible error.

12. Criminal law — §1170½(1).

Refreshing witness' memory by reading and showing to each transcript of his testimony before grand jury held harmless error, where witness failed to remember facts and there was no substantial change in testimony, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2049.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Alva H. Floyd was convicted of embezzlement, destruction and mutilation of public records, and falsifying a public record, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. C. Hunting, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was convicted on each of seven counts contained in two indictments which charged him with the crime of embezzlement of public funds while acting as recorder of Culver City. Under additional counts of one of such indictments he was also convicted on each of two counts which charged him with the destruction and mutilation of public records; also on each of four counts therein which charged him with the crime of falsifying a public record. Defendant appeals from the judgment rendered by the trial court on a verdict of conviction as to each of such counts, as well as from the order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial thereon.

[1] The first point made by appellant for reversal of the judgment as to each count of the indictments on which he was convicted is that the verdict was "contrary to and against the weight of the evidence." For this court to attempt to weigh the evidence adduced on the trial of the action and to determine therefrom whether it preponderated in favor of the prosecution or of the defendant would be a clear usurpation of the functions of the jury, which body is exclusively charged with the performance of a duty which, were the suggestion of appellant to be adopted, would thrust it upon a tribunal wholly unacquainted with the facts except as they may appear in cold type, utterly divested of the illuminating circumstances and conditions surrounding the receipt of the evidence by the trial court. The only power possessed and properly assumed by an appellate court in connection with the facts presented on the trial of an action is that of determining whether such facts are sufficient to justify the conclusion reached by the jury, and while such particular question is only inferentially suggested by the point presented herein by appellant, in passing it may be said that as to each count on which defendant was convicted this court has examined not only the admitted statements of respective counsel with reference thereto, but, wherever necessary or advisable, has also inspected the reporter's transcript of the evidence, and after a consideration thereof is convinced that the jury was fully warranted in its several conclusions as expressed in its verdict.

[2] With reference to the crime of embezzlement of which defendant was convicted, it is urged by appellant that, considering the fact that the offense was committed by defendant while acting in the capacity of recorder of a city of the sixth class of this state, there is no rule of law which makes it the official duty of such officer to collect or handle moneys belonging to a city of such class. It appears that the moneys alleged to have been embezzled by defendant came into his possession as recorder of Culver City, and were derived from fines imposed by defendant in his judicial capacity of recorder for violations of different provisions of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517). General powers and duties of a recorder are prescribed by sections 882, 883, and 885 of the Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 93, as variously amended; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 5233), which include the provisions that the recorder shall be judge of the recorder's court and shall have the powers and perform the duties of a magistrate, and that "every officer collecting or receiving any moneys belonging to or for the use of such city or town, shall settle for the same on the first Monday in the month and immediately pay the same into the treasury," etc.

Sections 1457 and 1570 of the Penal Code provide in substance that all forfeitures and fines collected in any court for the violation of any city or town ordinance shall be paid into the city treasury. In addition thereto, and as possibly applying to the facts of the instant case, section 160 of the California Vehicle Act, supra, provides that:

"All fines or forfeitures collected upon conviction or upon the forfeiture of bail of any person charged with a violation of any of the provisions of this act constituting a misdemeanor following an arrest of such person by any officer employed by a city, shall be paid into the city treasury. * * * All fines or forfeitures collected upon conviction for violation of any of the provisions of this act following arrest by any officer employed by the state or by a county or city and county and whether collected by a justice of the peace, police court, city recorder's court, city justice of the peace or otherwise shall be paid to the treasurer of the county or incorporated city and county in which the court is held and said moneys shall belong to such counties and cities and counties respectively. * * * St. 1923, p. 570; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 5128.

It is conceded by appellant that the recorder's court over which defendant presided had jurisdiction to assess fines against persons convicted of violations of the California Vehicle Act, but, as heretofore stated, he contends that there was no fiduciary or official duty resting upon defendant as such recorder relative to the collection, care, or custody of such fines or funds derived therefrom, and cites authorities to sustain such general position assumed by him.

It would seem clear that a magistrate vested by the terms of a statute with express power to assess a fine, in the absence of any provision by which any other person or officer is empowered to collect or to receive it, is necessarily clothed with the implied authority to make effective the original power conferred upon him. Otherwise the law as affecting the infliction of punishment by way of monetary assessments for violations thereof would be impotent and utterly inoperative. That no such result as that just indicated is contemplated in the law is manifest from a consideration of section 187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that:

"When jurisdiction is, by the Constitution or this Code, or by any other statute, conferred on a court or judicial officer, all the means necessary to carry it into effect are also given; and in the exercise of this jurisdiction, if the course of proceeding be not specifically pointed out by this Code or the statute, any suitable process or mode of proceeding may be adopted which may appear most conformable to the spirit of this Code."

We are therefore of the opinion that, by virtue of the provisions of the several statutes to which reference has been had, it became and was the official duty of defendant as such recorder not only to assess fines against defendants convicted of violations of the California Vehicle Act, but as well to receive the payment thereof and thereafter to pay the same into the treasury.

[3-5] Complaint is also made by appellant that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence, over defendant's objections, certain cash books and dockets kept by defendant, without a proper foundation for the admission thereof having first been laid by establishing the fact that they were a "book account," or kept by defendant or under his direction or supervision, pursuant to official duty prescribed by law. That the dockets kept by defendant in substance were such as were required by law and consequently were within the inhibitions of the statute regarding the mutilation and the falsification of such documents appears to have been satisfactorily established. The facts supporting the conclusion that the several books were either kept by defendant personally or under his direction were also fully presented. Moreover, defendant as a witness in his own behalf admitted on cross-examination the necessary foundational facts. It was not indispensable that the cash books were kept in pursuance of any statutory requirement. No question is raised as to the relevancy of the contents of either or of any of the books in question. If they were private memoranda containing statements or figures in the nature of admissions against interest, they were as admissible as would be any other memoranda of a similar nature made by defendant. We therefore perceive no error committed by the trial court in admitting the several books in evidence.

[6] Intimately connected with the admission in evidence of the dockets to which reference has just been had was the further admission in evidence, over defendant's objection, of oral statements of several different witnesses in contradiction of various statements and figures contained within the dockets. In this respect it is contended by appellant that the trial court erred to defendant's prejudice; and authorities are cited by him to sustain the position that proceedings before a justice of the peace or other officer keeping a record of his official action must be shown by such record or by an authenticated copy thereof. It may be conceded that no criticism may properly be indulged as against such a general rule, especially as between or among civil litigants; but it should be remembered that in the instant case the defendant was charged with a criminal offense or offenses which in their proof involved alleged false entries made in such dockets either by the defendant himself or under his direction or supervision. For example, as to one of the offenses of which defendant was convicted, the docket entry showed that a convicted violator of one of the provisions of the California Vehicle Act was fined the sum of $50, for which amount the defendant herein as recorder accounted and paid to the treasurer of Culver City. The testimony given by several witnesses, however, proved to the apparent satisfaction of the jury that instead of a $50 fine, a fine of $250 was imposed by defendant herein upon the convicted violator of the California Vehicle Act, and that such fine of $250 was paid to the defendant as such recorder. It would be a sad commentary on the state of the law which would admit of the proposition that a person situated as was the defendant herein might embezzle public funds, make false entries in his official docket with reference thereto, and thereafter by virtue of a rule of procedure be enabled to screen himself from successful prosecution. This court is not prepared to subscribe to any such doctrine. Surely such a rule could not be in the interest of justice, and if in some jurisdictions such procedure may possibly appear to be sanctioned, it may be said that, so far as this state is concerned, no decision has been cited to the effect for which appellant contends. This court knows of none such. Certainly, if it exist, it is timely that, as applied to the conditions and circumstances as shown by the evidence in the instant case, the rule should be abrogated or at least modified so as to permit the introduction of evidence for the purpose of establishing the facts and rendering complete justice in the premises.

[7] The further point advanced by appellant, as ground for reversal of the several judgments affecting the charge of embezzlement, in substance, is that the court in which defendant was tried was without jurisdiction of the offense for the reason that section 427 of the Penal Code provides that:

"If any clerk, justice of the peace, sheriff, or constable, who receives any fine or forfeiture, refuses or neglects to pay over the same according to law and within thirty days after the receipt thereof, he is guilty of a misdemeanor."

As to the embezzlement counts of the two indictments against defendant, he was prosecuted under the provisions of section 504 of the Penal Code, which provides as follows:

"Every officer of this state, or of any county, city, and county, or other municipal corporation or subdivision thereof, and every deputy, clerk, or servant of any such officer, and every officer, director, trustee, clerk, servant, or agent of any association, society, or corporation (public or private), who fraudulently appropriates to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, any property which he has in his possession or under his control by virtue of his trust, or secretes it with the fraudulent intent to appropriate it to such use or purpose, is guilty of embezzlement."

Considering section 427 of the Penal Code under which it is appellant's contention that any prosecution for any alleged offense by him committed should have been as for a misdemeanor, it will be noted that the act against which the inhibition of the statute is directed is for either the refusal or the neglect of the officer who receives the fine or forfeiture "to pay over the same according to law and within thirty days after the receipt thereof." It may easily be imagined that for the statutory period any conscientious officer might, through sheer neglect, fail to render account as by the law required, or that an honest, though stubborn, official, or one honestly mistaken in his legal rights (County of Los Angeles v. City of Los Angeles, 65 Cal. 476, 4 P. 453), might refuse to do so without having the least intention of unlawfully appropriating any moneys to his own use. For such an offense the statute fixes his guilt as that of a misdemeanor; but where, as provided by section 504 of the Penal Code, the officer "fraudulently appropriates * * * any property which he has in his possession or under his control by virtue of his trust, * * *" an entirely different offense is committed, to wit, embezzlement, which carries with it as a necessary element thereof the felonious or fraudulent intent of the person or officer making such appropriation. Section 503, Pen. Code; People v. Dillon (Cal. Sup.) 248 P. 230, and cases there cited. The feature distinguishing between the offense for the punishment of which provision is made by section 427 of the Penal Code and the crime defined in section 504 of the Penal Code, is clearly that of felonious intent and fraudulent appropriation, both of which may be wholly lacking in the former, but are necessarily included within the latter statute. Robinson v. Commonwealth, 104 Va. 888, 52 S. E. 690; Britton v. State, 77 Ala. 202. It follows that appellant's contention cannot be sustained.

[8] Because of certain argument presented by the respondent to the effect that, under the provisions of the California Vehicle Act, supra, it became the duty of the defendant as recorder to pay over all fines collected by him to the treasurer of Culver City, appellant now urges that if as a matter of law respondent is right in such contention, it would follow that defendant should have been prosecuted, not under the provisions of section 504 of the Penal Code, but that the prosecution of defendant, if at all, should have been pursued under the provisions of subdivision 7 of section 424 of the Penal Code, which in substance covers an embezzlement by a public officer for a willful omission or refusal by him "to pay over to any officer or person authorized by law to receive the same any money received by him under any duty imposed by law so to pay over the same." People v. Westlake, 124 Cal. 452, 57 P. 465.

As affecting the several charges of embezzlement against defendant, it is conceded that the indictments herein are drawn under the provisions of section 504 of the Penal Code. Embezzlement, whether charged under either section 424 or section 504 of the Penal Code, is "the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." Section 503, Pen. Code; People v. Dillon (Cal. Sup.) 248 P. 230.

The gist of the several charges of embezzlement set forth in the several counts of the indictments herein against defendant is that as an officer of Culver City he came into the possession of certain money which he held in trust for said city, and which money the defendant thereafter feloniously appropriated to his own use. Neither the element of willful omission, nor neglect to pay the same over to the person entitled thereto, as specified in subdivision 7 of section 424 of the Penal Code, was necessarily present in the case, excepting possibly that willful omission to do so might be impliedly included in the fraudulent intent and the felonious appropriation of the money by defendant. The proof of the fact that it was a duty resting on the defendant to pay the fines collected by him into the treasury was a necessary incident for the purpose of showing that the moneys so collected by defendant were held in trust by him for the benefit of Culver City. Without deciding that a prosecution for an offense of the nature of that herein involved would be improper under the provisions of subdivision 7 of section 424 of the Penal Code, no sufficient reason has been suggested, nor do we know of any, why the prosecution of defendant herein under the provisions of section 504 of the Penal Code was inappropriate. The moneys in question, in the language of section 504 of the Penal Code, having been shown to have been in defendant's "possession or under his control by virtue of his trust," and that he fraudulently appropriated the same to a "use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust," clearly present facts which make applicable the provisions of the section of the Code under which defendant was prosecuted.

[3] By one of the counts of one of the indictments defendant was charged with the mutilation of a certain docket kept by him. Although such docket was properly identified, appellant complains that it was never formally introduced in evidence. An inspection of the record on appeal discloses the fact that, while the matter of the introduction of the docket was not made as clearly and as definitely as might have been desirable, nevertheless, in the course of a résumé among the court and respective counsel as to what exhibits had been introduced in evidence, the docket in question was mentioned by the deputy district attorney as one which had been so introduced, without any objection to such statement being made by counsel representing defendant, or without any correction or modification of such statement being at any time thereafter suggested. Apparently no valid objection could have been raised to the formal reception in evidence of the docket, and, as it was treated by all parties as having been properly introduced, we think appellant should not now be heard to complain.

[10-12] It is finally contended by appellant that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in permitting the district attorney, over the objections of defendant, to refresh the recollection of certain witnesses by showing to each of them respectively a transcript of his testimony given before the grand jury. As to the first and the fourth of such specifications, it appears that in neither case was the memory of the witness refreshed by having shown to him a transcript of his former testimony. No evidence resulted from the attempt to so refresh the memory of the witness, nor was any part of such former testimony read to the jury. The facts were otherwise as to the second and third of such specifications, in that, by the procedure followed by the district attorney, the memory of the witness was not only refreshed thereby as to a part of his testimony, but, in addition thereto, some of such testimony was read to the witness in the presence of the jury. As to the fifth of such specifications, no objection appears to have been made by the defendant to the course adopted by the district attorney, nor does it appear either that the memory of the witness was refreshed, or that anything in relation thereto was read to the jury. As to both the sixth and seventh of such specifications, although the former testimony of the witness was read aloud in the presence of the jury, no objection thereto was made by the defendant. Regarding the eighth of such specifications, there is nothing to indicate that the memory of the witness was at all refreshed. No formal objection was made by defendant, nor was any part of the testimony of the witness read to the jury.

Statutory authority exists in section 2049 of the Code of Civil Procedure for showing to the jury the fact that one's own witness has not testified in accordance with statements theretofore made by him—the section referred to providing in substance that "the party producing a witness * * * may contradict him by other evidence, and may also show that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony. * * *"

In the instant case no suggestion is made which would indicate either that the prosecution was not misled by the statement made by the witness, or that there was no reasonable ground for believing that the testimony which would be given by the witness would be favorable to the cause of the prosecution. With the exceptions of the second and the third of such specifications, the circumstances and the facts with reference to each of the other several specifications of error, as heretofore set forth herein, being considered, the following authorities would indicate that no error was committed in the course pursued by the trial court in connection therewith. People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 P. 127, 549; People v. Ross, 115 Cal. 233, 46 P. 1059; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 214, 48 P. 75; People v. Decker (Cal. App.) 246 P. 157. In the case of People v. Selby (Cal. Sup.) 245 P. 426, it is held (syllabus) that where a witness for the prosecution on direct examination admitted a variance between her testimony before the grand jury and that given upon the trial, the prosecution had the right to present to the witness, for the purpose of refreshing her memory, a transcript of her testimony taken before the grand jury and ask her if she so testified.

It also appears to be the rule that if by reason of a defective memory a witness fails to testify in accordance with the expectations of the party by whom he is called and gives no positive testimony against such party, it is not permissible to prove former statements made by such witness, which, if made by the witness on the trial of the action, would tend to establish the case of the party calling him. People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 529, 75 P. 101; People v. Follette (Cal. App.) 240 P. 502, and authorities there cited. In each of the said second and third specifications, an inspection of the reporter's transcript shows that the witness failed to remember certain material facts to which he had testified when a witness before the grand jury; that in the presence of the trial jury excerpts from such testimony were read to the witness, but that in each case no change of any consequence occurred as between the testimony which was given by the witness on the trial and that which was given by him when he appeared before the grand jury. It is therefore apparent that as to each of such last-mentioned specifications, while an erroneous course was pursued by the district attorney, the error was nonprejudicial to defendant's substantial rights.

So far as we are able to determine, the defendant was accorded a fair trial.

The judgment and the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

BEAL v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5241.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 13, 1926.)

1. Justices of the peace ☞ 166(2).

Provision in Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, which is similar to sections 581a, 581b, that appeal from justice court to superior court be dismissed if not brought to trial within one year from date of filing, held mandatory.

2. Justices of the peace ☞ 166(2).

Trial in superior court on appeal from justice's court, in absence of appellee, within one-year period prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, but without five days' notice of trial required by section 594, held error, which court could correct by dismissing appeal before completion of trial and after expiration of one-year period.

3. Justices of the peace ☞ 172.

Five-day notice of date of trial in superior court on appeal from justice's court prescribed in Code Civ. Proc. § 594, is not subject to modification by any order shortening time.

Application by Isabell A. Beal for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Harry A. Hollzer, Judge, to require respondent court to proceed with the trial of an action on appeal from a justice's court. Writ discharged, and petition denied.

Ray Howard, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Dailey S. Stafford and Frank G. Falloon, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The facts as shown by the petition herein are as follows: The petitioner was defendant in an action brought against her by Herman Perry, in the justice's court of Los Angeles township, where judgment was rendered against the defendant. The defendant appealed on questions of both law and fact. The judgment was rendered on July 2, 1924. The date of taking the appeal is not given, but it is alleged that the papers on appeal were filed in the superior court on July 23, 1924. On July 20, 1925, the defendant, after obtaining "an order shortening time" to two days for giving notice of motion, gave notice that on July 22, 1925, he would move for an order setting the case for trial and that it be tried forthwith. On July 22, the plaintiff and his counsel failing to appear, said motion was presented and granted, and the court began and entered upon the trial by receiving in evidence certain documentary evidence offered by the plaintiff. The court then continued the cause until the next day, July 23, 1925. On July 23, the plaintiff and his counsel still failing to appear, the court continued the trial to August 3, 1925, and directed that counsel for defendant be notified thereof. This notice was given on July 23, 1925. On the 3d day of August, 1925, the case being called for further trial, plaintiff's counsel being present for the sole purpose of moving to vacate the order of July 22 setting the cause for trial and that the appeal be dismissed, presented said motions. These motions were taken under submission and on October 20, 1925, the court granted both motions and dismissed the appeal. By reason of said action of the court and its refusal to further recognize the appeal the defendant has instituted this proceeding for writ of mandate. An alternative writ of mandate was issued herein. Respondents now demur to the petition and at the same time have filed an answer or "return," which raises no issue of fact.

[1] Section 981a, Code of Civil Procedure, requires the dismissal of all appeals from justice's courts "where the appealing party fails to bring such appeal to trial within one year from the date of filing such appeal" in the superior court, unless such time has been extended by written stipulation filed with the clerk of the court. In this case there was no stipulation extending the time. The provisions of section 981a, Code of Civil Procedure, prohibiting the further prosecution of such appeal and requiring the dismissal thereof, are mandatory. The language used in expressing the legislative intention is closely parallel to the terms of section 581a, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the dismissal of actions in the superior court on account of delays in issuance, service, and return of summons. It has been definitely settled that these provisions are mandatory. Sauer v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 241 P. 570. In Middlebrook v. Superior Court, 241 P. 914, we referred to the parallel existing between section 981a, Code of Civil Procedure, and sections 581a and 581b of that Code, and based our decision upon the mandatory character of all of these sections of the Code.

[2] From the foregoing the conclusion follows that it was the duty of respondent court to dismiss the appeal, unless it can be said that by the proceedings of the court on July 22, 1925, the case was lawfully brought to trial. Section 594, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the bringing of issues to trial, provides that if the issue to be tried is an issue of fact "proof must first be made to the satisfaction of the court that the adverse party has had five days' notice of such trial." In Uplinger v. Yonkin, 47 Cal. App. 435, 190 P. 822, this court held that where the requirements of section 594, Code of Civil Procedure, are applicable, a trial and judgment given without the notice therein required is merely erroneous and is not in excess of the court's jurisdiction. We drew that inference from the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Estate of Dean, 149 Cal. 487, 492, 87 P. 13, where the court very carefully limited to cases of direct appeal its declaration that a judgment rendered in disregard of that section is erroneous and should be reversed. In Sheldon v. Landwehr, 159 Cal. 778, at page 782, 116 P. 44, it was held that where the court proceeds against a party in his absence and without the notice required by section 594, Code of Civil Procedure, such proceeding against the party in his absence is in the nature of a default, but the court held that the section has reference only to proceedings taken against a party in his absence. The court held that if such party appears and has actually known that the case was set for a certain time the court has jurisdiction to proceed, and that the question of continuance is a matter for the discretion of the trial court. To similar effect see Handy v. Handy, 31 Cal. App. 590, 161 P. 21.

[3] But here it appears that the attempted commencement of the trial took place in the absence of the plaintiff. We are convinced, as was held in the case of Cahill v. Verdier, 54 Cal. App. 465, 202 P. 154, that the period of five days' time prescribed for the notice of date of trial is not subject to modification by any order shortening the time, as was attempted to be done in the case now before us. The case must be considered as one wherein, although the case was actually brought to trial and the court commenced the taking of evidence on July 22, 1925, which was within the one-year period prescribed by section 981a, Code of Civil Procedure, this was a proceeding erroneously allowed, because it was had in the absence of the adverse party and without the five days' notice required by section 594, Code of Civil Procedure. But it further appears that before any judgment rendered, and, indeed, before completion of the trial, the court became convinced of the error which it had committed. It needs no argument to prove that at such a time, and while the cause is wholly before the court and undetermined, the court has power to correct its rulings, and the litigant in whose favor the error had been committed has not thereby acquired any vested right.

We conclude that the superior court acted within the scope of its authority in dismissing the appeal.

The alternative writ is discharged, and the petition denied.

Ex parte MAKINGS. (Cr. 1323.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District Division 2, California. May 17, 1926.)

1. Statutes $\S$ 110½ (2).

Local and special legislation relating to taking of crabs is expressly authorized, under Const. art. 4, $\S$ 25½.

2. Constitutional law $\S$ 48.

Every presumption is to effect that statute is valid.

3. Constitutional law $\S$ 48.

Statute will not be held unconstitutional, unless it is positively and certainly opposed to Constitution.

4. Constitutional law $\S$ 209.

Equality guaranteed by Constitution is equality of persons and not places,—equality of right and not enjoyment.

5. Constitutional law $\S$ 209.

Law, conferring equal rights on all citizens, or subjecting them to equal burden, and inflicting penalties for violation, is equal law.

6. Fish $\S$ 9.

Pen. Code, $\S$ 628, subd. (c), as amended by St. 1925, p. 456, prohibiting transportation of crabs taken from certain fish and game districts into other districts, held not unconstitutional.

7. Fish $\S$ 8.

Ownership of crabs in waters being in people of state, Legislature may permit catching on such conditions as wisdom may dictate, and may limit property rights of persons catching.

Application by James A. Makings for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Constable of Sausalito Township, Marin County, to secure release from custody on a charge of transporting crabs from Fish and Game District No. 1½. Writ denied, and petitioner remanded.

Puter & Quinn and Marc F. Morrison, all of Eureka, for petitioner.

B. D. Marx Greene, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Ralph W. Scott, of Los Angeles, for State Fish and Game Commission.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner is held by the constable of Sausalito township, county of Marin, under a warrant of arrest issued out of the justice's court of said township by virtue of a complaint filed in said court which charges that on the 12th day of March, 1926, the petitioner " * * * did then and there willfully and unlawfully transport and carry crabs from fish and game district No. 1½ to the county of Marin, state of California. * * * " The petitioner asserts the complaint is based on section 628 of the Penal Code, subd. (c), as amended by St. 1925, p. 456, thereof, and that such portion of the statute is unconstitutional because it is discriminatory. In this connection the petitioner earnestly contends that—

"If crabs are caught in any one of said districts, then any of the other six districts has and enjoys the right and privilege of having said crabs shipped into it, sold to, purchased by, and consumed by the residents of such district. * * * Each of these particular 7 districts enjoys privileges in regard to crabs caught in any one of this group of 7 which are not enjoyed or possessed by the other 53 fish and game districts. * * * Crabs caught in district No. 5 can be shipped into district No. 1½ and bought and consumed by its people, but the people residing in district No. 1 have no such privilege."

Section 628 of the Penal Code (1) prohibits the taking at any time of crabs less than seven inches in diameter measured across the back; (2) the taking of any female crab; (3) the taking, between July 31st and November 14th, of any crab excepting imported crabs; (4) the sale of crab meat not in the shell; (5) or the bringing to shore of any portion of any crab without the remaining portions showing its size; and then it provides:

"(c) Every person who ships or offers for shipment or who transports or carries any species of crab from fish and game districts one and one-half, five, six, seven, seven A, eight and nine, either to a point outside of the state or into any part of the state other than in districts one and one-half, five, six, seven, seven A, eight and nine, or who holds any crabs in live cars within said fish and game districts, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

"For the purposes of this act a live car shall be any box, crate or pen in which live crabs are kept."

[1-6] It will be noted at once that the statute does not directly confer any right or any privilege on any one. Indirectly it confers the privilege of taking crabs in the seven districts named and the privilege of transportation as therein designated. Those privileges are conferred on all manner of men without limitation as to the residence, citizenship, color, or age of the person doing the taking. It is local and special legislation. But local and special legislation is expressly authorized on the subject. Section 25½, art. 4, Const. Even before that section was adopted all local and special legislation was not prohibited. If the classification adopted rests on any natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction, it is permissible. Looking at the entire statute, it is clear that it was enacted for the purpose of preventing crabs from being totally destroyed. If we assume it is a fact that in the waters located in the 7 districts crabs may be found in large quantities, then we may further assume that no one will engage in transporting large quantities of crabs from one place to another place where the same large quantities of crabs are to be found, and we may further assume that the supply of crabs will not be materially lessened by such restricted limitations. If we are otherwise in doubt and such assumptions will sustain the constitutionality of the statute, we must further assume that the Legislature heard and determined the facts before it enacted the statute and that it found that the facts existed which were necessary to sustain the statute. Galeener v. Honeycutt, 173 Cal. 100, 104, 159 P. 595. Every presumption is to the effect that the statute is valid. Macmillan v. Clarke, 184 Cal. 491, 496, 194 P. 1030, 71 A. L. R. 288. We should not declare a statute unconstitutional unless it can be said of the statute that it positively and certainly is opposed to the Constitution. San Francisco v. Industrial Acc. Com., 183 Cal. 273, 279, 191 P. 26. In the case of In re Marinovich, 48 Cal. App. 474, 482, 192 P. 156, 159, the court quotes with approval:

"The statute makes no discrimination. * * * Everybody is prohibited.' True it is that the prohibition affects some more than others. 'Such is necessarily the effect of all restrictive laws. * * * The equality of the Constitution is the equality of persons, and not of places—the equality of right, and not of enjoyment. A law that confers equal rights on all citizens of the state, or subjects them to equal burdens, and inflicts equal penalties on every person who violates it, is an equal law.'"

[7] We have proceeded as above in reply to the points made by the petitioner. However, it is not clear to us how, in the light of the decisions of this state, that the point discussed is presented by a consideration of the statute in question. The statute expressly prohibits certain acts and by implication grants other rights. It grants limited rights to take certain crabs in certain waters. Theretofore the ownership was in the people of the state. In the case entitled Ex parte Kenneke, 136 Cal. 527, at page 529, 69 P. 261, 262 (89 Am. St. Rep. 177) Mr. Justice McFarland, speaking for the court, quoted with approval as follows:

"This being so, it necessarily followed that the Legislature had the right to permit persons to kill or take game upon such terms and conditions as its wisdom might dictate, and that the person killing game might have such property interest in it, and such only, as the Legislature might confer. The Legislature has never conferred an absolute property in quail upon the person who might kill the same. The killing of quail during the months of October and November was permitted, not for sale—not to go upon the market as an article of commerce—but for the mere use of the person who killed the birds. The person killing quail under this statute has but a qualified property in the birds after they are killed. He may consume them. If a trespasser should take them from him, he might maintain an appropriate action to regain the possession. But the law which authorized him to kill the quail has withheld the right to sell or the right to ship for the purpose of sale, and when such person undertakes to ship for sale he is undertaking to assert a right not conferred by law. The act, therefore, does not destroy a right of property, because no such right exists.”

That case has been cited and followed in later cases. Paladini v. Superior Court, 178 Cal. 369, 371, 173 P. 588.

The writ is denied, and the petitioner is remanded.

Surviving husband held entitled to have set apart to him homestead and exempt property of estate of deceased wife, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1465, notwithstanding he and wife had separated three months before her death, since rights under sections 1464, 1465, 1466, are not conditioned on existence of family status at decedent's death.

2. Homestead $\S$ 151.

Flats occupied by tenants, wherein neither spouse resided, held properly set apart as homestead to surviving spouse.

In Bank.

Appeals from Superior Court, Alameda County; George Samuels, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Agnes C. Henningsen, deceased. From orders setting apart homestead and exempt property of estate to R. M. Henningsen, as surviving husband of deceased, John L. McVey, executor, appeals. Affirmed.

John L. McVey, of Oakland, in pro. per., for appellant.

Herbert Chamberlain, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. There are two appeals involved in this proceeding, one an appeal from an order of the probate court setting apart a homestead to the surviving husband of the decedent out of the separate property of the latter, the other an appeal from an order of said court setting apart the exempt property of said estate to the surviving spouse. These appeals are prosecuted by the executor of the last will and testament of said deceased. The two appeals are predicated upon the same evidence; the questions of law are the same upon each appeal, and are presented in a single set of briefs. They will therefore be considered and disposed of in a single opinion.

The respondent herein, R. M. Henningsen, and the deceased, Agnes C. Henningsen, were, at the time of the death of the latter, husband and wife. They had been married and had lived together in that relation for about 19 years up to about three months prior to the death of the wife, when, apparently, a discord arose between them. What property they possessed was the separate property of the wife, and consisted of the real property sought to be set apart as a probate homestead herein, of certain exempt personal property and of certain other moneys and properties not affected by these proceedings. At the time the relation between the spouses became strained the husband apparently had no property and was in need of immediate means and asked his wife for $300 in money to relieve his situation. Trouble ensued. She told him to leave the house, and upon that or the following day the wife handed her husband a check for $100, which contained the following statement below the name of the maker: "Payment in full for all claims you have against me." She also at the same time offered back a ring which he had given her years before. The husband took the check, but refused the ring, and went away to live elsewhere in Oakland, wherein they had both theretofore resided, and did not return to or see his wife during the remaining few months of her lifetime, nor did he attend her funeral. His excuse for not doing so, given at the hearing of these proceedings, was that he had been told by her "to stay away from the house and never come near it," and that he did not know that she was sick and had died until after she was buried. He further testified upon such hearing that the money she gave him was part of his own property of which she was possessed. During the course of probate of his deceased wife's will, her husband, the respondent herein, presented the two applications above referred to, under the provisions of section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure. At the hearing thereon the foregoing facts were educed, and at the conclusion thereof the trial court made and entered the two orders from which these appeals have been taken.

[1, 2] The main contention which the appellant makes upon each of these appeals is that the evidence presented at the hearing showed that the family relation between the husband and wife had been dissolved prior to her death, and for that reason the husband was not entitled to have set apart to him the homestead or the exempt property from the separate property and effects of his deceased spouse under the provisions of said section of the Code. There is no merit in this contention. Even if it were to be conceded, which it is not, that the appellant herein had established upon such hearing by practically undisputed evidence that the family status of the parties had been destroyed, it would not follow that the husband of the decedent must for that reason have been denied the rights he sought to assert under section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On the contrary, this court has held in Estate of Gould, 181 Cal. 11, 183 P. 146, and also in Estate of Parkinson, 193 Cal. 354, 224 P. 453, that the rights of the surviving spouse created under the provisions of sections 1464, 1465, and 1466 of the Code of Civil Procedure were not conditioned upon the existence of the family status at the date of the decedent's death. In each of these cases the earlier decisions of this court, including the cases of Estate of Yoell, 164 Cal. 540, 129 P. 999, and Bose v. Bose, 158 Cal. 428, 111 P. 258, upon which the appellant chiefly relies, were fully considered and distinguished. We are satisfied that the language of the court in Estate of Gould, supra, and in Estate of Parkinson, supra, must be given full application to the facts as presented upon these two appeals; and we are further satisfied that the appellant herein made no such showing as to the severance and nonexistence of the family relation between these discordant spouses during the brief period preceding the death of the wife as to bring these appeals within reach of the decisions of this court in Estate of Yoell and Bose v. Bose, supra, even if these cases could otherwise have been given application to the status provided for in section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure, upon the basis of which the orders herein appealed from were made. The further contention of the appellant herein to the effect that the property selected and set apart as a homestead herein was not of the character which would render it available for such purpose is equally without merit. The property in question consisted of two flats occupied by tenants at the time of the decedent's death, and wherein at such time neither of said spouses resided. It has, however, been held by this court that residence upon the property sought to be impressed with the quality of a probate homestead was not a prerequisite to its segregation for such purpose under the provisions of said Code relating to such homesteads if such property was otherwise suitable for such purpose. In re Sharp, 78 Cal. 483, 21 P. 182; In re Bowman, 69 Cal. 244, 10 P. 412.

The contentions of the appellant being thus disposed of, it follows that the orders appealed from must be and they and each of them are hereby affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BORCHERS. (Cr. 2865.)(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1926.
Rehearing Denied July 30, 1926.)

1. Embezzlement $\hookrightarrow$ 4—To sustain conviction of "embezzlement," it must be shown that defendant was agent or bailee of owner, that property belonged to owner and was lawfully in defendant's possession, and that defendant converted it and intended to deprive owner of his property unlawfully.

To sustain conviction of embezzlement, it must be shown (1) that defendant was agent or bailee of prosecuting witness in holding embezzled property; (2) that property actually belonged to prosecuting witness; (3) that property was lawfully in defendant's possession at time of embezzlement; (4) that defendant was guilty of conversion denounced by statute; (5) that defendant intended to deprive prosecuting witness of property unlawfully.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Embezzlement—Embezzlement.]

2. Embezzlement $\hookrightarrow$ 6—Property intrusted to one with authority to change it into other property is not subject of embezzlement, if change is made, but only property resulting from change.

Property, including commercial paper, intrusted to one with authority to transmute it into property of another kind, including cash, to use of depositor, is not subject of embezzlement, if transmutation is made, but only the property resulting from transmutation.

3. Embezzlement $\hookrightarrow$ 6.

Evidence not showing that defendant converted checks as distinguished from cash represented thereby held insufficient to sustain conviction for embezzlement of checks.

4. Embezzlement $\hookrightarrow$ 44(1).

Evidence held to sustain conviction of embezzlement of note given defendant in blank with authority to fill blanks to complete agreed transaction.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

William C. Borchers was convicted of embezzlement on separate counts, and he appeals. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

Henry St. Rayner, R. P. Henshall, and Nat Schmulowitz, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LAWLOR, J. The defendant, William C. Borchers, was indicted by the grand jury of the county of Los Angeles in ten counts—five for the crimes of larceny and five for embezzlement. As to the five larceny counts and one of the counts of embezzlement the prosecution was abandoned, but defendant was found guilty of embezzlement on each of the four remaining counts—numbered 1, 3, 5, and 9. A motion for a new trial was interposed and denied, whereupon judgment of conviction was pronounced on each of the said four counts. The District Court of Appeal reversed the judgment and order so far as they related to counts 1, 5, and 9, but affirmed them so far as they concerned count 3. We are in accord with the reasoning and conclusions of the District Court of Appeal touching counts 1, 5, and 9, and, though we agree with the conclusion of that court as to count 3, we cannot accept the reasons advanced therefor. As regards counts 1, 5, and 9, therefore, the opinion of the District Court of Appeal contains an expression of our views of the questions considered therein, and that portion of said opinion to which we now adhere, hereby adopt and make a part hereof is as follows:

"It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict on the first count. This count charged appellant with the embezzlement of a check or order for $2,000, drawn by one Sarah M. Garrigus in favor of Borchers, Clarke & Co., the indictment alleging that appellant at the time was the agent and bailee of Mrs. Garrigus. The evidence in support of this branch of the indictment, found in the testimony of the complaining witness, was to the effect that Mrs. Garrigus was desirous of obtaining a loan for [of] $250,000; that appellant told her that he was connected with the Southern California Mortgage Company, which would let her have the money, but he later told her that one of the directors of the company objected to the making of the loan and stood in the way of the completion of the deal; that appellant then urged the complaining witness to buy the stock of this director in the mortgage company in order to be rid of him and therefore rid of his objection to the loan, saying that $2,000 would be necessary for the purpose. Appellant urged this course upon Mrs. Garrigus on three different occasions, and she finally consented to the plan, especially as appellant said to her that he would later sell the stock and give back her money. She then handed appellant her check on a bank for $2,000, payable to Borchers, Clarke & Co., Inc. This paper was offered in evidence at the trial, together with an indorsement thereon, 'Pay to the order of [another bank than the one on which the check was drawn].' Below this indorsement appeared the signature, 'Borchers, Clarke & Co., Inc.' The check also showed by means of a perforation stamp, 'Paid 9-20-23,' which date was the next day after the date of the paper. At the time of the delivery of the check to appellant Mrs. Garrigus signed a document headed, '200 Units Subscription to Underwriters Syndicate,' and which she testified she read before executing. This instrument recited in part that the signer subscribed for ten units of the common capital stock of 'the Pre-organization Syndicate now being organized to underwrite' shares of the common stock of the Southern California Mortgage Company, a corporation proposed later to be incorporated under the laws of Delaware; that the signer was to pay $2,000 for the ten units upon signing the document; that the signer's subscription and similar subscriptions 'shall be used for preorganization purposes, and the expense of starting the company, and advertising campaign, and for selling expense of said stock to be issued under the direction of the underwriters, Borchers, Clarke & Co.'; that each of the units subscribed for should be exchangeable for common stock 'to be issued out of that promotion stock later to be issued to Borchers, Clarke & Co., underwriters, for service performed and to be performed in organizing and procuring capital for said company'; that the 'certificates of stock hereby subscribed for to be issued in my name or to my order * * * and to be delivered to me when authorized by the commissioner of corporations and in full compliance with all the terms and conditions of the permit later to be issued by the commissioner'; that the subscription was 'taken and executed' upon the condition that the company was to be organized within 90 days, 'or moneys collected to be refunded to the subscriber'; and that this 'subscription unit transferable only upon acceptance and approval of Borchers, Clarke & Co.' To this agreement was appended the following, signed 'Borchers, Clarke & Co., By Wm. C. Borchers': 'Receipt of the sum of $2,000 is hereby acknowledged and the above preorganization subscription is hereby accepted, in connection with the terms and conditions above mentioned.' Mrs. Garrigus testified that she received no stock in exchange for the check, and that neither the check nor the $2,000 which it represented was ever returned to her. The only evidence of an appropriation of the check for $2,000, or of the amount represented thereby, was in the indorsement shown upon the paper, that is to say, the special indorsement signed 'Borchers, Clarke & Co., Inc.,' and the perforated indorsement, 'Paid,' with a date.

[1] "For the purpose of testing the sufficiency of this evidence to support a conviction on the first count it is necessary to state several principles of the law of embezzlement. In order to sustain a conviction upon such a charge it must at least be shown, first, that the accused was the agent or bailee of the prosecuting witness in holding the alleged embezzled property; second, the property must actually belong to the alleged principal, the prosecuting witness; third, it must be lawfully in the possession of the accused at the time of the alleged embezzlement; fourth, the accused must have been guilty of the conversion which the statute denounces; and, fifth, there must be shown an intent on the part of the accused to deprive the prosecuting witness of his property unlawfully. See 20 C. J. 413, and following pages.

"Before attempting to make application of these rules of law it is to be observed that in one respect the evidence under the first count of the indictment is to be viewed in two distinct aspects. Mrs. Garrigus testified that her check was given for the purchase of the stock in the mortgage company said by appellant to be held by the director who opposed the making of the loan to her. On the other hand, the documentary evidence shows that the check was given in payment for certain 'presyndicate' shares of stock, which were to be exchanged for shares later to come from the then unincorporated mortgage company. Appellant insists that the recitals of the documentary evidence are conclusive upon the prosecution, and that the case attempted to be made against him under the first count of the indictment is to be plumbed from that viewpoint. This particular question, however, we do not find it necessary to decide, as in our opinion the result is the same whether the evidence be seen in the one aspect or in the other.

[2, 3] "It appears to us that the evidence for the prosecution under the first count failed to establish several elements necessary to a conviction of appellant of the crime with which he stands charged. Various considerations seem to exhibit the justice of this remark. The check, under any view of the evidence, was delivered into the hands of appellant with the intention upon the part of Mrs. Garrigus that it should be cashed and that its proceeds should be used to pay for shares of stock. Even if it be said that the check might have been passed by indorsement in payment for the stock, the payee certainly was clothed with the power to cash it, and even with the right to do so, for the purpose of making payment. Moreover, it was intended by Mrs. Garrigus that the paper should be cashed by Borchers, Clarke & Co. and not by appellant. That is conclusively shown by the manner in which it was drawn. Appellant could not have gotten the money on it, at least not until after it had gone through the hands of Borchers, Clarke & Co. Therefore, in strictness, as it appears to us, it may possibly be said that the check was not delivered to appellant to be held, even momentarily, for Mrs. Garrigus, but to be held for Borchers, Clarke & Co., that is, that within the meaning of the law of embezzlement appellant may not have been her agent or bailee, but the agent of the payee of the check. Here it is to be observed that the indictment does not charge and there is nothing in the evidence to show that appellant, in dealing with Mrs. Garrigus, was masquerading under the name of a corporation—if that is what the concerned named was—the title of which entity contained a word which was the same as his own surname. Under all the circumstances of the case, then, appellant was burdened by Mrs. Garrigus with the duty of delivering the check to Borchers, Clarke & Co. We need not pause to inquire what the charge against appellant must have been if he had failed to comply with this duty and had converted the check to his own use—whether he should then have been indicted for the embezzlement of paper which was the property of Mrs. Garrigus or with property which belonged to the corporation, assuming from now forward that it was one. There was no evidence that appellant did not deliver the check to the payee named in it. In fact, the indorsement of the corporate name upon the paper indicated that the delivery was made and that appellant properly discharged his duty so far as the check was concerned. Let us now turn to other considerations. We have already seen not only that Mrs. Garrigus intended that appellant should deliver the check to Borchers, Clarke & Co., but that the corporation was to transmute it into cash. Suppose we assume, in order to show how far short of sufficiency the evidence fell, that the corporation was not in the transaction, or that Borchers, Clarke & Co. was another name for appellant. In other words, let us assume that the check was drawn payable to appellant and that it bore his indorsement and the perforated mark 'Paid.' These assumptions are distinctly favorable to respondent, but even with them we are to observe that the charge here was the embezzlement of the check and not the embezzlement of cash, the converse of the case of People v. Riccardi, 50 Cal. App. 427, 195 P. 448, upon which respondent relies. There is a vast difference between the two charges, as the following authorities will demonstrate: Commonwealth v. Merrifield, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 468; State v. Bacon, 170 Mo. 161, 70 S. W. 473; State v. Mispagel, 207 Mo. 571, 106 S. W. 513; People v. Leipsic, 6 Cal. Unrep. 536, 62 P. 311; People v. Meseros, 16 Cal. App. 277, 116 P. 679. These cases establish the rule that where property, including commercial paper, is intrusted to one with authority to transmute it into property of another kind, including cash, to the use of the one who deposits with the trusted person, the property so intrusted cannot be the subject of embezzlement, if the transmutation is made, but only the property which results from the change. Under such circumstances the holder of the original deposit, having made the transmutation, has done, up to the time of the change in the nature of the property, exactly what he was authorized to do. In People v. Riccardi, supra, the facts were the same in substance as those in the present instance, under the assumptions now made, but the defendant there was charged with the embezzlement of cash and not of the check which he turned into cash. There was no evidence here that appellant embezzled the check, still disregarding the interposition of Borchers, Clarke & Co. in the affair. The prosecution proceeded upon the theory that the paper was cashed, exactly as Mrs. Garrigus intended that it should be and as the prosecuting witness in People v. Riccardi, supra, intended that the check there in question should be. Assuming then, as we have already done, that appellant was the payee of the check and that he obtained and converted the proceeds arising from it, he could have been convicted, if at all under a charge of embezzlement, only for the appropriation of the cash and not at all for the conversion of the check.

"Upon these reflections it appears to us, as already stated, that the evidence failed to disclose several of the elements which we have above set forth as necessary to a conviction upon a charge of embezzlement. In the first place, it was not shown that appellant converted the check, the only property to which the charge against him related, and it follows also from this failure of proof that there was no showing of an intent on the part of appellant to deprive Mrs. Garrigus of the check unlawfully. It may be doubtful also—but we express no opinion on what immediately follows—whether appellant was, under the law of embezzlement, the agent or bailee of Mrs. Garrigus in receiving the check and in holding it on its way to Borchers, Clarke & Co., or whether, as between the prosecuting witness and appellant, the check belonged to her, within the meaning of that law, while he held it. It seems to us, then, that the evidence did not sustain the conviction on the first count. * * *

"Appellant contends that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict under the fifth count of the indictment. In that count he was charged, while acting as the agent and bailee of Mrs. Garrigus, with the embezzlement of a certain check or order for $800 signed by her and payable to the order of Borchers, Clarke & Co., Inc. This was the evidence produced in support of the charge: Mrs. Garrigus testified that she gave the check for $800 to appellant for the purpose of paying for the engraving and printing of bonds which were intended to be issued as evidence of the indebtedness to the Southern California Mortgage Company, supposed to arise from the loan of $250,000 referred to in the evidence above set forth as relating to the first count of the indictment. After the date line and the name of the bank upon which it was drawn, the check read thus: 'Pay to the order of Borchers, Clarke & Co., Inc., eight hundred and no/100 dollars, $800.00. For printing bonds.' It was signed by Mrs. Garrigus, and at the time it was offered in evidence it bore the following indorsements: 'Pay to the order of [a bank other than the one upon which the check was drawn] Borchers, Clarke & Co. Paid 11—26—23.' There was evidence to the effect that no bonds were ever printed as contemplated, and that no part of the proceeds of the check was ever paid out for such a purpose. Neither the check nor any part of the proceeds thereof was ever returned to Mrs. Garrigus. This evidence appears to place the conviction under the fifth count in the same difficulty with that under the first count. Not only did the indorsements on the check tend to show that it had been cashed, but it is the theory of the prosecution that it was cashed. It is said in respondent's brief, concerning the particular check now in question: 'It was shown that the check was deposited in a bank and paid by it.' It is also said that no more than this, and other evidence referred to in the brief, 'was necessary to bring home to defendant the receipt of the money,' italics being ours. Returning now to the indorsements on the check, it is to be observed that they tend to prove that the paper was cashed by Borchers, Clarke & Co. and not by appellant. Under all these circumstances, what we have said in disposing of the conviction under the first count of the indictment applies with equal force to the conviction under the fifth. The later conviction, therefore, cannot stand.

"It is also contended by appellant that the evidence fails to sustain the conviction under the ninth count of the indictment. This count departs from the affairs of Mrs. Garrigus, and charges that appellant embezzled property of one H. E. Ketchum, which property appellant at the time held as the agent or bailee of the person named. The property in question was alleged to be a check or order for $515, payable to the order of Borchers & Clark. The evidence under this branch of the indictment was that the check was issued for the purpose of paying for the printing of certain bonds. It was not used, nor was the cash which it represented, for that purpose. Neither the check nor the proceeds arising from it was ever returned to Ketchum. The paper read, so far as it is material here: 'Pay to the order of Borchers & Clark $515.00. Five hundred and fifteen & no/100 dollars. H. E. Ketchum.' When it was offered in evidence it bore the perforated marks, 'Paid 11—26—23,' and was indorsed, 'Pay to the order of [a certain bank]. Borchers, Clark & Co.' Not only were these marks and indorsements on the check, but it is the theory of the prosecution that it was cashed, as it is said concerning the paper in respondent's brief: 'The check was introduced in evidence, and it showed that it had been paid by the bank on which it was drawn.' Our attention is called to no evidence that the check was converted by appellant. It was testified by Ketchum: 'Q. * * * Did you intend that your individual check should be delivered to the person who printed the bonds, or that it should be delivered to the company, and that the company should pay for the bonds itself? * * * A. I intended the check to be delivered to the company. * * * Q. To which company? A. To Borchers & Clarke. * * * These facts seem to make applicable what we have said above concerning the convictions under the first and fifth counts. The conviction under the ninth count therefore must also fall.

"Appellant contends that parts of the trial judge's charge to the jury were erroneous on the ground that they amounted to instructions upon matters of fact. It is also claimed that certain of the court's instructions in effect told the jury that its members might disregard other instructions which the court gave as to the law. These contentions are to our minds so clearly untenable that we forbear further to mention them.

"Still other points are made, but they are either disposed of by what has been said concerning the particular questions which we have thoroughly discussed, or they relate to appellant's conviction under counts of the indictment as to which a reversal will be ordered for the reasons above given."

[4] It is likewise contended by the appellant that the evidence addressed to the third count of the indictment is insufficient as matter of law to sustain the verdict thereon. In this count the appellant was charged with the embezzlement of a note intrusted to him as the agent of Mrs. Garrigus and payable to the order of Myra J. Borchers in the sum of $4,000. Concisely stated, the evidence touching the third count tended to show that the appellant represented to the prosecuting witness that two directors, other than the one mentioned in connection with count 1 of the indictment, were opposed to the loan of $250,000 which she was seeking from the Southern California Mortgage Corporation, and that to overcome this opposition it would be necessary to "buy them off" by purchasing their stock; that he represented that $4,000 would be required to secure that result; that he requested the prosecuting witness to "put up a note," but stated that it would not be used or hypothecated in any manner; that when Mrs. Garrigus signed the "note" and delivered it to appellant there was nothing on the face thereof except certain printed matter; that the amount of the note, the date thereof, the time the note was to run, the name of the payee, and the amount of the interest did not appear thereon when she signed as maker and delivered it to appellant; that appellant stated he would fill in the blank spaces in the instrument; that she did not expressly authorize the appellant or any other person to fill in any of the blank spaces; that she authorized the appellant to use the instrument in connection with the transaction for which it was given to him, and that she did not learn of the insertions in the instrument "until the bank showed it to me."

Appellant contends that the evidence addressed to count 3 is insufficient to support a conviction thereon for the reason that when the prosecuting witness parted with the instrument to him it was a mere scrap of paper, and not a note. As the indictment charged appellant with the embezzlement of a $4,000 promissory note payable to Myra J. Borchers, it is urged by appellant that the instrument when delivered to him did not answer that description, and therefore the conviction under count 3 was improper.

We are of the opinion that the conviction under this count of the indictment may be affirmed without determining whether the doctrine of estoppel, applied by the District Court of Appeal, is applicable so as to preclude the appellant from contending that the instrument when delivered to him was not a note. As outlined above, the evidence touching the third count of the indictment tended to show that the appellant was the agent of Mrs. Garrigus for the purpose of consummating the transaction described; that the unfilled form of note was delivered to and received by him in that capacity; that he, at the time of receiving it, informed her, without objection on her part, that he would fill in the blank spaces; that he was impliedly, if not expressly, authorized by her to make these insertions in the instrument in order to complete that part of said transaction in the course of which such note completely filled out to some payee and in the amount of $4,000 was to be used. If the appellant had so filled out and so used said note the conclusion is inescapable that it would have been a perfectly valid instrument. Nor do we think the fact that appellant filled out the note in the name of his wife would have affected its validity if he had otherwise acted in good faith in its transfer. From the fact that he had the foregoing authority and from the further fact that he apparently had continuous possession of the instrument from the time he received it until he transferred it in finished form the jury might reasonably infer that it was he who filled in the blank spaces so as to render it a good note before uttering it. With the aid of this inference we have the appellant filling in this instrument as he was, at least impliedly, authorized so to do, and, having done so, converting it to his own use as charged in the third count of the indictment. The offense charged in said count of the indictment was thus completely proven without the aid of the doctrine of estoppel which is so exhaustively discussed by counsel for both sides. The appellant did not take the stand as a witness in his own behalf. Had he done so and attempted to deny the agency relationship, or, admitting such relationship, had he testified that he had not made the insertions in the instrument, the troublesome question as to the applicability of the doctrine of estoppel might have arisen. In our view, however, that question does not arise on the face of the record in this case, and hence it becomes unnecessary to decide it.

The judgment and order, in so far as they relate to the first, fifth, and ninth counts of the indictment, are reversed. The judgment and order under the third count are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. F. Hahn, Judge.

Action in claim and delivery by the Blankenhorn-Hunter-Dulin Company against Will J. Thayer, trustee in bankruptcy for Mason & Owen, bankrupts, and another, to recover possession of a stock certificate. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Will J. Thayer, of San Diego, in pro. per.
Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. Plaintiff brought this action in claim and delivery to recover the possession of a stock certificate alleged to have been wrongfully withheld by the defendants. Plaintiff obtained judgment for the delivery of the stock against both defendants. The appeal is prosecuted solely on behalf of the trustee in bankruptcy, and is on the judgment roll alone.

It appears from the findings that on and prior to November 15, 1920, Mason & Owen were engaged in the business of stock brokers in the city of San Diego. On or about that date they were employed to purchase for the plaintiff, for cash, ten shares of stock of the Standard Oil Company of Indiana. In execution of the order, Mason & Owen directed their correspondents Logan & Bryan, stockbrokers having offices in New York City and elsewhere, to purchase for the account of Mason & Owen, as a marginal transaction, 10 shares of the said Standard Oil Company stock. On November 15, 1920, Logan & Bryan purchased 10 shares of stock of that company on the New York Stock Exchange for $7,100, and immediately notified Mason & Owen of the purchase. The latter in turn notified the plaintiff that the said shares had been purchased as ordered. On November 17, 1920, the plaintiff paid to Mason & Owen the said purchase price of $7,100, plus the usual broker's commission. The whole of said payment was placed among the general funds of Mason & Owen, and no part of the same was paid to Logan & Bryan for the purchase of said stock. Prior to said purchase, Mason & Owen had an account with Logan & Bryan, and through them were trading in stocks on the New York Stock Exchange as marginal traders. The purchase of said 10 shares of stock was made by Logan & Bryan as a part of the marginal transactions of Mason & Owen, and said shares were paid for by Logan & Bryan out of moneys advanced by them as a loan to Mason & Owen, based upon the securities held by them in Mason & Owen's account. At all times mentioned Mason & Owen had to their credit as a pledge in the hands of Logan & Bryan a large number of stocks and securities of various kinds belonging to the customers of Mason & Owen which had been purchased by Logan & Bryan for the marginal account of Mason & Owen and their customers, the purchase price of which had been advanced by Logan & Bryan as a loan to Mason & Owen and all of said stocks and securities were held in pledge by Logan & Bryan as security for said loan, and the value of said securities was in excess of the indebtedness due from Mason & Owen to them. When Logan & Bryan purchased said shares of stock, they did so on the strength of the credit of said pledged stocks and securities and also on the strength and credit of said 10 shares of Standard Oil Company stock. The purchase price of the said 10 shares was advanced by Logan & Bryan as a part of the loan to Mason & Owen, and increased the burden of said loan by the sum of $7,100, but also increased the security held by Logan & Bryan to the amount of the market value of said 10 shares. When purchased, the said 10 shares were credited to Mason & Owen by Logan & Bryan and became a part of the general mass of securities held by Logan & Bryan as a pledge for the payment of the general indebtedness of Mason & Owen to Logan & Bryan, and became subject to the lien of Logan & Bryan in that behalf. When Mason & Owen ceased doing business on November 20, 1920, there were to their credit with Logan & Bryan as a pledge stocks and securities belonging to the customers of Mason & Owen, including said 10 shares, of the value of $339,156 subject to a lien in favor of Logan & Bryan to secure an indebtedness of $206,054.43 due from Mason & Owen. In executing orders for Mason & Owen and in advancing money on said stocks, Logan & Bryan did so in good faith, without any knowledge or notice of the rights, if any, of the plaintiff or other customers of Mason & Owen in and to said securities. In dealing with Mason & Owen, the plaintiff did not know the methods employed by Mason & Owen in dealing with Logan & Bryan or others in causing orders for stock to be executed on the New York Stock Exchange.

On December 1, 1920, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against Mason & Owen, and Will J. Thayer was appointed and qualified as receiver and trustee in bankruptcy. He was later superseded by George P. Kier as such trustee, without in any manner affecting this cause. On December 6, 1920, in pursuance of an order of the court in the bankruptcy proceeding, sufficient of said stocks and securities held by Logan & Bryan were sold to cancel the entire indebtedness of Mason & Owen to Logan & Bryan, leaving in the hands of the latter, as a residue of said stocks that had been pledged, a number of securities, including said 10 shares of Standard Oil Company stock. On December 20, 1920, Mason & Owen were duly adjudged bankrupts. Most of the securities held by Logan & Bryan for the account of Mason & Owen belonged to or were ordered by persons who had not paid in full for said securities to Mason & Owen but were purchased on margin account through Mason & Owen. The value of the securities so purchased on margin was more than sufficient to pay all advances of Logan & Bryan to Mason & Owen on account of said purchases. If the securities so purchased by the marginal customers of Mason & Owen had first been sold to pay off the indebtedness due from Mason & Owen to Logan & Bryan, it would not have been necessary to sell any of the stock which the customers of Mason & Owen had paid for in full. After the sale by the trustee in bankruptcy there was a surplus of approximately $100,000 remaining in the hands of Logan & Bryan, which was more than sufficient to take care of any stocks or securities so sold which had been paid for in full in the same manner that the said 10 shares of stock had been paid for by the plaintiff. Only a small amount of fully paid for stock was held by Logan & Bryan at the time of the sale of the stocks which had been purchased for Mason & Owen on margin. None of the marginal customers of Mason & Owen have paid into the bankrupt's estate or to Logan & Bryan or to any one else the unpaid balance due upon the stocks or securities ordered by such marginal customers through Mason & Owen. The 10 shares of Standard Oil stock referred to in the complaint were the only shares of Standard Oil Stock held by Logan & Bryan under their pledge, and the plaintiff is the sole claimant of this particular stock.

As conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, the court determined in accordance with the plaintiff's contention that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of the certificate of stock, free and clear of any and all claims on the part of the trustee in bankruptcy and of Logan & Bryan, and judgment was entered accordingly.

[1-4] Several propositions seem to be well settled: (1) That, as between a broker and a customer who has paid for stock in full, the latter is the owner of the stock, and does not impliedly authorize the broker to pledge the security. As to the fully paid customer, the pledging of his stock by the broker is wrongful (In re J. C. Wilson & Co. (D. C.) 252 F. 631); (2) that, as between a broker and a marginal customer, the latter is also the owner of the stock, and the broker is a pledgee (Richardson v. Shaw, 209 U. S. 365, 28 S. Ct. 512, 52 L. Ed. 835, 14 Ann. Cas. 981; Thomas v. Taggart, 209 U. S. 385, 28 S. Ct. 519, 52 L. Ed. 845), and has a lien on the stock for any advances he may make thereon, and has the implied consent of the owner lawfully to repledge the same (In re J. C. Wilson & Co., supra); (3) that, as between the broker and his cash customer the latter is entitled to the immediate delivery of the stock (Duel v. Hollins, 241 U. S. 523, 36 S. Ct. 615, 60 L. Ed. 1143), and the marginal customer is entitled to the delivery when he pays the balance of the contract price (In re Mason [C. C. A.] 282 F. 202).

[5] With these general rules in mind, the respondent contends that, having paid the full purchase price, and there being no question of the identity of the stock, it was entitled to immediate delivery free and clear of any claims of the trustee in bankruptcy representing, as he says, the marginal customers as well as the general creditors of the bankrupt. On the other hand, the appellant contends that, as Logan & Bryan had a lien on the respondent's stock for the full purchase price of $7,100, and as said stock was released from said lien by the sale of other stocks in the hands of Logan & Bryan belonging to the marginal customers of Mason & Owen, the respondent must contribute ratably to the discharge of Logan & Bryan's lien. The respondent replies that, being a cash customer, it is in a preferred class with rights superior to those of the marginal traders, and that, before the latter may insist that the respondent be held in contribution, it must appear that they have paid the balance due on their purchases. It insists that, as its stock was wrongfully pledged by Mason & Owen it should have the right to recover before, and, if necessary, to the exclusion of the marginal traders whose stocks were rightfully pledged.

We think the contention of the respondent must be sustained. It paid for its stock in full. It gave to its broker, Mason & Owen, no authority to pledge the same, and consequently did not subject itself to that risk. It therefore occupied a position superior to the marginal customers who had not paid for their stocks in full, and had impliedly authorized a repledge thereof, and thus voluntarily assumed the risk.

"As between securities hypothecated with authority and those hypothecated without authority, obviously the latter have the superior equity." In re J. C. Wilson & Co., supra, 650.

The right of contribution does not arise from contract, but rests upon principles of equity and natural justice. Concerning this right it was said in Re Toole (C. C. A.) 274 F. 337, 24 A. L. R. 470:

"The principle is that, where all are equally liable for the payment of a debt, all are bound equally to contribute to that purpose. So that, if the stock of A, B, and C is lawfully pledged for the payment of the debt of X, the stock of each is under the common burden, and, if X sells the stock of A and B, and leaves unsold the stock of C, the latter must contribute to A and B the excess they have paid above their share. But if, on the other hand, the stock of A is lawfully pledged, while that of B and C is unlawfully pledged, there is no obligation on the part of B and C to contribute, for there is no common burden as between A, on the one side, and B and C, on the other. The principle applies only in cases where the situations of the parties are equal as equality among persons whose situations are not equal is not equitable."

The equities of the fully paid customers and of the marginal traders are therefore not equal, and, as ratable contribution may be enforced only as to those of the same class, the marginal traders whose securities were rightfully pledged and who took the risk of a repledge cannot justly complain of the preference given to those whose securities were wrongfully pledged and who took no such risk.

The appellant has been twice subjected to a court order concerning stocks wrongfully pledged by the bankrupt. In re Mason (C. C. A.) 282 F. 202, presents a situation almost identical with the one at bar. In that case Steer, a customer of Mason & Owen, was declared to be the owner and entitled to the possession of 100 shares of Midvale Steel stock free and clear of any claims on the part of the trustee, appellant herein. Steer had paid for said stock in full, and the same had been wrongfully pledged by Mason & Owen. The lien thereon was discharged by the sale of the stocks of the same customers who are now represented by the appellant herein, and no part of Steer's stock was sold to satisfy the lien of Logan & Bryan. The principles of law declared and approved in that case are applicable here. It was there said:

"Under such circumstances it would be inequitable to hold that Steer, who paid his money in full and who had no pledge or loan, should be required to pay more, and thus reduce the losses of the marginal traders, who were speculating on the market." In re Mason, supra, 205.

The other case involving this same appellant is In re Mason & Owen (C. C. A.) 284 F. 714, where the right of a customer, who was not indebted to Mason & Owen, and whose securities were wrongfully pledged to Logan & Bryan, to recover his securities from the trustee in bankruptcy was confirmed.

An interesting treatise on the subject of the rights and obligations of customers in stock brokerage bankruptcies, with authorities cited in support of the text, is found in 37 Harv. L. Rev. 860-888. See, also, In re T. A. McIntyre & Co., 181 F. 960, 104 C. C. A. 424; Tompkins v. Morton Trust Co., 91 App. Div. 274, 86 N. Y. S. 520, affirmed in 181 N. Y. 578, 74 N. E. 1126.

The general creditors of the bankrupt are not in position justly to complain of the superior position accorded the respondent, for the reason that the $7,100 paid by the respondent went into the funds of Mason & Owen, and, so far as the record shows, is now a part of the bankrupt's estate. The said estate was therefore neither increased nor diminished by reason of respondent's transaction in the purchase of said 10 shares of Standard Oil stock. Wherefore, as against the marginal customers and general creditors of Mason & Owen, the title of the respondent to said 10 shares of stock became absolute, and it was entitled to the possession of the certificate representing such title as determined by the trial court.

[6] The contention of the appellant that the trial court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action is without merit. Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 521, 23 L. Ed. 403; Jaquith v. Rowley, 188 U. S. 620, 23 S. Ct. 369, 47 L. Ed. 620; Frank v. Vollkommer, 205 U. S. 521, 27 S. Ct. 596, 51 L. Ed. 911; In re Continental Producing Co. (D. C.) 261 F. 627; Fidelity, etc., Ass'n v. Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, 186 Cal. 689, 200 P. 631.

The judgment is affirmed.

Proc. § 473, had expired, in absence of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect.

3. Executors and administrators ⚡12—Distribution, under will bequeathing property in state, of proceeds of drafts drawn in Australia more than month before death held not error.

Distribution, under will bequeathing property in state, of proceeds of drafts drawn in Australia on request of deceased more than month before death held not error, in absence of showing that drafts did not or could not have reached state before death.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Application by William Cornelius Tymms and others to set aside an order of distribution in the matter of the estate of Ernest A. Tymms, deceased, naming the Title Insurance & Trust Company, as executor of the estate, and another as parties. From an order denying the motion, applicants appeal. Affirmed.

H. A. Massey and Meserve & Meserve, all of Los Angeles (Timon E. Owens, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Henry K. Elder and Lawrence L. Otis, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. On November 27, 1923, the probate court entered its order of partial distribution to one Shersby, distributing to him certain real property in Los Angeles county and $8,487.82 in cash, all belonging to the estate of Ernest A. Tymms, deceased. On May 22, 1924, the father, brothers, and sisters of the deceased served and filed their motion to vacate said order of distribution. This motion was noticed for May 27, 1924, and, after several continuances, upon agreement of the parties was finally heard and denied by the probate court on November 25, 1924. The moving parties in this motion, representing themselves as heirs at law of the deceased, have appealed from the order denying their motion to vacate said order of partial distribution. The appeal is presented upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The grounds of the motion to vacate, as stated in the notice of motion, are that the deceased died on March 4, 1923, leaving a last will and testament and a codicil thereto; that said will has not been admitted to probate, but that the codicil thereto was admitted, and letters testamentary thereon were issued by the probate court of the county of Los Angeles; that in and by said codicil there was bequeathed to the respondent Shersby "all property of whatever nature belonging to the deceased, situate in the state of California, at the time of the death of said Ernest A. Tymms"; that at the time of said death the only property belonging to the deceased and situated in this state was certain real property in the county of Los Angeles, and that no part of said sum of $8,487.82 was situated in this state at that time. Five affidavits were attached to the notice of motion, one executed by one of appellants' counsel, who deposed that he had been informed by the executor of the estate that, under date of January 31, 1923, the Perpetual Trustee Company of Australia sent to the deceased a draft dated at Sydney, Australia, January 21, 1923, and drawn on the First National Bank of Los Angeles by the Union Bank of Australia, and that on February 14, 1923, a similar draft, though for a smaller sum, was sent to the deceased; that from information obtained from other sources neither of said drafts was in California prior to the 12th day of March, 1923. The information upon which the affiant relied regarding the receipt of the drafts is found in the other affidavits attached to the notice, three of which were executed by officials of certain steamship lines, and gave the sailing dates of the mail-carrying steamers running between Sydney, Australia, and San Francisco or Vancouver, B. C., during the months of January, February, and March, 1923. The other affidavit was executed by James E. Power, the postmaster at San Francisco, and gave the date of departure and arrival of the mail-carrying steamers of these same steamship companies, and stated that those companies were the only ones operating boats carrying mail between Sydney, Australia, and Vancouver, B. C., and San Francisco during the period from January 23 to March 29, 1923.

At the hearing of the motion to vacate all these affidavits were offered in evidence, together with the petition for probate of codicil to will, the decree admitting said codicil to probate, letters testamentary, the first inventory of the estate filed on May 21, 1923, the second inventory filed on October 17, 1923, and the petition, notice of hearing, and order for partial distribution. No other evidence tending to prove that the money was not situated in the state of California at the death of the deceased was offered by the moving parties, and no evidence was offered by the respondent. Upon this showing the motion to vacate the order of partial distribution was denied, and the propriety of this action is the question which is now presented on this appeal.

[1] At the outset respondent insists that the appellants have wholly failed to bring themselves within the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, in order to entitle them to the extraordinary relief which is permitted by that section. In this connection it is argued that the order for final distribution, being an appealable order, became final and conclusive, in the absence of an appeal after the time for an appeal therefrom had expired, and that the only method of setting it aside was by motion based upon the grounds of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect within the terms of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. That such is the rule there is, of course, no ground for argument. The section of the Code expressly so provides, and the language is so plain and unmistakable that no judicial interpretation is necessary. The rule has been followed on numerous occasions by the Supreme Court and the Appellate Courts, and is expressly emphasized in the Estate of Nolan, 145 Cal. 559, 562, 79 P. 428, where an attempt to annul an order of family allowance to the widow was denied.

[2] Here the motion was made solely upon the ground that the personal property distributed to Shersby was not situated in the state of California at the time of the death of deceased. The petition for partial distribution alleged that this money was subject to distribution to the petitioner within the terms of the codicil of the will, and the second inventory filed by the executor disclosed that the money was then in the possession of the executor, received by it on April 13, 1923, but it did not disclose when the money had come into the state of California. However, the probate court did, after a hearing of evidence, grant the petition, and this was in effect a finding that the money was situated in this state at the time of the death of the deceased, and therefore subject to distribution under the codicil of the will. The attack which appellants have made upon that order is nothing more than a claim that the probate court committed error therein. The order was valid upon its face, and no question of mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect is involved. Such an attack should have been made by an appeal from the order, and, this not having been done, the order became final and conclusive, subject only to an attack upon a showing of the grounds specified in section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. Estate of Leonis, 138 Cal. 194, 200, 71 P. 171.

[3] Upon the foregoing ground alone the order appealed from must be affirmed, but it is appropriate to say, in addition thereto, that we have carefully examined the entire record on the merits of the motion. The moving parties made the showing that the money had been requested by the deceased some time prior to his death, and that drafts had been drawn on January 31, 1923, a little more than one month prior to the death. The sailing dates of certain mail-carrying steamers from Sydney to San Francisco and Vancouver were also shown, but it was not shown that the draft could not have reached California over some other line and through some other port, and there was no attempt to show when the money was actually received by the bank in Los Angeles which turned it over to the executor after the decedent's death. Upon the showing which was made, we cannot say that the probate court committed error in finding that this money was subject to distribution under the codicil to the will.

Order appealed from affirmed.

1. Wills ☞601(8).

Direction of testator in will, when addressed to legatee, will not be construed as a limitation on estate or interest which has been given him in absolute terms.

2. Wills ☞601(8)—Will devising realty to wife without limitation, and directing her to give realty or remainder to certain persons on her death, held to devise fee-simple estate to wife.

Will devising realty to testator's wife without limitation, followed by paragraph directing wife to give realty or remainder thereof to certain persons after her death, held to give wife fee-simple estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Perry Wood, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Thomas L. Hull, deceased, Grace B. Willard, executrix, involving construction of the will. From a decree directing final distribution in favor of Mary M. Hull, Lee D. Hull and another appeal. Affirmed.

Edgar K. Brown, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

C. M. Frazier, of Glendale, and Leo B. George, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

A. C. McCall, of Alhambra, for executrix.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a decree of final distribution in the matter of the estate of Thomas L. Hull, deceased. Appellants object to the decree because it proceeds upon the theory that a fee-simple estate in certain real property was devised to Mary M. Hull by the last will and testament of Thomas L. Hull, deceased, her husband. The only question involved is the construction of certain language in the will, as follows:

"I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Mary M. Hull, the house and lot situated at 328 West Colorado street, city of Glendale, state of California, described as follows, to wit: Lot 10 in block C. Grand Valley View Tract, book 9 page 157 of maps of record in the recorder's office of Los Angeles county of said state, together with all improvements and personal property situated in and about it; and the sum of five hundred dollars in cash.

"At the death of said wife I direct that she give said real property so given her by me, or the remainder thereof, to my son, Lee D. Hull, and Anna May Hull, share and share alike."

The legal representative of Lee D. Hull and Anna May Hull contend for a construction of the will which will give the widow a life estate and the remainder to the other persons named.

[1] The language of devise to the wife contains no words of limitation. It is also legally significant that the direction to give the property, or the remainder thereof, to the son is addressed to the devisee and not to an executor. In the case of Estate of Mitchell, 160 Cal. 618, 117 P. 774, quoting from another California case (Estate of Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 61 P. 964), it was said that, while the desire of a testator for the disposition of his estate will be construed as a command when addressed to his executor, it will not, when addressed to his legatee, be construed as a limitation upon the estate or interest which has been given him in absolute terms.

[2] The language of the second paragraph quoted from the will confirms the previous devise, when it described the property as that which was "given her (the wife) by me (the testator)." Likewise, by the use of the words, "or the remainder thereof," the testator recognized the effect of the previous devise as investing the wife with an absolute power of disposition. While there is something to be said in favor of the position taken by appellants and the construction which they place upon the will, the situation thus presented is analogous to that presented in the case of O'Donnell v. Murphy, 17 Cal. App. 625, 120 P. 1076, in which it was said that the most that could be reasonably claimed for the evidence is that it possibly exhibits a case in which either of two opposite conclusions might be drawn by the trial court, in which case the appellate court is bound by the conclusion of the trial court.

The decree of distribution is affirmed.

PER CURIAM. Appellant's petition to have the above-entitled cause heard and determined by this court after judgment in the district court of appeal, first appellate district, division two, is denied, but such denial should not be taken as an approval of the statement in the opinion of the district court of appeal that the appellate court is bound by the conclusion of the trial court, where, as here, the only question involved is one of law, viz., the construction of certain language of the will without the aid of extrinsic evidence.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

Harlie Stanley BURWELL, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. William H. MOORE and Charles E. Shattuck, Defendants; Charles E. Shattuck, Defendant and Appellant. (Civ. 4432.) (District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 17, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 15, 1926.) Appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, John Perry Wood, Judge, in an action for money had and received. Affirmed. J. W. Satterwhite, of Los Angeles, for appellant. H. S. Laughlin and Frank L. Muhleman, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Briefly, it appears that defendant Shattuck was the owner of a ranch with its equipment, which he leased to his codefendant Moore on the understanding that Moore would pay the expenses of running the ranch and that the money received from the sale of the crops thereon should be equally divided between him and Shattuck. Besides the equipment in use on the ranch at the time the lease was entered into, a truck was purchased, partly with the sum of $500 which was borrowed from the plaintiff. The money not having been repaid, plaintiff brought an action for its recovery. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff and against both defendants, and defendant Shattuck appeals therefrom. The specification of error is that the findings of the trial court are not sustained by the evidence. The substance of the findings to which objection is registered by appellant is that the defendants received from plaintiff the sum of $500 to be used in the development of defendants' ranch property, that defendants agreed to repay plaintiff on demand, that before the commencement of the action such demand was made, that no part of the sum so borrowed was ever repaid, and that in the entire transaction in question defendant Moore was the agent of defendant Shattuck. It would serve no useful purpose for this court to set forth the testimony of the several witnesses. An examination of the reporter's transcript of the evidence reveals the fact that the evidence was sufficient to justify the trial court in deducing therefrom that by the terms of the lease defendant Shattuck was to furnish all equipment to be used on the ranch; that when the truck was purchased the two defendants together negotiated with the seller thereof; that each of the defendants signed the installment contract for the purchase of the truck; that each of them paid his portion of the installment payments as they became due; that the truck was used in the work on the ranch; that the products of the ranch were sold by defendant Moore, acting on his own account as well as agent for defendant Shattuck; that defendant Moore, with the knowledge, consent, and co-operation of defendant Shattuck, borrowed the $500 in question from plaintiff for the use of both defendants, and agreed to give plaintiff a promissory note therefor, to be signed by each of the defendants, which was never done; that before commencement of the action plaintiff demanded payment from each of the defendants, but that no part of the money owing to plaintiff was ever repaid by the defendants or either of them. Although the testimony was not altogether clear or uncontradicted, we are of the opinion that the evidence was ample to justify each of the findings to which objection is made. The judgment is affirmed.

In the Matter of the Application of Charles S. McKELVEY for Reinstatement as an Attorney and Counselor at Law. (Civ. 5286.) (District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 17, 1926.) Application for reinstatement as attorney and counselor at law. Referred to Board of Bar Examiners. William M. Morse, Jr., Dana R. Weller, and W. H. Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Kenyon F. Lee, of Los Angeles, for Los Angeles Bar Ass'n.

CONREY, P. J. In the Matter of Stevens, 247 P. 231, the court, in Division 2 of this district, outlined the procedure which that division has established for its disposition of matters of this nature. In accordance with that procedure the matter of the application of Stevens was referred to the board of bar examiners for investigation and report to the court concerning both the moral qualifications and the mental qualifications of the applicant. The causes for disbarment of Stevens and of McKelvey were similar and arose out of the same transactions. So far as the mental qualifications of McKelvey are concerned, we think that no further inquiry need be made. He practiced law as a member of the bar of this state for many years. There is nothing in the record tending to show that he is subject to any mental disqualification. By reason of the facts above stated, and by reason of the fact that an examination into the moral qualifications of Stevens is now being made by the board of bar examiners, it seems to us especially appropriate that the matter of the moral qualifications of McKelvey should be the subject of examination and report by that board at the same time. It is ordered that the application of McKelvey be and it hereby is referred to the board of bar examiners of the state of California, with the direction that the board take such evidence as may be submitted to it by the applicant, and such evidence as may be submitted by the Los Angeles Bar Association, concerning the moral qualifications of the applicant. The board will report the evidence by filing a transcript or copy of it with the clerk of this court, together with its findings upon the question whether or not the applicant is possessed of such moral qualifications as to entitle him to reinstatement. If the letters and affidavits now on file with the application, or any of them, are presented as evidence before the board, the originals of such documents should be referred to in the report, but copies thereof need not be incorporated in the transcript of evidence received. When the report of the board has been filed, either the petitioner or the respondent may take exceptions to any or all of the findings of the board. The exceptions shall be presented in a manner similar to that followed in Re Ryzek, 70 Cal. App. 23, 232 P. 473, and in Re Scott, 70 Cal. App. 716, 234 P. 128.
